17-3: "Behind the now-famous State Department espionage case, involving the arrest of six persons of whom I was one, an arrest which shocked the Nation on June 7, 1945, is the story of a highly-organized campaign to switch American policy in the Far East from its long-tested course to the Soviet line."

17-5: "* * * It is the mysterious whitewash of the chief actors of the espionage case which the Congress has directed the Hobbs committee to investigate. But from behind that whitewash there emerges the pattern of a major operation performed upon Uncle Sam without his being conscious of it."

17-6: "* * * How did it come to pass that Washington since 1944 has been seeking to foist Communist members upon the sole recognized and legitimate Government of China, a maneuver equivalent to an attempt by a powerful China to introduce Earl Browder and William Z. Foster into key positions in the United States Government?"

17-7: "* * * Whose was the hand which forced the sensational resignation of Under Secretary of State Joseph C. Grew and his replacement by Dean Acheson? And was the same hand responsible for driving Ambassador Patrick Hurley into a blind alley and retirement?"

17-14: "The day before President Roosevelt announced that Stilwell had been relieved of his command, on October 30, 1944, John S. Service submitted his report No. 40 to the State Department. As disclosed months later by General Hurley in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that report was 'a general statement of how to let fall the government I was sent over there to sustain. The report was circulated among the Communists I was trying to harmonize with the Chiang Kai-shek government.'"

Q. Were these charges also repeated in substance by Congressman Judd, on October 19, 1944?—A. They were.

Q. I should like to introduce at this point document 20-4, an excerpt from Congressman Judd's remarks as they appear in the Congressional Record for that date.

"REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN JUDD, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, OCTOBER 19, 1949,
PAGES 15282-15283

"The memorandum illustrates the conniving against highest officials of the Government of China, being carried on even during the war by representatives of our Government. The Chinese Government had the right to expect that the representatives of the United States, its ally, would do their best to help it with its overwhelming problems, which it knew better than anyone else it could not possibly solve without sympathetic understanding and support from us. Instead, officials of the United States were insisting that our Government intervene to coerce the responsible heads of the Chinese Government into so-called cooperation with a Communist rebellion."

Q. Were these remarks repeated by Senator McCarthy on the floor of the Senate on January 5, 1950?—A. They were.

Q. I should like to introduce at this point, document No. 31, which is an excerpt from Senator McCarthy's remarks as they appear in the Congressional Record.

"REMARKS OF SENATOR MCCARTHY, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JANUARY 5, 1950,

"Mr. MCCARTHY. I wonder if the Senator could shed some light on a certain subject. I read in a local newspaper a short time ago that the man in charge of promotions or placements in one branch of the State Department is named John Service, the same John Service who in 1944, according to Gen. Patrick Hurley's papers, advocated that we torpedo Chiang Kai-shek, and who officially as a representative of the State Department, said that the only hope of Asia was communism. The same John Service was later picked up by the FBI on charges of espionage. He was not tried, he was not convicted, but was brought home, promoted, and put in charge of personnel and placement in the State Department.

"As I said, I read this in a local newspaper, the Times-Herald, and I wonder if the Senator could shed any light on that particular situation, as to whether or not the situation still exists, in other words, whether this man, John Service, who in 1944 said, 'Let us scuttle Chiang Kai-shek' and who said the only hope of Asia is communism, this man who was picked up by the FBI, for espionage, who was accused of having had a sizable number of secret documents in his possession which he was handing over to the Communists, is still in charge of personnel and placement, as he apparently was about a month ago when the article appeared in the newspaper."

Q. Were these remarks also repeated by Senator McCarthy before the Tydings subcommittee on March 15?—A. They were.

Q. And were these same charges repeated by Senator McCarthy on the floor of the Senate on March 30, 1950?—A. They were.

Q. At this point I would like to introduce documents 39-9, 39-16, 39-17, 39-23, 39-24, which are excerpts from Senator McCarthy's remarks appearing in the Congressional Record on that date.

DOCUMENT 39-9

"(P. 4438:) * * * In connection with this, it will be remembered that John Service, as Stilwell's political adviser, accompanied a highly secret military commission to Yenan. Upon the return of this mission, you will recall that Stilwell demanded that Chiang Kai-shek allow him to equip and arm some 300,000 Communists. Chiang Kai-shek objected on the grounds that this was part of a Soviet plot to build up the rebel forces to the extent that they would control China. Chiang Kai-shek promptly requested the recall of Stilwell and President Roosevelt relieved Stilwell of his command. It was at this time that Service submitted his Report No. 40 to the State Department, which, according to Hurley, was a plan for the removal of support from the Chiang Kai-shek government with the end result that the Communists would take over."

DOCUMENT 39-16

"(P. 4440:) When Chiang Kai-shek was fighting our war, the State Department had in China a young man named John S. Service. His task, obviously, was not to work for the communization of China. Strangely, however, he sent official reports back to the State Department urging that we torpedo our ally Chiang Kai-shek and stating, in effect, that communism was the best hope of China."

DOCUMENT 39-17

"(P. 4440:) * * * Strangely, however, he was never prosecuted. However, Joseph Grew, the Under Secretary of State, who insisted on his prosecution, was forced to resign. Two days after Grew's successor, Dean Acheson, took over as Under Secretary of State, this man—John Service—who had been picked up by the FBI and who had previously urged that communism was the best hope of China, was not only reinstated in the State Department but promoted. And finally, under Acheson, placed in charge of all placements and promotions."

DOCUMENT 39-23

"(P. 4443:) Not till I have completed my answer. J. Edgar Hoover did a phenomenal job in the Service case, and if the Department of Justice had done an equally good job, Service would not be in the Far East trying to turn the whole business over to Russia."

DOCUMENT 39-24

"(P. 4445:) * * * but I am sure that if the Senator will sit here and will listen to the material which I am presenting, he will be convinced that the clique of Lattimore, Jessup, and Service has been responsible, almost completely—under Acheson, of course—for what went on in the Far East, although there were other individuals taking part."

Q. Now, will you comment for the Board, Mr. Service, on the charge which appears in paragraph No. (4) of document 35-3 that your memorandum No. 40 which, for the information of the Board, appears as document No. 193, constitutes a plan, or proposal, as General Hurley put it, for letting fall the government which he was sent to sustain, or that it was planned for bringing about the torpedoing, as Senator McCarthy said, of Chiang Kai-shek's government?—A. Memorandum No. 40 was certainly not a plan or proposal for bringing about the collapse of China's Government. It doesn't even propose withdrawal of support of that government. The memorandum was a limited discussion of one particular phase of our problem in China and was an attempt to meet a persistent line of argument that China and China's resistance would collapse and cease if anything happened to Chiang Kai-shek or to the Central Government.

I feel it is necessary to consider this memorandum against the background of circumstances and events which occurred in China. In October of 1944 China was in extremis. If the Board will refer to our chronology of events on page 2, in the spring of 1944, in April, the Japanese commenced a systematic series of campaigns to seal off all of eastern China. They drove through central China from the North clear to the south to capture our advanced air bases and cut off the coast of eastern China. You see the main events outlined—that means the Yellow River front. They took Loyang on May 18.

Having completed the occupation of the Peiping-Hankow Railway, in late May, they commenced from the Yangtze River south to Canton in order to seal off northeastern China. They took Changsha June 18. On July 7 the situation began to look so dark it was obvious the Japanese could accomplish almost any objective they picked for themselves.

President Roosevelt sent a telegram to Chiang Kai-shek recommending that General Stilwell, the commander in the theater, be placed in command of all Chinese forces. This was a drastic effort to force some sort of military unity in China so that the two armies, which were blockading and opposing each other, would be unified, and so that we could have perhaps more of a fighting chance of stopping the Japanese and holding part of China.

There were a long series of telegrams on this subject—repeated requests from President Roosevelt that the Generalissimo implement his agreement, which he had given in principle. This proposal to put Stilwell in command of all forces was the "genesis" of the Hurley mission and it was the primary task which General Hurley was to accomplish.

The Japanese campaign continued. In August they captured one of the most important forward air bases. They moved on. They were moving up toward Kweilin without heavy opposition; they would soon be in a position where they could threaten Chungking or move toward our main base at Kunming.

By the time this memorandum was drafted, the Yen-an mission had been in the Communist areas for 2½ months so all members had done extensive travel in the actual guerrilla areas. We had talked to a large number of rescued pilots, who had traveled long distances and we talked to foreign correspondents and other travelers, so in addition to our own observations in Yen-an, we had a broad basis for coming to a conclusion that the Communists were so strong and such an important factor that they could not be ignored and would have to be expected to play an important part in China's future.

These views are summarized in my memorandum, in Document No. 192.

Early in October we heard at Yen-an by scuttlebutt—by rumor—that the only subject of negotiation in Chungking was the Generalissimo's demand for the recall of Stilwell and that there was a great deal of weight being given by some of the negotiators, and certainly encouraged from the Chinese side, that we simply had to support Chiang Kai-shek, and that if Chiang went down, China went down, and that we were in a sense dependent on Chiang Kai-shek.

Against this background I wrote my memorandum, saying we are not dependent on Chiang Kai-shek; Chiang Kai-shek is dependent on us; that for us to waste time talking about who is going to be the commander is just a waste of time, and that we should adopt a more realistic, and, if you wish, hard-boiled policy toward Chiang Kai-shek. It was not, I repeat, a proposal to let fall or a plan to cause the collapse of the Central Government.

Q. Mr. Chairman, in view of the importance of this memorandum to all the charges in this area, I should like to ask that Document No. 193 be included in the transcript at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done.

Report No. 40

U. S. ARMY OBSERVER SECTION, APO 879,

October 10, 1944.

Subject: The Need for Greater Realism in our Relations with Chiang Kai-shek.
To: General Stilwell, Commanding General, USAF-CBI.

1. You have allowed me, as a political officer attached to your staff, to express myself freely in the past regarding the situation in China as I have seen it. Although in Yen-an I am only a distant observer of recent developments in Chungking and Washington, I trust that you will permit the continued frankness which I have assumed in the attached memorandum regarding the stronger policy which I think it is now time for us to adopt toward Chiang Kai-shek and the Central Government.

2. It is obvious, of course, that you cannot act independently along the lines suggested. The situation in China and the measures necessary to meet it have both military importance and far-reaching political significance; the two aspects cannot be separated. Because of this interrelation, and because of the high level on which action in China must be taken, there must be agreement and mutual support between our political and military branches. But this will be ineffective without clear decision and forceful implementation by the President.

3. It is requested that copies of this report be transmitted, as usual, to the American Ambassador at Chungking and Headquarters, USAF-CBI, for the information of Mr. Davies.

/S/ JOHN S. SERVICE.

Enclosure :

Memorandum, as stated.

"MEMORANDUM

"Our dealings with Chiang Kai-shek apparently continue on the basis of the unrealistic assumption that he is China and that he is necessary to our cause. It is time, for the sake of the war and also for our future interests in China, that we take a more realistic line.

"Kuomintang Government is in crisis. Recent defeats have exposed its military ineffectiveness and will hasten the approaching economic disaster. Passive inability to meet these crises in a constructive way, stubborn unwillingness to submerge selfish power-seeking in democratic unity, and the statements of Chiang himself to the Peoples Political Council and on October 10, are sufficient evidence of the bankruptcy of Kuomintang leadership.

"With the glaring exposure of the Kuomintang's failure, dissatisfaction within China is growing rapidly. The prestige of the Party was never lower, and Chiang is losing the respect he once enjoyed as a leader.

"In the present circumstances, the Kuomintang is dependent on American support for survival. But we are in no way dependent on the Kuomintang.

"We do not need it for military reasons. It has lost the southern air-bases and cannot hold any section of the seacoast. Without drastic reforms—which must have a political base—its armies cannot fight the Japanese effectively no matter how many arms we give them. But it will not permit those reforms because its war against Japan is secondary to its desire to maintain its own undemocratic power.

"On the other hand, neither the Kuomintang nor any other Chinese regime, because of the sentiment of the people, can refuse American forces the use of Chinese territory against the Japanese. And the Kuomintang's attitude prevents the utilization of other forces, such as the Communist or Provincial troops, who should be more useful than the Kuomintang's demoralized armies.

"We need not fear Kuomintang surrender or opposition. The Party and Chiang will stick to us because our victory is certain and it is their only hope for continued power.

"But our support of the Kuomintang will not stop its normally traitorous relations with the enemy and will only encourage it to continue sowing the seeds of future civil war by plotting with the present puppets for eventual consolidation of the occupied territories against the Communist-led forces of popular resistance.

"We need not fear the collapse of the Kuomintang Government. All the other groups in China want to defend themselves and fight Japan. Any new government under any other than the present reactionary control will be more cooperative and better able to mobilize the country.

"Actually, by continued and exclusive support of the Kuomintang, we tend to prevent the reforms and democratic reorganization of the government which are essential for the revitalization of China's war effort. Encouraged by our support the Kuomintang will continue in its present course, progressively losing the confidence of the people and becoming more and more impotent. Ignored by us, and excluded from the Government and joint prosecution of the war, the Communists and other groups will be forced to guard their own interests by more direct opposition.

"We need not support the Kuomintang for international political reasons. The day when it was expedient to inflate Chiang's status to one of the 'Big Four' is past, because with the obvious certainty of defeat, Japan's Pan-Asia propaganda loses its effectiveness. We cannot hope that China under the present Kuomintang can be an effective balance to Soviet Russia, Japan, or the British Empire in the Far East.

"On the contrary, artificial inflation of Chiang's status only adds to his unreasonableness. The example of a democratic, nonimperialistic China will be much better counterpropaganda in Asia than the present regime, which, even in books like 'China's Destiny', hypnotizes itself with ideas of consolidating minority nations (such as the 'Southern Peninsula'), and protecting the 'rights' and at the same time national ties of its numerous emigrants (to such areas as Thailand, Malaya and the East Indies). Finally, the perpetuation in power of the present Kuomintang can only mean a weak and disunited China—a sure cause of international involvements in the Far East. The key to stability must be a strong, unified China. This can be accomplished only on a democratic foundation.

"We need not support Chiang in the belief that he represents pro-American or democratic groups. All the people and all other political groups of importance in China are friendly to the United States and look to it for the salvation of the country, now and after the war.

"In fact, Chiang has lost the confidence and respect of most of the American-educated, democratically minded liberals and intellectuals. The Chen brothers, Military, and Secret police cliques which control the Party and are Chiang's main supports are the most chauvinist elements in the country. The present Party ideology, as shown in Chiang's own books 'China's Destiny' and 'Chinese Economic Theory', is fundamentally anti-foreign and anti-democratic, both politically and economically.

"Finally, we feel no tics of gratitude to Chiang. The men he has kept around him have proved selfish and corrupt, incapable and obstructive. Chiang's own dealings with us have been an opportunist combination of extravagant demands and unfulfilled promises, wheedling and bargaining, bluff and blackmail. Chiang did not resist Japan until forced by his own people. He has fought only passively—not daring to mobilize his own people. He has sought to have us save him—so that he can continue his conquest of his own country. In the process, he has 'worked' us for all we were worth.

"We seem to forget that Chiang is an Oriental; that his background and vision are limited; that his position is built on skill as an extremely adroit political manipulator and a stubborn, shrewd bargainer; that he mistakes kindness and flattery for weakness; and that he listens to his own instrument of force rather than reason.

"Our policy toward China should be guided by two facts. First, we cannot hope to deal successfully with Chiang without being hard-boiled. Second, we cannot hope to solve China's problems (which are now our problems) without consideration of the opposition forces—Communist, Provincial and liberal.

"The parallel with Yugoslavia has been drawn before but is becoming more and more apt. It is as impractical to seek Chinese unity, the use of the Communist forces, and the mobilization of the population in the rapidly growing occupied areas by discussion in Chungking with the Kuomintang alone as it was to seek the solution of these problems through Nikhailovitch and King Peter's government in London, ignoring Tito.

"We should not be swayed by pleas of the danger of China's collapse. This is an old trick of Chiang's.

*"There may be a collapse of the Kuomintang government; but it will not be the collapse of China's resistance. There may be a period of some confusion, but the eventual gains of the Kuomintang's collapse will more than make up for this. The crisis itself makes reform more urgent—and at the same time increases the weight to our influence. *The crisis is the time to push—not to relax.

"We should not let Chiang divert us from the important questions by wasting time in futile discussion as to who is to be American commander. This is an obvious subterfuge.

"There is only one man qualified by experience for the job. And the fact is that no one who knows anything about China and is concerned over American rather than Chiang's interests will satisfy Chiang.

"We should end the hollow pretense that China is unified and that we can talk only to Chiang. This puts the trump card in Chiang's hands.

"Public announcement that the President's representative had made a visit to the Communist capital at Yanan would have a significance that no Chinese would miss—least of all the Generalissimo. The effect would be great even if it were only a demonstration with no real consultation. But it should be more than a mere demonstration; we must, for instance, plan on eventual use of the Communist armies and this cannot be purely on Kuomintang terms.

"Finally, if these steps do not succeed, we should stop veiling our negotiations with China in complete secrecy. This shields Chiang and is the voluntary abandonment of our strongest weapon.

"Chinese public opinion would swing violently against Chiang if he were shown obstructive and noncooperative with the United States. We should not be misled by the relatively very few Kuomintang die-hards; they are not the people. The Kuomintang Government could not withstand public belief that the United States was considering withdrawal of military support or recognition of the Kuomintang as the leader of Chinese resistance.

"More than ever, we hold all the aces in Chiang's poker game. It is time we started playing them.

"OCTOBER 10, 1944.

"JOHN S. SERVICE."

Q. I take it, Mr. Service, when you prepared your memorandum you had no consciousness you were making a proposal which was in any way inimical to the best interests of the United States in the conduct of the war at that time?—A. Certainly not. The most effective conduct of the war was a primary consideration but this was not in any way different from the policy which General Stilwell had been following and which we had been following in China.

Q. In fact, it wasn't any different from General Stilwell's policy but precisely what General Stilwell's policy was.—A. Certainly, as can be seen in the white paper on pages 68 to 70. General Stilwell said: "It is not a choice between throwing me out or losing Chiang Kai-shek and possibly China. It is a case of losing China's potential effort if Chiang Kai-shek is allowed to make removals now."

Q. As a matter of fact, the telegram which you are reading from, which appears on page 68 of the white paper, was sent on September 26, 1944, wasn't it?—A. That is correct.

Q. Almost a little over 2 weeks before you prepared your memorandum of October 10, 1944?—A. That is correct, but I should point out I of course had absolutely no knowledge of these telegrams by General Stilwell until I read the white paper.

Q. Yes, but the fact that General Stilwell had sent the telegram of September 26, taking substantially the identical position which you took subsequently in a telegram dated October 10, tends to indicate that you were in complete unity with General Stilwell, who was indeed your superior at that time. Is that not correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. I should like to introduce at this point, into the transcript, document No. 35-5.

"(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Relations Committee December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

"(1) HURLEY. President Roosevelt sent me to China, first as an officer in the United States Army, as his personal representative, with a directive to (a) prevent the collapse of the National Government of the Republic of China; (b) keep the Chinese Army in the war; (c) harmonize relations between the Chinese and American military establishments; (d) bring about closer and more harmonious relations between the American Embassy in Chungking and the Chinese Government.

"(2) That part of our mission was accomplished. It was not accomplished without the relief or removal in China of some very admirable Americans, who either could not go along with the American policy or were incompatible with the officials of the Chinese Government with whom we had to deal * * * (p. 29-30).

"We had in China a secondary objective (a) to unify the anti-Japanese military forces in China; (b) to prevent civil war in China; (c) to support the aspirations of the Chinese people to establish for themselves a free, united, democratic government.

"(3) On these objectives we also had the opposition of most of the career diplomats. * * * Notwithstanding this opposition we did succeed for the first time during China's 8 years of war against Japan in reestablishing discussions between the Communist armed party and the National Government. We did bring Mao Tse-tung * * * and Chiang Kai-shek * * * together in conference. * * * We did prevent civil war among the factions of China, at least as long as we remained there (p. 30-31).

"(4) HURLEY. At that time our policy in China was clearly defined and could be stated roughly as follows:

"1. To unify all anti-Japanese military forces in China, and

"2. To support the aspirations of the Chinese people to establish for themselves a free, united, democratic government (p. 32)."

Q. I ask you to examine that document, the various statements there by General Hurley of the American policy objectives in China. Do you disagree with any of these stated objectives of American policy as General Hurley described them to the Senate?—A. I certainly did not.

Q. As a matter of fact, did you agree with all of them?—A. Yes.

Q. Did your views differ from General Hurley's in certain respects as to how these policy objectives might most effectively be accomplished?—A. We raise a question in a way when we ask if my opinions differ, because General Stilwell and I never had any discussion on the matter and there was never any pointing up of issues at the time.

Q. By General Stilwell, I take it you mean General Hurley?—A. General Hurley, I mean. I would say though that—and Secretary Byrnes has said the same thing—actually there was no disagreement in objectives. American policy in China was clear and all of us agreed in it. We differed however on the best methods to achieve that policy. General Hurley put great emphasis on one particular feature, and that was support of Chiang Kai-shek and central government, and he believed that by persuasion along he would induce Chiang Kai-shek to make the concessions necessary to bring about a coalition government and a unification of Chinese armies.

At the first we all agreed that that had to be tried, but eventually as the negotiations had gone on for some time with no success and as became apparent later with only a worsening of the situation, some of us believed that we had to take more direct action and in effect tell Chiang Kai-shek instead of asking him, and that is the only disagreement which we had on China policy with General Hurley.

Q. When you say "in effect tell" Chiang Kai-shek rather than ask him, you mean, I take it, that the United States influence or United States economic and military aid had to be conditioned upon Chiang Kai-shek's taking reciprocal action which was necessary in the interest of promoting the war against Japan?—A. Basically the point at issue was the use of the Communist armies. We were hampered in making our aid conditional during the war—there were some who recommended it in a drastic form. I always argued that you can't stop aid to an ally during the middle of a war, so that the only way that we could attack this question of the use of the Communist armies if Generalissimo Chiang wouldn't agree was to simply tell the Generalissimo, as we did in the case of Yugoslavia, we are going to arm any forces that are in position to actively engage and resist the Japanese. That is the position which we reached about the middle of February 1945.

Q. At this point I would like to introduce document 35-21, which is an excerpt from the testimony of the Secretary of State Byrnes.

Mr. MORELAND. In the transcript?

Q. Into the transcript.

DOCUMENT 35-21

Hurley—Hearings Before Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 5, 6, 7, 10, 1945

"(1) BYRNES. * * * During the war the immediate goal of the United States in China was to promote a military union of the several political factions in order to bring their combined power to bear upon our common enemy, Japan. Our longer-range goal, then as now, and a goal of at least equal importance, is the development of a strong, united and democratic China (p. 189).

"(2) BYRNES. * * * We believe, as we have long believed and consistently demonstrated, that the government of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek affords the most satisfactory base for a developing democracy. But we also believe that it must be broadened to include the representatives of those large and well organized groups who are now without any voice in the Government of China (p. 189-190).

"(3) BYRNES. * * * To the extent that our influence is a factor, success will depend upon our capacity to exercise that influence in the light of shifting conditions in such a way as to encourage concessions by the Central Government, by the so-called Communists, and by the other factions (p. 190).

"(4) BYRNES. * * * If I understand correctly what Ambassador Hurley has stated to me, and subsequently to the press and to this committee, he entertains no disagreement with this conception of our policy (p. 190).

"(5) BYRNES. That phase of our policy upon which Ambassador Hurley has placed the greatest emphasis is our support of the National Government of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek (p. 191)."

Q. I would like to call your attention particularly to paragraph marked "(5)" in this document, Mr. Service. I take it that Secretary Byrnes is there referring to what you have just testified to, namely that General Hurley emphasized above all others supporting Chiang regardless of this—regardless, period.—A. That is correct. The Secretary has given a very concise and clear summary in the paragraphs above of American policy, to which all of us subscribed, and he comments without elaboration that the phase on which Ambassador Hurley placed the greatest emphasis was the support of the Nationalist Government. I think I should say that General Hurley's own concept of his instructions developed, changed from time to time. The clearest indication of this in public form is on page 71 of the white paper. General Hurley himself said that his original instructions—General Hurley, I should say, said in August that his instructions from the President were: "(1) To serve as personal representative of the President to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek; (2) to promote harmonious relations between Chiang and General Joseph Stilwell and to facilitate the latter's exercise of command over the Chinese armies placed under his direction; (3) to perform certain additional duties respecting military supplies; and (4) to maintain intimate contact with Ambassador Gauss."

As will be seen from the following material in the white paper and from the excerpts which we just discussed, by the beginning of 1945—

Q. By "excerpts we just discussed" you refer to document 35-5?—A. 35-5.

Mr. ACHILLES. Isn't that 35-21, 5?

A. No.

Q. Secretary Byrnes' statement is 35-21; 35-5, it is General Hurley's various statements of objective, I believe.

Mr. ACHILLES. Right.

A. By the passage of several months, Ambassador Hurley's own account of his instructions, which were oral, had developed a great deal.

Q. Yes. Now I would like at this point to introduce document 35-4 in the transcript.

DOCUMENT 35-4

(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Relations Committee December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

"(1) WILEY. (2) That there were in the Department certain individuals that you mentioned; that these individuals were cognizant of the policy laid down by the State Department and by two Presidents, but that they apparently did not cooperate with you in carrying out that policy; is that correct? (p. 159).

"(2) HURLEY. That is correct (p. 159).

"(3) WILEY. (3) Were these individuals motivated in your judgment by simply a disagreement as to the validity of the policy, or do you think there was back of their motives something else? And if you have any information or facts that would clarify the answer, I would like to have it (p. 159).

"(4) HURLEY. I think, Senator, your first question that these men disagreed with the American policy is correct, but my contention with them * * * [was] that when the "die is cast," when the decision is made, when the policy is announced by duly constituted authority, it becomes the duty of every one of us to make that policy effective; and I charge that these gentlemen did not do that. They continued to snipe the policy and tried to defeat it. * * * (p. 160).

"(5) WILEY. * * * Was there anything back of this 'inability' to put it that way, on their part, to play ball with you as the American representative, to carry out the President's foreign policy? Was there anything back of it except simply their own stubbornness, their inability to see that it was their obligation to play ball, or were they disloyal, or were they conniving with the Communists, or what was the picture? (p. 160).

"(6) HURLEY. They were disloyal to the American policy. I would not say they were disloyal to the United States Government. I think possibly that some of them were imbued with the crusader spirit, that they believed that it would be best for China to destroy the National Government and the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek, but I tried to tell them that I could not argue, while I could recommend to Chiang Kai-shek and the Government the changes that I thought should take place—which I did, and a lot of changes did take place—that while I might agree with them on a lot of their criticism, our directive, mine and theirs, was to prevent the collapse of the Government and to uphold the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek and, whether I believed in it or not, as soon as that policy was made by my superior it became my duty to make it effective (p. 161)."

Q. I direct your attention particularly, Mr. Service, to paragraph (6). Mr. Hurley is there referring to the various Foreign Service officers whom he had asserted had been disloyal to him, and I direct your attention particularly to the sentence, "I would not say they were disloyal to the United States Government." That is a quote. "I would not say they were disloyal to the United States Government." Then, "I think possibly that some of them were imbued with the crusader spirit * * *." I take it from that statement of General Hurley that whatever he thought about you and other Foreign Service officers, he at least did not regard you as disloyal to the United States Government. Is that a fair reading of his testimony?—A. Yes. He says that we were—he said in the previous sentence we were disloyal to the American policy. To that I would add a footnote—as he conceived it—but he goes on to say that we were not disloyal to the United States Government.

Q. Yes. Now then, with regard to the suggestion that you and others were disloyal to the United States policy, I should like to introduce document 35-7 into the transcript, which are excerpts from the testimony of Secretary of State Byrnes concerning particularly Mr. Service's report No. 40—that is to say, document 193—and I ask that that be included in the transcript.

The CHAIRMAN. It shall be included.

DOCUMENT 35-7

(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

"(1) BYRNES. The specific action of John Service to which Ambassador Hurley referred in his conversation with me was the preparation of a memorandum on October 10, 1944. I have also read this memorandum.

"(2) Before I turn to its contents, I wish to call attention to a few facts, as they have been presented to me. At the time this memorandum was prepared by Mr. Service, he was not attached to the Embassy at Chungking. Although he retained his status as a Foreign Service officer, he was attached to the staff of General Stilwell as a political observer in Yenan. He was at the time administratively responsible to General Stilwell and not to the Embassy (pp. 196-197) * * *.

"(3) BYRNES. Ambassador Hurley, as of that date * * * was not in charge of the United States Embassy in Chungking.

"Under these circumstances, it seems to me, it cannot be said that anything Mr. Service wrote constituted insubordination to Ambassador Hurley (p. 197) * * *.

"(4) BYRNES. The Service report was addressed to General Stilwell. It was also routed to the Embassy in Chungking. The Embassy forwarded it to the Department without endorsing its conclusions, but with a noncommittal covering memorandum indicating that it represented the views of a single political observer (p. 198) * * *.

"(5) BYRNES. It is not my purpose to dwell at greater length upon the two documents. In my opinion, based upon the information which has thus far been presented to me, there is nothing in them to support the charge that either Mr. Atcheson or Mr. Service was guilty of the slightest disloyalty to his superior officers (p. 198).

"(6) What it amounts to is that within proper channels they expressed to those under whom they served certain views which differed to a greater or less degree from the policies of the Government as then defined. Of course, it is the duty of every officer of the United States to abide by and to administer the declared policy of his Government. But conditions change, and often change quickly in the affairs of governments. Whenever an official honestly believes that changed conditions require it, he should not hesitate to express his views to his superior officers (p. 199).

"(7) I should be profoundly unhappy to learn that an officer of the Department of State, within or without the Foreign Service, might feel bound to refrain from submitting through proper channels an honest report or recommendation for fear of offending me or anyone else in the Department. If that day should arrive, I will have lost the very essence of the assistance and guidance I require for the successful discharge of the heavy responsibilities of my office" (p. 199).

Q. I take it, Mr. Service, that this testimony of Secretary Byrnes may be said to reveal he not only did not regard you as disloyal to the United States Government but not even to, nor to American policy, but not even to General Hurley personally. Is that your understanding of this testimony?—A. That is correct.

Secretary Byrnes says there is nothing in them to support the charge that either Mr. Acheson or Mr. Service was even slightly disloyal to his superior officers.

Q. Now, in that connection, as to who your superior officer was, I should like to introduce document No. 35-6, and I ask that that be included in the transcript.

DOCUMENT 35-6

Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
December 5, 6, 10, 1945

"(1) CONNALLY. Was Mr. Service serving under you in China at that time?

"(2) HURLEY. Well, that is disputed, sir. He was in the State Department, and I was Ambassador.

"(3) CONNALLY. Well, where was he?

"(4) HURLEY. He was in China (p. 16).

"(5) CONNALLY. Well, was he not under you?

"(6) HURLEY. No, sir. If he had been, I would have taken him out immediately. I could not control him. He said he was serving the commander of American forces in China—anything to oppose the American policy of sustaining the Government of the Republic.

"(7) CONNALLY. Well, what was his status? I do not know him. I never heard of him until you brought him up; but what was his status out there? Was he attached to the Embassy, or was he the adviser to the American general, or what was he?

"(8) HURLEY. He was a foreign-service diplomat, who had been assigned as political adviser to the American general.

"(9) CONNALLY. Well, then he was not directly under your organization?

"(10) HURLEY. Well, eventually he was * * *" (p. 17).

Q. In this document General Hurley seems to suggest that there was some question whether you were responsible to him or to General Stilwell, does he not?—A. He does.

Q. Was there in fact any question whatsoever as to who your superior was and under whose orders you were operating?—A. Absolutely none. My original instructions clearly stated I would be completely under Army orders and all during the period from August 18, 1943, until April 12, 1945, I traveled and performed all my duties under Army orders.

Q. I should like to introduce into the transcript at this point documents number 94-1, 94-2, and 94-3. These documents consist of three letters from Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, the first of them dated June 29, 1943, the second consisting of two pages dated November 22, 1944, and the third dated January 5, 1945, all of which relate to this particular question. I ask that they be included in the transcript.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 29, 1943.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Political factors have proved to be of major importance in the prosecution of the war in the China-Burma-India Theater. Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, Commanding General of the U. S. Army Forces in that theater, is therefore urgently in need of having trained political observers assigned to his command to supplement the work done by his military intelligence.

General Stilwell has indicated the names of certain Foreign Service Officers who would be of assistance if sent to the theater for this purpose, as follows:

To be sent to the U. S. Embassy, Chungking, China, for detail to the Commanding General, U. S. Army Forces, China-Burma-India: Raymond P. Ludden, John S. Service, John K. Emmerson.

To be sent to the U. S. Mission at New Delhi for detail to the Commanding General, U. S. Army Forces, China-Burma-India: Kenneth C. Krentz.

The duties of these officers would not only be to collect Chinese, Indian, and Japanese information of interest to General Stilwell, but also to be of service to commanders in the field in matters affecting relations with the various Burmese factions, British colonial administrators, the Free Thais, the French in Indo-China, and the Indo-Chinese.

Any assistance that you can give in connection with this matter will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 22, 1944.

The honorable the ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer again to your letter of November 8, 1944 in regard to the release of three of the four Foreign Service Officers who have been attached to the United States Army Forces in China, Burma, and India.

Your need for the restoration of these officers to regular Foreign Service duty is very evident. It was presented in full to Generals Sultan and Wedemeyer, the Commanding Generals of the India-Burma and of the China Theaters, respectively, and their views on the matter have now been received.

Unfortunately the only officer who, it appears, can be spared is Mr. Ludden, and General Wedemeyer indicates his regret at losing his services. Nevertheless when he returns from the field in approximately two months General Wedemeyer states that in accordance with your request Mr. Ludden will be given prompt air transportation to Washington.

As for Messrs. Davies, Service and Emmerson, who, as you know, are all detailed for duty in China, General Wedemeyer indicates that it is his conviction that unless these three officers are retained, military activities will be hampered. I therefore hope that their assignment to the China Theater need not be changed.

There is no political adviser assigned to the India-Burma Theater at the present time. General Sultan speaks of the former China-Burma-India Theater as having been full of political complexities and of your Foreign Service Officers having been an indispensable link with the State Department in connection therewith, as well as of the superior manner in which they performed their duties. Being without a political adviser not only would hamper our military activities, he states, but the British, who have a regularly assigned political adviser at Southeast Asia Command Headquarters and thoroughly understand such a position, would not comprehend General Sultan's having to secure advice from the American Mission in New Delhi. On the basis of the assignment of a really qualified political adviser to the India-Burma Theater being a necessity, he earnestly requests that Mr. Max Waldo Bishop be assigned by the State Department to the India-Burma Theater. At the same time he appreciates your need for having the services of all possible Foreign Service officers and will keep the situation constantly in mind so that as soon as the need for a political adviser is at an end this will be reported.

I am very aware of how great your need is to have as many of your Foreign Service officers as possible returned to regular duty. At the same time, these two theaters (India-Burma and China) have the most unusual political problems confronting them constantly, and your help in the matter is a real necessity.

In view of the above I trust that the request of General Sultan to have Mr. Max Waldo Bishop assigned to the India-Burma Theater, and General Wedemeyer's desire to retain Messrs. Davies, Service, and Emmerson in the China Theater can be acceded to.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 5, 1945.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of December 26, 1944, with respect to the Foreign Service Officers assigned as political advisors in the China Theater.

As the State Department has already been advised, General Wedemeyer has informed the War Department that Mr. John Davies is preparing to leave Chungking for assignment to the Moscow Embassy. General Wedemeyer is very desirous that Mr. Davies remain in Chungking, however, until the arrival of Mr. John Service who, it is understood, should be ready to leave Washington for China early in January.

Your letter indicates that the Embassy in Chungking is now sufficiently staffed so as to obviate the necessity of having a political advisor detailed to the U. S. Forces in that city, although you believe that the retention of one or two officers in Chinese Communist territory is advantageous, and you raise the question of releasing any or all of the Foreign Service Officers. Your need for Foreign Service Officers and your request that three out of the four advisors assigned to China Theater be released was communicated to General Wedemeyer in November. As I advised in my letter of November 22, 1944, he indicated that unless three of the original four advisors were retained, military activities would be hampered. Since that time military and political problems in the China Theater have increased. However, General Wedemeyer has again been queried as to whether he can relinquish the services of the Foreign Service Officers now assigned to his headquarters. Your indication that if General Wedemeyer requests the retention of Mr. Ludden you believe favorable consideration could be given thereto, as well as the question of his and Mr. Emmerson's proceeding to the United States for leave and consultation has also been submitted to General Wedemeyer. You will be informed as promptly as possible of his reply.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

(Off record discussion, short recess.)

Q. I also offer for inclusion in the transcript document No. 94-4, which is a copy of the telegram from the Department of State to the Ambassador at Chungking detailing Mr. Service to the Army in accordance with the Secretary of War Stimson's request.

[Telegram sent]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Aug. 10, 1943, 10:00 p. m.

AMERICAN EMBASSY, CHUNGKING, 1081:

Monroe B. Hall, Class VI, New Delhi, has been directed to proceed to Chungking as soon as possible for consultation with General Stilwell after which he will return to New Delhi. He will be stationed at New Delhi but will be subject to instructions from General Stilwell.

John K. Emmerson, Class VII, Lima, has been designated Second Secretary of Embassy at Chungking.

Ludden at Kunming is designated Second Secretary of Embassy at Chungking. He will retain Commission as Consul at Kunming. Should proceed upon arrival of Langdon. This transfer not made at his request nor for his convenience. Transportation expenses, per diem, and shipment effects, Kunming to Chungking, authorized subject Travel Regulations. Air travel authorized. Expenses chargeable "Transportation, Foreign Service."

Hall, Emmerson, Ludden, and John S. Service are attached to the staff of the Commanding General, U. S. Army Forces, China-Burma-India, and are subject to instructions from General Stilwell and authorized to travel to any country or place which he may designate.

While Department has authorized expenses for Hall, Ludden, and Emmerson in proceeding to Chungking, it assumes, as in the case of Davies, the Army will provide travel expenses and per diem for such missions as General Stilwell will direct for all four officers.

HULL.

(Off-record discussion.)

Q. Now, Mr. Service, you were assigned by the State Department to the commanding general of the CBI theater on August 10, 1943. How long did you remain attached to the commanding general of the CBI theater?—A. I was returned to active duty in the State Department on April 12, 1945.

Q. And in the meantime General Stilwell had been recalled on October 19, 1944, had he not? A. That is correct.

Q. And you returned to the United States at that time, did you not? A. Soon after that time, under Army orders.

Q. And you were subsequently recalled to China by General Wedemeyer, were you not? A. Yes; and returned to China under Army orders.

Q. But you remained attached to the commanding general, CBI theater, throughout? A. That is correct.

Q. And until April 12, 1945? A. (Nodded yes.)

The CHAIRMAN. The answer then is "Yes" to the last question? A. Yes.

Q. In that connection I ask you to refer to document 35-7, which has already been introduced into the transcript, and particularly paragraphs 2 and 3 thereof. Secretary Byrnes makes it clear, does he not, that you were in no sense and at no time a subordinate of General Hurley but of the commanding general of the theater? A. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt? Do you intend sections 2 and 3 to be written into the transcript?

Q. No, not again, just refer to them, since that has already been included in the transcript.

Now referring back to document 35-6, particularly paragraph 10, General Hurley seems to close that colloquy with Senator Connally by the suggestion that you eventually were a subordinate officer, but as a matter of fact you were not, ever?—A. I never was subordinate to Ambassador Hurley.

Q. You never were during his entire tenure of office as Ambassador a member of the staff of the Embassy or in any way responsible to General Hurley?—A. I was never administratively a member of the Embassy staff. The final orders under which I returned from China to the United States were issued by the Army, they were Army orders.

The CHAIRMAN. I have a question here.

Mr. STEVENS. Could you clarify for us or have it clarified, the relation to exist between General Stilwell and Mr. Hurley as a personal representative of the President? Did Mr. Hurley, in other words, feel that General Stilwell was responsible to him in his mission? A. I have never seen such a statement. I do not believe that the military commander of a theater would normally be considered subordinate to a personal representative of the President. I would say that General Stilwell's immediate superior was General Marshall, and eventually the President as Commander in Chief.

Mr. ACHILLES. May we just clarify for the record the dates that General Hurley stayed in China? Is it correct that he first arrived in China as the President's personal representative on September 6, 1944?

A. That is correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. When he was made Ambassador to China, that was done while he was in China?

A. No.

Mr. ACHILLES. He didn't return to the United States?

A. He was continuously in China from September 6 until the date of his appointment as ambassador, which was November 30, 1944. He did not actually present his credentials until one of the first days of January 1945, but he functioned as ambassador from November 1930. He left China on February 19, 1945, and returned to the United States for consultation. Page 5, if you have it.

Mr. ACHILLES. And then he returned again?

A. To Chungking. The date is not here but it was about April 22 or 23, 1945.

Mr. ACHILLES. And then he remained?

A. Which was after I had left China, it seems to me, and then he remained in China until September 22, 1945, when he returned to the United States for the last time.

Mr. ACHILLES. For the last time, yes.

Q. Now, you have testified, Mr. Service, that you were recalled to Washington under Army orders at about the same time as General Stilwell was recalled on October 19, 1944, and I believe that you also testified that you thereafter remained attached to the commanding general of the CBI theater during the period while you were back in the United States, and that thereafter you returned at General Wedemeyer's request to China to continue to serve on the staff of the commanding general of the theater. Will you describe to the Board how you came to be attached to General Wedemeyer's staff after General Stilwell was recalled?—A. There were four of us Foreign Service officers who had been assigned to General Stilwell at his request. At the time of General Stilwell's recall, I believe that the State Department assumed that our assignment would be terminated and that we would come back to active duty under the State Department. I believe in the very first days of November the State Department addressed a letter to Secretary Stimson asking for the return of all of us or all but one officer. To that letter Secretary Stimson replied in document 94-2, saying that General Wedemeyer wished to retain at least three of us—Davies, Service, and Emmerson. It was on the basis of that request that my assignment with the Army was continued and never terminated.

Q. Well, particularly do you know what caused the revision of plans and the occasion for your return to serve with General Wedemeyer after you were under the impression that you were about to discontinue that work?—A. It had been expected when the Department assumed that I would be released that I would be assigned to Moscow, to the Embassy there. Subsequently, in late December, while the negotiations with the Army were still proceeding, John Davies, who had remained in Chungking, had a disagreement with Ambassador Hurley, in which Ambassador Hurley's reaction was so violent that it became necessary to remove John Davies from Chungking immediately. The State Department telephoned to me out in California, where I was on leave, and asked if I would be willing to return to Chungking and how soon, if I could leave in a few days. I said, "Of course."

Q. Were you advised that General Wedemeyer had particularly requested—
A. Certainly.

Q. Requested that you be detailed to fill this vacancy?—A. That is right, that is correct, and there was another consideration which I think should be mentioned which influenced the State Department in its willingness to release me or to extend my assignment, and that was the very important consideration of receiving intelligence on the Chinese Communists. That was a field in which I had done a great deal of work. I had a solid basis of personal acquaintance with the principal Communist leaders. The State Department did not feel that they were in a position to send an Embassy officer up there, so that from the State Department's point of view the only way they could continue to receive reports, direct reporting on the Chinese Communists, was by having a State Department man assigned to the Army, so that the Army would detail him to Yen-an a good deal of the time. We do not have that letter but it is in the file in which it is very clearly stated as a condition of my return to China, that I would spend a large part of my time in Yen-an and that the principal duty would be reporting on the Chinese Communists.

The CHAIRMAN. Who in the State Department made that telephone call?—A. Mr. John Carter Vincent, who at that time was Director of—I am not sure, he was either Chief of the Division of Chinese Affairs or possibly Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs.

Q. Now at the time of your return, then, to serve with General Wedemeyer, Ambassador, or rather General Hurley had already become Ambassador, had he not?—A. That is correct.

Q. Now, at the time of your return at General Wedemeyer's request, do you know whether he had knowledge of your report No. 40, which is document No. 193, which has been introduced into the transcript?—A. By "he" you mean General Wedemeyer?

Q. General Wedemeyer, yes.—A. I cannot positively say that he had knowledge of it, but I am convinced that he must have had knowledge of it because the paper had been discussed in headquarters, it was well known to the Assistant Chief of Staff for G-2.

Q. Who was that?—A. Col. Joseph Dickey. It was well known to Ambassador Hurley, who had already taken violent exception to it in discussions in Chungking. General Wedemeyer was familiar with my views, and I have always taken it for granted and I am sure it is correct that he certainly knew of my memorandum No. 40.

Q. So you think that—in your opinion anyway—A. My conviction.

Q. It is your conviction that General Wedemeyer was familiar with your report before he requested your return to China?—A. Certainly.

Q. For service on his staff?—A. That is right.

Q. Did he ever discuss—did he ever at any time discuss this with you, this memorandum, or this report, or the views expressed in it?—A. He certainly discussed the views I expressed in it. We had a number of discussions on general policy questions.

Q. Did he ever indicate that he regarded the general policy view that you expressed as being in any way inimical to the interests of the United States?—A. Quite to the contrary. He welcomed the views, and our document No. 204 was written at his specific request, and he said that he agreed with the views that he put forth.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask a question, please, Mr. Service? You mentioned a letter that specified your return and assignment to General Wedemeyer. Can you give us enough identification of that so that we may obtain it?—A. It is a letter to which Secretary Stimson's letter of January 5 is a reply. It will be a letter in the last days of December or early January.

The CHAIRMAN. December 26.

A. You will note here—this is the letter of Secretary Stimson—that the—

The CHAIRMAN. You are reading from what document?

A. 94-3.

"Your letter indicates that the Embassy in Chungking is now sufficiently staffed so as to obviate the necessity of having a political advisor detailed to the United States forces in that city, although you believe that the retention of one or two officers in Chinese Communist territory is advantageous. * * *"

And in subsequent discussions in Chungking with General Wedemeyer he acknowledged, he stated himself that that had been one of the purposes, one of the conditions of the State Department agreement about continuation of my assignment with the Army.

Q. That is that you should continue your intelligence reporting activities on Chinese Communists—A. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The direct answer to the question asked is that the letter in question is of December 26, 1944?—A. That is right.

Q. I should like to have included in the transcript at this point document 84-2, which is an exhibit from the Congressional Record for May 1, 1950, setting forth a broadcast by Mr. Henry J. Taylor.

Taylor, Henry J.—J/S record—Cong. Rec. May 1, 1950, pages A3322-A3323

"First, Ambassador Hurley told me that John Service had already been relieved of his duties once in China, and sent home, by Supreme Commander Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer, another fine American. Nevertheless, State Department officials in Washington sent John Service back to China, through another channel, to the Communist area of Yunnan—by bypassing Wedemeyer, and without the knowledge or consent of Ambassador Hurley * * *

"When Service reached America, he was arrested by the FBI. He wasn't just questioned by the FBI. He was arrested by the FBI, as Mr. J. Edgar Hoover would verify to you. For J. Edgar Hoover is not afraid of anybody. That's what makes him a great American."

Q. I should like to ask you, Mr. Service, were you ever relieved of your duties in China and sent home by General Wedemeyer?—A. The telegram ordering my return is from Marshall.

Q. That is the telegram ordering your return in April 1945?—A. That is correct.

Q. So that that is the only order that you know of for your return to the United States, your dismissal from attachment to the Army?—A. That is correct.

Q. At any time prior to that were you ever sent home by General Wedemeyer?—A. No.

Q. Were you ever at any time returned by the State Department to the Communist area of Yunnan, China, by bypassing General Wedemeyer and without the knowledge of or consent of Ambassador Hurley?—A. No. After I left China in April 1945 on Army orders I never returned to China.

Q. And before that time you had never been ordered back by General Wedemeyer and returned to China?—A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice that in that exhibit that you quoted from, 84-2, that it states that you were returned to China without the knowledge of Ambassador Hurley. Do you know anything about whether Ambassador Hurley knew you were going back?—A. I did not return to China after my recall.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently Ambassador Hurley is alleging in this statement that you at some time previous to your final return from China—

Mr. STEVENS. Could this not have made reference to your return, I think it was in October, to the United States, and then your order from California out again?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the point that I was about to make.

Q. May I ask this question? If the reference in this document is to your return to China in January 1945, could that possibly have been by bypassing General Wedemeyer?—A. No, because we have from this correspondence—no, it was at his request.

Q. That is, you went at that time at the specific request of General Wedemeyer?

The CHAIRMAN. That already clearly appears in evidence, that you returned to China at the request of Wedemeyer. I just wanted to find out whether that return to China was with or without the knowledge of Ambassador Hurley?

A. I do not know, sir.

Q. Let us suppose it was without the knowledge of Ambassador Hurley, is there any possible reason why he should have known about an officer who had been attached to the commanding general's staff since August 1943 and who remained so attached, and who was merely returning to the theater?—A. Since my assignment to the Army was not broken, there was no reason for the State Department to consult the Ambassador. It was merely a matter of continuing an assignment which already existed and of which the Ambassador knew.

Q. So that the only time you ever went to China when General Wedemeyer was commanding general was at his specific request, is that correct?—A. That is correct, and under Army orders.

Q. And under Army orders. And that after your recall to the United States in April of 1945 you have never again been to China, is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Now returning again, Mr. Service, to document No. 35-3, which has already been introduced into the transcript, I direct your attention particularly to paragraph 4 of this document, where General Hurley states that your report No. 40, which is document No. 193 in evidence here, was circulated among the Communists, whose support he was seeking for our policy. In this connection I also direct your attention to document 35-12, and I ask that that be introduced into the transcript at this point.

(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

"(1) CONNALLY. Now, you said in your statement the other day in the press that these subordinates, these Foreign Service men, had been continually advising the Communists that your views did not represent the views of the Government. How did they advise them—in writing, or by personal contact? * * * You make the statement that they communicated with them. Now, how did they communicate with them? (p. 179).

"(2) HURLEY. By writing and by talking and by being with them (p. 179).

"(3) CONNALLY. Can you say what officials of the Communists they contacted and talked with? (p. 180).

"(4) HURLEY. Well, I would not know exactly. I do not think they all contacted the top officials, but they did contact, and I have told you that it is contained in Public Document No. 30.

"(5) CONNALLY. Oh, I know!

"(6) HURLEY. Signed by John Service, and dated October 10; and you can get it, in writing, sir.

"(7) CONNALLY. That was addressed to the Secretary of State; that was not addressed to the Communists?

"(8) HURLEY. No, sir; it was addressed to Stilwell.

"(9) CONNALLY. He was not a member of the armed Communists, he was our officer, was he not—Stilwell?

"(10) HURLEY. That is right, but I say this document that proves it is addressed to him * * *.

"(11) CONNALLY. Yes, but I want to know. You have made the charge, yourself, and I want to know what you have to say about your statement that they were continuously advising the Communists. Now, they would not advise the Communists through the State Department; they would advise them directly, either in writing or personally. Now, which was it? Do you still adhere to the statement that they were advising them continuously that your views did not represent the Government's views? (p. 180).

"(12) HURLEY. I most certainly do! (p. 181).

"(13) CONNALLY. Well, would you mind telling us whom they saw?

"(14) HURLEY. All right, I will begin again. I will repeat. A telegram sent by George Acheson on the 28th of last February, in which he said—

"(15) CONNALLY. To whom?

"(16) HURLEY. To the Secretary of State.

"(17) CONNALLY. Oh, well, I want to know.

"(18) HURLEY. Well, you know, it is in writing, sir.

"(19) CONNALLY. Why, certainly.

"(20) HURLEY. And you ask me to prove what is in that, and I have given you a writing.

"(21) CONNALLY. All right. I was asking what communications they had had, not with the State Department but with the Communists. All right, we will not pursue that any further. We have to go out and find it out, ourselves (p. 181)."

Q. In his document General Hurley in substance repeats your charge that you had circulated or that this report was circulated among the Communists. Did you ever disclose the contents of document 193 to anyone in the Chinese Communist Party?—A. I did not.

Q. As a matter of fact, when was its first disclosed to the Chinese Communist Party and the world, as General Hurley says, according to your information?—

A. When Congressman Judd put it in the Congressional Record on October 19, 1949, stating at the time he did so that the copy was furnished him by General Hurley.

Q. That, I may say, appears on page 152 3 of the Congressional Record for October 19, 1949.

Now again with reference to document No. 35-3 and General Hurley's statement in paragraphs 6 and 7 that you and other career men continuously told the Communist armed party and the world that America was betting on the wrong horse and that the American policy which General Hurley was upholding in China did not have the support of the United States Government, did you ever make any statement in substance or effect to anyone in the Chinese Communist Party to this effect?

The CHAIRMAN. What was that quotation you just gave?

Q. It is in paragraphs 6 and 7 of document 35-3.—A. There are several things there to answer. Certainly I never said to the Chinese Communists or to anyone else that Ambassador Hurley was not representing American policy. In fact, I don't understand how a junior officer could make such a statement. The fact that the Ambassador is the Ambassador and continues to be the Ambassador is the—you can't argue the fact that he represents American policy. I have never made a statement to the Communists that we were backing the wrong horse.

The CHAIRMAN. Or that the American policy which you were upholding in China did not have the support of the United States Government?

A. That is right.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you ever make any statements which could be so interpreted by the Communists?

A. Well, the Communists knew, as the correspondents knew and everyone knew that there was discussion and debate as to where we went next. That debate was going on in the press. The debate was going on in American circles. As to whether or not we could cooperate with the Communists in any form, for instance if we landed on the coast of China whether or not we would take more positive measures in China—now the Communists knew that we were not all of one mind but as for saying that we were backing the wrong horse, definitely not, because I always argued, if I was asked I always said that we were not committed to all-out support of any one party or faction in China. That was our line, that we were not there to take part in a civil war, we were all-out for a united and democratic China.

Q. Now, to the extent that this debate to which you refer had been going on, did you express any views that you may have had in that debate to the Chinese Communists or did you express them in your discussions with American officials?—

A. I made no secret of the fact that I was favorably impressed by the Chinese Communists. I made no secret of the fact that I thought that we would have to work with them in a military way, but those were exactly the same things that our official policy was recommending. We were trying to unify their forces, trying to bring about a coalition government. But I did not express those views in a critical way of Ambassador Hurley.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you ever in your talks with the Communists indicate that Mr. Hurley's interpretation of the policies were wrong?

A. Certainly not. In fact, I have urged the Chinese Communists not to engage in personal attacks on Ambassador Hurley, which they were commencing to do even while I was in China, because, I said, that is the worst possible way for you to win American friendship or support, if that is what you want, to attack the American Ambassador, because he is the American Ambassador, he does represent America.

Q. As a matter of fact, in expressing the view that the United States should utilize the Communist forces in the fight against Japan, did you understand at any time from any of your contacts with General Hurley that that differed in any way from his objectives?—A. It did not.

Q. As a matter of fact, did General Hurley ever say anything to you about the subject?—A. Certainly.

Q. What did he say?—A. When I returned from Yen-an the first time—

Q. That is when?—A. On October 23, 1944, I was instructed to make myself available to Ambassador Hurley when I passed through Chungking if he should wish to talk to me about the current attitude, the policies, objectives of the Chinese Communists.

Q. Now, this is at the time you were on your way back to the United States?—A. That is correct.

Q. Coincident with General Stilwell's recall?—A. Yes. General Hurley was desirous of talking to me, called me over to his house, and I spent most of that evening of October 23 having dinner and talking with him. My chief concern was to tell him of the confidence and feeling of strength of the Chinese Communists and their determination to receive a share of American arms and some sort of recognition as a fighting force against Japan. Ambassador Hurley repeatedly told me that they don't need to worry, that is what I am here to do, that is one of the things I am here for, is to be sure and make sure that they do receive arms.

Q. This he told you when?—A. On the evening of October 23, 1944.

Mr. ACHILLES. Had General Hurley then read your memorandum of October 10, your memorandum No. 40? Did you discuss that with him?

A. I believe he had not read it at that time. Actually I brought that memo down with me from Yen-an on that occasion, and I had delivered one copy to the Embassy and one copy to the headquarters, but I did not—I was not at that time delivering copies or furnishing copies for General Hurley since he was the President's representative and was not the Ambassador.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you express the same views to General Hurley that you had in the memo?

A. I don't think that our discussion ever covered that point, that particular point of whether or not the major objective of policy was to support Chiang Kai-shek, no.

Q. As a matter of fact, did you do much of the talking on that occasion?—A. I did very little of the talking.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you intend to direct yourself to (7) in the document 35-3, the last three lines particularly? " * * * they charged me with making my own policy in China and said that it was not the policy of the United States Government." Did you so charge? And to whom, if so?

A. I did not so charge.

Mr. STEVENS. As a matter of fact, did you ever make any statement of any kind at any time that suggested in any way to the Communists that General Hurley was making his own policy independently of the United States policy?

A. We were living in a very heated atmosphere where a great deal of debate and discussion was going on all of the time.

Mr. STEVENS. But what I wanted to know was, were you debating it with the Chinese Communists?

A. No, no, certainly not, sir. In my document 204, the memorandum which Mr. Ludden and I prepared on February 14, we stated at the conclusion:

"Support of the Generalissimo is but one means to an end; it is not an end in itself, but by present statements of policy we show a tendency to confuse the means with the end."

Q. Now that memo, was that addressed to the Communists in any way or shown to the Communists?—A. No.

Q. That was addressed to the commanding general of the theater, was it not?—
A. But that can be interpreted, in reply to Mr. Stevens' question, that can be interpreted, if you so wish to interpret it, as a criticism of General Hurley and an inference that General Hurley is not following the basic objectives of American policy by confusing the means with the end.

Mr. STEVENS. One other question. Did you ever show to anyone a copy of this memorandum 40? Anyone who was not a member of the United States Government or its establishments?

The CHAIRMAN. Anyone in China?

Mr. STEVENS. Anyone in China; that is correct?

A. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Q. Coming back to your reference a moment ago—

Mr. STEVENS. May I interrupt again? Do you know of anyone who did, Mr. Service? Any member of the United States Government forces that did or gave access of that document to someone in China?

A. I do not know of anyone; no.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you suspect someone?

A. I believe that it may have been shown; yes.

Q. Your position is that you have no personal knowledge?—A. I have no personal knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. This suspicion that you have—was it with any connivance of yours?

A. It was not, it was when I was physically absent from China, or from Yen-an.

Q. Or from China? Physically absent from China?—A. It was after I left Yen-an. It was not shown to the Chinese Communists at that time.

Q. According to your belief.—A. According to my belief.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's clarify this matter a little bit. To whom do you suspect that it was shown?

Q. I would like to suggest that if he has any suspicions I would like to avoid having him discuss suspicions in this proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think we should interject just suspicions into the transcript, perhaps.

Q. Which, I may say, is quite a different thing—I would advise him to discuss with you freely.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness seemed to have some hesitation on the point and I just wanted to make sure that it had nothing to do with revelation by him to the Chinese Communists.

A. It did not.

Mr. STEVENS. Or to anyone outside United States Government forces?

A. I was not—I did not show it to anyone outside the American Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Or you were not involved in its being shown to anyone?

A. That is right.

Q. And to the extent that you have any grounds for believing it may have been shown, it was at a time, you say, when you were not in China at all; you were physically absent from China?—A. That is correct.

Q. Not merely physically absent from Yen-an but absent from China?—A. I left China the next day after I left Yen-an, so the only thing I can say with positive knowledge is that it was not while I was in Yen-an.

Q. And that if it was shown to anyone, you had no connection or participation in it?—A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And is it fair to say that whoever it was shown to was not a Communist?

A. If it were shown to anyone, it was not a Communist.

Q. At least as far as—A. As far as I know.

Q. More particularly, what you mean to say is that to the extent you have any reason to believe it was shown to someone, you have no reason to believe it was shown to anyone in the Communist Party.—A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Q. I would like to return just a moment—a short time ago we were discussing the question of whether or not you had in any way indicated that General Hurley did not represent the policy of the United States or that you had indicated to Communists or anyone that the United States was backing the wrong horse, and in that connection you referred to your memorandum, which is document No. 204, and said that that might have been interpreted as a criticism of General Hurley. What I want to find out is, that memorandum was addressed exclusively to your superior officer, the commanding general of the theater; is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Did you ever show that memorandum to anybody in the Communist Party or anybody other than American officials?

The CHAIRMAN. In China? We are restricting our questions here to apply to when he was in China?

Q. That is right.—A. I did not show that to any Chinese or any Chinese Communists. I discussed the memorandum, some of the contents of it, with a very reliable friend who was an American correspondent. He did not read the memorandum but I discussed the contents, particularly that section where we draw the parallel between China—suggest a parallel between China and Yugoslavia.

Q. Now in that connection—

Mr. STEVENS. Would you mind inserting the name?

A. Mr. Harold Isaacs of Newsweek.

Mr. STEVENS. Is that the only person?

A. That is the only person.

Q. Now, insofar as you discussed the general views expressed in that memorandum with this American correspondent, did you understand that to be a proper and authorized activity as part of your functions on the staff of the commanding general of the theater?—A. I would say that discussion of background material, particularly concerning the political situation in China, was habitually and with authority discussed with the correspondents. And as far as this relates to my own personal views, which is what it was, it was quite proper for me to discuss them with the press, and with a reliable correspondent. It did not purport to be an expression of official views, of the Army's views—nothing except our own views on policy there and the situation in China.

Mr. STEVENS. This was a memo which was prepared jointly by you and Mr. Ludden; was it not?

A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Therefore it reflected more than your personal views; did it not?

A. Yes; we were in the same status, working together.

Q. As a matter of fact, did it represent your personal views and the views of your commanding general, as you best understood them? A. He told us that he was glad to have it; that it pointed out certain things that he agreed with and danger he wanted to avoid, but it was not discussed with Mr. Isaacs on that basis.

Q. No; I am addressing myself to a slightly different question.

You say it reflected your personal views. Did not the views expressed also reflect, as you understood them, the views of General Wedemeyer?—A. Well, certainly, but I never told anybody that General Wedemeyer agreed with this.

Q. I understand that; that is not what I am asking.

Now, you have indicated that it was the general policy, it was authorized policy, and that you and others were authorized to discuss background material of political character with the American representatives of the press in China. Do you regard discussion of the general views embodied in this memorandum with members of the press as any deviation from that authorized?—A. None whatsoever so long as I do not represent to the press that those are the views of General Stilwell, or General Wedemeyer.

Mr. STEVENS. What people did this authorization, to authorize you to talk to newspaper people and others about your personal views? Was it ever anything in writing? How did you get that instruction and know the latitude that you could go to in talking to the press?

A. The status and duties of the political officers assigned to the Army were very loose and vaguely defined. The principal officer of the political officers was John Davies, who went out to China with General Stilwell when he first went out to take over command of the theater. John Davies had oral instructions from General Stilwell, and he functioned in a very important way as Stilwell's public relations officer, particularly on political background. When we came in, particularly when I came in in August 1943, I was serving really under Davies, who was the senior of the political officers, and John spent most of his time in India and I spent my time in Chungking. I became in a way the headquarters, Chungking headquarters, political public relations officer; press agent in a way, you might say, for the press. I tried to keep the press informed of the political background, the political problems that the Army was encountering.

Mr. STEVENS. The latitude that was given you was given you on oral instructions from Davies: is that correct?

A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. O. K.

Q. On this general matter of dealing with the press, since we have got into it at this point, I would like you to describe to the board a little bit more fully what you understood to be the general scope of this somewhat vaguely defined latitude that you mentioned and how it came about.—A. I covered it fairly well in my first statement.

Q. Yes.—A. I think if you read Secretary Stimson's letters, particularly the first letter—well, and even the following letters—there is continual reference to the political problems in that theater. We had a continual effort to get—I am speaking only of China—we had a continual effort to get Chinese cooperation. General Stilwell wanted to fight an active war: the Chinese, generally speaking, hoped to hold out by a passive war. General Chennault was technically under General Stilwell's command but at the same time was in independent relationship to the Generalissimo. The Chinese preferred to follow General Chennault's recommendations of an air war rather than a land war because it would require, shall we say, far less effort on their part, and you had various forces hauling and pulling. The Chinese imposed rigorous censorship, largely politically motivated; the Air Force put out its own propaganda to try to get its view across—the Chennault-Stilwell feud, if you wish. You had Chinese propaganda in the United States, you had Madame Chiang coming back to the States and appealing to the American people over the head of the President, you had an American welter of emotion, really, after Pearl Harbor about China. China had been a neglected ally, we had been selling scrap iron and oil to Japan, and after Pearl Harbor they were the heroic allies who had been fighting alone all those years, and there was a great deal of misunderstanding about China in the United States.

All of this had a direct bearing on what General Stilwell was trying to do. It was to his advantage and it was vital to him that the American press be informed of the true situation of China, the difficulties that he was facing, the fact that the Chinese promised one thing but usually didn't deliver it, that there were commitments to open a campaign, for instance in the Salween front and in western Yunnan, to coordinate with the campaign which he was directing from India and north Burma. To accomplish all this it was necessary that we work closely with the correspondents and the policy was, in military matters as well as in political background matters, to deal with them very frankly and to give them all the information that was necessary, so that they could understand what was going on in China.

Q. Now, referring to the line of questioning that was brought up a moment ago—

The CHAIRMAN. By the way, we have reached 12:30. Is this a stopping point or do you want to go on with a question?

Mr. ACHILLES. There were one or two questions on that point we were just discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's have them.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. You state that you discussed the purport and substance of this report 40 with the correspondent, but you did not give him a copy?—A. That was a different report, sir. My 204, which is unnumbered actually in my series, but it is document 204.

Q. You did not give any correspondent a copy?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you give correspondents any copies of your other reports in Yenan?—A. Yes, they were allowed to read some of them, descriptive ones, informative ones.

Q. Did they include classified material?—A. Technically yes, everything was classified.

Q. You say you allowed them to read them. Did you at any time let them have copies to take out of your presence?—A. I don't recall ever doing that; no. You say "out of my presence"?

Q. To keep overnight or anything like that?—A. No; I may have said to some person, "You sit here and read this; I have to go down the hall a minute."

Q. You didn't allow them to take any of them away?—A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this access to your descriptive reports known to your superiors, on the part of the correspondents known to your superiors?

A. Well, to my superior John Davies certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. He was the one under whom you were acting directly?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. By means of your general instruction which you had got from him, or did he know specifically about the ones you were letting people read?

A. No, because he was one or two thousand miles away. I mean, it is a question of judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the sort of things you understood he knew you were to do?

A. That is right.

Mr. RHETTS. It was the sort of thing, if I understand correctly, that you understood from him that General Stilwell wanted you and him to do.

Mr. STEVENS. With regard to the problem as discussed in the personal statement with regard to the classification of documents, mostly which you classified yourself, as I understand it—

A. That is right.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it might be well when we reconvene if you ask for a fuller explanation on that subject.

A. Fine.

The CHAIRMAN. Any more questions?

Mr. ACHILLES. No, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. We will adjourn until 2:30 p. m.

(The board adjourned at 12:35 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: May 26, 1950—2:30 p. m. to 5:15 p. m.

(The board reconvened at 2:30 PM)

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed whenever you are ready.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

(Continuation of testimony by Mr. John S. Service.)

Q. Now, Mr. Service, in connection with the preparation of your reports, you, I believe, testified that you invariably put a classification on those reports at the time you prepared them. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Can you describe to the board the considerations which in the first instance affected the determination for classifying any particular document at any particular level from unclassified to secret?—A. I think, to answer the question completely, we ought to examine the character of these memoranda as to just what they really were. I was really a free agent with very few assigned duties and because I was interested—because I had a great many contacts and because the information was sometimes useful to the army as background information and generally useful to the Embassy as political reporting material, I would put down such information that I thought of interest in these memoranda.

Now, if I had been working in an organization like the Department of State, or as a regular member of the staff of headquarters, assigned to a particular section, I would not be writing independent personal information memoranda. I would be preparing, if I were in G-2, a paper for the signature and forwarding action by the Chief of Staff, G-2. My initials might appear on it as drafter, but the signature would be his.

These were very different from that. They were strictly personal observations—reports of personal conversations, or sometimes my personal views. I put a classification on these things, sort of an informal classification or recommended classification, based on a number of factors. The principal reason was that these things should be locked up, rather than left around for anybody to read, or the Chinese, working in headquarters, to read.

They were on economic or political subjects. They were often critical of Chinese personalities and Chinese conditions. They usually contained information from informants who had to be protected to some extent. We had inter-allied arrangements for exchange of some categories of information. These generally were not the sort of thing which we wanted to exchange with our Chinese allies as they were critical of the Chinese and, generally speaking, they were not things we wanted to hand to the British, with whom we exchanged certain categories of information.

Q. May I interrupt. Am I correct in believing that certain arrangements which existed between the American Government and the Chinese and the British, such as the Joint Intelligence Collection Agency and other interallied arrangements, contemplated that material of certain types of classification would be automatically circulated through that distribution machinery whereas material of other classifications would not? Is that correct?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you therefore motivated in part, as you suggested, by whether you wished it made available to others of our own allies in determining classification?—A. That is right. Most of my work was reporting on the Chinese Government. Obviously we did not want to hand it to them through official channels.

Q. What other types of consideration, if there were any, affected your determination to place any particular classification on a document?—A. Sometimes if I had advance information—if I had knowledge of something which was not at that time known by other people, I would make it classified. Later on when it became general knowledge and known to the correspondents, and so on, there was no longer any necessity for considering it classified.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any other considerations that affected these determinations?

A. I think I have covered most of them.

The CHAIRMAN. You might refer to the page in your statement that covers that point.

A. Page 17 or 18 of my statement discusses this question.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the last paragraph on page 17?

A. Yes.

Q. Now I show you document No. 197 and ask you to state what it is—characterize it.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going on to another subject?

Q. No; it is the same subject.

A. I would like to say something else on the same subject if I could; that is, in a military theater, and under these conditions, practically all material or reports were classified. However, it was normal practice, for instance, to brief the correspondents before an operation was going to take place and keep correspondents informed and to give them, in those briefing sessions, the most highly classified material so they would know what was going on. They would be taken into the confidence of the commanding officer and told: This is what the plan is; this is what we are going to try to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any provision for declassifying documents formally—removing classification lines?

A. I think, generally speaking, it was left to the discretion of the responsible commanding officer as to whether information should be given out.

The CHAIRMAN. No formal steps?

A. I don't believe there were, but the Chief of G-2 could certainly give any information which he thought appropriate to give.

Q. Mr. Service, I show you Document No. 166 and ask you to state for the Board in general what that document is.—A. This is an Embassy dispatch which transmitted a memorandum of mine, transmitting in turn the notes of a large number of correspondents, notes of their interviews with Communist leaders.

Q. By "correspondents" you mean "newspaper correspondents"?—A. Yes.

Q. State who the correspondents were.—A. Guenther Stein, Christian Science Monitor; Maurice Votaw, Israel Epstein, representing the New York Times at that time.

Q. Your memorandum transmitted notes taken by these American correspondents on what?—A. Notes of their interviews with Communist leaders.

Q. Your memorandum transmitting these foreign correspondents' notes, what classification does it bear, if any?—A. Secret.

Q. And what classification does the Embassy dispatch bear?—A. Secret.

Q. You were transmitting notes taken by American correspondents in a document which you in turn classified secret. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. The notes taken by the American correspondents were notes they were sending back to their papers to be printed in the press. Is that correct?—A. Yes; but the point is at that time they had not had an opportunity to publish them.

Q. They had not been sent out yet?—A. That is right.

Q. But were they subsequently, as soon as they could get them into channels?—A. Subsequently, after they left China. They could not publish them because of the Chinese censorship.

Q. But when it was physically possible to get them back to the United States, the respective papers published them?—A. Yes; and they wrote books.

Q. Before they could get published in the United States, you transmitted it under the classification of "secret"?—A. Yes.

Q. Would you have hesitated to discuss with other correspondents in China, the contents of those notes?—A. Certainly.

Q. Or interviews with the Chinese Communist leaders?—A. Certainly I would not discuss with Mr. Harold Isaacs what Mao Tse-tung had said to another correspondent such as Guenther Stein.

Q. I didn't make myself clear. Would you have hesitated to discuss with other correspondents in China the contents of these interviews with various Communist leaders, whether the interviews had been interviews held by you or other correspondents? Would you regard that as the type of material which was in any substantive way intended to be protected by classification "secret" so that it could not be talked about with anyone?—A. No.

Q. The point being that the nature of the material was such, it was going to be published sooner or later anyway, and, for example, would this document here—would the reason for your classifying the transmission as "secret," does that mean you did not want it to get into the hands of the Chinese Government?—

A. It should not get into the hands of the Chinese Government and it should not, of course, get into the hands of other persons; that is, the actual notes. In other words, the confidences of these people had to be respected. They were giving me their complete notes of everything they were getting.

Mr. ACHILLES. You would consider yourself bound by the classification that you put on any particular document just as much as anybody else?

A. Yes, depending of course on whether the information in that document was still of a confidential nature.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have any occasion at the time to write to anyone outside China concerning the subject matter or printing of these reports?

A. Absolutely not. I am the world's worst correspondent even with my own family and with my own family I was completely discreet. I am not an habitual correspondent with anyone outside my own family and when I was trying to get in touch with my mother recently to find out if any letters I had written her would throw any light on my attitudes and opinions during this period. I was completely unsuccessful because my letters during that period don't show it.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was your correspondence at the time subject to military or other censorship?

A. I wasn't granted authority to censor my own mail and every letter I wrote had to have on the envelope the signature of an officer authorized to censor.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Q. Unless the board has further questions I propose to drop this particular point.

I think I will just deal with one other facet of this before we go on and that is this: When you put a classification on a document or report which you prepared, what then happened to those reports? Whom did you send them to?—

A. Generally I prepared four copies of these memoranda. I had no clerical help. Usually I sat down to a typewriter and wrote them out—original and three carbons. One copy I gave to headquarters, one copy I gave to the Embassy—by agreement with the Army—and one copy I sent to John Davies, who is senior political officer, stationed in New Delhi, and that was my arrangement with the Army.

Q. You gave one to the Embassy and you sent one to John Davies. As a matter of fact, did you do that or did you keep one copy for your file and send all three to headquarters with the request they cause it to be distributed?—A. The practice differed from time to time. When I was physically in Chungking I usually took the copies to the Embassy myself. When I was in Yen-an—

Q. When you were in Chungking did you mail the copy to Davies?—A. I mailed it through G-2 channels. I actually put it in an envelope and took it to G-2 and they put the necessary stamps on it so it would go down by military pouch to Yen-an.

Q. When you were in Yen-an—A. When I was in Yen-an I prepared four copies and sent three copies to G-2 at the headquarters in Chungking and if you will look at some of my headquarters reports—

Q. Document 193 will show this.—A. "It is requested that copies of this report be transmitted, as usual, to the American Ambassador at Chungking and headquarters, USAF-CBI, for the information of Mr. Davies." G-2, in those cases, forwarded two additional copies, one to the Ambassador and one to Davies.

Q. Did you know, after you sent the copies to G-2 or after you personally delivered copies to the Embassy, we will say, did you have any knowledge thereafter what classification the Army, in one case, or the Embassy, in another, might put on the document which you had already classified?—A. No, I did not. I didn't know what use they might make of it or what classification they might put on it. I wasn't working as an integral part of G-2 and I wasn't physically a part of the Embassy and I was denied access to the Embassy files so that I never had any way of knowing what they did with my reports.

Q. So that, answering my question, you did not know what classifications they put on them.—A. That is correct. They did not always follow my recommended classifications.

Mr. STEVENS. You were denied access to the Embassy files. Did you ask for it and was it denied or was it customary for you not to?

A. It was an instruction by the Ambassador that the officers assigned to the Army, no longer being part of the Embassy staff, would not have access to the Embassy's file. He agreed that if we requested specific information, and if he thought it suitable, he would have it made available to us.

Q. This rule was not only applied to you?—A. No.

Q. It was a general rule applied by the Ambassador generally to persons not members of the Embassy staff. Is that correct?—A. That is correct. I am going to show some samples of the Embassy or Army use of these reports.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

A. Document 120 is a report by the Joint Intelligence Collection Agency which transmits one of the memoranda which I prepared. I would like to show it to you. The underlying part is my memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. Marked "secret."

A. The chief of G-2 presumably thought that that was worth forwarding. Most of my things were simply retained in G-2. He turned it over to the Joint Intelligence Agency for forwarding to Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. They marked it "secret"?

A. They marked it "secret", yes, and they also attached that cover sheet which gives an official evaluation of the source. It gives a summary and some comment. Now that final document has changed character from my original memorandum because it contains official Army views and comments and evaluation of my memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. By the addition of the cover sheet?

A. Yes; by the addition of the cover sheet.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

A. Similarly, I have here a document No. 161, which is a dispatch 2760 from the Embassy at Chungking to the Department of State transmitting a memorandum which I have prepared on June 28, 1944. My memorandum simply attaches a translation of a published document of the Chinese Communists summarizing their military operation during the month of May 1944.

Since that was a published document, put out by the Chinese Communists and published in their newspaper in Chungking, I did not classify my memorandum but the Embassy forwarded it to the Department of State under confidential dispatch. I would never have had any hesitation in letting any correspondent who wished to see it, sit down and read it. Of course I did not have any knowledge of the fact that the Embassy had forwarded it under confidential dispatch.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did the Embassy comment in the dispatch?

A. Yes; they made some comment and I presume that is the reason why they changed the classification on my material.

I have other examples here but you may not wish to see all of them. Here is another type of thing, a report of mine which was unclassified which has been stamped "secret" by Research and Analysis Branch of OSS.

Q. Refer to the document number.—A. Document 94, subject: Communist Interception and Use of Radio Bulletin. They intercepted something on the Radio Bulletin, misquoted it and put it in the press. There are quite a large number of these instances where classification has been either upped or generally raised by either the Department or some other agency which received copies of my memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any example where they lessened the classification?

A. No; I don't see any here.

Mr. ACHILLES. As far as the physical security of the reports are concerned, except for the copies which you kept and the ones which you delivered to the Embassy, when you were in Chungking, the other copies were in G-2 channels. Is that correct?

Q. At least their distribution was carried on by G-2.—A. G-2 might make further distribution, just as the Embassy might or might not forward the material and a copy was sent to Mr. Davies in New Delhi, and there again I don't know what became of it after it left my hands.

Q. Similarly, G-2 may have sent the material elsewhere within the theater or directly back to the War Department where in turn it might have further distribution that you know nothing about?—A. Yes.

Q. Has this Board further questions on this particular feature?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time.

Q. Returning, Mr. Service, to document No. 35-3, which is General Hurley's charges, I direct your attention particularly to paragraph (5) of that document where General Hurley asserts it was the policy of the professional Foreign Service officers to side with the Communist Armed Party and imperialistic bloc of nations whose policy it was to keep China divided against herself. Did you ever recommend or entertain the belief that China should be kept divided against herself?—A. Certainly not. Quite the contrary, in all our arguments and recommendations for unifying the armies and eventually seeking a coalition government, we were doing our best to prevent civil war and prevent the division of the country.

Q. Did you ever openly or otherwise advise the Communist Armed Party, to use General Hurley's language, " * * * to decline unification of the Chinese Communist Army with the National Army unless the Chinese Communists were given control"?—A. I did not; in fact, General Hurley's statement there is incomprehensible.

The whole problem was never discussed in those terms. The original proposal by President Roosevelt, starting in July 1944, was that the American commander, General Stilwell, be put in command of all Chinese forces. After Stilwell's recall the idea of an American commander over the Chinese forces was dropped. However, the National Government proposed, as one of the conditions for the coalition that the Communist forces only be placed under an American commander. The Communists, who had agreed to an American commander for all forces, refused to agree to the idea there would be any discrimination. They said they would be glad to have an American commander if he commanded both armies but not as long as the Nationalists would not accept an American. There was never any proposal made that the Communist forces would be anything more than about 20 percent of the unified Chinese army and no one—even the Communists I knew—ever proposed or thought a Chinese Communist should be a commander of that unified army.

Q. It was never your thought or proposal or suggestion in any way that the Chinese Communist Party should resist unification except upon the terms that they control?—A. No, it certainly was not my idea or recommendation.

Q. I would like to read to you a statement by General Hurley, a message from Hurley for the eyes of the Secretary of State alone, dated January 31, 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. Will that be offered in evidence?

Q. I am reading it right now. I will show the Board the document. It isn't complete yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Are these from the files of the State Department?

Q. It is a photostat.

The CHAIRMAN. Describe what it is.

Q. This is a photostat of a message which I have just described, or, more particularly, it is a photostat of a portion of it, which is part of General Hurley's papers that were in the Department. It was formerly classified "secret" and it is now unclassified.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it better be offered.

Q. I would suggest at the present moment—I subsequently wish to offer this. Since there are certain pages left out I hope to obtain a fuller version of it. At the moment I would just like to read a statement out of it to show the Board it actually appears there, as I read it, rather than offering the whole document.

The CHAIRMAN. You may read the document.

Q. General Hurley states on page 8 of this document:

"In conclusion of this part I of my report on the background of the Communist negotiations, I wish to state that in all my negotiations with the Communists I have insisted that the United States will not repeat nor supply or otherwise aid the Chinese Communists as an armed political party or as an insurrection against the National Government. Any aid from the United States to the Chinese Communist Party must go to that party through the National Government of China. The Chinese Communist Party has never indicated to me that they desire to obtain control of the National Government until, if and when they achieve control through a political election. The Communist Party demands the end of the one-party government by the Kuomintang. The Chinese Communist Party is willing for the Kuomintang to still have a vast majority of the government offices. The Chinese Communist Party demands representation, both for itself and other anti-Japanese political parties in China, in the policy-making agencies of the government."

I gather from that that on January 31, 1945, General Hurley did not understand the Chinese Communist Party to be demanding that it be given control of the government of China. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. I will show the board what I read is the passage right here [handing document to the chairman].

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Q. As I said, I later propose making further use of it but at the moment it seems to be incomplete.

Now referring to document No. 35-4, and particularly paragraph 6 of that document, where General Hurley asserts he would not say you and other Foreign Service officers, of whom he complained, were disloyal to the United States Government. I should like to ask you whether if General Hurley had seriously believed you were giving the Chinese Communist Party the type of advice and information he charged, would he not have been expected to regard you as disloyal to the United States Government as well as disloyal to what he called "American policy"?—A. He certainly would.

Q. Would you regard such action as disloyal to the United States?—A. Yes; if I were doing all the things General Hurley accused me of.

Q. With reference to General Hurley's charges, in document 35-3, paragraphs (6) and (7), that you continuously advised the Chinese armed party he was making his own policy in China which was not the policy of the United States Government. I believe you have testified you never made any such statement or suggestion. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. I would like to show you document No. 198 to look at and ask you if there is anything in this document that bears on such charges?—A. Yes; there is. In the early part of the memorandum I describe how the Chinese communist radio had been broadcasting certain statements that had been made by American correspondents traveling in their area. These statements were very laudatory and at least one of the correspondents said that he would recommend that American arms be furnished to the Communists.

In paragraph 4 I state:

"If the question of accreditation of Harrison Forman ever does arise, however, it may be of interest to note that his remarks here quoted are actually a very mild version of statements made in numerous public speeches in which he promised large-scale American help. It is of questionable wisdom and discretion under the present circumstances in China for any American to make extravagant public promises of American aid to the Communists. The effects are especially unfortunate when made, not to the better informed leaders in Yen-an, but to the less informed and more anxious fighting forces in the forward areas."

Q. Now, I would like to introduce at this point document No. 35-8. I ask it be included in the transcript.

(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

"(1) HURLEY. When I left China to come to the United States for a conference, I was confronted in Washington by a report from Mr. George Atcheson, whom I had left in charge of the Embassy, addressed to the Secretary of State, in which he recited nearly all of the policies that I had upheld as the just policy, but in addition to that he recommended that instead of following my policy of not arming belligerents against the Government that we were upholding that we furnish lend-lease to the Communists, and in that, Mr. Chairman, Mr. George Acheson said that he had the support, the acquiescence, of every official member of the American Embassy in Chungking. (P. 41-42.)

"(2) CONNALLY. * * * Did Mr. Acheson point out that the purpose of furnishing arms to the Communists was to get them to unite in fighting the Japanese, or not? (P. 42.)

"(3) HURLEY. * * * It is true. (P. 42.)

"(4) CONNALLY. * * * Now I am asking you what his reasons for that were. Were his reasons that they would aid in fighting the Japanese? (P. 43.)

"(5) HURLEY. They were already fighting the Japanese. (P. 43.)

"(6) CONNALLY. What were his reasons? (P. 43.)

"(7) HURLEY. His reasons were that that would destroy the National Government of the Republic of China, and the John Service report is for that purpose, and as soon as I left, George Acheson and everybody attempted what they had been trying to do when the President sent me to China, and that was to destroy the Government of the Republic of China. (P. 43.)

"(8) CONNALLY. He said that in the letter? (P. 43.)

"(9) HURLEY. No, he did not, but he did use all of my arguments for unification. (P. 43.)

"(10) HURLEY. * * * the report of George Acheson has a lot of the policy that I had outlined for the heads of the American services in China. In fact, I think that is the first time any career man announced that our policy was to assist in the establishment in China in proper ways without interfering in internal affairs of a strong, united, democratic China. * * * but, what Acheson recommended to the State Department, and what he said he had concurrence in with every official in the Embassy, was that we supply lend-lease arms and munitions to the armed Communist Party. * * * (P. 49.)"

Q. Are you familiar, Mr. Service, with the telegram referred to by General Hurley here?—A. Yes, I am.

Q. Is that telegram set forth in full, pages 87 to 92 of the white paper?—A. It is.

Q. I ask that this telegram be inserted into the transcript at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. What paragraph in document 35-8 does this refer to?

Q. The whole document is in reference to this telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. Document 35-8, if I am looking at the right paper, is Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Q. The beginning first paragraph: "When I left China to come to the United States * * *" It is part of General Hurley's testimony—it is discussing this telegram of February 26.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; I see. It may be included in the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"It appears that the situation in China is developing in some ways which are neither conducive to the future unity and peace of China nor to the effective prosecution of the war.

"A necessary initial step in handling the problem was the recent American endeavor to assist compromise between the factions in China through diplomatic and persuasive means. Not only was unity correctly regarded as the essence of China's most effective conduct of the war, but also of the speedy, peaceful emergence of a China which would be united, democratic, and strong.

"However, the rapid development of United States Army plans for rebuilding the armies of Chiang Kai-shek, the increase of additional aid such as that of the War Production Board, the cessation of Japanese offensives, the opening of the road into China, the expectation that the Central Government will participate at San Francisco in making important decisions, the conviction that we are determined upon definite support and strengthening of the Central Government alone and as the sole possible channel for assistance to other groups, the foregoing circumstances have combined to increase Chiang Kai-shek's feeling of strength greatly. They have resulted in lack of willingness to make any compromise and unrealistic optimism on the part of Chiang Kai-shek.

"Among other things, this attitude is reflected in hopes of an early settlement with the Soviet Union without settlement of the Communist problem, when nothing was ultimately offered except an advisory interparty committee without place or power in the Government, and in recent appointments of a military-political character, placing strong anti-Communists in strategic war areas, and naming reactionaries to high administrative posts, such as General Ho Kuo Kuang, previously commander in chief of gendarmerie, as chairman of Formosa; and Admiral Chan Chak, Tai Li, subordinate, as mayor of Canton.

"On their part, the Communists have arrived at the conclusion that we are definitely committed to the support of Chiang Kai-shek alone, and the Chiang's hand will not be forced by us so that we may be able to assist or cooperate with the Communists. Consequently, in what is regarded by them as self-protection, they are adopting the course of action which was forecast in statements made by Communist leaders last summer in the event they were still excluded from consideration, of increasing their forces actively and expanding their areas to the south aggressively, reaching southeast China, regardless of nominal control by the Kuomintang. We previously reported to the Department extensive movements and conflicts with forces of the Central Government already occurring.

"It is the intention of the Communists, in seizing time by the forelock, to take advantage of east China's isolation by the capture of the Canton-Hankow Railway by Japan to render themselves as nearly invincible as they can before the new armies of Chiang Kai-shek, which are being formed in Yunnan at the present time, are prepared; and to present to us the dilemma of refusing or accepting their assistance if our forces land at any point on the coast of China. There is now talk by Communists close to the leaders of the need of seeking Soviet aid. Active consideration is being given to the creation of a unified council of their various independent guerrilla governments by the party itself, which is broadcasting demands for Communist and other non-Kuomintang representations at San Francisco.

"Despite the fact that our actions in our refusal to aid or deal with any group other than the Central Government have been diplomatically correct, and our intentions have been good, the conclusion appears clear that if this situation continues, and if our analysis of it is correct, the probable outbreak of disastrous civil conflict will be accelerated and chaos in China will be inevitable.

"It is apparent that even for the present this situation, wherein we are precluded from cooperating with the strategically situated, large and aggressive armies, and organized population of the Communist areas, and also with the forces like the Li Chi-shen-Tsai Ting-k'ai group in the southeast, is, from a military standpoint, hampering and unsatisfactory. From a long-range viewpoint, as set forth above, the situation is also dangerous to American interests.

"If the situation is not checked, it is likely to develop with increasing acceleration, as the tempo of the war in China and the entire Far East is raised, and the inevitable resolution of the internal conflict in China becomes more imperative. It will be dangerous to permit matters to drift; the time is short.

"In the event the high military authorities of the United States agree that some cooperation is desirable or necessary with the Communists and with other groups who have proved that they are willing and in a position to fight Japan, it is our belief that the paramount and immediate consideration of military necessity should be made the basis for a further step in the policy of the United States. A favorable opportunity for discussion of this matter should be afforded by the presence of General Wedemeyer and General Hurley in Washington.

"The initial step which we propose for consideration, predicated upon the assumption of the existence of the military necessity, is that the President inform Chiang Kai-shek in definite terms that we are required by military necessity to cooperate with and supply the Communists and other suitable groups who can aid in this war against the Japanese, and that to accomplish this end, we are taking direct steps. Under existing conditions, this would not include forces which are not in actual position to attack the enemy, such as the Szechwan warlords. Chiang Kai-shek can be assured by us that we do not contemplate reduction of our assistance to the Central Government. Because of transport difficulties any assistance we give to the Communists or to other groups must be on a small scale at first. It will be less than the natural increase in the flow of supplies into China, in all probability. We may include a statement that we will furnish the Central Government with information as to the type and extent of such assistance. In addition, we can inform Chiang Kai-shek that it will be possible for us to use our cooperation and supplies as a lever to restrict them to their present areas and to limit aggressive and independent action on their part. Also we can indicate the advantages of having the Communists assisted by the United States instead of seeking direct or indirect help or intervention from the Soviet Union.

"Chiang Kai-shek might also be told, if it is regarded as advisable, at the time of making this statement to him, that while our endeavor to persuade the various groups of the desirability of unification has failed and it is not possible for us to delay measures for the most effective prosecution of the war any longer, we regard it as obviously desirable that our military aid to all groups be based upon coordination of military command and upon unity, that we are prepared, where it is feasible, and when requested, to lend our good offices to this end, and although we believe the proposals should come from Chiang Kai-shek, we would be disposed to support the following:

"First, formation of something along the line of a war cabinet or supreme war council in which Communists and other groups would be effectively represented, and which would have some part in responsibility for executing and formulating joint plans for war; second, nominal incorporation of Communist and other forces selected into the armies of the Central Government, under the operational command of United States officers designated by Chiang Kai-shek upon General Wedemeyer's advice, upon agreement by all parties that these forces would operate only within their existing areas or areas which have been specifically extended. However, it should be clearly stated that our decision to cooperate with any forces able to assist the war effort will neither be delayed by nor contingent upon the completion of such internal Chinese arrangements.

"It is our belief that such a modus operandi would serve as an initial move toward complete solution of the problem of final entire unity, and would bridge the existing deadlock in China. The principal and overriding issues have become clear, as one result of the recent negotiations. At the present time, Chiang Kai-shek will not take any forward step which will mean loss of face, personal power, or prestige. Without guarantees in which they believe, the Communists will not take any forward step involving dispersion and eventual elimination of their forces, upon which depend their strength at this time and their political existence in the future. The force required to break this deadlock will be exerted on both parties by the step we propose to take. The modus operandi set forth in these two proposals should initiate concrete military cooperation, with political cooperation as an inevitable result, and consequently furnish a foundation for increasing development toward unity in the future.

"The political consultation committee plan, which could function, if adopted, side by side with the Government and the war council, would not be excluded by these proposals. It should be anticipated that the committee would be greatly strengthened, in fact.

"Of course, the statements to the Generalissimo should be made in private, but the possibility would be clearly understood, in case of his refusal to accept it, of the logical, much more drastic step of a public expression of policy such as that which was made by Churchill with reference to Yugoslavia.

"The fact of our aid to the Communists and other forces would shortly become known throughout China, however, even if not made public. It is our belief that profound and desirable political effects in China would result from this. A tremendous internal pressure for unity exists in China, based upon compromise with the Communists and an opportunity for self-expression on the part of the now repressed liberal groups. Even inside the Kuomintang, these liberal groups such as the Sun Fo group, and the minor parties, were ignored in recent negotiations by the Kuomintang, although not by the Communists, with whom they present what amounts to a united front, and they are discouraged and disillusioned by what they regard as an American commitment to the Kuomintang's existing reactionary leadership. We would prove we are not so committed by the steps which we proposed, we would markedly improve the prestige and morale of these liberal groups, and the strongest possible influence would be exerted by us by means of these internal forces to impel Chiang Kai-shek to make the concessions required for unity and to put his own house in order.

Such a policy would unquestionably be greatly welcomed by the vast majority of the people of China, even though not by the very small reactionary minority by which the Kuomintang is controlled, and American prestige would be increased by it.

"The statement has been made to a responsible American by Sun Fo himself that if Chiang Kai-shek were told, not asked, regarding United States aid to Communists and guerrillas, this would do more to make Chiang Kai-shek come to terms with them than any other course of action. It is believed by the majority of the people of China that settlement of China's internal problems is more a matter of reform of the Kuomintang itself than a matter of mutual concessions. The Chinese also state, with justification, that American nonintervention in China cannot avoid being intervention in favor of the conservative leadership which exists at the present time.

"In addition, by a policy such as this, which we feel realistically accepts the facts in China, we could expect to obtain the cooperation of all the forces of China in the war; to hold the Communists to our side instead of throwing them into the arms of the Soviet Union, which is inevitable otherwise in the event the U. S. S. R. enters the war against Japan; to convince the Kuomintang that its apparent plans for eventual civil war are undesirable; and to bring about some unification, even if not immediately complete, that would furnish a basis for peaceful development toward complete democracy in the future."

Q. Will you describe to the board the background of this telegram about which General Hurley complains and your connection with the telegram?—A. You mean the background of events in China or the actual background of—

Q. Certain circumstances that gave rise to the sending of the telegram.—A. The immediate background was that General Hurley, while Ambassador, had done very little reporting. His first real report was a telegram of January 31, over 2 months after he became Ambassador, and in such reporting as had been done, the chargé d'affaires felt that an overoptimistic picture had been presented of the likelihood of success.

After Mr. Acheson became chargé he felt that it was his duty to make a full report to the Department, which up to that time had been impossible to make, and to point out his conviction and the conviction of the rest of us there that the situation was worsening rather than improving, so he suggested to some of the political reporting officers that they prepare a comprehensive study of the situation and make some recommendations.

Although I was not actually working in the Embassy, I shared the views Mr. Acheson and the other officers had and I had been doing a good deal of reporting and was, in some ways, more intimately familiar with the details, and also I had fewer routine duties, so after we consulted together it was decided that I would prepare the original first draft. I did so and, after consultation with the other officers, some revisions were made and finally we presented to Mr. Acheson and he suggested further revisions, and this is the telegram which we are here discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you put that in evidence?

Q. Yes. It appears on pages 87 to 92 of the white paper material which is in your document book.

The CHAIRMAN. In the white paper, pages 87 to 92.

Q. Yes. Now, in his testimony, document 35-8, General Hurley states that the reasons for the proposal contained in this telegram of February 26 to furnish lend-lease assistance to the Chinese Communists was that "* * *" that would destroy the National Government of the Republic of China * * *" and that your report No. 40 was also for that purpose. He also adds, I believe, that it was made just as quickly as he left China. Will you state the reasons that were advanced in the telegram itself for the proposal to furnish lend-lease assistance to the Chinese Communists?—A. The reasons were to try and break the deadlock and the increasing tension between the two parties and force a coalition and unification of the armies, to promote the war effort and avoid civil war, and unify the country. We pointed out that the attitude of the Central Government is hardening and the Communists are reacting in the opposite way by hardening their own attitude and by preparing to defend themselves by seizing more territory, particularly in southeast China; that we are denying ourselves of military forces which can be useful; if the situation is not checked it is likely to develop with increasing acceleration, as the tempo of the war in China and the entire Far East is raised, and the inevitable resolution of the internal conflict in China becomes more imperative.

We then recommend that we privately tell the Generalissimo that military considerations impel us to commence moderate military cooperation with the Communists and that we believe that this statement by us will impel the Generalissimo to agree and when the fact of military cooperation becomes known, the Central Government will agree to something along the lines of a coalition government.

Q. Was this telegram in any sense, as General Hurley implied, done behind his back?—A. It was not done behind his back because we say in the telegram: "The presence of Ambassador Hurley and General Wedemeyer in Washington will afford favorable opportunity for discussion of this matter." There was no effort to circumvent or bypass General Hurley.

Q. On the whole matter of supplying arms to the Chinese Communists, will you indicate to the board what views General Hurley expressed to you on this subject? You have already mentioned in part one conversation you had with General Hurley touching on this matter. I suggest you refer to any others you may have had.—A. I don't recall that we had any other conversations on the subject of military aid to the Communists.

Q. In the first conversation you had with him, as I recall your testimony, he assured you he regarded as one of the purposes of his presence in China to bring about unification of the military forces and engage the Communists more actively in the war against the Japanese.—A. That is correct, and repeatedly, in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he says also that was one of his objectives.

Q. General Stilwell certainly favored supplying arms to the Chinese Communists in order to engage them in the war against the Japanese; did he not?—A. He did.

Q. I would like at this point to introduce document 35-9 and ask that it be included in the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

“(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

“(1) SHIPSTEAD. Did they succeed in getting lend-lease to the Communists?

“(2) HURLEY. They did not.

“(3) SHIPSTEAD. Did you know of your own knowledge that they tried to?

“(4) HURLEY. Yes, sir. I can prove it by their record, that they recommended that I be reversed, and that we furnish lend-lease to the belligerent enemy of the Republic that I was instructed to uphold.

“(5) CONNALLY. That was during the fighting, though: was it not?

“(6) HURLEY. Yes, sir.

“(7) CONNALLY. The war was still going on?

“(8) HURLEY. Yes, sir.

“(9) CONNALLY. It was part of your instructions, was it not, also, to try to get union between the so-called Communists and the Chiang government, so they could both fight the Japanese?

“(10) HURLEY. Yes, sir (p. 39).

“(11) The Ambassador continued by pointing out that the United States has endeavored to use whatever influence it possesses to point the way toward a unification of military forces that would enable China to bring her full military power to the task of defeating Japan. He said that there had been some progress along these lines and that the United States still expected more favorable results (Hurley press conference, April 2, 1945) (p. 40B).

“(12) CONNALLY. Did General Stilwell ever tell you that his purpose in advocating the arming and unification of the Communists and Chiang Kai-shek's forces was to destroy the Government of China? Did he ever tell you that?

“(13) HURLEY. No, sir (p. 44).

“(14) CONNALLY. I was talking about the division of opinion between General Stilwell and yourself. It was rather sharp: was it not?

“(15) HURLEY. It was not.

“(17) HURLEY. No, sir (p. 46). * * *

“(18) CONNALLY. What did they (Stilwell and Chiang) disagree about, if you do not mind stating—about the Communist army, or not?

“(19) HURLEY. As I recall, at that time General Stilwell and I were not in disagreement in regard to the Chinese Communist armies, * * * So far as I know, General Stilwell and I are not at odds about the issue, and we have never had a controversial word between us (p. 47). * * *

“(20) CONNALLY. General Stilwell did advocate, however, the unification of the Communists with the Central Government in fighting, making a united front against the Japanese?

“(21) HURLEY. He had been advocating that for 2½ years and, so far as I know, had not gone to the Communists as I had done. I think that he advocated everything that I advocated in that connection, * * * I think he was in favor of unification of the forces. I certainly was, and we had no controversy on that (p. 90). * * **

Q. In this document General Hurley indicates that he was in no disagreement with General Stilwell: does he not?—A. That is correct. General Hurley says that he had no disagreement with General Stilwell in regard to the Chinese Communist armies, and * * * General Stilwell and I are not at odds about the issue. * * **

The CHAIRMAN. What paragraph are you reading from?—A. Paragraph (19).

Q. Also in paragraph (21) he makes it pretty clear, does he not, that he and General Stilwell were in complete agreement on this question.—A. That's right.

Q. Now, I ask you to refer to document No. 35-11 where General Hurley indicates, I believe, that from the beginning he was of the opinion that lend-lease supplies given to any organization in China, other than the National Government, was weakening that Government and would bring about its collapse; does he not?—A. That is what he says.

Q. Can you reconcile the views expressed by General Hurley in this document No. 35-11 and the views expressed in document No. 35-13, particularly paragraph (11)?—A. I would say they are inconsistent.

Q. As a matter of fact, did you ever propose that aid to the Central Government be discontinued?—A. I never made any such proposal; in fact, we repeatedly said it should not be discontinued. Even in the telegram of February 26 from Chargé d'Affaires Atcheson, we make it clear that aid to the Central Government should not be discontinued and that the arms supplied to the Communists would be far smaller in quantity and would probably be really a natural increase of the supplies coming into China. In my Document 204, which I drafted with Mr. Ludden February 14, 1945, we state specifically that discontinuance of aid to the Central Government would be unnecessary and unwise.

Q. I ask you to look at Document 35-14. This is the testimony of Secretary Byrnes, expressing his views as to the propriety of the February 26 telegram; isn't it?—A. That's right.

Q. I ask that Document No. 35-14 be introduced into the transcript.

The CHAIRMAN. No objection.

“(Hurley—hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 5, 6, 10, 1945)

“(1) BYRNES. When Ambassador Hurley departed from the Embassy at Chungking, Mr. Atcheson, as counselor, automatically assumed charge of the Embassy's affairs. On February 28, 9 days after the Ambassador's departure from Chungking and 3 days before his arrival in Washington, according to the records of the Department, Mr. Atcheson sent his telegram. It contained a broad and thoughtful analysis of the situation in China as it appeared to him in the light of the shifting circumstances of the moment. It concluded with the recommendation that these shifting circumstances required a readjustment of our immediate strategy.

“(2) In his telegram, Mr. Atcheson distinctly stated that ‘a favorable opportunity for discussion of this subject should be given by the presence of General Wedemeyer as well as General Hurley in Washington.’

“(3) The officer in charge of an American mission in a foreign country bears the responsibility for full and accurate reporting of the factors and events which are necessary to the intelligent formulation and execution of United States foreign policy. He is further responsible for the submission from time to time of recommendations with respect to this policy. If his reports and recommendations are to be useful, it is clear that they must reflect his free and honest judgment (p. 195). * * *

“(4) BYRNES. It is difficult to understand how Mr. Atcheson failed in any way to observe the letter or the spirit of these rules and traditions. His telegram of February 28 was a full and free report of the current situation in China as he saw it. His recommendation was an honest effort to assist the Department of State in the formulation of its future policy in China. There is nothing to indicate that he sought to circumvent his superior in making this report and recommendation. On the contrary the telegram expressly suggested that this was a matter upon which the views of Ambassador Hurley should be sought by the Department in Washington (p. 196). * * *

“(5) VANDENBERG. Can I ask you in a general way, then, whether the telegram did represent a recommendation of a sharp and distinct change in our Chinese policy? (p. 212).

“(6) BYRNES. Yes. As I have stated, while it analyzed the conditions, it made a recommendation that would have involved a change. And as I say, when I called for it, investigating it, I was impressed by the fact that it was written 9 days after the Ambassador's departure, and that in the message Mr. Atcheson said that he felt that it should be called to the attention of Ambassador Hurley and General Wedemeyer, who were in Washington, so that the matter could be discussed by the Department in the light of their views (p. 212).

"(7) VANDENBERG. Was this sharp change in policy which was recommended the result of anything that had happened since Ambassador Hurley had left? (p. 212).

"(8) BYRNES. Evidently that was the opinion of Acheson, who was then in charge of the Embassy (p. 213).

"(9) VANDENBERG. You mean it did not refer to the situation prior to Hurley's departure from China?

"(10) BYRNES. Oh, it referred to the situation existing at that time as to our efforts to have unity among the Chinese factions and how we could best bring all of the manpower of China into the war against the Japanese.

"(11) VANDENBERG. That was the general problem that General Hurley had been dealing with.

"(12) BYRNES. Exactly. It impressed me, when I called for it, that here are two men (Acheson and Hurley) who have been considering a question of how to bring about unity between the factions in China, the objective being to secure unified action by all Chinese forces against the Japanese, and there was a difference of opinion as to the methods to be pursued. That is the impression that it made upon my mind (p. 213). * * *

"(13) VANDENBERG. And the views submitted by Acheson in his wire were contrary to the American policy? (p. 215).

"(14) BYRNES. It was providing a change.

"(15) VANDENBERG. That is what I mean.

"(16) BYRNES. It was suggesting a change in policy; not that something had been done that was contrary to the policy.

"(17) VANDENBERG. And you think it was perfectly appropriate for Mr. Acheson, in his temporary assumption of top authority, to take advantage of the opportunity to send this report to the Department?

"(18) BYRNES. I think that the man in charge of an Embassy owes it to the Department, if he believes there is a change in conditions that should be brought to the attention of the Department, to send it (p. 215).

"(19) GREEN. Was there any suggestion on the part of either of these two men that they would act in any way contrary to the policy of the State Department until and unless that policy was changed?

"(20) BYRNES. No; your statement is exactly right. That is what they were doing—submitting, making a suggestion to the Department based upon their views, but in the one case with the express request that it be called to the attention of the Ambassador.

"(21) GREEN. Do I understand the justification for that is that they simply represented their views, submitted them to the Department for the Department's approval, but were ready to carry out any policy that the Department instructed them?

"(22) There was nothing to indicate that they were not willing to carry out any policy of the Department. To me it is important that if from our representatives abroad we are to receive full and free expression, the best judgment that a man has, we cannot say to him, 'You have got to be entirely a "yes-man" to the policy of the Secretary of State,' but we should say to him, rather, 'If conditions have changed and you believe that that policy should be modified, it is your duty to make the suggestion.' The suggestion may or may not be accepted—it was not, in the case either of Mr. Acheson or Mr. Service—but nevertheless I would dislike greatly to think the foreign officers whose duty it is to advise us to the best of their ability of conditions and make recommendations would be prevented from doing so by any fear of offending me. Why, they do it constantly, and I read the reports that come to me. They come to me with recommendations, as in one of these cases, from the head of the office. About half a dozen of the things suggested by Mr. Service were wrong and should not be adopted. I must read the suggestion, I must read the recommendation, and in the light of all the information which I have, reach my own conclusion.

"(23) GREEN. It seems to me that is the correct policy. I am very glad to have this enunciation of it (pp. 227-228).

"(24) CONNALLY. When an ambassador is temporarily absent from his post, of course, the chargé d'affaires, or whoever is designated to take his place, is in fact the acting ambassador, is he not?

"(25) BYRNES. Yes.

"(26) CONNALLY. And if things were moving—out in that area they were moving pretty rapidly, were they not, in February?

"(27) BYRNES. Very. Very.

"(28) CONNALLY. The war was progressing, and the attitude of the Communist army and the Communist forces was of the highest importance; we were approaching the climax of the war?"

"(29) BYRNES. If our minds go back to that time, your statement is certainly correct.

"(30) CONNALLY. If things were happening out there, so that somebody—the acting ambassador—suggested a modification not of the objectives but of the methods of achieving the objective, was it not appropriate for him to indicate that to the Department, to the Secretary, especially when he advised him to consult General Hurley and General Wedemeyer, who was the military commander there?"

"(31) BYRNES. I thought so; I think so now (pp. 258-259)."

Q. Now I ask you to look at Document No. 35-17. Here again Secretary Byrnes indicates he can perceive no conflict in policy objectives between the drafting of the February 26 telegram and General Hurley's, does he not?—A. That is correct.

Q. I ask that this document, No. 35-17, be introduced into the transcript. The CHAIRMAN. No objection.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 5, 6, 7, 10, 1945)

"(1) CONNALLY. One other question. As I understand from your testimony and from our general knowledge of this subject, there was no divergence between the objectives that the Government's policy contemplated, as between Mr. Acheson and General Hurley; the objective was to try to unite the Communist forces with the Central Government's Chinese forces, so that they would all fight the Japanese, is that correct? (pp. 223-224).

"(2) BYRNES. There is no question about that; the objective was the same (p. 224).

"(3) CONNALLY. The objective was the same; the only divergence then was, as I understand you, a difference as to the manner in which that could be brought about, is that right?"

"(4) BYRNES. That is right. There is a serious difference as to the method to be pursued.

"(5) CONNALLY. But the objective of both parties remained the same?"

"(6) BYRNES. There is no question about that (p. 224)."

Q. Now I request you to look at Document No. 35-16. I ask you, with reference to General Hurley's statement that his resignation as Ambassador to China was brought about by the alleged disloyalty of Foreign Service officers in China, whether the testimony of Secretary Byrnes, in Document No. 35-16, bears on this question?—A. It does.

Q. Will you characterize Secretary Byrnes' comments. A. The Secretary points out in paragraph 3 that when he had his first interview with General Hurley, on October 12, 1945, the Ambassador made no criticism of his staff. No; I am sorry. Pardon me. It was on October 12 that the Ambassador made his first comment that he had not been supported by employees of the State Department and the Embassy. At the time the charge was not specific and General Hurley was satisfied with Secretary Byrnes' assurance that if any man was opposing him, he would be withdrawn. Of course by this time both Mr. Acheson and myself had been out of China for 6 months.

Then in paragraph 5 Secretary Byrnes says that during the second conversation, about November 26, Mr. Hurley for the first time mentioned Mr. Acheson and myself. Secretary Byrnes asked him to go back to China and forget what Mr. Acheson and Mr. Service wrote back in October 1944 and February 1945.

Q. Now referring back to Documents 35-3 and 35-4 where General Hurley makes his broad charges that you and others were proponents of the Chinese Communists, is it your understanding that General Hurley regarded the Chinese Communists as being affiliated with or under control or in any way responsive to the Russian Communists?—A. We have General Hurley's repeated statements that both Mr. Stalin and Mr. Molotov agreed entirely with American policy and were not supporting the Chinese Communists and did not consider the Chinese Communists to be Communists at all and that Russia desired harmonious and close relations with China and would support the Chinese National Government. He makes it very clear, therefore, that he did not think there was close cooperation between the Chinese Communists and Russia.

Q. I asked you to look at Document No. 35-11 and then at Document No. 35-18 where I believe he expresses these views. Am I correct that 35-18 is as extensive an expression of General Hurley's views that the Chinese Communists are not really Communists and the Russians are not really interested in them. Is that a fair statement?—A. It is an extensive and repeated statement of that view.

Q. I would like to ask you if you shared General Hurley's views that the Chinese Communists were not real Communists at all and that they were, as is sometimes said, "vegetarian" Communists.—A. In Document 225, there is a memorandum I drafted at Yenan on March 23, 1945. I make it very clear that there is contact between the Chinese Communists and Moscow despite the Chinese Communists denials. I give various ways in which this contact exists. I conclude: "In spite of all these possibilities for contact, the Chinese Communists consistently deny they have any relations with the Soviet Government and complain they know less than anyone else about such subjects as about what the Soviet Union will do. The first part of this statement may be true. I know nothing to disprove it. What contact does exist is between the two parties, not governments. I think it likely that such contact exists."

That was Document 225.

Q. That was the memorandum of March 23, 1945. Is that right?—A. That is correct.

In Document 168 which I prepared on August 3, 1944, I state: "The Chinese Communist Party claims it is Marxist. By this the Communists mean their ideological and philosophical approach and dialectical methods are based on the Marxist approach. Marxism thus becomes to them chiefly an attitude and approach to the problem. It is a long-term view of political and economic development to which all short-term considerations of temporary advantage or premature power are ruthlessly subordinated."

Q. I take it then it was your view that the Chinese Communist Party was essentially Marxist?—A. Certainly.

Q. And in no sense vegetarian?—A. No; and I point out numerous instances where their thinking exactly follows the Russians.

Q. What was the date of that memorandum?—A. August 3, 1944.

Questions by Mr. RHETS:

Q. I ask you to refer to Documents 39-17 and 39-23.

The CHAIRMAN. Have we now finished with General Hurley's?

Q. No, no; it is just that—I am not finished with General Hurley by any means. I would like to ask that these two documents be introduced into the transcript at this point, 39-17 and 39-23.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be introduced.

Q. I will withdraw that. I have already put them in earlier in the proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. You refer to Hurley but it is McCarthy.

Q. It is McCarthy speaking.

The CHAIRMAN. Hurley's words?

Q. I will show you what I have in mind by referring to these in just a minute. I gather however that while General Hurley seems to suggest that—while General Hurley understands the Chinese Communists not to be oriented toward the Russian Communists, Senator McCarthy seems to think that you were pro-Soviet Communist, does he not?—A. He does, very mistakenly.

Q. So that to that extent Senator McCarthy and General Hurley have parted company. I take it it is fair to say that, is that right?—A. That is right.

Q. Now I would like to introduce at this point Documents 26-1 and 26-2 and I ask that they be introduced into the transcript. This document refers to the testimony of Mr. Budenz before the Senate Tydings committee, where he indicates here what is the Russian Communist Party line.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this 26-1? Did you say 26-1?

Q. Yes—no, excuse me; it should be just 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The reference to the New York Times?

Q. That is right, reporting a quote of Mr. Budenz.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 26

(Article in New York Times, April 21, 1950, Lattimore accused by Budenz as a Red; General backs him; by William S. White, p. 2C)

"In 1937, then, at a meeting called by Earl Browder, it was brought forward that we were now under instructions to name the Chinese Communists no longer as Red Communists, but we were to begin to represent them, as Browder said, as 'North Dakota nonpartisan leaguers.'

'Field was present at that meeting and made a report at which he commended Mr. Lattimore's zeal in seeing that Communists were placed as writers in 'Pacific Affairs.'

"LINE WAS TO ATTACK CHIANG"

'It was decided,' Mr. Budenz went on, 'that the line was to attack Chiang Kai-shek. As a matter of fact, an article was discussed, to be put in one of the organs of the Institute of Pacific Relations—and it did so appear—by T. A. Bisson, declaring that Nationalist China was feudal China and that Red China was democratic China.'

'Mr. Service, a State Department foreign officer, has been accused by Senator McCarthy of Communist associations and his loyalty file is currently under review pending his own testimony before the subcommittee.

'Service has been referred to as Lattimore's pupil,' Mr. Budenz said, 'but I have no knowledge of his political affiliations.'

Q. Now Mr. Budenz there indicates what he understood to be the Soviet or rather the International Communist Party line and with respect to the Chinese Communists, both in 1937 and also again in 1943, does he not?—A. Yes.

Q. He indicates that the Communist Party line then was adopted that the Chinese Communists should be regarded as simply agrarian reformers and most comparable to the North Dakota non-Partisan Leaguers, does he not?—A. Yes.

Q. That is generally conformable to the views General Hurley entertained, is it not?—A. That is correct.

Q. So that to the extent anybody was pursuing the Communist Party line, it appears to have been General Hurley, wasn't it?—A. Yes.

Q. What was your attitude? Did you ever regard or indicate the Chinese Communist Party to be mere agrarian reformers?—A. I never did. I never used the phrase "agrarian reformers."

Q. It was extensively used, was it not, during that period?—A. It was.

Q. But you state you never regarded them as mere reformers?—A. That is right. I always considered them as Marxist Communist Party, and I never used "Communist" in quotes nor said "so-called Communists."

Mr. ACHILLES. Was that view of the agrarian reformers at that time being extensively carried in the press by correspondents in the Chinese Communist-held areas?

A. I would have to check my memory, sir. I don't think that it was. Actually, of course, there was very little appearing in the press at that time. The correspondents didn't get out of Communist territory until late 1944, and the first books and writings based on direct observation were in early 1945. The phrase "agrarian reformers" was used fairly frequently in articles, magazines, here in the States.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would you say that the origins of those articles were primarily in this country rather than in China?

A. Yes, a good many of the articles were certainly ideologically influenced in the States. A lot of them were based on old writings about Chinese Communists, written in the 1938-39 period when the blockade was not yet established. A lot of them were based on conversations with people who had come back, with Army people, the newspapermen themselves, and American officers.

Mr. ACHILLES. The Chinese Communist leaders were taking that line at the time, or did they admit the connection with Moscow? You say they did not admit direct connection with Moscow but they did, as I understand it, claim they were Marxists?

A. They always insisted they were Marxists and Communists. Almost every correspondent who went up there said, "Why don't you change your name?" They said, "Why? We are Communists. Why should we change our name?"

Enclosure No. 1 of document 177 is a memorandum of conversation which I had with Mao Tse-tung, the memorandum of a long conversation I had with Mao during a whole afternoon and evening on August 23, 1944, and I brought up the the same question. I mentioned that the name "Communist" wouldn't be very reassuring to American businessmen. We were talking about economic development after the war and the need for American help. Mao laughed and said they had thought of changing their name but after all they were Marxists and they weren't ashamed of it and why should they try to conceal it. They did subsequently in their publicity try to popularize the Chinese version of their name, which of course would have meant nothing to Americans or to foreigners, and to call themselves "Kungchantang."

Mr. ACHILLES. Would you say then that this concept of the Chinese Communists as liberal agrarian reformers was one which had its origin primarily in the Moscow party line rather than the Yen-an party line?

A. They insisted all of the time that they were Marxists but they could quote Marxists scriptures to prove that in a backward agrarian society such as China the correct interpretation of Marxism involved first getting rid of their traces of feudalism and moving into a capitalistic democratic state as a step toward eventual socialism, but they couldn't jump at one step to socialism, and their only proper program in this intermediate phase, which they insisted would be a matter of decades, was a moderate program which would keep support of all classes on the united-front basis, which would permit the development of private enterprise, political democracy, and so on.

Mr. ACHILLES. But the point I am really interested in is whether this concept or this at least propaganda concept of it as being non-Marxist was Moscow Communist Party line and not the Chinese Communist Party line?

A. I can't answer the question specifically. They didn't talk very much about communism or Marxism. You had to probe them to get them to explain that what they were doing was all according to the book of Marx, and the whole program was united front, a moderate program, and that is the only thing they talked about. The average correspondent who went up there and looked around, said, "Why, this is wonderful." He was not concerned with the question of whether or not they were Marxists or real Communists, so that he was apt to go away and say, "Why, these people are cutting rents and taxes, reducing interest, trying to stimulate private enterprise, developing cooperatives."

The CHAIRMAN. I judge that your answer to the question is that it might have its origin right there in China by a misunderstanding of the newspapermen who took a superficial view of it?

A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. But it was not your view?

A. It was not my view.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Q. Referring, Mr. Service, to charges by Senator McCarthy which are indicated in documents 39-7 and 39-8 and 39-16 and 39-17 and 39-23, I would like to ask you whether you ever expressed the view that communism represented the best hope of China or the best hope of Asia, as Senator McCarthy has charged?—

A. I never made any such statements as that communism was the best hope of either Asia or China.

Q. Did you ever entertain such a view or belief?—A. I never did.

Q. Do you now?—A. I do not, most definitely not.

Q. Would you undertake to summarize for the Board what views you did express as to the prospects, if you like, of the Chinese Communist Party?—A. Well, I would say that the best summary is contained in document 192, which I drafted on October 9, 1944. I detailed the steps by which utilizing the opportunities of the war and their mastery of guerilla tactics the Communists had been able to build up a very, very strong popular support. And in the last paragraph I say:

"From the basic fact that the Communists have built up popular support of a magnitude and depth which makes their elimination impossible, we must draw the conclusion that the Communists will have a certain and important share in China's future. * * * I suggest the further conclusion that unless the Kuomintang goes as far as the Communists in political and economic reform, and otherwise proves itself able to contest this leadership of the people (none of which it yet shows signs of being willing or able to do), the Communists will be the dominant force in China within a comparatively few years."

Q. That, I take it, was a political prediction based upon your observation of political facts?—A. That is correct.

Q. Was it in any sense a statement of your aspirations or hopes?—A. It certainly was not.

The CHAIRMAN. But you did feel that the Chinese Communist forces could be integrated with the Nationalist forces?

A. Integrated into a coalition government, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In spite of the fact they were Marxist Communists?

A. Marxists committed for the time being to a moderate program and at that time showing a strong nationalistic orientation, strong desire for American aid and cooperation and postwar economic rehabilitation.

Q. Can you refer to any of your writings in which you both recognize this strong probability of Communist domination unless the Kuomintang took steps to bring about reforms in which you expressed any view as to either the possibility of orientation toward Russia or the desirability of it?

The CHAIRMAN. Is that question clear? Do you understand the question?

A. I don't.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the reporter read the question.

(Reporter repeated the question.)

A. As I would say that right from the very beginning, from the memorandum which I drafted January 1943, which is Document 103, one of my primary concerns was to keep China from falling completely into the Russian orbit. We had a situation of Japanese elimination being inevitable and no one, or no country, left to balance Japan—the certainty that to balance Russia—the certainty that Russia would be the dominating power, and the very greater necessity than ever before of trying to build a strong and independent China and one which would not be forced or allowed to go into the complete Russian orbit—completely into the Russian orbit.

Q. I wonder if it might be possible to take a short recess?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, certainly; about 10 minutes?

(Recess from 4:05 to 4:15 p. m.)

Q. Shall we proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, if you are ready.

Q. Before the recess I had asked a very awkward question which I would like to make a new attempt at. You have indicated that based upon your observation of political factions in China, you foresaw that the Chinese Communist Party was clearly in the ascendant and that its ascendancy would increase unless the Kuomintang took some sort of steps to bring about basic reforms in China. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. And while foreseeing the increasing growth of the Chinese Communist Party you have indicated that you did not recommend that development or in any way desire to bring it about. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Now, I had asked you whether you could refer to any of your memoranda or writings of the time which expressed your concern about the possibility of China's becoming increasingly within the orbit of Soviet Russia, and I would like to ask you to refer to Document 142, which is a dispatch dated April 21, 1944, signed by Ambassador Gauss, transmitting a memorandum prepared by you under date of April 7, 1944. Now is there any expression of views in that memorandum which bears on the question before us?—A. Yes; I believe there is.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to read that into the record?

Q. Read it to the Board.—A. I quote from page 7 of my memorandum.

Q. This is not in your book, sir. (Mr. Rhett's submitted a copy to the chairman.)

The CHAIRMAN. You refer to pages which appear as No. 142 in exhibit 1.

Q. Yes; I misfired.—A. I commence with the second paragraph of the excerpt before you:

"As for the present Chinese Government, it must be acknowledged that we are faced with a regrettable failure of statesmanship. Chiang's persisting in an active anti-Soviet policy, at a time when his policies (or lack of them) are accelerating economic collapse and increasing internal dissension, can only be characterized as reckless adventurism. The cynical desire to destroy unity among the United Nations is serious. But it would also appear that Chiang unwittingly may be contributing to Russian dominance in Eastern Asia by internal and external policies which, if pursued in their present form, will render China too weak to serve as a possible counterweight to Russia. By so doing, Chiang may be digging his own grave; not only North China and Manchuria, but also national groups such as Korea and Formosa may be driven into the arms of the Soviets. "Neither now, nor in the immediately foreseeable future, does the United States want to find itself in direct opposition to Russia in Asia; nor does it want to see Russia have undisputed dominance over a part or all of China.

"The best way to cause both of these possibilities to become realities is to give, in either fact or appearance, support to the present reactionary government of China beyond carefully regulated and controlled aid directed solely toward the military prosecution of the war against Japan. To give diplomatic or other support beyond this limit will encourage the Kuomintang in its present suicidal anti-Russian policy. It will convince the Chinese Communists—who probably hold the key to control, not only of North China, but of Inner Mongolia and Manchuria as well—that we are on the other side and that their only hope for survival lies with Russia. Finally, Russia will be led to believe (if she does not already) that American aims run counter to hers, and that she must therefore protect herself by any means available: in other words, the extension of her direct power or influence.”

Mr. ACHILLES. Coming back, if we might for a minute, to the conclusion of Document 192 in which you expressed the belief that unless the Kuomintang did various things which it showed no signs of being able or willing to do the Communist would be the dominant force in China within a comparatively few years, did you believe that their inclusion in a government with the Kuomintang would change that situation or that they would still be the dominant force?

A. I thought that their inclusion in a coalition government would, say, stimulate the Kuomintang and encourage the liberal forces which were considerable in China, so that it would be unlikely that the Communists would gain complete control, that there would be a chance for survival in China of moderate, pro-American liberal forces whom we desired to see maintained, who would be completely eliminated if there was going to be a civil war which we believed would be won by the Communists, that it would be a modified transfer of power, a gradual transfer of power rather than a complete transfer of power which would come about through a civil war, which is the bitterest kind of conflict that there usually is, driving both parties to extremes.

I believe that it is correct to say that we anticipated that, as the dominant and most dynamic force, the Communists would substantially be the strongest force, eventually become the strongest force in a coalition government, but there would be or there was a good chance of its being the kind of government that we might be able to work with, that would not swing over completely to the other side. Of course, this was in 1944.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes, I realize that.

A. We might have kept China, shall we say, in the status of a buffer, might have kept it from going completely the other way. It was a gamble, we knew it was a gamble, but faced with the alternatives it was the only possible thing.

CHAIRMAN. All right.

Q. Now I would like to introduce at this point documents 33-1, 33-2, 3, 33-4, and 33-5, and I ask that these all be introduced in the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

(Extension of remarks of Congressman Dondero, Congressional Record, December 10, 1945, p. A5403)

“Bishop Yu-pin had just returned from the San Francisco Conference where he had served as unofficial adviser to the Chinese delegation. Previously arriving in this country on Easter Monday 1943 he remained here until November 1944 and returned to the United States in April to attend the conference.

“The prelate said there was every indication that Service was working in the interests of the Communist Party and that it was upon his advice that General Stilwell approached Chiang Kai-shek in person no less than three times to ask that the Chinese Communists be armed with American lend-lease supplies.”

(Extension of remarks of Congressman Dondero, Congressional Record, December 10, 1945, p. A5403)

“The prelate disclosed that when Service was appointed political adviser to General Stilwell, the American Communists immediately began howling for this Government to demand that the Chinese National Government arm the Chinese Communist soldiers.

“Meanwhile Service was doing a pretty job of finagling with the Chinese Communists, Bishop Yu-pin said, and kept urging Stilwell to send a representative to provinces in which they were active to investigate the part they were playing in the war against the Japanese.”

DOCUMENT No. 33-4

(Extension of remarks of Congressman Dondero, Congressional Record, December 10, 1945, p. A5404)

"'Vinegar Joe,' playing into Service's hands, the bishop continued, appointed Service himself to the job. The report Service submitted to Stilwell, the prelate said, 'lauded the Communist soldiers in glowing terms.'

"But, the bishop emphasized, Communist guerilla warfare actually was but a minor part in the battle against the enemy."

DOCUMENT No. 33-5

(Extension of remarks of Congressman Dondero, Congressional Record, December 10, 1945, p. A5404)

"Following his report to Stilwell, Service kept urging him to go to the Chinese generalissimo with the demand that the Communists be armed. Cognizant of the situation in China, Vinegar Joe hesitated to do so, the bishop said, but finally consented when his political adviser insisted.

"STILWELL SHOCKS CHIANG

"Bishop Yu-pin said that Chiang Kai-shek was astounded at the American general's velvet-gloved demands because the latter knew that to arm the rival faction could result in but one thing—an immediate outbreak of civil war and the possible destruction of the National Government of China.

"Although Stilwell's first Service-inspired visit failed, Service did not lose heart, the bishop said, but allowed some time to go by before he again urged a second visit by Stilwell to the generalissimo. Again the Chinese leader refused, and it was then, the prelate said, that Stilwell was informed that if the demand was repeated, there was no other alternative but to ask that President Roosevelt recall him from China.

"STILWELL TRIES THREE TIMES

"Undismayed, Service kept hammering at Stilwell that the Chinese Communists were getting a raw deal, and again insisted that the demand be resubmitted for the generalissimo's reconsideration.

"And it was on this third visit to his good friend, with whom he had broken bread on many an occasion, that Stilwell was informed by the generalissimo he was asking Roosevelt to relieve him of his duties in China.

"Service, the bishop said, was a definite detrimental influence during his assignment in China."

Q. Now, these documents relate to certain charges attributed by the Washington Times-Herald to Bishop Yu-pin. Do you know who Bishop Yu-pin is?—A. He is actually the archbishop of Nanking at the present time. He is also the—

Mr. ACHILLES. At the present time, now?—A. I believe at present he is the archbishop, at that time he was the bishop. He is the honorary chairman of a magazine called China Monthly, which is a propaganda publication published in the United States for which Kohlberg is one of the frequent contributors. He is an intimate of Generalissimo and Madame Chiang Kai-shek, functions in a way as an adviser to them and as an emissary for them on semiofficial missions abroad. He is a member of the People's Political Council of the Chinese Government. He was an adviser carrying a diplomatic passport to the Chinese delegation at the San Francisco Conference.

Mr. ACHILLES. You say he was a member of the People's Advisory Council, that was in 1945 or now?

A. In 1945 I know that he was. I am not sure now. With the changes in China I assume that the organization is no longer in existence.

Q. Now, it is evident from these documents which have just been introduced that Bish Yu-pin regards you as a pro-Chinese Communist, is that not so?—A. Yes.

Q. Would you care to comment on the charges made in this article?—A. Well, he made a number of charges in the article. He says, for instance, I "lauded the Communist soldiers in glowing terms"—I did report that our military observers and newspaper correspondents and other contacts and sources had found the Chinese Communist troops generally to have high morale, good organization and training, and considerable effectiveness in the type of guerrilla operations in which they were engaging. I believed that the effectiveness of the Chinese Communist forces was very thoroughly documented by our American military observers and has been pretty well demonstrated by subsequent events.

It is interesting to find in Bishop Paul Yu-pin's own China Monthly magazine, the issue for June 1945, an article by a Catholic priest, Father Cornac Shanahan, who visited the Communist area in 1944, the statement: "Allied military intelligence reported the fighting spirit of the Communist soldiers. This we saw for ourselves."

Now the main part, it seems to me, of the archbishop's interview is that I was the chief figure behind General Stilwell's request that the Chinese Communists be armed, and he says that I specifically was responsible for three separate demands by General Stilwell that the Chinese Communist forces be armed. He goes on to say that General Stilwell was warned after the second request that if it was repeated the generalissimo would have to ask for his recall. However, according to him, I persisted and forced General Stilwell to make a third request and caused the generalissimo to request his recall.

In the first place, I never made such recommendations during the period before Stilwell's recall. The first suggestion I made that we would have to face the problem of arming the Communists was in a memorandum which I wrote on August 29, 1944. Even my memorandum No. 40 of October 10 does not say anything about arming the Communists. I therefore never instigated or put pressure or urged General Stilwell to demand that the Communists be armed. The only explanation, possible explanation I can find for the archbishop's statements is the series of telegrams from President Roosevelt to the generalissimo which commenced in a telegram of July 7, 1944. We have referred to those before, I think. That is on page 68 of the China white paper. These telegrams were for the eyes of the generalissimo alone. Stilwell was in Burma, the chief of staff in Chungking was worried about using any of our interpreters or any of the generalissimo's interpreters. I was the only person available that had sufficient command of Chinese and could be trusted, so I was ordered to accompany General Ferris when he delivered the first and second of these messages on July 7 and July 15, and I was the interpreter translating these telegrams phrase by phrase to the generalissimo. It may be that because of my presence and because of the Central Government's dislike of me—for instance, I was credited with being the chief instigator of the observer group to Yenan that they may have jumped to the conclusion that really I had a great deal more to do with these telegrams than I did. Actually I had no knowledge of it beforehand, I had no part in preparing them or instigating them. I was just as surprised as the chief of staff himself was when the first one came.

The whole picture that the archbishop draws of my being an important figure, an influential member of Stilwell's staff, is completely erroneous. I was not even the principal one of his political officers, and none of us had any effect, any substantial effect, I am sure, on his own thinking. He had intimate knowledge of China, going back 20 years, or about 20 years. He didn't need us to tell him about China. And, in fact, my own direct contact with General Stilwell was extremely limited. There was simply no truth in what the archbishop says.

Q. Now, the archbishop also says that you were throughout this time, I think he says, finagling with the Communists. Will you tell the Board just what you were doing with the Communists?—A. The only thing that I was doing with the Communists was acting as the political reporter, getting acquainted with their leaders, trying to find out what they were thinking, and, more important, what they were doing.

Q. You were seeing as many of them as you could?—A. I was seeing every one of them that I could and spending a good deal of my time with them, but purely as a reporter. There was never any misunderstanding of my status, either on the part of headquarters or on the part of the Chinese Communists.

Q. Your contacts with the Chinese Communists, however, were part of your official duties, is that not correct?—A. At that time they were the major part of my official duties.

Q. So that if you can call an intelligence officer's associating with the persons from whom he seeks to obtain intelligence "finagling," you were finagling with the Communists?—A. I won't agree with your definition but—for instance, if I can interrupt you, in document 177, which I referred to before—it is a dispatch from the Embassy transmitting my memorandum of conversation with

Mao Tse-tung on August 23, 1944. In my memorandum of conversation I referred to the fact that General Mao asked me a number of questions about the United States, American policy, and so on, and I made the following statement:

"This and other questions about the United States were addressed directly to me. I therefore made it clear in most explicit terms that I had no official authority and that my replies were only my purely private and completely unofficial opinions."

And that was the basis on which I approached the Chinese Communists from the very beginning. They knew when we were sent and arrived in Yen-an, that I had no representative capacity, no authority to negotiate, or to discuss any sort of agreement, or on the equipping of the Communists, recognition of Communists, or anything of that sort. I was purely there as a pair of ears and eyes.

Q. Will you look at document 33-6, the first paragraph. This is an excerpt from the article appearing in the San Francisco Examiner for June 10, 1945, by Mr. Ray Richards, where he says, where he refers to John S. Service who allegedly made a special mission to Moscow a year ago to aid the Red group in the United States Embassy there in weakening the will of Chiang Kai-shek not to submit to north China Communist demands. Have you ever been in Moscow?—A. I have never been in Russia or Moscow. I would like to call your attention to the fact that the next paragraph of this quotation goes on to say that the information was supplied by an important attaché of the Chinese delegation to the World Security Conference.

Q. And that important attaché is presumably whom?—A. From the similarity of the information that has been given to this man and to the Times-Herald, and so on, I believe it to be Bishop Yu-pin.

Q. Now, will you refer to document 35-19? In this excerpt from General Hurley's testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he charges that after you were relieved from duty on General Wedemeyer's staff at his insistence, you and George Atcheson were placed in positions of supervision over him. Were you ever put in any position in Washington or any place else which might remotely be regarded as supervisory of General Hurley?—A. Never in any position which by any stretch of the imagination could be called supervisory. I was never assigned duties or put in a position where I was concerned with policy even on a low level.

Q. You returned from your assignment to General Wedemeyer on what date?—A. I returned to Washington on April 12, 1945.

Q. And what was your assignment in the Department upon your return?—A. I was temporarily assigned to the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, where I was used for consultation as customary with officers returning from the field who have information which may be of interest to various Government departments in Washington.

Q. Will you describe just a little more in detail what this term "consultation" means? What you do when you are assigned to consultation?—A. You are given no regular duties, you don't become a part of the union organization. You are literally just available.

Q. You are available to consult with whom?—A. In the first place with the interested officers of the division or the office to which you are attached, then to other divisions of State Department—and there were quite a number who were interested in one way or another in China, and then, too, other agencies, and there were a great many during the war who were concerned with China.

Q. Such as?—A. Such as MID of the Army and also OPD of the Army, ONI of the Navy, and the various branches of OSS, OWI, and FEA. I think I have mentioned enough.

Q. So that when you were assigned consultation, you were available to and did talk with these various groups about such information as you brought back from your assignment in the field?—A. That is right.

Q. Now, General Hurley in this document 35-19 states that when you and George Atcheson were returned to the United States, one of you was made Assistant Chief of the Far Eastern Division and the other Assistant Chief of the Chinese Division. Did you ever occupy either of these positions?—A. I never have. As I said, on this occasion I was not given any position in the organization. I spent actually very little time in the State Department. I continued my consultation only until about May 8 on which date I was assigned to the Office of the Foreign Service, which is an administrative branch of the State Department. My duties there were to assist in some preliminary studies that were being made preparatory to recommending the revision of the Foreign Service Act, or Foreign Service legislation, I should say.

Q. And you remained on that assignment from May 8?—A. Until the time of my arrest on June 6.

Q. And then at the time of your arrest on June 6 you were put in the position of leave and had no further active duties of any kind in the Department from then until when?—A. After my arrest on June 6 I was on leave until my return to active duty following clearance by the grand jury.

The CHAIRMAN. This George Acheson, who has been referred to in this recent testimony, is the man who was killed in the plane crash in the Pacific some years ago?

A. That is correct; 1947, I believe. I returned to active duty in the Department on August 12, 1945.

Q. What was the assignment you were next given?—A. At that time the war was ending and we found ourselves—the State Department found itself rather unprepared for the sudden need to reopen our offices in the Far East, particularly in what had been occupied China and in Japan. I was assigned temporarily to the Office of Far Eastern Affairs and I acted as a leg man or liaison man between the FE and the various administrative divisions of the State Department.

Q. By "FE" you mean?—A. Office of Far Eastern Affairs. I was, you might say, an expeditor, a person to follow up. My jobs were to promote, expedite the making of travel arrangements. We arranged special cars for people trying to get out to the west coast quickly, arranged transportation across the Pacific, arranged for the shipment of supplies, some of which had to be sent out by air, of cryptographic material, Foreign Service regulations, files of Foreign Service circulars.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have anything to do with assignment of personnel?—A. I had nothing to do with assignment of personnel myself. I was a carrier of messages between the Office of Far Eastern Affairs and the Division of Foreign Service Personnel concerning their requirements of personnel and their recommendations. I was not in the position of recommending personnel myself. I was simply the man who provided the continual follow-up contact, because it was a matter of tremendous urgency and it was a desperately hard business to find personnel. I had several conferences a day, I think, with officers in FP on particular problems of getting this man who might be in South America, or this man who might be in some post in Europe. FP would say, "We can't get this man." I would go back to FE and say, "How about somebody else?" and I would go back—

Q. All right, now how long did you engage in this type of work?—A. September 7, 1945, I was assigned to the staff of the United States political adviser in Tokyo and I departed from Washington on September 14. Now, of course, those last few days I was engaged primarily in getting ready to leave, but roughly speaking I was on this temporary liaison job from August 12 until September 14, my departure.

Q. Now, when questioned as to any activities of yours which tended to be supervisory of or in any way interfere with General Hurley, the general indicated one example of this interference was a telegram addressed to him by Secretary of State Stettinius on February 6, 1945. Where were you on that date?—A. I was in Chungking.

Q. How long had you been there?—A. Since January 18.

Q. Did you have anything to do with this telegram of February 6 that General Hurley complains about?—A. I did not. I had no knowledge of it until I read it in the white paper many years later.

Q. It would not have been possible for you to have been the author or instigator or in any way connected with it, would it?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. In what paragraph does General Hurley refer to that?—A. That is in this 35-19. It is paragraphs 6 and 7 and 8.

Q. Now will you refer to Document 35-10? In this document General Hurley refers to another cablegram from the State Department which he seems to indicate was an example of your interference or supervision of him, does it not?—A. Yes.

Q. General Hurley, when questioned further about this, recognized that you were in Tokyo at the time of this cablegram, does he not?—A. That is what he states, yes.

Q. He states that you were an adviser to General MacArthur, who in turn, as he put it, was Commander of Asia, and therefore above him. Did you have any connection with political work or political advice to General MacArthur during your tour of duty in Tokyo?—A. No; I did not, but there is a great deal of confusion in General Hurley's mind over this telegram. The telegram that he refers to in paragraph 4 of 35-10 is actually the telegram which was sent to him by the Department of State after it had received a telegram from George Kennan in Moscow on the 23d of April, and had discussed the interview with Stalin with Mr. Harriman, Ambassador Harriman in the Department here on April 19, and both of those officers were—

Q. By interview with Stalin, you mean an interview?—A. That Hurley had with Stalin about April 15 and both Kennan and Ambassador Harriman were very much concerned that Ambassador Hurley was taking far too optimistic a view of Mr. Stalin's statements—all this is contained on pages 96, 97 and 98 of the white paper—and therefore Secretary Stettinius sent his telegram to Ambassador Hurley, which as Ambassador Hurley says "was contrary to the instructions that he had received."

The CHAIRMAN. Where was the reference in here to a telegram from Japan and MacArthur? I did not see that?—A. It isn't there.

The CHAIRMAN. You said it is in 35-10. I don't care about any additional exhibit, but I was looking for it in the exhibits we are supposed to have.

A. I am sorry, it is in 35-19, paragraph 9, Senator La Follette inquires of General Hurley where these people were. He says, "Were these people in China now or in State Department or both?" Hurley said, "Both. I think by that time Atcheson, Service, and Emmerson had been appointed as advisers to the Supreme Commander in Asia."

The CHAIRMAN. You say 39-19?

Q. 35-19. I am sorry.

The CHAIRMAN. It is my mistake.—35-19, paragraph what?

A. Paragraph 9. This is 35-19.

The CHAIRMAN. O. K., thank you.

Q. Now I should like to introduce at this point into the transcript document 35-20.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT 35-20

(Hurley—Hearings before Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 5, 6, 7, 10, 1945)

"CONNALLY. In your statement you say that the professional diplomats continually advised the Communists that your efforts in preventing collapse of the National Government did not represent the policy of the United States. Do you mean that they went directly to the Communists and made these representations from time to time? (P. 82.)

"(2) HURLEY. I mean they did more than that, Senator. I mean that when the program was prepared for President Roosevelt to go to Yalta that there is a paper dated January 29 on American policy in Asia, and one paragraph of that paper—it is listed among those I wish—provided, if the military, in landing on the coast of China, found the Communists instead of the National Army, they would have the right to arm all forces in such a condition that would assist the American landing force. With that I was in agreement. But imagine my consternation when I saw a general movement of Communist troops from a territory just described by Senator Austin, all moving toward a certain port in China. Then I read that some naval officer had been arrested here, and the Communists not only knew the naval port but they knew the most secret plan of the United States, and I picked that up, not from our career men, but from the Communist armed party in China, and I have asked for that record in what I have submitted to you (p. 83).

"(3) CONNALLY. You approved the policy that was outlined in the paper, but you did not like the leak, is that it (p. 84).

"(4) HURLEY. I do not like to be leaked on.

"(5) CONNALLY. Who leaked? Do you know who it was that gave the leak?

"(6) HURLEY. No, sir; I only know that it did leak.

"(7) CONNALLY. You cannot base any charge, because you do not know who it was who gave it out? (p. 84).

"(8) HURLEY. * * * if the military, in landing on the coast of China, found the Communists instead of the National Army, they would have the right to arm all forces in such a condition that would assist the American landing force. With that I was in agreement (p. 83).

"(9) HURLEY. I have never contended that in a landing you would not use all forces available to you. I believe that was essential. I am not quarreling with that as a policy. I am quarreling with the fact that it became known to the Communists and started a big movement from their territory in the north and northwest to the seacoast (p. 84).

"(10) HURLEY. The committee asked me to advise them who are the men who are guilty of the leaks from the State Department, which leaks are designed to defeat the foreign policy of the United States. Personally I have been on the perimeter of America's influence since we entered the war. I, therefore, could not have intimate or personal knowledge of what has been transpiring in Washington. I do recall that certain career men were arrested on information supplied by the FBI. Usually the FBI does not cause arrests in suspicions. They usually base their arrests on fact (p. 170)."

Q. This document deals with General Hurley's charges that you were engaged in improperly supplying information to the Chinese Communist Party. Did you ever supply any information—

The CHAIRMAN. In what paragraph does that appear?

Q. It commences with paragraph (1).

The CHAIRMAN. That is Connally.

Q. That is right. Connally asks him the question. Connally is asking him this question as to what these people actually did, and then in the next paragraph Hurley tells him what they did.

The CHAIRMAN. In paragraph 1 Connally simply refers to testimony we have already considered previously.

Q. Connally is saying in this statement:

"In your statement you say that the professional diplomats continually advised the Communists that your efforts in preventing collapse of the National Government did not represent the policy of the United States. Do you mean that they went directly to the Communists and made these representations from time to time?"

And then Hurley—

"I mean they did more than that, Senator."

And then he goes on—

"I mean that when the program was prepared" for the President, and he goes on to indicate that somebody leaked to the Chinese Communists the possibility that we were going to land troops on the southeast coast of China, and Hurley says he does not like to be leaked on. Connally says, "Who leaked, do you know it was, who gave the leak." He says at that point, "No sir, I only know that it did leak." Connally says, "You can't seem to base any charges on that," and Hurley came right back, "Yes." His implication certainly is, despite the fact that since he does not know and he can't make any charge, he indicates nonetheless it was some of these Foreign Service officers who, as he put it, leaked on him.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

Q. Now, what I want to ask you, Mr. Service, is whether you ever supplied any information to the Chinese Communists or to anyone else outside the United States Government that the United States contemplated making landings on the coast of China?—A. I never supplied any such information. As a matter of fact, when this policy decision was reached, as General Hurley says, on January 29, I was in Chungking and I had no knowledge of any such paper or such decision being reached. It was generally understood from repeated public statements during the war that we would eventually land in China. I never had the slightest idea of any definite plans. For instance, I see from the China Monthly, in the April 1945 issue, that Admiral Chester Nimitz, who recently came to Washington for important strategy conferences, in a press conference on March 8, 1945, made the following statement:

"I believe that we should plan the war against Japan in such a manner that our chances of success are greatest and our casualties least. In planning the final assault on the Empire, we will need more than one position from which to attack. We will need a number of positions. It may well be that some of these positions will be in China."

The article was headlined something to the effect that Nimitz promises China landing.

Actually in my conversations with the Chinese Communists, it was very apparent right from August 1944, the time I first went to Yen-an, that they themselves were hoping to be on the spot when we landed, and I tried to discourage that. For instance, in my conversations with Mao Tse-tung on August 23, 1944, quoted from my Document 177, I find the following in my memorandum:

"I noted his emphasis on American landing in China and suggested that the war might well be won in other ways and a landing not necessary."

In September 1944 I had a long conversation with Chu Teh, commander in chief of the Chinese Communist forces. This memorandum is contained in Document 186, and I quote: "He (Chu Teh) argued at length the necessity for an American landing on the China coast. He attempted to refute my suggestion that it might be easier and quicker to defeat Japan from the sea by claiming that the shipping and manpower required would be too great to be practical."

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at that time have any knowledge of the Manhattan project?

A. I certainly did not, sir. My first knowledge of that was the newspapers that were published the day before—the day I appeared before the grand jury. When I came out of the grand jury I saw the extras.

Now I mentioned a while ago that the Chinese Communists gave indications from at least August 1944 of their plans to move to the southeast part of China, as General Hurley alleges they did only after they found out about some plans of ours. In my document No. 180, which contains a memorandum of conversation on August 31 with General Chen Yi on August 25, General Chen said that: "This section of southeast China may be of great importance to the war against Japan because it must be the site of American landings. If the Kuomintang cannot hold it, the Communists can. Now however the situation may be changing. The possible near collapse of the Kuomintang in these areas and the importance of the areas to the United Nations war effort must be considered."

That is the end of the quotation from General Chen Yi. I go on in my memorandum to say:

"It would be a mistake to assume that the Communist consideration of the problem is all on a high-minded and unselfish plane, as indicated here."

I don't think that there is any need of mentioning all these various instances where the Chinese Communists with increasing openness as time went by discussed quite frankly their plans to try to be on the coast, the part of China where they thought we were going to land, but in a memorandum on March 4, 1945, I state that Communist forces are aggressively expanding in south China. In our telegram of February 26, this was a factor which we mentioned, the Communist expansion.

Q. That is, toward the southeast, the coast?—A. That is right. Here is a memorandum of conversation, again with General Chen Yi. Chen Yi, by the way, was commander of the Communist new Fourth Army, now the mayor of Shanghai. Chen Yi is saying: "Give us a year—this is March 11, 1945—and we will have all of east China from the borders of Manchuria to Hainan."

Then they say: "When that has been accomplished the Communist forces will be at least as strong as the Central Government and it will be the Kuomintang which will be blockaded."

I go on to say, and this is in March 1945: "Conflicts between the Central Government and Communist forces are widespread. The Communists admit fairly heavy losses to their units around Canton but claim that these are more than balanced by growth in the Shanghai area, south An-hwei, Che-kiang, Fukien, Hu-nan, and north Kwang-tung. Open civil war seems to be expected without fail by the Communists."

My only point in going into so much detail is that there was never any secret as far as we were concerned of the Chinese Communist intentions for a long time, and their movements were not dictated by any leaks from us. In any case, there were no such leaks and we did our best to discourage them from the idea that they would be successful in meeting us if they made a drive to south China.

Q. Now, I would like to introduce at this point document 39-4 and ask that it be included in the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT 39-4

"Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950, remarks of Senator McCarthy)

"(Page 4437): To indicate to the committee the importance of this man's position as a security risk to the Government, I think it should be noted that he is one of the dozen top policy makers in the entire Department of State on far-eastern policy.

"He is one of the small, potent group of untouchables who year after year formulate and carry out the plans for the Department of State and its dealings with foreign nations; particularly those in the Far East."

Q. You have already covered this point in part but would you comment generally upon Senator McCarthy's charge here that you were "one of the small, potent group of untouchables who year after year formulate and carry out the plans" and policies of the State Department?—A. Well, to this board there would hardly be any need to elaborate on that. No one man makes policy of course unless it is the President. The State Department makes policy, the State Department recommends policy, and the State Department is a sort of gathering together, a grinding mill of a great deal of grist from a great many sources. As a reporter in the field I was a minor participant in the process of providing grist for the policy-making mill, but I have never been assigned to the Department of State in a position which was connected or concerned in any way with policy. My assignments to the Department have been temporary and have been very brief. I was here for a few weeks' consultation while on home leave in 1938, again on consultation while on home leave for a few weeks in 1943, again on consultation for a few weeks only in 1944. I have already explained my assignments during 1945, which were, first, a brief period of consultation, and then administrative duties in the Office of Foreign Service, and then again administrative duties in connection with the reopening of the offices in China. The next time I came to Washington, the only time I have ever been assigned to the Department in Washington, was in 1949, when I was assigned to the Division of Foreign Service Personnel, but again in a position without any administrative or executive authority. I was a special assistant to the Chief of Foreign Service Personnel, but my duties principally were to advise Foreign Service officers on the contents of their files and their standing in the service. I was not concerned with the assignment or transfer of personnel.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Has anybody any questions they want to put in at this time before we adjourn?

(None.)

No, no questions until tomorrow. Thank you. We meet tomorrow at 10 a. m. (The meeting adjourned at 5:15 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: Saturday, May 27, 1950, 10:15 a. m.—1 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building, Washington, D. C.

Reporter: Violet R. Voce, Department of State, C/S—Reporting.

Members of Board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles; Arthur G. Stevens, and Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhett, firm of Reilly, Rhett & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 10:15 a. m.)

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Conrad E. Snow). The Board will be in session. I will read into the record the pertinent portion of the telegram from the Department of State to the American Embassy at Chungking, dated 10th of August 1943:

Restricted

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Aug. 10, 1943, 10 p. m.

AMERICAN EMBASSY,

Chungking:

Ludden at Kunming is designated second secretary of Embassy at Chungking. He will retain Commission as Consul at Kunming. Should proceed upon arrival of Langdon. This transfer not made at his request nor for his convenience. Transportation expenses, per diem, and shipment effects, Kunming to Chungking, authorized subject Travel Regulations. Air travel authorized. Expenses chargeable "Transportation, Foreign Service."

Hall, Emmerson, Ludden, and John S. Service are attached to the staff of the Commanding General, U. S. Army Forces, China-Burma-India, and are subject to instructions from General Stilwell and authorized to travel to any country or place which he may designate.

While Department has authorized expenses for Hall, Ludden, and Emerson in proceeding to Chungking, it assumes, as in the case of Davies, the Army will provide travel expenses and per diem for such missions as General Stilwell will direct for all four officers.

HULL.

Mr. JOHN STEWART SERVICE, having previously been sworn as a witness in his own behalf, resumed the stand and continued his testimony as follows:)

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Service, at one or another of your returns to Washington from China it has been stated that you were interviewed by the Interview Section of the Military Intelligence Service in the War Department, date unstated. Did you at any such interview advocate taking United States aid away from Chiang Kai-shek and giving it to the Communists instead?—A. I think, General, that is Military Intelligence Section. I certainly never at any time recommended discontinuing aid to the Central Government and to Chiang. In fact, on numerous occasions I argued against such proposals which were made by some people. Therefore, my answer is that I never made the statement so alleged.

Q. Did you at any such interview represent that the Chinese Communists were free of Soviet influence?—A. I never made any such statement. I did, however, say, I believe, that they were not strongly oriented toward the Soviet Union at that time, that they were following a moderate program, that we might expect that they would, because of the strong nationalistic bias, because of their independent history which has resulted in their not having to rely on the Soviet Union for the past 10 years, we might expect them to maintain a somewhat independent position with the Soviet Union.

Q. In your statement on page 27 you refer to Document 201, just below the middle of the page, as an example of a report of such an interview which you had with either the OSS or the MIS, would that be a fair sample of the report that you made to the Intelligence Section of the Military Intelligence Service?—A. It would be a sample, sir, because I usually went to these sessions with no set speech. I simply want to be interrogated by their own experts, their own people who were working on China and these subjects were extremely various and maybe in one session they might cover the whole gamut of information or topics of interest. This is a fair sample.

Q. Has that been put in the transcript, or might it be introduced in the transcript in connection with this paragraph of the statement?

Mr. RHETTS, I may say, the only problem on that, General, is that these are mostly documents which have been located in files and which presumably have to go back into the State Department files.

The CHAIRMAN, This report seems to deal more particularly with the puppets, the puppet governments in China.

Mr. RHETTS, A copy could be made of this document so the copy could be introduced as an exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN, Is there any other report which would confirm the testimony that you have just given with reference to the nature of your reports to the Military Intelligence Service on your return, or is this the only one you have, Mr. Service?—A. We have one or two others, sir, but most of these briefing sessions were not policy talks. In fact at most of them, like the OWI and some of the other agencies, I prefaced the meeting with the statement I was not there to discuss policy, that these meetings were simply factual discussions with their research people who were interested in getting news, information, facts.

The CHAIRMAN, In view of the nature of this report, I do not think it will be necessary to introduce it at this moment.

Mr. RHETTS, In that connection, General, I think I ought to make clear to the Board what our situation is on this documentation problem. You see, this whole series of documents, from 101 to 227, are the documents which represent the product of research to try to find the various reports, memoranda, that Mr. Service has written. Those have simply been extracted from the files of the State Department and brought together for use in this proceeding and presumably must go back into those files.

Now, what we have done, those reports are right here in this file cabinet and they will be, of course, available to the Board for its inspection. We didn't try to make copies of all of them. We have made copies only of the few which appear in the document book, so as to any others, why they are all available for the examination of the Board. And as to any of them that the Board, for example, would like to have brought into this case separately, it would be a question of making some copies of them, you see. But they are here and they are available for the use of the Board, even though they are not being physically introduced in the record as such.

The CHAIRMAN. With reference to that statement just made by counsel, I would like to say that any report—which either counsel or members of the Board think is material to any issue in the hearing—should be introduced either as an exhibit or read into the transcript.

Mr. MORELAND. You have the problem of classifications on some that you haven't been able to get declassified.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; insofar as classification forbids—

Mr. RHETTS. But even apart from that, General, if I may suggest, this series of documents from 101 to 227 is 6 inches or 8 inches deep. We think they are all material to this proceeding. On the other hand, the physical problem of reproducing all of them was simply beyond our capacity. Consequently, we have not tried to have them all so that they cannot all be physically a part of this record, though we use them in part to make available for the inspection of the Board and to refer to, and they will be used as the raw material for the testimony. But I don't know how we can actually put them into the record in the technical sense that you have in mind.

The CHAIRMAN (off the record). Will you now then offer for the record, but not for the transcript, documents numbered 101 through 227 as identified in your exhibit 1?

Mr. RHETTS. That is correct, in the document list containing exhibit 1.

The CHAIRMAN. That offer will be received and the documents will be attached to the FBI file in the possession of the Board and made available not only to the members of the Board but to the Loyalty Review Board.

You have now, I take it, found a report characteristic of Mr. Service's reports to the Military Intelligence Section on his return from China.

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, General, document 202, which is another memorandum prepared in this case by the OSS, a memorandum of one of these consultative conferences with Mr. Service.

The CHAIRMAN. What date?

Mr. RHETTS. Dated November 8, 1944. Actually this document consists evidently of the notes taken by two different people that attended this conference—because you have in effect two sets of notes on the same conference. On page 2 of the second set of notes is certain material which I believe bears on the precise question that you were interrogating Mr. Service about.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this document identifiable as No. 202?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, 202 in our document list.

Mr. SERVICE. I think the material from the point marked on that page to the end will be of interest.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, I think you're correct. It just bears on the subject and I'd like to insert into the transcript at this time that portion of document 202 which begins with: "What hope of the KMT and CP coming together? Only through thorough reform of the KMT," to the end of the next page of the report.

Mr. RHETTS. In that connection, General, might I just ask two questions of the witness on this point?

The CHAIRMAN. Surely.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. Service, did you prepare this memorandum?—A. I did not. I never saw the memorandum prepared by the agencies in any of these interviews or interrogations.

Q. So that these represent notes taken by someone who attended the conference?—A. Yes.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you examined these notes to ascertain if they accurately represent your report at the time?—A. The only ones I have ever seen, sir, are these. I think we have three altogether, which are notes of interviews in OSS, Research Analysis Branch. I have never seen any.

Q. You didn't get my question. Do these notes which I have just inserted in the record accurately represent what you reported at the time?—A. In some respects they do not.

Q. Would you point out in what respects they are inaccurate?—A. Well—

Mr. RHETTS. When you say "in some respects," in general you are referring to these particular notes here?—A. I think there is one point here.

Q. Just sit down and take that from the point marked [handing Mr. Service the document], the point I introduced, and read it through to yourself and call our attention to any inaccuracies in it.—A. The only statements in this section to which I take exception is this one: "(After meeting broke up, JAC asked if KMT reports of Communists fighting them and JS said that this was only in self-defense, usually when the KMT men went into Communists' areas to take the harvests.)"

This is undoubtedly an extreme abbreviation of considerable discussion. And I don't believe that I ever made the statement that these conflicts arose only from such circumstances as mentioned here.

Q. Otherwise than that the paper is an accurate, although abbreviated, report of what you said?—A. Yes.

Mr. RHETTS. I take it you're referring to only that portion of it which the general has asked to be inserted in the record. You have not read the whole document?—A. That is correct.

Q. Mr. Service, after your return to serve General Wedemeyer did you in your reports to him ever report that the Chinese Communist leaders are not real Communists but only Chinese farmers, or, in other words, that the Chinese Communist movement is a democratic agrarian movement not directly connected with the Soviet Union?—A. Could I ask you to repeat the first part of that question.

(Reporter read the portion requested.)

A. The answer to that is "No." Now would you read the second part?

(Reporter read the portion requested.)

A. No; I never made any such statement. In fact, I reported quite to the contrary. I reported on their ties with Moscow and I never made a statement that they were merely a democratic agrarian movement.

Q. I think you have already put in evidence, yesterday, reports that you made to the same effect as you have just testified. Am I correct, Counsel, that you have covered that point?

Mr. RHETTS. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You state on page 22 of your statement that document 157 represents your criticism of the Kuomintang. You say that you prepared this summary of the situation in China in June 1944 and that it is your most extensive analysis of the weaknesses of the Kuomintang. It has been alleged from various quarters that you have drawn excessively on the weaknesses of the Kuomintang. What I'd like to know at this moment is if document 157—which represents, as I understand it, your view on that subject, your most complete view, the most complete statement of your view—has been introduced into the record.

Mr. RHETTS. There has been an oversight there, General; at the outset of the proceeding yesterday morning I thought that I had introduced into the transcript all of the documents referred to here, but I see that I have not. I should like at this time to offer for inclusion in the transcript document 157.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be admitted.

Mr. RHETTS. It appears in your document book.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be copied into the transcript at this point.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

THE SITUATION IN CHINA AND SUGGESTIONS REGARDING AMERICAN POLICY

I. THE SITUATION IN CHINA IS RAPIDLY BECOMING CRITICAL

A. The Japanese strategy in China, which has been as much political as military, has so far been eminently successful.

Japan has had the choice of two alternatives.

1. It could beat China to its knees. But this would have required large-scale military operations and a large and continuing army occupation. And there was the danger that it might have driven the Kuomintang to carry out a real mobilization of the people, thus making possible effective resistance and perhaps rendering the Japanese task as long and costly as it has been in north China.

2. Or Japan could maintain just enough pressure on China to cause slow strangulation. Based on the astute use of puppets, the understanding of the continuing struggle for power within China (including the Kuomintang-Communist conflict), and the knowledge that Chiang expects to have the war won for him outside of China by his Allies, this policy had the advantage that as long as the Kuomintang leaders saw a chance for survival they would not take the steps necessary to energize an effective war. It would thus remove any active or immediate threat to Japan's flank, and permit consolidation and gradual extension of the important Japanese-held bases in China. Finally, it would permit the accomplishment of these aims at a relatively small cost.

Japan chose the second alternative, accepting the gamble that the Kuomintang would behave exactly as it has. Like many other Japanese gambles, it has so far proved to have been nicely calculated. China is dying a lingering death by slow strangulation. China does not now constitute any threat to Japan. And China cannot, if the present situation continues, successfully resist a determined Japanese drive to seize our offensive bases in east China.

B. The position of the Kuomintang and the generalissimo is weaker than it has been for the past 10 years.

China faces economic collapse. This is causing disintegration of the army and the government's administrative apparatus. It is one of the chief causes of growing political unrest. The generalissimo is losing the support of a China which, by unity in the face of violent aggression, found a new and unexpected strength during the first 2 years of the war with Japan. Internal weaknesses are becoming accentuated and there is taking place a reversal of the process of unification.

1. Morale is low and discouragement widespread. There is general feeling of hopelessness.

2. The authority of the Central Government is weakening in the areas away from the larger cities, and government mandates and measures of control cannot be enforced and remain ineffective. It is becoming difficult for the government to collect enough food for its huge army and bureaucracy.

3. The governmental and military structure is being permeated and demoralized from top to bottom by corruption, unprecedented in scale and openness.

4. The intellectual and salaried classes, who have suffered the most heavily from inflation, are in danger of liquidation. The academic groups suffer not only the attrition and demoralization of economic stress, the weight of years of political control and repression is robbing them of the intellectual vigor and leadership they once had.

5. Peasant resentment of the abuses of conscription, tax collection, and other arbitrary impositions has been widespread and is growing. The danger is ever-increasing that past sporadic outbreaks of banditry and agrarian unrest may increase in scale and find political motivation.

6. The provincial groups are making common cause with one another and with other dissident groups, and are actively consolidating their positions. Their continuing strength in the face of the growing weakness of the Central Government is forcing new measures of political appeasement in their favor.

7. Unrest within the Kuomintang armies is increasing, as shown in one important instance by the "young generals conspiracy" late in 1943. On a higher plane the war zone commanders are building up their own spheres of influence and are thus creating a "new warlordism."

8. The break between the Kuomintang and the Communists not only shows no signs of being closed, but grows more critical with the passage of time; the inevitability of civil war is now generally accepted.

9. The Kuomintang is losing the respect and support of the people by its selfish policies and its refusal to heed progressive criticism. It seems unable to revivify itself with fresh blood, and its unchanging leadership shows a growing ossification and loss of a sense of reality. To combat the dissensions and cliquism within the party, which grow more rather than less acute, the leadership is turning toward the reactionary and unpopular Chen brothers clique.

10. The generalissimo shows a similar loss of realistic flexibility and a hardening of narrowly conservative views. His growing megalomania and his unfortunate attempts to be "sage" as well as leader—shown, for instance, by "China's Destiny" and his book on economics—have forfeited the respect of many intellectuals, who enjoy in China a position of unique influence. Criticism of his dictatorship is becoming more outspoken.

These symptoms of deterioration and internal stress have been increased by the defeat in Honan and will be further accelerated if, as seems likely, the Japanese succeed in partially or wholly depriving the Central Government of East China south of the Yangtze.

In the face of the grave crisis with which it is confronted, the Kuomintang is ceasing to be the unifying and progressive force in Chinese security, the role in which it made its greatest contribution to modern China.

C. The Kuomintang is not only proving itself incapable of averting a debacle by its own initiative; on the contrary, its policies are precipitating the crisis.

Some war-weariness in China must be expected. But the policies of the Kuomintang under the impact of hyperinflation and to the presence of obvious signs of internal and external weakness must be described as bankrupt. This truth is emphasized by the failure of the Kuomintang to come to grips with the situation during the recently concluded plenary session of the Central Executive Committee.

1. On the internal political front the desire of the Kuomintang leaders to perpetuate their own power overrides all other considerations.

The result is the enthronement of reaction.

The Koumintang continues to ignore the great political drive within the country for democratic reform. The writings of the generalissimo and the party press show that they have no real understanding of that term. Constitutionalism remains an empty promise for which the only "preparation" is a half-hearted attempt to establish an unpopular and undemocratic system of local self-government based on collective responsibility and given odium by Japanese utilization in Manchuria and other areas under their control.

Questions basic to the future of democracy such as the form of the Constitution and the composition and election of the National Congress remain the dictation of the Kuomintang. There is no progress toward the fundamental conditions of freedom of expression and recognition of non-Kuomintang groups. Even the educational and political advantages of giving power and democratic character to the existing but impotent People's Political Council are ignored.

On the contrary, the trend is still in the other direction. Through such means as compulsory political training for government posts, emphasis on the political nature of the army, thought control, and increasing identification of the party and government, the Kuomintang intensifies its drive for "Ein Volk, Ein Reich, Ein Fuhrer"—even though such a policy in China is inevitably doomed to failure.

The Kuomintang shows no intensive or relaxing the authoritarian controls on which its present power depends. Far from discarding or reducing the paraphernalia of a police state—the multiple and omnipresent secret police organizations, the gendarmerie, and so forth—it continues to strengthen them as its last resort for internal security. (For the reinforcement of the most important of these German-inspired and Gestapo-like organizations we must, unfortunately, bear some responsibility.)

Obsessed by the growing and potential threat of the Communists, who it fears may attract the popular support its own nature makes impossible, the Kuomintang, despite the pretext—to meet foreign and Chinese criticism—of conducting negotiations with the Communists, continues to adhere to policies and plans which can only result in civil war. In so doing it shows itself blind to the facts: that its internal political and military situation is so weak that success without outside assistance is most problematic; that such a civil war would hasten the process of disintegration and the spread of chaos; that it would prevent the prosecution of any effective war against Japan; and that the only parties to benefit would be Japan immediately and Russia eventually. Preparations for this civil war include an alliance with the present Chinese puppets which augur ill for future unity and democracy.

2. On the economic front the Kuomintang is unwilling to take any effective steps to check inflation which would injure the landlord-capitalist class.

It is directly responsible for the increase of official corruption, which is one of the main obstacles to any rational attempt to ameliorate the financial situation. It does nothing to stop large-scale profiteering, hoarding, and speculation—all of which are carried on by people either powerful in the party or with intimate political connections.

It fails to carry out effective mobilization of resources. Such measures of wartime control as it has promulgated have remained a dead letter or have intensified the problems they were supposedly designed to remedy—as for instance ill-advised and poorly executed attempts at price regulations.

It passively allows both industrial and the more important handicraft production to run down, as they of course must when it is more profitable for speculators to hold raw materials than to have them go through the normal productive process.

It fails to carry out rationing except in a very limited way, or to regulate the manufacture and trade in luxury goods, many of which come from areas under Japanese control. It shows little concern that these imports are largely paid for with strategic commodities of value to the enemy.

It fails to make an effective attempt to reduce the budgetary deficit and increase revenue by tapping such resources as excess profits and incomes of landlords and merchants. It allows its tax-collecting apparatus to bog down in corruption and inefficiency to the point that possibly not more than one-third of revenues collected reach the government. It continues to spend huge government funds on an idle and useless party bureaucracy.

At best, it passively watches inflation gather momentum without even attempting palliative measures available to it, such as the aggressive sale of gold and foreign currency.

It refuses to attack the fundamental economic problems of China such as the growing concentration of landholdings, extortionate rents and ruinous interest rates, and the impact of inflation.

3. On the external front the Kuomintang is showing itself inept and selfishly short-sighted by progressive estrangement of its allies.

By persistence in tactics of bargaining, bluff, and blackmail—most inappropriate to its circumstances—and its continuing failure to deal openly and frankly and to extend whole-hearted cooperation—which its own interests demand—the Kuomintang is alienating China's most important ally, the United States. It had already alienated its other major potential ally, Soviet Russia, toward which its attitude is as irrational and short-sighted as it is toward the Communists. The latest example of this is the irresponsible circulation of the report that Soviet Russia and Japan have signed a secret military agreement permitting Japanese troop withdrawals from Manchuria.

It is allowing this situation to develop at a time when its survival is dependent as never before upon foreign support. But the Kuomintang is endangering not only itself by its rash foreign policy: There are indications that it is anxious to create friction between the United States and Great Britain and Russia. When speedy victory—and any victory at all—demands maximizing of agreements and the minimizing of frictions, such maneuvers amount to sabotage of the war effort of the United Nations.

4. On the military front the Kuomintang appears to have decided to let America win the war and to have withdrawn for all practical purposes from active participation.

Its most important present contribution is to allow us—at our own and fantastic cost—to build and use air bases in China.

It delayed, perhaps too long for success, to allow forces designated for the purpose and trained and equipped by us to take the offensive in west Yunnan, even though needed to support the American-Chinese campaign in North Burma, the purpose of which is open a "life line" into China and facilitate the eventual landing on the China coast. It agreed to this action only after long months of obstruction.

It fails to make effective use of American equipment given to it, as it also failed with earlier Russian supplies. Equipment brought into China has often not been transported to the fighting fronts. In other cases it has been known to have been hoarded or diverted to nonmilitary purposes. China has displayed a dog in the manger attitude in regard to equipment consigned to China and deteriorating in India for lack of transportation. It has concealed and refused to make available to our forces hoards of supplies such as gasoline known to exist in China, even when the emergency was great and China's own interests directly served.

It has consistently refused to consolidate and efficiently administer transportation. In the past this resulted in great losses of supplies in the Japanese capture of Burma and west Yunnan; now it is crippling Chinese internal transportation on which military activity must depend.

It has allowed military cooperation to be tied up with irrelevant financial demands which can only be described as a form of blackmail. It has made these excessive demands in spite of the fact that American expenditures in China (against which there are almost no balancing Chinese payments) continually add to the large Chinese nest egg of foreign exchange, which cannot be used in China at present and thus constitutes in effect a "kitty" being hoarded for postwar use.

It has failed to implement military requisitioning laws to assist us in obtaining supplies in China and has left us at the mercy of conscienceless profiteers, some of whom have been known to have official connections. It has permitted the imposition on us of fantastic prices, made more so by a wholly unrealistic exchange rate, for articles in some cases originally supplied to China through American credits. It seemingly has ignored the fact that the more supplies that can be obtained in China, the greater the tonnage from India that can be devoted to other essential military items.

It remains uncooperative and at times obstructive in American efforts to collect vital intelligence regarding the enemy in China. This attitude is exemplified by the disappointing fruits of promised cooperation by Chinese espionage organizations (toward which we have expended great effort and large sums); by the continued obstruction, in the face of agreement, to visits by American observers to the actual fighting fronts; and by the steadfast refusal to permit any contact with the Communist areas. It apparently remains oblivious to the urgent military need, both in China and in other related theaters, for this intelligence regarding our common enemy, and it seemingly cares little for the fact that exclusion from Communist-controlled territory hampers our long-range bombing of Japan and may cost needless loss of American lives.

In its own war effort a pernicious and corrupt conscription system which works to insure the selection and retention of the unfit, since the ablest and the strongest can either evade conscription, buy their way out, or desert. It starves and maltreats most of its troops to the degree that their military effectiveness is greatly impaired and military service is regarded in the minds of the people as a sentence of death. At the same time it refuses to follow the suggestion that the army should be reduced to the size that could be adequately fed, medically cared for, trained, and armed. It bases this refusal on mercenary political considerations—the concentration on the continuing struggle for power in China, and the ultimate measurement of power in terms of armies.

For the same reason it refuses to mobilize its soldiers and people for the only kind of war which China is in a position to wage effectively—a people's guerrilla war. Perhaps our entry into the war has simplified the problems of the Kuomintang. As afraid of the forces within the country, its own people, as it is of the Japanese, it now seeks to avoid conflict with the Japanese in order to concentrate on the perpetuation of its own power.

The condition to which it has permitted its armies to deteriorate is shown most recently by the defeat in Honan, which is due not only to lack of heavy armament but also to poor morale and miserable condition of the soldiers, absence of support by the people—who have been consistently mistreated—lack of leadership, and prevalent corruption among the officers through such practices as trade with the occupied areas.

If we accept the obvious indications that the present Kuomintang leadership does not want to fight the Japanese any more than it can help, we must go further and recognize that it may even seek to prevent China from becoming the battleground for large-scale campaigns against the Japanese land forces. This helps to explain the Kuomintang's continued dealings with the Japanese and puppets. Thus the Kuomintang may hope to avert determined Japanese attack, maintain its own position and power, save the east China homes of practically all of its officials, and preserve its old economic-industrial base in the coastal cities.

If this analysis is valid it reveals on the part of the Kuomintang leadership—which means the generalissimo—a cynical disregard of the added cost of the inevitable prolongation of the war in American lives and resources.

D. These apparently suicidal policies of the Kuomintang have their roots in the composition and nature of the party.

In view of the above it becomes pertinent to ask why the Kuomintang has lost its power of leadership; why it neither wishes actively to wage war against Japan itself nor to cooperate wholeheartedly with the American Army in China; and why it has ceased to be capable of unifying the country.

The answer to all these questions is to be found in the present composition and nature of the party. Politically, a classical and definitive American description becomes ever more true: the Kuomintang is a congerie of conservative political cliques interested primarily in the preservation of their own power against all outsiders and in jockeying for position among themselves. Economically, the Kuomintang rests on the narrow base of the rural gentry landlords, the militarists, the higher ranks of the government bureaucracy, and merchant bankers having intimate connections with the government bureaucrats. This base has actually contracted during the war. The Kuomintang no longer commands, as it once did, the unequivocal support of China's industrialists, who as a group have been much weakened economically, and hence politically, by the Japanese seizure of the coastal cities.

The relation of this description of the Kuomintang to the questions propounded above is clear.

The Kuomintang has lost its leadership because it has lost touch with and is no longer representative of a nation which, through the practical experience of the war, is becoming both more politically conscious and more aware of the party's selfish shortcomings.

It cannot fight an effective war because this impossible without greater reliance upon and support by the people. There must be a release of the national energy such as occurred during the early period of the war. Under present conditions, this can be brought about only by reform of the party and greater political democracy. What form this democracy takes is not as important as the genuine adoption of a democratic philosophy and attitude; the threat of foreign invasion is no longer enough to stimulate the Chinese people and only real reform can now regain their enthusiasm. But the growth of democracy, though basic to China's continuing war effort, would, to the mind of the Kuomintang's present leaders, imperil the foundations of the party's power because it would mean that the conservative cliques would have to give up their closely guarded monopoly. Rather than do this, they prefer to see the war remain in its present state of passive inertia. They are thus sacrificing China's national interests to their own selfish ends.

For similar reasons, the Kuomintang is unwilling to give wholehearted cooperation to the American Army's effort in China. Full cooperation necessarily requires the broad Chinese military effort which the Kuomintang is unable to carry out or to make possible. In addition, the Kuomintang fears that large-scale, widespread, and direct contact by Americans with the Chinese war effort will expose its own inactivity and, by example and personal contacts, be a liberalizing influence.

The Kuomintang cannot unify the country because it derives its support from the economically most conservative groups, who wish the retention of China's economically and socially backward agrarian society. These groups are incapable of bringing about China's industrialization, although they pay this objective elaborate lip service. They are also committed to the maintenance of an order which by its very nature fosters particularism and resists modern centralization. Countless examples can be given to show the line-up of the party with the groups that oppose modernization and industrialization—such as connections with Szechwan warlords and militarists. The Kuomintang sees no objection to maintaining the economic interests of some of its component groups in occupied China or in preserving trade with occupied China, the criterion of which is not the national interest but its profitability to the engaging groups. This explains why free China's imports from occupied China consist largely of luxuries, against exports of food and strategic raw materials. It is therefore not surprising that there are many links, both political and economic, between the Kuomintang and the puppet regime.

E. The present policies of the Kuomintang seem certain of failure; if that failure results in a collapse of China, it will have consequences disastrous both to our immediate military plans and our long-term interests in the Far East.

The foregoing analysis has shown that the Kuomintang, under its present leadership, has neither the ability nor desire to undertake a program which could energize the war and check the process of internal disintegration. Its preoccupation with the maintenance and consolidation of its power must result, to the contrary, in acceleration rather than retardation of the rate of this disintegration. Unless it widens its base and changes its character, it must be expected to continue its present policies. It will not of its own volition take steps to bring about this broadening and reform. The opposite will be the case: Precisely because it has lost popular support, it is redoubling its efforts to maintain and monopolize control.

The present policies of the Kuomintang seem certain to fail because they run counter to strong forces within the country and are forcing China into ruin. Since these policies are not favorable to us, nor of assistance in the prosecution of an effective war by China, their failure would not of itself be disastrous to American interests. For many reasons mentioned above, we might welcome the fall of the Kuomintang if it could immediately be followed by a progressive government able to unify the country and help us fight Japan.

But the danger is that the present drifting and deterioration under the Kuomintang may end in a collapse. The result would be the creation in China of a vacuum. This would eliminate any possibility in the near future of utilizing China's potential military strength. Because the Japanese and their puppets might be able to occupy this vacuum—at much less cost than by a major military campaign—it might also become impossible for us to exploit China's flank position and to continue operating from Chinese bases. The war would thus be prolonged and made more difficult.

Such a collapse would also initiate a period of internal chaos in China which would deter the emergence of a strong and stable government—an indispensable precondition for stability and order in the Far East.

China, which might be a minor asset to us now, would become a major liability.

F. There are, however, active and constructive forces in China opposed to the present trends of the Kuomintang leadership which, if given a chance, might avert the threatened collapse.

These groups, all increasingly dissatisfied with the government and the party responsible for it, include the patriotic younger army officers; the small merchants; large sections of the lower ranks of the government bureaucracy; most of the foreign-returned students; the intelligentsia, including professors, students, and the professional classes; the liberal elements of the Kuomintang, who make up a sizable minority under the leadership of such men as Sun Fo; the minor parties and groups, some of which like the National Salvationists enjoy great prestige; the Chinese Communist Party; and the inarticulate but increasingly restless rural population.

The collective numbers and influence of these groups could be tremendous. A Kuomintang official recently admitted that resentment against the present Kuomintang government is so widespread that if there were free, universal elections 80 percent of the votes might be cast against it. But most of these groups are nebulous and unorganized, feeling—like the farmers—perhaps only a blind dislike of conditions as they are. They represent different classes and varying political beliefs—where they have any at all. They are tending, however, to draw together in the consciousness of their common interest in the change of the status quo. This awakening and fusion is, of course, opposed by the Kuomintang with every means at its disposal.

The danger, as conditions grow worse, is that some of these groups may act independently and blindly. The effect may be to make confusion worse. Such might be the case in a military putsch—a possibility that cannot be disregarded. The result might be something analogous to the Sian incident of 1936. But the greater delicacy and precariousness of the present situation would lend itself more easily to exploitation by the most reactionary elements of the Kuomintang, the Japanese or the puppets. Another possibility is the outbreak, on a much larger scale than heretofore, of unorganized and disruptive farmers revolts. A disturbing phenomenon is the apparent attempt now being made by some of the minority parties to effect a marriage of convenience with the provincial warlords, among the most reactionary and unscrupulous figures in Chinese politics and hardly crusaders for a new democracy.

The hopeful sign is that all of these groups are agreed that the basic problem in China today is political reform toward democracy. This point requires emphasis. It is only through political reform that the restoration of the will to fight, the unification of the country, the elimination of provincial warlordism, the solution of the Communist problem, the institution of economic policies which can avoid collapse, and the emergence of a government actually supported by the people can be achieved. Democratic reform is the crux of all important Chinese problems, military, economic, and political.

It is clear beyond doubt that China's hope for internal peace and effective unity—certainly in the immediate future (which for the sake of the war must be our prior consideration) and probably in the long term as well—lies neither with the present Kuomintang nor with the Communists, but in a democratic combination of the liberal elements within the country, including these within the Kuomintang, and the probably large sections of the Communists who would be willing, by their own statements and past actions, to collaborate in the resurrection of a united front.

Given the known interest and attitudes of the Chinese people, we can be sure that measures to accomplish the solution of these problems will be undertaken in earnest by a broadly based government. Such a government—and only such a government—will galvanize China out of its military inertia by restoring national morale through such means as the reduction of the evils of conscription and stopping the maltreatment and starvation of the troops. Such a government—and only such a government—will automatically end the paralyzing internal dissension and political unrest. Such a government—and only such a government—will undertake the economic measures necessary to increase production, establish effective price controls, mobilize national resources, and end corruption, hoarding, speculation and profiteering.

It is of course, unrealistic to assume that such a broadly based democratic government can be established at one stroke, or that it can immediately achieve the accomplishment of these broad objectives. But progress will be made as, only as, the government moves toward democracy.

II. IN THE LIGHT OF THIS DEVELOPING CRISIS WHAT SHOULD BE THE AMERICAN ATTITUDE TOWARD CHINA?

It is impossible to predict exactly how far the present disintegration in China can continue without spectacular change in the internal situation and drastic effect on the war against Japan. But we must face the question whether we can afford passively to stand by and allow the process to continue to an almost certainly disastrous collapse, or whether we wish to do what we legitimately and practically can to arrest it. We need to formulate a realistic policy toward China.

A. The Kuomintang and Chiang are acutely conscious of their dependence on us and will be forced to appeal for our support.

We must realize that when the process of disintegration gets out of hand it will be to us that the Kuomintang will turn for financial, political, and military salvation. The awareness of this dependence is the obvious and correct explanation of the Kuomintang's hypersensitivity to American opinion and criticism. The Kuomintang—and particularly the Generalissimo—know that we are the only disinterested, yet powerful, ally to whom China can turn.

The appeal will be made to us on many grounds besides the obvious, well-worn, but still effective one of pure sentiment. They have said in the past and will say in the future that they could long ago have made peace with Japan—on what are falsely stated would have favorable terms. They have claimed and will claim again that their resistance and refusal to compromise with Japan saved Russia, Great Britain and ourselves—ignoring the truth that our own refusal to compromise with Japan to China's disadvantage brought on Pearl Harbor and our involvement before we were ready. They have complained and will continue to complain that they have received less support in the form of materials than any other major ally—forgetting that they have done less fighting, have not used the materials given, and would not have had the ability to use what they asked for. Finally, they have tried and will continue to try to lay the blame on us for their difficulties—distorting the effect of American Army expenditures in China and ignoring the fact that these expenditures are only a minor factor in the whole sorry picture of the mismanagement of the Chinese economy.

But however farfetched these appeals, our flat refusal of them might have several embarrassing effects.

1. We would probably see China enter a period of internal chaos. Our war effort in this theater would be disrupted, instability in the Far East prolonged, and possible Russian intervention attracted.

2. We would be blamed by large sections of both Chinese and American public opinion for "abandoning" China after having been responsible for its collapse. (In a measure we would have brought such blame upon ourselves because we have tended to allow ourselves to become identified not merely with China but also with the Kuomintang and its policies. Henceforth, it may be the better part of valor to avoid too close identification with the Kuomintang.)

3. By an apparent abandonment of China in its hour of need, we would lose international prestige, especially in the Far East.

On the other hand, if we come to the rescue of the Kuomintang on its own terms we would be buttressing—but only temporarily—a decadent regime which by its existing composition and program is incapable of solving China's problems. Both China and ourselves would be gaining only a brief respite from the ultimate day of reckoning. It is clear, therefore, that it is to our advantage to avoid a situation arising in which we would be presented with a Hobson's choice between two such unpalatable alternatives.

B. The Kuomintang's dependence can give us great influence.

Circumstances are rapidly developing so that the Generalissimo will have to ask for the continuance and increase of our support. Weak as he is, he is in no position—and the weaker he becomes the less he will be able—to turn down or render nugatory any coordinated and positive policy we may adopt toward China. The cards are all in our favor. Our influence, intelligently used, can be tremendous.

C. There are three general alternatives open to us.

1. We may give up China as hopeless and wash our hands of it altogether.
2. We may continue to give support to the Generalissimo, when and as he asks for it.
3. We may formulate a coordinated and positive policy toward China and take the necessary steps for its implementation.

D. Our choice between these alternatives must be determined by our objectives in China.

The United States, if it so desired and if it had a coherent policy, could play an important and perhaps decisive role in:

1. Stimulating China to an active part in the war in the Far East, thus hastening the defeat of Japan.

2. Staving off economic collapse in China and bringing about basic political and economic reforms, thus enabling China to carry on the war and enhancing the chances of its orderly postwar recovery.

3. Enabling China to emerge from the war as a major and stabilizing factor in postwar east Asia.

4. Winning a permanent and valuable ally in the progressive, independent, and democratic China.

E. We should adopt the third alternative—a coordinated and positive policy.

This is clear from an examination of the background of the present situation in China and the proper objectives of our policy there.

The first alternative must be rejected on immediate military grounds—but also for obvious long-range considerations. It would deprive us of valuable air bases and position on Japan's flank. Its adoption would prolong the war. We cannot afford to wash our hands of China.

The results of the second alternative—which, insofar as we have a China policy, has been the one we have been and are pursuing—speak for themselves. The substantial financial assistance we have given China has been frittered away with negligible, if any, effect in slowing inflation and retarding economic collapse. The military help we have given has certainly not been used to increase China's war effort against Japan. Our political support has been used for the Kuomintang's own selfish purposes and to bolster its short-sighted and ruinous policies.

The third, therefore, is the only real alternative left to us. Granted the rejection of the first alternative, there is no longer a question of helping and advising China. China itself must request this help and advice. The only question is whether we give this help within a framework which makes sense, or whether we continue to give it in our present disjointed and absent-minded manner. In the past it has sometimes seemed that our right hand did not know what the left was doing. To continue without a coherent and coordinated policy will be dissipating our effort without either China or ourselves deriving any appreciable benefit. It can only continue to create new problems, in addition to these already troubling us, without any compensating advantages beyond those of indolent short-term expediency. But most important is the possibility that this haphazard giving, this serving of short-term expediency, may not be enough to save the situation; even with it, China may continue toward collapse.

F. This positive policy should be political.

The problem confronting us is whether we are to continue as in the past to ignore political considerations of direct military significance or whether we are to take a leaf out of the Japanese book and invoke even stronger existing political forces in China to achieve our military and long-term political objectives.

We must seek to contribute toward the reversal of the present movement toward collapse and to the rousing of China from its military inactivity. This can be brought about only by an accelerated movement toward democratic political reform within China. Our part must be that of a catalytic agent in this process of China's democratization. It can be carried out by the careful exertion of our influence, which has so far not been consciously and systematically used.

III. THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THIS POLITICAL POLICY, THOUGH DIFFICULT IN SOME RESPECTS, IS PRACTICAL AND CAN BE CARRIED OUT BY MANY MEANS

A. Diplomatic finesse will be required in the execution of this policy in such a way as not to offend the strong current of genuine nationalism (as distinguished from the chauvinism of the Kuomintang) which characterizes almost all sections of the Chinese people. There must be a sensitivity to the situation in China and the political changes there so that there can be an appropriate and immediate stiffening or softening of the measures which we undertake. This tact and sensitivity will be required not only of the top policy-directing agency but of all other agencies actually implementing that policy and concerned in direct relations with China.

B. There must be effective coordination of the policies and actions of all American Government agencies concerned in these dealings with China.

The present lack of effective cooperation between the various Government agencies—State, War, and some of the newer autonomous organizations—derails from the efficient functioning of each, and weakens American influence when it is most needed.

It must be recognized—and it will be even more the case under the policy proposed—that all our dealings with and all our activities in China have political implication. Coordination is absolutely essential for the achievement of unity of policy and synchronization of action. It's attainment will require intelligent and forceful direction both in Washington and in Chungking.

The logical person to coordinate activities in Chungking is obviously, because of the broad issues involved, the Ambassador. Similarly the corresponding person in Washington might be the Chief of the China Section of the State Department, who would watch the whole field for the President or a responsible Cabinet member. Positive action, of course, would depend on constant and close consultation, both in Washington and in the field, between the representatives of the State, War, Navy, and Treasury Departments and the other agencies operating in China.

C. Since all measures open to us should not be applied simultaneously, there should be careful selection and timing.

Some measures will be simple and immediately useful. Others should be deferred until primary steps have been taken. Still others will be more forceful or direct and their use will depend on the Kuomintang's recalcitrance to change its ways. We must avoid overplaying or underplaying our hand.

D. Specific measures which might be adopted in the carrying out of this positive policy include the following:

1. Negative.—(a) Stop our present "mollycoddling" of China by: Restricting lend-lease, cutting down training of Chinese military cadets, discontinuing training of the Chinese army, taking a firmer stand in the financial negotiations, or stopping the shipment of gold. Any or all of these restrictive measures can be reversed as the Generalissimo and the Kuomintang become more cooperative in carrying on military operations, using equipment and training supplied, being reasonable on financial questions, or allowing us freedom in such military requirements as establishing contact with the Communist areas.

(b) Stop building up the Generalissimo's and the Kuomintang's prestige internationally and in the United States. Such "face" services only to bolster the regime internally and to harden it in its present policies. Our inclusion of China as one of the "Big Four" served a useful purpose in the early stage of the war and as a counter to Japanese racial propaganda but has now lost its justification.

We make fools of ourselves by such actions as the attention given to the meaningless utterances of Chu Hsueh-fen as a spokesman of Chinese labor and the prominence accorded to China in the International Labor Office Conference. Our tendency toward overlavish praise is regarded by the Chinese as a sign of either stupidity or weakness.

Abandonment of glib generalities for hardheaded realism in our attitude toward China will be quickly understood—without the resentment that would probably be felt against the British. We can make it clear that praise will be given when praise is due.

(c) Stop making unconditional and grandiose promises of help along such lines as UNNRA, postwar economic aid, and political support. We can make it clear without having to be very explicit that we stand ready to help China when China shows itself deserving. This ties into the more positive phase of publicity and propaganda to the effect, for instance, that American postwar economic aid will not be extended to build up monopolistic enterprise or support the landlord-gentry class but in the interests of a democratic people.

(d) Discontinue our present active collaboration with Chinese secret police organizations, which support the forces of reaction and stand for the opposite of our American democratic aims and ideals. This collaboration, which results in the effective strengthening of a Gestapo-like organization, is becoming increasingly known in China. It confuses and disillusiones Chinese liberals, who look to us as their hope, and it weakens our position with the Kuomintang leaders in pressing for democratic reform.

2. Positive.—(a) High Government officials in conversation with Chinese leaders in Washington and in China can make known our interest in democracy and unity in China and our dissatisfaction with present Kuomintang military, financial and other policies. Such suggestions will bear great weight if they come from the President and advantage can be taken of opportunities such as the visits of Vice President Wallace to China and H. H. Kung to the United States. A progressive stage can be questions or statements by Members of Congress regarding affairs in China.

(b) We should take up the repeated—but usually insincere—requests of the Kuomintang for advice. If advisers are asked for, we should see that they are provided, that good men are selected, and that they get all possible aid and support from us. While the Kuomintang will be reluctant to accept the advice we may give, its mere reiteration will have some effect.

(c) We should seek to extend our influence on Chinese opinion by every practical means available.

The Office of War Information should go beyond its present function of reporting American war news to pointing up the values of democracy as a permanent political system and as an aid in the waging of war against totalitarianism. We should attempt to increase the dissemination in China, by radio or other more direct means, of constructive American criticism. This should include recognition and implied encouragement to liberal and progressive forces within China. Care should be taken to keep this criticism on a helpful, constructive and objective plane and to avoid derogatory attacks which may injure Chinese nationalistic sensitivities. To do this work, there may have to be some expansion of the OWI in China and of our propaganda directed toward this country.

A second line is the active expansion of our cultural relations program. The present diversion—by Kuomintang wishes—to technical subjects should be rectified and greater emphasis laid on social sciences, cultural, and practical political subjects such as American Government administration. We should increase our aid and support to intellectuals in China by the many means already explored, such as aid to research in China, translation of articles, and opportunity for study or lecturing in the United States.

Other, more indirect lines, are the expansion of our American Foreign Service representation in China to new localities (since each office is in some measure a center of American influence and contact with Chinese liberals and returned students from the United States) and the careful indoctrination of the American Army personnel in China to create, by example and their attitude toward Chinese, favorable impressions of America and the things that America stands for. Where contact between American and Chinese military personnel has been close, as in Burma, the result has apparently been a democratizing influence.

(d) We should assist the education of public opinion in the United States toward a realistic but constructively sympathetic attitude toward China. The most obvious means would be making background information available, in an unofficial way, to responsible political commentators, writers, and research workers. Without action on our part, their writings will become known to Chinese Government circles and from them to other politically minded groups. We should, however, coordinate this with the activity described in the section above to promote dissemination in China.

(e) We should maintain friendly relations with the liberal elements in the Kuomintang, the minor parties, and the Communists. This can—and should for its maximum effect—be done in an open, aboveboard manner. The recognition which it implies will be quickly understood by the Chinese.

Further steps in this direction could be publicity to liberals, such as distinguished intellectuals. When possible they may be included in consideration for special honors or awards, given recognition by being asked to participate in international commissions or other bodies, and invited to travel or lecture in the United States. A very effective action of this type would be an invitation to Madam Sun Yat-sen from the White House.

We should select men of known liberal view to represent us in OWI, cultural relations, and other lines of work in China.

(f) We should continue to show an interest in the Chinese Communists. This includes contact with the Communist representatives in Chungking, publicity on the blockade and the situation between the two parties, and continued pressure for the dispatch of observers to North China. At the same time we should stress the importance of North China militarily—for intelligence regarding Japanese battle order, Japanese air strength, weather reporting, bombing data, and damage assessment, and air crew evacuation and rescue work. We should consider the eventual advance of active operations against the Japanese to North China and the question of assistance to or cooperation with Communist and guerrilla forces. If our reasonable requests based on urgent military grounds do not receive a favorable response, we should send our military observers anyway.

(g) We should consider the training and equipping of provincial and other armies in China in cases where we can be satisfied that they will fight the Japanese.

(h) We should continue to press—and if necessary insist—on getting American observers to the actual fighting fronts. We should urge, and when possible assist, the improvement of the condition of the Chinese soldier, especially his treatment, clothing, feeding, and medical care.

(i) We should publicize statements by responsible Government officials indicating our interest in Chinese unity and our attitude toward such questions as the use of American lend-lease supplies by the Kuomintang in a civil war. It is interesting, for instance, that Under Secretary Welles' letter to Browder regarding American interest in Chinese unity was considered so important by the Kuomintang that publication in China was prohibited.

This program is, of course, far from complete. Other measures will occur to the policy agency and will suggest themselves as the situation in China develops.

E. Most of these measures can be applied progressively.

This is true, for instance, of the various negative actions suggested, and of the conversations, statements, and other lines of endeavor to influence public opinion in China. A planned activity of encouragement and attention to liberals, minor party leaders, and the Communists can advance.

F. The program suggested contains little that is not already being done in an uncoordinated and only partially effective manner.

What is needed chiefly is an integration, systematic motivation and planned expansion of activities in which we are already, perhaps in some cases unconsciously, engaged. We do, for instance, try to maintain contact with liberal groups; we have expressed the desire to send observers to the Communist area; we have a weak cultural relations program; and the OWI has made some attempts to propagandize American democratic ideals.

G. The program constitutes only very modified and indirect intervention in Chinese affairs.

It must be admitted that some of the measures proposed would involve taking more than normal interest in the affairs of another sovereign nation. But they do not go so far as to infringe on Chinese sovereignty. If we choose to make lend-lease conditional on a better war effort by China, it is also China's freedom to refuse to accept it on these conditions. We do not go nearly as far as imperialistic countries have often done in the past. We obviously do not, for instance, suggest active assistance or subsidizing of rival parties to the Kuomintang—as the Russians did in the case of the Communists.

Furthermore, the Chinese Government would find it difficult to object. The Chinese have abused their freedom to propagandize in the United States by the statements and writings of such men as Lin Yu-tang. They have also, and through Lin Yu-tang, who carries an official passport as a representative of the Chinese Government, engaged in "cultural relations" work. They have freely criticized American policies and American leaders. And they have attempted to dabble in American politics—through Madame Chiang, Luce, Willkie, and Republican Congressmen. They have had and will continue to have freedom to try to influence public opinion in the United States in the same way that we will try to do it in China.

(Off the record.)

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It is stated somewhere in the record that General Stilwell ordered your return to the United States in October 1944 just before he himself returned. I'm not sure that it's clear in the record why General Stilwell ordered your return. Was it due to any criticism of your activities?—A. It was not due to any criticism whatever of my activities. I don't know all of the reasons why I was ordered back. Actually I was up in Yen-an at the time and not physically present with General Stilwell. I don't think I—I didn't talk to him until after he had returned to the United States. I think that General Stilwell assumed that probably my assignment, which had been more or less a personally requested one, would be terminated. I had been in China, away from the United States, at that time for over a year and a half, a year and 9 months, and I think that was the motivation of his giving the orders to bring me back.

Q. As far as you know, your services were completely satisfactory to General Stilwell?—A. I know they were, sir.

Q. Did you receive any rating or commendation or anything on account of your service? Perhaps it's already in the record. Did you have any Army rating as a result of your service?—A. No; we received no Army rating or efficiency reports. General Stilwell was a busy man and not one for personal details. I have some letters from General Stilwell but they are on the high seas. I don't have them with me. I think we could confirm from the associates of General Stilwell and his wife that he was satisfied with my service.

Q. I refer to page 26 of your statement and your reference there to the Memorandum No. 40 of October 10. I think that has been put into the record.

Mr. RHETTS. Yes; that is Document 193.

Q. Referring to page 31 of the transcript, I'm just wondering if I have noticed a typographical error. At the bottom of page 31 it reads: "In this talk he mentioned that he had made the same threat to John Devies but had relented because he did not wish to ruin a young man's career. This interview was of course reported by me to General Wedemeyer, who told me that I was working only for him and should 'carry on'." Is that correct?—A. Yes, sir. That is, my interview with General Hurley was reported by me to General Wedemeyer, who was my superior.

Q. That is all right then. I think I had a confusion of generals in my mind. I thought they were talking about the same general who made the remark. No, I'm still in difficulty, this was not the statement of General Hurley but is a statement by General Wedemeyer. How could you report General Wedemeyer's statement to General Wedemeyer? Will you examine that?

Mr. RHETTS. At the beginning of the paragraph General Hurley sent for Mr. Service.

Q. It is General Hurley's threat and not General Wedemeyer's?—A. That is right. In the first part of the paragraph we will have to insert "General Hurley" instead of "he" in each case and when we get down to the next to the last sentence "In this talk General Hurley mentioned that he, General Hurley, had made the same threat to John Devies but had relented because he, General Hurley, did not wish to ruin a young man's career. This interview was of course reported by me to General Wedemeyer."

Q. I understand it now. I was confused before. On page 33 of your statement, just below the middle of the page you refer to white paper 87-92 with the notation it be put into the record. Is that in the record?

Mr. RHETTS. It is in the record in the sense I offered it entirely. I offered the entire book for the record. It is as an exhibit. It is not copied into the transcript, but as an exhibit.

Q. What I refer to is the text of the telegram from George Acheson, which was drafted by Mr. Service.

Mr. RHETTS. That is correct. During the course of discussion of this telegram yesterday afternoon we did insert it in the transcript.

Q. Those are the questions that I wanted to ask in connection with part I of your examination. Have you gentlemen some questions?

Questions by Mr. Achilles:

Q. Mr. Service, the part of the charges which we are interested in at the moment is that your official writings in China were influenced by Communist sympathies. We have gone into certain aspects of that at considerable length but there are various aspects, some of a personal nature, which I would like to have a little more information on. According to your introductory statement, you were born in China of missionary parents. May I ask what faith your father was?—A. My father's family and my father were Baptists.

Q. Were you also a Baptist?—A. No. My mother was Presbyterian and neither one of my parents had a very strong denominational feeling. I was not baptized until my father thought I was old enough to know what it was about and wished it and I asked to be baptized when I was 12 by a very old family friend. So I was actually baptized by a Methodist clergyman. The church in Shanghai was an American community church which was a rather unusually successful interdenominational church and I always considered that church in Shanghai as my home church.

Q. Does that mean you are a Methodist or interdenominational, or what?—A. Technically I suppose I'm a Methodist. I have no very strong feeling on the matter. I have always picked my churches largely on the preacher, on the sermons. Generally I'm attracted toward Congregational churches. In Washington we usually attended the church on Connecticut Avenue.

Q. I see in your statement that you attended first grade in a public school in the suburbs of Cleveland and that thereafter you were educated at home by your mother in China, until you again came to the United States at the age of 11. Is that correct?—A. No, sir. I went to Shanghai to boarding school at 11 and I did not return to the United States until just before my fifteenth birthday.

Q. When you were at the American school in China, at Shanghai, was that for 4 years?—A. Yes.

Q. Were the students there principally Americans or were there a lot of Chinese as well?—A. There were no Chinese in the school. There were a few non-Americans but the school was supported largely by American mission boards and by American business organizations for their own children. And the foreign children were very strictly limited in number. I would say that at least 90 percent of the children were Americans.

Q. At that time did you have many Chinese friends, or were your friends principally Americans at that point?—A. At that period, you mean in Shanghai?

Q. Yes.—A. I had no Chinese friends at Shanghai. I was in a boarding school, completely American atmosphere, and I knew a few of my father's associates in the YMCA but I didn't know their children, generally, or their families. I couldn't say that I had any Chinese friends while I was in boarding school in Shanghai.

Q. You were 15 when you returned to the United States to high school?—A. That is correct.

Q. You attended Oberlin College, I see by your statement. While you were in college were you interested in political or social matters?—A. Very little. I'm afraid that, for the first two and a half years at any rate, my chief interests were (a) athletics, and (b) social, but I think in a different sense than the one you mean. Toward the end I became interested in study and I had very little time for political activities. When I say political activities, I joined a cosmopolitan club which they had there but it was almost moribund. I belonged for a short time to what they called the Oberlin Peace Society, but that again was not an active organization.

Q. What was the nature of that society?—A. The president of Oberlin at that time, Ernest Hatch Wilkins, was quite a strong—I suppose you would say—pacifist, and he invited I think Kirby Page to come to Oberlin and give a talk. This would be in 1930, I think. Kirby Page had the idea, as I remember it after all these years, that if enough people and enough countries around the world would get together and say we don't want war, that there won't be any more wars, and in this optimistic naive view we organized Oberlin Peace Society which I think had about three meetings and talks and, as far as I know, just folded up. We took no Pacifist oath. It was not an active organization at all.

Q. You were in college, I believe, from 1927 to 1931, is that correct?—A. I graduated—well, I entered as a freshman in 1927 and graduated in 1931 and I stayed for an additional year of graduate study, which carried me into June 1932.

Q. During the period you were in Oberlin was there to your knowledge any interest in communism or any communist groups?—A. Absolutely none whatever.

Q. Was there any particular interest in socialism either academically or otherwise?—A. I don't remember ever discussing the subject or hearing it discussed. Oberlin actually is a rather conservative school as far as the student bodies go. It's an old Republican school and every 4 years they have a Republican convention. The student body in all polls has traditionally gone Republican. They are more conservative than the faculty actually. They come from upper middle class homes, most of them. But this was before the real days of the depression and I think that Oberlin would be considered a very politically unconscious student body, at that time, sir.

Q. You say that, if anything, the students were more conservative than the faculty. Were any of your professors, as far as you recall, particularly interested in communism or socialism?—A. Certainly not in communism. There may have been one economics professor, who was an elderly man near retirement, who might be considered as having leanings toward socialism.

Q. Did you have any particular close contact with him in his courses?—A. No.

Q. In college did you generally mix freely with your associates, or were you the type who was inclined to keep to himself?—A. I think I mixed extremely freely. I knew every man in my class. There were perhaps 160 men. I was nominated for class president 2 years and was a runnerup. I was active in a good many student organizations, student activities. I think that probably I knew as large a number of student body as well as anybody else did in college.

Q. Following completion of your year of graduate work, you took the Foreign Service examinations, is that correct, in the following fall?—A. Yes.

Q. And since there was a delay in appointing persons who had passed the examinations to the Foreign Service, is it correct that you returned to China and reported as clerk in Kunming?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was in 1933?—A. Yes. I worked for a short while in a bank in Shanghai, an American bank, while awaiting appointment as clerk.

Q. And you served at Kunming until when?—A. I was commissioned Foreign Service officer in early October 1935 and was ordered immediately to Peiping. I couldn't leave at once and did not reach Peiping until early December 1935. At the time of my appointment I was actually absent from my post because of the death of my father in Shanghai. I had to return to my post and make arrangements for my family's travel.

Q. Upon the completion of your language studies in Peiping, you were assigned to Shanghai in what year?—A. The orders, I believe, are dated in December 1937. I reached Shanghai in January 1938.

Q. And you served at Shanghai until your assignment to Chungking in 1941, is that right?—A. Yes; that is correct.

Q. During those years what was the prevailing political situation in China, during the years from 1933 until 1941? I realize that it's quite an extended period as far as Chinese politics are concerned, but during your period in Kunming, for example, what was the situation in that part of China?—A. It's a little hard to limit an answer to a question like that. In 1933 when I arrived in Kunming it was a semi-independent province governed by a typical Chinese war lord, General Lung Yun. He issued his own currency, managed his own foreign relations, maintained his own army. In every respect he was independent and only owed nominal allegiance to the Central Government. Access to Yunnan Province where Kunming was located was only possible, only easily possible, through French Indochina and French influence was fairly strong there.

During the spring of 1935, I believe, the Chinese Communists had broken out of their encirclement of the Kuomintang armies in southeast China and Kwangsi Province and detoured, zigzagged through the various provinces of southwest China and then came through Yunnan past, almost below, the walls of Kunming actually, and we had to evacuate all the women and children very hurriedly late one night.

The Central Government armies followed the Communists on the long march and established their control over these provinces of west China as a result. So that in the period, the last period that I was in Kunming the Central Government was in the process of really taking over the province for the first time.

Q. You say the Communists passed through Yunnan. Were they at any time in control of Kunming?—A. No, sir. They did not take the city. They were in a great hurry to beat the Central Government armies to the Yangtze River crossing. They had sidestepped the Yunnan armies and the Kuomintang armies and they had an open field ahead of them and they went through just as rapidly as they could.

Q. Did you have any contact with any of the Chinese Communists at that time?—A. None whatever. It would have been impossible. There were no Communists above ground in those days and, as far as I know, there were never any in Kunming. We never had any contact at all with them in those civil war days. It was actually a civil war going on at that time.

Q. To what extent were the teachings of Sun Yat-sen influential in Chinese thought in Yunnan?—A. We get into problems of the nature of Chinese society, if you will, Sun Yat-sen's Three People's principles were certainly known to and read by a narrow group of intellectuals. They were not influential on the mass of them and they were not influential with the then Government of Yunnan, which was purely a robber-baron type of government out for self-aggrandizement and maintenance of its own power. There was a headquarters branch of the party in Kunming.

The CHAIRMAN. Which party?

A. Kuomintang Party.

Q. The Kuomintang was then the leading proponent of Sun Yat-sen's philosophies?—A. It was and it was the party of the National Government but it had party headquarters in Kunming in Yunnan Province and had to be subservient to the local war lord or it could not maintain itself.

Q. The local government then was not particularly under the influence of Sun Yat-sen's philosophy?—A. It paid lip service to it.

Q. Were any of your associates there of that intellectual group who were sincere followers of Sun Yat-sen or strongly influenced by his teachings?—A. I didn't have a great many Chinese friends during this period in Kunming. I knew several Chinese students, exchanged lessons with them, helped them with some of their work, and they were certainly, if not members of the Kuomintang, at least believers in Sun Yat-sen's Three Peoples' principles. But I was a clerk in the Consulate. I was not in a position to mingle or meet with very many Chinese. My associates at that time were chiefly with the foreign community.

Q. To pass on to Peiping at the time you were there, what was the prevailing political philosophy in Peiping in those years?—A. Peiping is an old sophisticated capital which is not generally politically active, or politically interested. Most of the people of Peiping have watched governments come and government go and it is not as, for instance, Canton might be called a center of political activity. It was, however, a large university center and a good many of the students at that time, the university students, were politically interested but particularly on the question of resistance to Japan.

Very soon after I arrived in Peiping the students of all the universities staged demonstrations, the purpose of which was to demand that a Central Government take more active steps to stop the creeping Japanese aggression which was proceeding particularly against north China.

Q. Was there any noticeable Communist influence in Peiping at that period?—A. It has been repeatedly alleged that Communist sympathizers were active in promoting this student agitation but if that is true they were not doing it as Communists, not openly. I have known a good many of the student leaders and none of them were Communists so far as I know. In fact they will deny that they were Communists. But because it was not the policy of the Central Government at that time to stage riots which might aggravate the Japanese, a lot of these people were accused of communism and were imprisoned on that basis for some time.

Q. What is your own opinion as to whether they were actually Communists?—A. My own opinion would be that very few of them were Communists. I have known several of those people who took an active part in those student demonstrations who worked all through the war for Kuomintang organizations in Chungking, although they were imprisoned by the Kuomintang authorities in 1935 and charged with being Communists.

The chief line at that time, 1935, was the united front. And there were a lot of people who thought the united front was a fine idea.

Q. That was the official government line?—A. That was the Communist line. And there were a lot of people who sincerely supported the united-front idea, who were not Communists.

Q. During your period in Peiping, what in general were your principal associates? Were they other people in the Embassy, other Americans, or Chinese?—A. Well, I was spending 8 hours a day studying Chinese and the question of time spent, well, my principal associates were my Chinese teachers with whom I spent these 8 hours or so a day. They were representatives of the old scholar class. They had very little political inclinations of any sort. One of them was a Manchu who had been a member of the Imperial clan, who had actually been some sort of a minor attendant in the Empress Dowager retinue. And another man was an old scholar who had taken degrees in the last days of the Empire. Outside of my studies, my principal associates were the other language students.

Q. Were any of your teachers in any way, would you say, communistically inclined?—A. Not in the least. I would say that none of them were even Kuomintang inclined. Outside of the teachers, my principal associates were the other language students. We had a group of embassy students. There was another group of Marine Corps and Navy students. They had finally a group of American Army students. All of these people knew each other well, associating together a great deal. And finally, of course, there were students from the other embassies whom we naturally saw a good deal of. I didn't belong to the social clubs in Peiping. Actually, I spent about 8 months living in the hills about 20 miles outside of Peiping where we lived in a very isolated way during the winter and spring.

Then there was a very large group in Peiping at that time of, I might call them, students, men holding fellowships who had come to Peiping because it was the cultural center of China, to do historical or other research, to do writing; and, in addition, there was a fairly large group of newspaper correspondents coming and going. Several of them had Peiping as a more prominent base, something like—well, Arch Steele of, at that time, the Chicago Daily News, now of the Herald Tribune. For instance, his wife lived in Peiping and he would make his trips and come back to Peiping and go out from Peiping. There was a Swiss correspondent, very well known, named Bosshardt.

Then there was John Kullgren, who represents the Swedish newspapers, and there was a very large group of these men who were writing, studying China, writing about and studying China.

Q. I notice in your statement that you list various persons who were studying reporting on China, including Owen Lattimore. How well did you know Owen Lattimore at that time?—A. I knew him very slightly, actually, at that time. I was surprised that he remembered knowing me at that time, but he did mention recently, I think, in some testimony, that he had met me first of that time. He was a well-known character. There was the aura of expertness about him. I met him at various social functions. I heard him talk once or twice.

Q. When did you next come in contact with Mr. Lattimore?—A. I think my next meeting with Mr. Lattimore was in 1941, in the summer of that year, when he arrived in Chungking as the adviser to the generalissimo.

Q. Did you see much of him in 1941?—A. Very little. Our Embassy at that time was on the south bank of the Yangtze River, across the river from the city. He lived in the city at the far end so it was very inconvenient for us to get together. Transportation was scarce and difficult. I don't believe I saw him more than three times, perhaps four times, during that year. I was in and out of Chungking a good deal. He actually made a point of avoiding close contact with the Embassy because of his position with the Generalissimo. He didn't want the Chinese to think he was being a pipeline or was running back and forth.

Q. He was there as the adviser to the Generalissimo?—A. Yes. And he was taking great pains to maintain that status and, as I say, to disassociate himself from the Embassy.

Q. When did you next come in contact with him?—A. My memory on this is not very clear but when I was on leave in California in December 1942, it might have been January 1943, Mr. Lattimore was I believe at that time head of the Pacific operations for OWI. They had their offices in San Francisco and I have a hazy recollection of just stopping and speaking to him, saying hello when I was visiting some friends in the OWI offices there in San Francisco.

Q. And after that?—A. The next time was in October 1944 when I returned to the United States. He was, I believe, at the off-the-record interview which I had with members of the IPR here in Washington. During that visit to the United States he invited me to come down and see him and spend the night at his home in Baltimore. And I did so. I don't remember the exact date but it would be probably about the middle of November 1944.

Q. Under what circumstances did you give that off-the-record talk at the IPR?—A. During the period of consultation at my return in 1944 I was much sought after because I was the first man to get back to Washington after having visited in the Chinese Communist areas since 1939. In addition to all these interrogations by the different agencies, a number of newspaper men were sent to me by the press section of the Department. I was asked to go up to New York to talk to Mr. Luce. I got approval. I talked to Mr. Hopkins, Mr. White, and various other people. And the IPR asked—

The CHAIRMAN. Will you just explain IPR?

A. The Institute of Pacific Relations. May we refer to it as the IPR?

The CHAIRMAN. Afterward, yes.

A. The Washington branch of the IPR asked Mr. Vincent, who I believe was then Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs, if it would be possible for me to come over and give an informal off-the-record talk to some of their people in the Washington office. The first I knew of the matter was Mr. Vincent's telling me that he had received the invitation and had accepted and hoped it would be all right with me.

Q. In other words, your talk at the IPR was at the initiative of the IPR?—A. That is right.

Q. And authorized by the Department?—A. That is correct. And it was quite a customary thing. We had a great many officers who did exactly the same when they came back from the field and had news, information of interest. I believe that Mr. Oliver Edmund Chubb had one of those meetings after he returned from Sinkiang. I know that Mr. Raymond P. Ludden was asked for and authorized to give a talk when he also returned from China in June 1945. And I'm sure there are many other instances of Foreign Service Officers being authorized by the Department to meet the research staff of the IPR in these off-the-record background sessions.

Q. And to return to Owen Lattimore, when did you next come in contact with him?—A. It's hard, after all these years, for me to remember all of the individual contacts, of course. The next time that I saw him was during the spring of 1945, in April or May. I can't remember the exact circumstances of seeing him, but during one of those contacts he asked me if I would come down and see him again. I was invited eventually to come down the first week end in June. I went down for a week end then.

Q. If I understand correctly, your contacts with Mr. Lattimore consisted of a few meetings with him in Peiping during your language student period, a few meetings in Chungking when he was there as adviser to the Generalissimo, one meeting in San Francisco when he was with OWI, one or possibly more than one meeting in November when you were in Washington in November of 1944, and spending the week end with him in the spring of 1945.—A. I spent a week end with him in '44, one night.

Q. And the week end of June 1945.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I would like to ask if you could give us some idea as to how many of these meetings you had alone with Mr. Lattimore, or were they group discussions?—A. Well, in the language-student period in Peiping I never saw Mr. Lattimore alone. There was always some social occasion or a lecture by him or something of that sort. In Chungking, again I don't believe that I ever—I'm sure I never saw Mr. Lattimore alone. I was usually accompanying Mr. Vincent or someone else on calls in the city and we would stop in and see Owen. On one occasion we got caught by a very bad storm which made it impossible for us to cross the Yangtze River and we went back to Mr. Lattimore's house and asked if he could put us up for the night, and we slept on a couch in his living room. I saw him once or twice at the Embassy when he called at the Embassy, but there again it was not alone.

During 1944—pardon me, in 1942—my recollection is that it was just a casual conversation when I was being taken around the office by one of the OWI staff, an old friend of mine whom I was visiting, and there again it was not a solitary conversation. In 1944 I don't remember that anyone was at his home that week end. And that night I stayed there there was nobody, but his wife was there, of course. In 1945 I never saw him alone. There were other people present that week end and there was no solitary conversation.

Q. One last question. Would you characterize your relationship with him as one of casual friendship, or how would you classify that relationship, sir?—A. Yes; I would call it casual. It would be a casual friendship, based on mutual interests in the Far East and in China. I have always been interested in the extreme western and northwestern part of China. My father was one of the founders of the West China Border Research Society. He made several trips to that borderland, acquired over the years probably the most complete collection of Tibetan articles which have been in several museums here in the States. I myself have traveled some in the Tibetan country. I traveled up to the border of Sinkiang. I visited the caves Sir Aurel Stein handled on the Han and Tang Dynasty manuscript. I have been along the southern border of Mongolia. I have been interested in all the books on Mongolia and central Asia, and we have a considerable interest in bases for exchange of views and talk about that part of the world.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Throughout the years that you knew Owen Lattimore, did you regard him as a particularly well informed person on China?—A. I don't like to discuss Mr. Lattimore very much. On his specialty, which is Mongolia and central Asia, he is of course probably the outstanding American expert. In fact there are very few other people who can be called experts, there are very few other Americans who can be called experts on that part of the world. I don't think that Mr. Lattimore is a profound scholar. I think he is rather superficial in his views. He has a very active mind but his views are apt to shift a bit. I don't think his views on current affairs and China in general are particularly noteworthy. They are always interesting because he has a very facile mind, a very quick mind, always has new ideas and states them very dramatically.

Q. Have his views on China had any influence on your own?—A. None whatever, sir. In fact I haven't known his views until after I have formed my own views. In 1941 I did not discuss China with him. Well, he won't talk about China. By the time I saw him again in 1944, in November '44, my views were formed and I had not seen any writings or had any contact with him.

Q. It has been said that you were a student or pupil of Owen Lattimore.—A. There is absolutely no truth in any such statement.

Q. To get back to Peiping, I noticed among some of the other correspondents and people particularly interested in China that you mentioned are F. McCracken Fisher of the UP. What would you say his political views were?—A. You're thinking about the political views about China, are you?

Q. China or Soviet communism?—A. Well, he's certainly not a Communist or a Communist sympathizer. You have to remember, I think that a man who is a strong conservative in the American terms, and on American affairs generally, finds himself in China or has found himself during the past few years in China being sympathetic toward what might normally be called a much more liberal point of view. Practically all of the Foreign Service officers and even men such as George Atcheson and former Ambassador Gauss were all extremely conservative men in American terms.

But the conditions in China of inadequacy and inefficiency, corruption if you wish, the failure of the Kuomintang, and the aspects of the Communists which produced better government was winning popular appeal, made these people recognize that whether one liked the Communists or not they were doing a better job than the Kuomintang. They were not Communists or pro-Communists. I'm afraid I don't make myself clear.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean these people were not Communists?—A. That is right.

Q. Fisher particularly?—A. Fisher's attitude would be of that sort.

Q. Which sort?—A. Of being himself a conservative. But if you would transfer him to China I would assume that he—I know you would find him critical of the Kuomintang, in general agreement with the views held by most of us.

The CHAIRMAN. By who?

A. By most of us who were in China.

Q. Haldore Hanson is another. What would you say of his views?—A. At the time I knew him up to the end of 1937 he hadn't yet visited the Communist areas. He was, as all the rest of us were, bitterly critical of the Japanese war, very sympathetic toward the Chinese. I think that Haldore Hanson is a man who probably, at that time at any rate, read the New Republic. But he certainly is no Communist or no pro-Communist. He was a much more definite liberal in the American sense of the word than McCracken Fisher.

Q. Or Frank Oliver, of Reuters?—A. [Shaking of head.]

The CHAIRMAN. Your answer is?

A. No. I haven't seen him for years. And I don't remember well enough to make much of a guess as to what his views were in those days. He is an Englishman. In American terms he would be a liberal. But not by any stretch of the imagination would he be Communist.

Q. Or Arch Steele, of the New York Herald Tribune?—A. Arch Steele would be conservative by everything.

Q. Or Edgar Snow of the Saturday Evening Post?—A. Well, he is not a Communist. He is a leftist. He was at that time, of course, the only American who had visited the Communists in the northwest. He was in the process of writing Red Star Over China.

Q. You say he visited the Communists areas prior to that?—A. Well, during that period.

Q. During that period?—A. Yes.

Q. And Frank Smothers, of the Chicago Daily News?—A. It's awfully hard to characterize all these people in very definite terms. In the first place we usually didn't discuss American politics with each other and I have no idea of what their attitudes were.

Q. I notice that you mention becoming acquainted with Colonel Stilwell who was then military attaché at the Embassy. Was that the same Stilwell who was later General Stilwell?—A. That is correct.

(Off the record.)

(At this point, 11:45 a. m. the Board recessed and reconvened at 11:50 a. m.)

Q. How long was Colonel Stilwell military attaché to Peiping?—A. He was military attaché during the entire period I was there. And he continued as military attaché until I believe about 1939. I saw him occasionally when he passed through Shanghai during the years 1938 and 1939.

Q. Had he served in China previous to that?—A. Yes. He had been in China for a good many years. I can't give you his record in detail but I believe that soon after the First World War he was assigned to the Fifteenth Infantry which we had stationed permanently in Tientsin. He served one tour of duty there and then was assigned to Peiping as an Army language student, which for the Army is a 4-year detail. I believe he had a second tour with the Fifteenth Infantry before he became the military attaché. But he had spent the greater part of the period from the early 1920's up until 1935, when I first met him, in China.

Q. As far as you know, did General Stilwell have any pronounced political views or orientation?—A. Not in a party sense. General Stilwell was a terrific individualist. He had a great conviction that—well, a great sympathy for the common soldier. He was an infantryman and he was the type of officer who always believed that everything should be done for the soldier. He had an obsession, almost, against brass. He hated pretention. He hated fuss about rank. I have never discussed political matters with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you intend your question to refer to Chinese politics, Mr. Achilles?

Q. No. In general did he have any strong views about Chinese politics?—A. He had a great impatience with inefficiency, the Chinese ideas of "face," covering up things. He had a great admiration for some things which the Chinese Army was able to do. He was impatient with a great many of the Chinese commanders, even in this early period. I remember hearing him talk about the terrific fight which the Chinese were putting up in Shanghai and I heard him discuss some of the other Chinese battles, such as Taierhchnang at the same time he was scathing in his comment on some of the Chinese military leaders in this period for failing to put up a fight for retreating before the enemy attacked them for giving up strong positions. But I don't remember in this period of ever hearing him discuss Chinese political matters.

Q. During your service in Shanghai, what were your principal duties?—A. Well, it's almost impossible to enumerate them all, sir. Ambassador Gauss was very much interested, I think, in junior officers and when I first arrived in Shanghai, I was put in the Visa Section as a subordinate there under a non-career officer. It was an assignment which several other Foreign Service officers had balked at. I got along well with this officer who was an experienced visa man. And I suppose I got a good report on my trial period. At the same time I was given several additional chores; one of them was to prepare a weekly summary of the press in Shanghai. It was a job which had been given several officers and not handled apparently completely satisfactorily.

I had a commendation from Mr. Gauss on the first one of these I prepared and within 2 or 3 months I think I was assigned to another section—and I can't at this time remember exactly which section—to fill the vacancy caused by an officer going on home leave. And thereafter during all of the 3 years and 3 months that I was in Shanghai I functioned as a relief officer and you might say an emergency man to go into a section which was temporarily swamped and help them out, take the place of anybody going on leave, I did all the jobs—accounts, invoices, leaves, citizenship, ran the land office for a while, had several periods in the political section, did a great deal of protection work in connection with our properties that were occupied by Japanese troops throughout eastern China, acted as assistant to the executive officer, handled the routine of the amalgamation, amalgamating the commercial attaché and agricultural attaché in 1939.

Q. How much political reporting did you do from Shanghai?—A. I didn't do a great deal because I was in the political section—well, I was generally in all of the sections for only 2 or 3 months when somebody was away and the political section was a fairly large one. Shanghai was probably the largest consulate general we had in the world at that time. And we were generally three or four officers in the political section and of those posts I was the most junior. I was still a Foreign Service officer unclassified at that time. So that most of the reporting I did was routine reporting, assigned reporting. It was to go over and and see so-and-so and talk to him, write up this, it was secondary political reporting.

Q. Did you have many Chinese contacts at that time?—A. Yes; I had a number, but not very many in connection with my political reporting—because of my junior status I was not contacting important officials. Most of the work I did was from newspapers and that sort of thing. I had a good many Chinese friends, social friends, particularly through the Masonic lodge and organizations like that, and I came to know a good many. They were mainly Chinese businessmen or Chinese professional men.

Q. You were at that time a member of the Masonic lodge?—A. Yes. I joined it during that period in Shanghai.

Q. I note that the membership was largely Chinese. But was Masonry in China substantially the same as Masonry in the United States?—A. Yes. There were a number of lodges in the main cities—American lodges affiliated with mostly Massachusetts constitution. But the Philippine Grand Lodge established a branch lodge in China, about 1930 I believe. And there were two lodges in Shanghai under the Philippine Grand Lodge. The membership of most of those, the greater part of the membership of those lodges was Chinese who had studied in the United States.

Q. Were your Chinese associates at this period any particular group? Were they primarily your lodge associates, or were they any other particular group?—A. Well, numerically the lodge associates would be the greatest number. There were also Chinese friends who had been associates of my father in the YMCA. I didn't know most of those people intimately because generally they were much older than I. There was another group of Chinese whom we met through Chinese in the office. We had quite a large Chinese staff. Most of those people were business people. We had several Chinese in fairly high positions in the commercial attaché's office, for instance, and we met Chinese through them or in connection with our commercial work.

I had two tours of duty in the commercial section, the economics section. Then there were some friends whom I had known or were friends of people whom I knew in Peiping, younger people. Some of them were university people in Shanghai, at St. John's University.

Q. Were any of your Chinese associates at that time, as far as you know, Communists?—A. None whatever.

Q. I note that your statement lists a number of American acquaintances that time, Robert Barnett of the IPR; William Johnstone, Hallett Abend, and Tillman Durdin of the New York Times; J. B. Powell of the China Weekly Review; Randall Gould of the Shanghai Evening Post; Larry Lehrbas of the Associated Press; and Robert Bellaire of the United Press. Do you recall whether any of them had any particular political biases or views?—A. Some of them I would call more liberal than the others and some of them I would call definitely conservative. None of them were Communists or pro-Communists or strongly leftist in sympathy, as far as I know.

The CHAIRMAN. You say "or strongly leftist"?

A. Yes.

Q. I notice that in your statement you subscribed at that time to a number of magazines dealing with China, one of which was the Far Eastern Survey. What is the character of that?—A. The Far Eastern Survey is a biweekly publication put out by the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations containing articles written by a very large number of people on subjects related to the Far East generally.

Q. And Pacific Affairs?—A. Pacific Affairs is a quarterly published by the International Council of the International Secretariat, I believe. Perhaps—I'm not sure of the exact wording of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Q. You were undoubtedly aware from the press of the charges that the Institute of Pacific Relations was seriously infiltrated by Communists. Do you have any knowledge as to how long that situation has existed, when the IPR first began to be influenced in its publications by Communist thinking?—A. No; I do not. Outside of being a subscriber to some of its magazines, I have had no interest in the Institute of Pacific Relations. I have never attended its periodic conferences or participated in its affairs in any way. Certainly it was always thought of in the days referred to here as a most respectable type of organization. I have heard from reading the press that there were some Communists who did occupy positions of some influence in it at one period, but I can't tell you with any definiteness or from personal knowledge when that was or how influential those people were.

Q. Did you at any time in China meet Frederick V. Field?—A. I have never met Frederick Field or had any contact with him in any way, not even to the point of attending a meeting where he was present, so far as I know.

Q. I also notice in your statement that at that time you subscribed to the magazine Amerasia. How would you describe that magazine?—A. I subscribed to it just after it was established, I think.

Q. When was it established?—A. I think in 1936 or 1937. I'm not sure of the exact date.

Q. Do you recall who established it?—A. I remember receiving some circulars giving the board of editors; a number of them were people I knew personally or knew of, who had a good reputation, and on that basis I subscribed to it for, I think, 2 years.

Q. Who were the persons connected with it that you knew personally?—A. I believe that William W. Lockwood was one of the original members. No, I see that he was not. I have the names of the editorial board as of March 1937.

Q. Will you read the names?—A. Frederick V. Field—

The CHAIRMAN. And indicate as you go along whether or not you were acquainted with them.—A. I was not acquainted with Mr. Field. Philip J. Jaffe, I was not acquainted with Mr. Jaffe and knew nothing about him. T. A. Bisson, I had met him in Peiping in 1935; I had read his book, Japan in China, and had read various other articles which he had written. And I believe at that time I also had read his book on—I have forgotten the title, but it is American policy in the Far East, or something of the sort.

Q. You had known Mr. Brisson at that time?—A. Yes.

Q. Where did you first meet him?—A. I first met Mr. Brisson during the winter of 1937, during the summer; yes, during the winter of 1937 in Peiping. He was traveling at that time, I think, on a Guggenheim grant, and had just been visiting in Manchuria. He came down to Peiping to collect material. He was writing a book on Japanese aggression in China. At that time Haldore Hansen was living temporarily with me. My family had been evacuated. I had a large house and Haldore Hansen had just had a very rigorous detention by the Japanese Army and was in need of a place to recuperate, so Haldore Hansen was staying temporarily with me.

As I remember it, Mr. Hansen, who was also beginning to write his book, was very anxious to see Mr. Bisson, to meet him, and we invited Mr. Bisson out for a lunch, I believe at my house. There were several other people present. I don't remember who they were now; and we spent several hours talking with Mr. Bisson. That was the only time I had met him.

Q. Did you have an impression at that point as to Mr. Bisson's political slant?—A. None at all. We were talking about Japanese aggression against China and his observations in Manchuria and he had no disagreement on anything like that.

Q. Would you give the other names—the other people?

Mr. STEVENS. Pardon me, did you have any reason to frame any judgment at all about his beliefs or along political lines?

A. There was no basis or reason to form any judgment on political lines.

Mr. RHETTS (off the record). I should like to offer as an exhibit document No. 32, which is a listing of the editorial board of the magazine Amerasia for the years 1937, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, and 1944, as they have been taken from the masthead of the magazine.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be introduced.

(Carbon copy of listing of members of editorial board of Amerasia magazine for years 1937, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, and 1944, was admitted in evidence and marked "Exhibit 14.")

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Will you give information concerning the other names on the list?—A. The next name is Ch'ao-ting Chi. I did not know him. The next name is Kenneth W. Colegrove. I had never met Mr. Colegrove but I had read his writings and understood that he had a reputation, a good reputation, as a scholar in the Far East. The next name is Owen Lattimore, who was at that time living in Peiping, who I knew personally.

The CHAIRMAN. You have already covered Lattimore.

A. The next is Cyrus H. Peake, who at that time I believe was a professor at Columbia University, whose writings, I had also read and was familiar with. The next one is Robert K. Reischauer. I knew his family well. They were missionaries in Japan. Mr. Reischauer had been a senior at Oberlin when I was a freshman and his younger brother had been a housemate of mine all through college and was one of my best friends. Robert Reischauer was at that time at Harvard. The next two names are William T. Stone and Hester Lorn, neither of whom I knew.

Q. Among the editors at that time was Frederick V. Field, who I believe is a self-asserted Communist. Also there was Philip J. Jaffe, T. A. Bisson, and Owen Lattimore who have all been accused of being Communists. In reading that magazine, were you conscious of any Communist propaganda line at that time?—A. None whatever. They favored active support of the Chinese Government. They were critical of American aid to Japan. Actually, of course, the magazine contained a great number of articles by very many people outside of the editorial board at that period—all the articles were signed articles and they published articles by a great many different people.

Q. At some point in all of our lives we have had occasion to become aware of Communist philosophy and Communist propaganda. At what point in your career, would you say, you had first come to be aware of Soviet Communist objectives and propaganda?—A. It's very hard, sir, to pick a certain point or date. Could you clarify the question a little bit?

Q. I'll try. What we had really in mind is that we would like to know when you first became conscious of Soviet Communist objectives, since I gather from a later part of your statement that you had occasion later to compare Chinese Communist policies with Soviet Communist policies, and I was wondering when you first became aware of what Soviet policies and objectives really were?—A. Well, I would say in the course I took during college in political science. In that course I learned enough about Communists to be very definitely sure that I was not and would not be sympathetic to communism, and was not a Communist. But in my thinking in China and the Far East it was not entirely based on ideology but based partly on the relations between powers, between the power balance and relationship in the Far East. I can't pick a date when I first became aware of the problems involved—but they were always there—that we didn't want China to be dominated by Russia. I certainly always had the conviction that Russia was latently aggressive. The example of Outer Mongolia was always present there from the early 1920's.

Q. Did you have occasion at any time in China to undertake a study of Soviet Communist policies and objectives?—A. Not in those terms; no.

The CHAIRMAN. How about Marxism?

A. After I left college I don't suppose I read any Marxist books or any Communist literature until during this period when I was reporting on the Chinese Communists, when I did so to inform myself more thoroughly. I did a little research when I was working on the Chinese Communists, so I would be informed and could recognize what they were saying or compare its relationship to Lenin and Stalin—compare its relationship to their writings.

Q. You had not at the time you were in Shanghai had occasion to make any study of Communist propaganda?—A. None at all.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. May I interject a question there on this point, on the general inquiry that Mr. Achilles is making as to when you began to become, if you like, really sophisticated about Marxism or at least Russian adaptations of Marxism, did I understand your testimony to be that—well, before coming to that, would you say that as of today you're reasonably alert and reasonably well informed about the main lines of Marxism and Communist Party tactics and operations in particular?—A. I certainly think so, sir; yes.

Q. What I'd like to get at is when did you begin to apply whatever intensive research or other process you utilized to acquire that expert advice which you now have?

Mr. ACHILLES. That is what I was trying to bring out.

A. I think during the period 1944-45.

Q. The period 1944 to '45 when you were engaged as an intelligence officer reporting on the Chinese Communists?—A. That is correct; yes.

Q. Is it your position that in connection with your work you had to study up on the subject in order to be able intelligently to appreciate what people were saying, what Communists were saying?—A. That is right, and so I could evaluate what I was being told and put it in its proper background.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Prior to that time you had not been sufficiently familiar with the doctrines and techniques of Communist propaganda to be able to recognize it when you saw it?—A. Well, I think I was reasonably intelligent at recognizing propaganda, of recognizing Communist propaganda, but I was not a student of communism nor had my work at this point put me in touch with Communists or communism.

Q. But in any event, you did not recognize Communist propaganda in Amerasia at that time?—A. I did not.

Mr. RHETTS. You're speaking of 1937?

Q. Yes.—A. I would be very much surprised if an examination now would show any very definite line in Amerasia at that time, because if there had been a very positive line I'm sure that I would have recognized it.

Q. Did the material in Amerasia or these articles in the Institute of Pacific Relations publications have any particular influence on your thinking?—A. No, I don't remember that they did. For one thing they covered a wide area, the whole Far East. They were not specifically limited to China, and when they did relate to China they were written, most of them, after the events occurred. So that a man on the spot usually knew of them and had drawn his own conclusions and points of view before he read about them in some magazine published much later.

The Pacific Affairs is a quarterly and it doesn't deal with current affairs very much. I'm very sure that they had no influence at all on my view of things in China.

Q. During the period you were in Chungking what were your principal duties?—A. I don't know how to answer that without repeating a good deal of material that is here in my personal statement.

Q. Will you just summarize it?—A. The Embassy was very short-staffed and I was the most junior officer. I started in, because of the urgent need, as a general consular officer and in what little citizenship or other routine work there was. I acted as protocol officer in getting passes and driver's licenses and gasoline permits and all that sort of thing from the Chinese authorities. Later I moved into what you might call the translation section and acted as the Chinese secretary, checking translations of notes to and from the Foreign Office, checking translations of newspaper articles and other published material, and for a period I actually read all the editorials and all the local papers—about 10 a day—and dictated very short summaries. It was the sort of thing we didn't have a Chinese at that time who was capable of doing. A Chinese could sit down and translate an editorial but it would take half a day to do it and then you spent the other half a day to put it into readable English.

All this time I was doing some political reporting. And as additional officers were assigned to the Embassy, I moved more and more into the political reporting. For a while I acted as chief of chancery, executive officer, reviewing correspondence, and having supervision of files and codes and so on. But by early 1943, or I guess about early 1942, I was spending practically all of my time on political reporting and drafting, accompanying the Ambassador at times when he interviewed the Minister of Foreign Affairs or someone like that. The Ambassador traveled with some difficulty between the Embassy and the south bank in the city and the Ambassador didn't speak much Chinese so it was customary to always have a Chinese-speaking officer to go with him when he had to visit the city.

Q. Who was the Ambassador then?—A. Mr. C. E. Gauss.

Q. During that period in what groups were your Chinese contacts?—A. Well, they were developing. I arrived in Chungking, of course, with very few Chinese friends. One group was again old friends of my parents. My father had served in Chungking and organized the YMCA and the Chinese YMCA secretaries and other people connected with the YMCA knew my father. Another group was the Chinese members of the Rotary Club, which I joined. The Rotary Club in Chungking was at least three-fourths Chinese. They were mainly business and professional men. We had informal Masonic meetings for a period and then we organized a Masonic lodge in Chungking and there again it was almost entirely Chinese and the members were Government officials, businessmen, professional men, officials of the Chinese Government. I met a number of—in fact I met most of the Chinese who were connected with the Ministry of Information and the Chinese officials of news agencies—they had a sort of club to which I belonged for a while. It was an informal club.

Then I became acquainted gradually with the junior officers in the Chinese Foreign Office and got to know some of them quite intimately before I left. About 1942 I began to become acquainted with many of the working Chinese newspapermen, reporters, junior editorial writers, on some of the leading Chinese papers.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that cover that question?

A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall we adjourn for lunch?

Mr. RHETTS. We have one witness, Mr. Johnson.

Thereupon, Mr. Nelson Trusler Johnson, being produced, sworn, and examined as a witness in behalf of Mr. John Stewart Service, testified as follows:

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. Johnson, will you state your full name and address for the record?—A. My name is Nelson Trusler Johnson and I have been employed with the Government of the United States since 1907, mostly in China. My last post in China was that of Chief of the Mission beginning in February 1930 and ending in May 1941. I then went to Australia as American Minister and was there from September 1941 until April 1945. I retired from the Foreign Service on the first of April 1946 and have been temporarily employed by the Department of State since that date and acting as Secretary General to the Far Eastern Commission, which is an international organization established for the purpose of formulating policy in connection with the occupation of Japan.

Q. When did you become Chief of Mission in China, sir? What year was that?—A. It was—I presented my credentials, I think, on February 2, 1940.

Q. In 1930?—A. Yes; 1930.

Q. You're acquainted with Mr. Service, are you?—A. Yes; I know Mr. Service. I think my first acquaintance with his family was when I met his father and mother out in Chungking back in the early twenties. Then when I was in Peiping as Chief of Mission Mr. Service came to Peiping as a language attaché. I have forgotten the exact year, but I think it was about 1935. I'm not too certain about that year. He was there for the usual 2-year period of study, passed his examinations, as I recall, with ease, and then was assigned to the field as a vice consul and has continued in the career service since that time.

Mr. ACHILLES. Pardon me, may I ask a question at that point. Did you ever have any indication that Mr. Service's parents were in any way communistically inclined?—A. None whatever. I said that I met the parents there. I didn't know them but they were engaged in, I think, the YMCA, wasn't it?

Mr. SERVICE. Yes.

A. In western China, and I never heard the slightest report that the Service family was engaged in anything other than the most respectable and most respected occupations in China. If there had ever been any reports of that kind I'm certain that I would have heard some gossip about it. I never did. In fact they were held in the highest respect by those who knew them and by the Chinese.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. After Mr. Service graduated as a language attaché and was assigned to the consulate, was his work in general under your administrative supervision at all?—A. No; it was not. And he did not come under my personal observation again until he was assigned to the American Embassy or that portion of the American Embassy which was temporarily stationed at Chungking. In April 1941, just about, well, I think it was less than a month before I left to go to Australia, Mr. Service arrived on that detail. I saw something of him during those days when I was getting ready to leave. I do not recall that I saw him again until I met him here in Washington in 1945.

Q. Now, during the period that you had occasion to know him in China, first in Peiping and later in Chungking, did you have an opportunity to form a judgment about his general competence and his general political orientation at all?—A. Well, I would put it this way, that during the period that Mr. Service was attached to the Embassy as a language attaché there was nothing that occurred that would have attracted my attention in any way, shape or form to his political activities because unless there was something peculiar about them I would not have paid any attention to them. He was a member of the group of students attached to the Legation at the time I mentioned who came under my observation who were intelligent and who did their work with credit and who were, insofar as the reports which came to me from those who I had immediate supervision over their studies, intellectually honest.

There was no occasion, so far as I can recall, for my being interested at all in Mr. Service's political orientation or outlook. Certainly when I was associated, on occasions, with Mr. Service and his wife and those of his group of students, nothing ever happened, nothing was ever said, nothing ever came to me, that indicated that I should be in any sense of the word interested.

Q. In that connection, sir, if—during this period in Peiping—Mr. Service had been in any way active politically and communistically inclined, would you have expected that his immediate supervisors would in turn have reported to you would have brought that fact to your attention?—A. Well, I would certainly expect that that would happen because the reports on the personnel attached to the Legation were all signed by myself once a year and, as my mind goes back to those days and to the preparation of those reports, they were discussed among the senior members of the staff and those who came into immediate contact with the subjects of the reports so that if there had been anything peculiar about any of these young men I would have known it.

I remember one or two who were peculiar and who eventually disappeared in that strange way that mist has of disappearing in the morning for this reason or that reason. Their reasons were never too clear but it was my recollection that their disappearance was due chiefly to lack of interest in their work or lack of interest in the particular subject of Chinese which they were concentrating on.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have at any time any indication that Mr. Service was opposed to or not in sympathy with American policy toward China at the time?—A. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the question you originally asked, counsel?

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. With respect to this particular period you mentioned, sir, I take it you are referring to the efficiency reports which are annually made on each of the Foreign Service officers?—A. The efficiency reports that were made on the personnel in the Embassy at Peiping that ran all the way from those immediately junior to me on down to the last messenger.

Q. In that connection, am I correct in believing that the matter of preparation of these annual efficiency reports in the Foreign Service is a matter which is given very careful attention?—A. In my own particular case I tried to give them a special personal consideration because I had served for 2½ years, I think it was, as an inspecting officer—through the years 1922, 1923, 1924, and I know it was a phase of the work that I was particularly interested in. I had been interested in the personnel of the Foreign Service. I have been connected with it quite a long time. I have seen it grow. I have been sympathetic with it. I have been interested in the kind of young men that have come out to the Far East and interested themselves in the service in the Far East.

I was instrumental in a small way when I served in the Department in working over the regulations for that service. I helped somewhat in the discussions connected with the examinations for those young men. And I have been extremely interested in the type of young men, the kind of young men, and the kind of work that they were doing. So that when we prepared these efficiency reports or these personnel reports once a year I tried to give them a special consideration for that reason.

Now, of course, in preparing an efficiency report you sometimes are reporting on personnel who you're not too intimately acquainted with. But you have to build it on that. And you should build on that. I have always understood that these reports were given very serious consideration here in the Department. And I have always felt myself that if the man in the field didn't put some of himself into it that they were of no use here whatever.

Q. Turning to the later period in Chungking when Mr. Service became attached to the Embassy there, did you, during the course of your conversation and contact with him at that time, have any basis to reach a judgment about his political views and outlook?—A. The time that Mr. Service was with me in Chungking of course was a very short one, extending from about the middle of April 1941 until I left. I left in about the middle of May. And during that period of time he was just newly attached. There was no occasion for me to have any reason to read anything. I don't know whether he wrote anything during that time that I should have read. But I'd like to say that during that period of time when I was preparing to leave and when I saw and greeted Service—as a young man in whom I had been interested and who was now rejoining my staff in a sense—I welcomed him there and I certainly did not at any time have the slightest indication from anybody or do I recall anything that he ever said to me or he ever said in my presence that would have alarmed me in any sense of the word as to his political views.

I'd like to say in this connection I have been in the service a long time and as young men come on in the service they all come with new ideas, ideas that are the product of their own environment, the product of their own training. And the first thing that I recognized or have tried to train myself to recognize in relation to the personnel that I have had to deal with was their right to see things as they saw them, and I certainly expected them to speak to me of them as they saw them and not as they thought I would like them to see them. It just happens that in this case there was never any occasion, as far as I know, for Mr. Service to make any reports to me about things that he saw. But I have been curious about this matter, of course, and I have within recent months turned up memoranda which have been attributed to Mr. Service and which have been printed in the volume issued by the Department of State having special reference to "United States policy with regard to China," and I believe vulgarly known as the white paper. And I have read these memoranda with special reference to what I might have thought about them if they had been made to me or had been made under my supervision. And I'd like to say this, that I couldn't find in those memoranda anything that I would not have forwarded to the Department of State if it had been made by one of my subordinates at that time.

Now, I'd like to say that I don't necessarily agree with the judgment of my young men. I don't necessarily agree with Mr. Service's judgment in interpreting some of the things he reports at times. And I would think, at least I hope I would have exercised my right to express my disagreement with that judgment, but I would not have considered that it was my duty or my right in my relationship with the Department of State to suppress views which young men who have been trained in the service to see and try to see honestly and I have always believed that Mr. Service was honest intellectually, and I don't remember any of my young men that I didn't consider honest intellectually. And I have never been known consciously to have been deceived by them. But I have never believed that, and I don't believe after reading those documents that there is anything in them that I wouldn't have forwarded and let the chips fall where they went; if the Department considered that the views therein expressed and the judgment therein expressed flowed with its judgment, that was something that I felt was the proper function of the leaders of the Department of State and not mine. I never interpret it as just my job in the field to present only my point of view.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You say you would have forwarded those documents?—A. I would have.

Q. Did you see anything in any of the documents which you have read which indicated to you any disloyalty to the United States?—A. I saw nothing in those documents that indicated to me that the writer of those reports was in any sense of the word disloyal, either to the United States or to his office, as a reporter on what he saw.

Q. Well, did you see anything that would have indicated to you that he was a security risk?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. You're speaking now of documents written after your departure from Chungking?—A. I'm speaking now of documents written after my departure which had nothing to do with my period there, documents which I have read out of personal curiosity because I have been interested in a young man who was attached to my staff and in whom I had a personal interest and in whose training I had had an interest. And naturally I have been sort of personally concerned in knowing what was behind all this business. I wasn't conscious of any training of people to grow up here as traitors, spies, and disloyal people. And so I have read those documents. That is all, however, that is the whole of my reading of Mr. Service's writings.

Q. Did you—I take it, due to your long service in China, you have continued to keep familiar with our policy toward China, even while you were serving in Australia?—A. Well, only insofar as I could be familiar with it in such speeches or such reports as the press gave me. But I have not had any access to any of the files since. And I have particularly tried to refrain from it.

Q. You would say, would you not, that particularly in recent years you have had occasion to keep familiar with United States policy toward China?—A. Yes.

Q. And in reading these documents of Mr. Service, are there any of those that you would consider to be antagonistic to American policy towards China at the time as you understood it?—A. I would have to read those documents over again and think of them in that light because I did not read them for that purpose.

Q. But you had no such impression from reading them?—A. No, I have no such impression. My impression was that the reports were written by a young man who was trying to see things as honestly as he could and who was trying to tell the story as honestly as he could. I think those reports do perhaps contain some recommendations which must have been contrary to the practice that you found. But I do not consider that recommendations are necessarily in opposition to policy.

Q. Would you consider any of those recommendations of an improper nature?—A. Certainly not. I have never considered any recommendation made by a member of my staff as being improper. Perhaps I have never seen any, perhaps I wouldn't recognize an improper one, but I would certainly—if a recommendation came along with which I didn't agree or I had other views with regard to it, I would parallel it with my own and give it to the Department of State to choose. I wouldn't call the young man in and say "Take them out." I certainly did not see in those documents any recommendations that I would have considered improper for him to make, whatever I might have thought of it—what's the word I want, whatever I might have thought of the judgment upon which the recommendations would have been made.

I might not have agreed with the conclusions upon which those recommendations were made but I certainly didn't consider them improper. I thought they were very proper. I would have felt that a young man having those conclusions and having those views, if he didn't make the recommendations, was not doing his duty.

Q. In other words—A. That is what he was there for, it seems to me. At least that has always been my belief in the work of the Department of State. How else can the Secretary of State or any of those who advise him judge it? How can they judge the situation that exists abroad, which they have to deal with, if they can't get the picture as accurately as possible? There is no single truth. You have got to see it in all of its phases. You have got to see it from all of its angles.

White lights are made up of many colors. You can't judge white light by black or blue or red, but put them all together and it's white. You have got to put all of these recommendations and all of these views together for the Government or the Secretary of State to make his decision as to how he is going to act or what he is going to do and it would seem to me that it would be highly improper for—well, that the improper thing would be to try to guide these, for some single source in the field to guide these young men or guide the reporters in such a way that the facts as they saw them never got there. Does that say anything? That is my view anyway.

Q. Yes, I understand it.—A. That is my view, for good or bad. And I have always encouraged such young men as I had about me to go out and see things as they saw them and express them as they saw them, leaving to myself if I saw fit to disagree with them or approve. And it seems to me that is the function and honesty the reporter in the field should follow.

Q. Having spent part of your service in China as an inspector, it's correct is it not, that one of the principal functions of an inspector is to judge the character of the persons that he inspects?—A. That is correct, the character and, as I recall the old form, "the character and the ability and the reputation of the person upon which you report" was very much a part of the report that you prepared and I did not—well, in fact all Foreign Service officers attempt to make themselves aware of the character and the reputation of the personnel abroad and in their own staffs in order to give the Department an honest appraisal.

Q. From your personal contact with Mr. Service, what would be your appraisal of his character?—A. Well, my appraisal of his character would be that he was honest intellectually, that he was morally courageous, that he was intellectually curious, that he was trustworthy, and I would say loyal.

Q. Have you any reason at all to doubt his loyalty?—A. None. I have never had any reason to doubt his loyalty, up to this moment, none whatever. I have valued his friendship, I have valued the friendship of his family. He has a very charming wife, the daughter of an Army officer who came and joined our little group of personnel there in Peiping and Mr. and Mrs. Service while there as students bore themselves very well in the community and were liked and respected. And to the best of my knowledge and belief throughout his service he has enjoyed the respect of those around him.

Q. Did you ever have any occasion to question in any way Mrs. Service's loyalty?—A. Never. My children have played with their children and I have a very high regard for the character of the children, which the Service family are bringing into the world now to carry on the Service tradition.

Q. What would be your estimate of Mr. Service's reputation in China at the periods you knew him?—A. Well, I would have said that it was very high. I never heard anything to the contrary. I have never known anything to the contrary. I may say the greatest shock I ever had with regard to anybody that I have served with is the accusations that were made about Mr. Service. And I still don't know anything about them.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(Witness excused.)

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: Saturday, May 27, 1950—2 to 5:30 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State.

Reported by: E. L. Koontz, CS/Reporting.

Board members present: Conrad E. Snow, Chairman, Theodore C. Achilles, Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

In the case of John S. Service: Charles Edward Rhetts, attorney.

(The meeting reconvened at 2 p. m.)

(After being duly sworn, former Ambassador Clarence E. Gauss testified in behalf of John S. Service as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. Gauss, will you state your full name and address for the record?—A. My name is Clarence Edward Gauss. I live at the Wardman Park Hotel.

Q. What is your present position, sir?—A. My present position is member of the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, a Government corporation.

Q. Would you describe briefly, sir, your prior positions with the United States Government?—A. Yes. I entered the Department of State in 1906 and retired from the Foreign Service on the 31st of May 1945. I retired as Ambassador. I entered the Department as a clerk at $900.

Q. And at the time of your resignation from the Foreign Service your position was what?—A. Ambassador. I was Ambassador to China, and from about the middle of November 1944 until the end of May 1945 was on leave of absence, terminal leave I suppose you would call it, prior to retirement.

Q. So that the period of your incumbency in the Ambassadorship in Chungking was from—A. From the spring of 1941 through about the middle of November 1944.

Q. And immediately prior to that what position?—A. Prior to that I had been a minister to Australia for about—oh, 8 or 9 months is all I had down there, worst luck.

Q. And immediately prior to your—A. Immediately prior to that I had been consul general in Shanghai from 1936 until early 1940 and I went down to Australia and then went to Chungking as Ambassador in the spring of 1941.

Q. Yes. Am I correct in believing, sir, that the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank is by law a bipartisan board?—A. That's quite true. I am one of the Republican directors.

Q. Now, would you state to the Board when you first met Mr. Service?—A. Well, I think Mr. Service came to me at Shanghai sometime in 1938, I couldn't say when but my recollection is somewhere along in there, and if my memory is correct he was still there when I left early in 1940.

Q. Yes. So that he served under you there for a period of approximately—A. A year and a half.

Q. A year and a half. And at that time was your relationship to him such that you had an opportunity to observe him closely?—A. Very much so.

Q. Then when was the next period of your association with Mr. Service?—A. The spring of 1941 I believe Mr. Service was in Chungking when I arrived, if he wasn't he came a few days later.

Q. Yes.—A. And he remained attached to the Embassy from the spring of 1941 until the summer of 1943, when I think, I being in California in the hospital, not knowing anything about it, the Army grabbed him and attached him to military headquarters. He was detached from the Embassy; attached to military headquarters, but in his work with military headquarters he still continued to give us at the Embassy copies of his political information. He was, in a measure, a liaison officer between the headquarters and the Embassy and we saw quite a bit of him although I had no responsibility for him after the middle of 1943.

Q. Now, coming back, first, to the period during which he served under you at the consulate in Shanghai I believe you have indicated that his relation to you was such that you had an opportunity to observe him very closely?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Would you care to characterize for the Board your general impression of him at that time with particular reference, first, to his competence as a Foreign Service officer, and, second, with special reference to his political orientation, if any, that came under your observation?—A. Well, gentlemen, I believe that out of Shanghai you probably will find in your State Department records an efficiency report on Mr. Service, which, I am quite sure, I prepared, and I think it will show you that I considered him one of the outstanding, if not the most efficient and promising younger member of the Foreign Service that had come to my notice. I had a very high regard for him, so had members of my staff. When he first came to us we put him on—we would call it administrative work, and, as I recall, why he reorganized several of the departments of the consulate general. All you had to tell him was what you wanted and it was done. We knew, of course, that he had been born and raised in China. He had considerable knowledge of China and the Chinese, and just as soon as we could we put him in what I called our political office. At that time, I should explain, the Japanese were in occupancy of Shanghai, but not in actual occupation of the International Settlement. We had a great deal to do in the way of protection of American nationals at Shanghai at that time. We had a political office, which not only reported such political information as we gathered there but also had a great deal to do in negotiation with the Japanese for the protection of American interests. As I recall, we put Service in that office some time before I left Shanghai and he was continuing there to show the same ability that he had in other places. He was outstanding. I don't know of any officer in my whole 39 years of service who impressed me more favorably than Jack Service and I have had an awful lot of young officers with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you like to examine the efficiency report to refresh your recollection?

A. I am sure I would be glad to see it again. I think it will bear out my statement.

Q. I think it probably will.—A (after looking through efficiency report). Yes. Q. Is there anything you would like to add to your statement [indicating efficiency report]?—A. No; I don't think so. That was a rating that I gave to Mr. Service as a junior officer. After all, you had various grades of officers there at the post, and he was one of the very junior officers, and he had a very good rating.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Gauss, would you also comment, if you can, on any opinion that you may have formed of Mr. Service's political orientation or political views, and I should say that you are doubtless aware at this point in time we are particularly interested in any possible Communist leanings that he might have exhibited?—A. No; Mr. Service never in my observation exhibited any Communist leanings.

I would like to make this statement, and, General, I am rather surprised that it isn't in that efficiency report. But one of the first things that impressed me most about Mr. Service was this: He was born and raised abroad. Now, I think Mr. Achilles would bear me out there in submitting in the case of so many American boys born and raised abroad they become international in their outlook; they get away from their American side, and you find them in China—and it is particularly true, if Jack will forgive me, of language officers in Japan and China and in the Orient—first thing you know they are pro this or pro that; anti this or anti that. Jack Service impressed me particularly during my whole period of contact with him of going right down the middle of the road as an American.

He was objective in his approach to all of the political problems that we had. Now I don't mean to say he was ostentatiously American, but he thought in his whole analysis, his political information and everything else, he thought as an American. And, to me, that was one of the most refreshing things that I could have had in my whole service. For instance, at Chungking I had an officer who was so pro Chiang Kai-shek that he would just go red in the face when anybody said anything in criticism of the existing government. You couldn't deal—you couldn't use an officer like that. But Jack Service impressed me at Shanghai and at Chungking as one of that type of Americans that could go right down the middle of the road as an American who recognized that he was abroad to recognize American interests and look at things from the American standpoint. There was no suggestion in any case of pro or anti anybody. He liked the Chinese as we all did. He got along with them.

Mr. ACHILLES. In his Chinese contacts, would you say that he had any particular groups that he associated with more than any other?

A. Now, Mr. Achilles, I would like to go very positively into that particular question because the only thing that I know about of Mr. Service—of complaint against him—is the McCarthy statement that he associated with Communists. In Chungking, Mr. Service was a political officer of the Embassy. His job was to cover the waterfront. His job was to get every bit of information that he possibly could, and he went over to the Chungking side of the river every day and he saw everybody that he could. Now it was difficult to get information in those days. We had a censorship. They had all these wonderful stories about Chinese victories which never proved to be true. Hollington Tong used to give out this information to the press and your Chinese press was censored, you couldn't get information, you had to go out and get it yourself. Jack Service's job was to go over to the other side of the river and to see everybody that he could. He would see the foreign press people. He saw the Chinese press people. He saw anybody in any of the embassies or legations that were over there that were supposed to know anything. He saw any people in the foreign office or any of the other ministries. He went to the Kuomintang headquarters and talked with whoever he could see there. He went to the Ta Kung Pao—

The CHAIRMAN. Would you spell that?

A. T-a-k-u-n-g-p-a-o, which was the independent newspaper. He went to this independent newspaper, he was in touch with those people. He went to the Communist newspaper. He went to Communist headquarters. He associated with everybody and anybody in Chungking that could give him information, and he pieced together this puzzle that we had constantly before us as to what was going on in China, and he did a magnificent job at it.

Now I would say this: During the period that Mr. Service was within the Embassy I had information—I don't know whether we ever mentioned it to Service or not—but I had it through my counselor that Chiang Kai-shek had commented that officers of our legation were going into Communist headquarters, and I was asked whether I wanted to prohibit them from going into Communist headquarters, and I said: "No, I want them to go wherever they ought to go to get the information that we need. We will do it openly and if Chiang Kai-shek has any comment to make on it let him make it to me and not indirectly." I told the counselor of the Embassy who reported that to me that he was not to give any instructions that Jack was not to go into the Communist headquarters.

Mr. ACHILLES. His contact with the Communists at that point was strictly in accordance with his official duties?

A. Strictly in accordance with his official duties. I didn't tell him to go there, but I expected him to go there, that was his job, and you didn't have to tell Jack Service what his job was, or how to do it. He did it. I would like to make that very plain. I would like to make very plain the fact that during the period he was there I was told that Chiang Kai-shek objected to some of our people going into the Communist headquarters, and I said we would not prohibit them from doing it.

Now, there was a representative in Chungking at that time of the Communist Party, who was recognized by Chiang Kai-shek, that representative, Chou En-lai, is now Foreign Minister to the Communist government in China, and was a frequent guest at most of the foreign embassies in Chungking. The British Ambassador, who was later British Ambassador here, had Chou En-lai constantly in his house at dinner. I knew Chou En-lai when I went to Chungking but I never entertained him, I had no more contact with him than to speak to him lightly on the steps of the Soviet Embassy when he would be going in, or I would be going in to some official reception, that's all.

Questions by Mr. RUTTS:

Q. In that connection though I take it you expected Mr. Service to maintain all the contacts with him that were possible.—A. I expected him to maintain those contacts.

Q. Now in connection with your comments a moment ago, Mr. Gauss, you were referring to the fact that some people were pro this or anti that, and you indicated that in the case of Service, on the contrary, he was entirely objective. In that connection, was it your observation, in the light of your knowledge of events and political affairs in China, that a person who made statements critical of the Kuomintang at that time was in any way nonobjective?—A. Oh, no, I would not say it was nonobjective.

Q. In other words, your own judgment would be any objective reporting would include necessarily the making of critical.—A. It did. Unfortunately, he had to say a lot that was not favorable to the Kuomintang.

Q. Now General Hurley, as you may know, has preferred very serious charges against Mr. Service on account of his activities in China. General Hurley has stated in the course of hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in December 1945 that Mr. Service was one of a group of Foreign Service officers in China, which included George Acheson, who sought to subvert or defeat American policy in relation to that country; that he exhibited pro-

Communist affinities and that he, in effect, was seeking to bring about the downfall of Chiang Kai-shek's government. While I recognize that you cannot have personal knowledge of the period subsequent to your departure, but inasmuch as you were the Ambassador who immediately preceded General Hurley as Ambassador I wonder if you would care to comment on those charges insofar as your observation of Mr. Service's activities can shed light on them?—A. I am sorry General Hurley isn't here because I would call him a liar to his face. There was never at any time any suggestion of disloyalty on the part of Mr. Service or George Acheson or any of the other members of my staff in Chungking with reference to American policy in China or any desire to bring about the collapse of the Chiang Kai-shek government.

The CHAIRMAN. I might say for the record here that General Hurley has been invited to be a witness before this Board—just for the record, that's all.

A. I have no objection to General Hurley being informed of exactly what I have said here.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you at any time question Mr. Service's personal loyalty to you?—A. I never expected any personal loyalty, Mr. Achilles, from Mr. Service or any other member of my staff. I considered that their loyalty was to the American Government. Now, outside of that, I would say that I had no occasion to question Jack Service's loyalty to me as his chief, or his respect to me as his chief.

Q. Nor to United States policy?—A. Not for one instant. Let me say this, too: I encouraged the younger officers of my staff, especially the political officers, to do a little thinking on their own. Now Service was not a political adviser; he was a political observer, a political reporter, and a political analyst. And I never discouraged, I encouraged, these younger officers when they were doing this political work to give us the benefit of their thinking, encouraged them to think and say what they thought, and they were probably freer to do that with me than they were with my successor.

Q. Mr. Service has told us that during the time he was at Shanghai he subscribed to magazines known as the Far Eastern Survey and Pacific Affairs, published by the Institute of Pacific Relations, and the magazine Amerasia, all of which, it is alleged, at some point have contained considerable Communist propaganda. Were you familiar with those magazines at the time you were in Shanghai?—A. No; I was not familiar with those magazines at the time I was in Shanghai. I heard about them and I was always sore because the Department of State didn't send them out to us. We never got anything; we had to go and get everything ourselves. I would like to know what went on. Occasionally, you would see a reference in the press to some article, but we never saw the magazines.

Q. You never had occasion then to form any judgment as to whether those magazines contained Communist propaganda in any way at that time?—A. No, as a matter of fact, I never saw those magazines until I retired from the Service and came down here to Washington and was interested in what was going on and I then subscribed for them. I wanted to know what was going on in these magazines.

Q. At the time you did subscribe to them were you conscious of any improper propaganda in them?—A. No; I considered that Amerasia was very distinctly anti-Chiang Kai-shek and rather, perhaps, favorable or complimentary toward the Communist regime in China, but I never had any impression of their being Communist propaganda. I didn't read them very carefully. I looked over them to see what they were. I bought one on the newspaper stand one day, this Amerasia, to see what it was like; I wanted to follow it. Pacific Survey—what do they call it—the Far Eastern Survey?

Q. The Far Eastern Survey and Pacific Affairs.—A. I knew Lawrence Salsbury who was editing the Survey. He used to be on the Survey. I never saw anything in any of those publications that particularly disturbed me. I thought a great many of the people who were writing them didn't know what they were writing about.

Q. I take it from the efficiency reports, the outstandingly favorable reports that you gave Mr. Service, that you never at any time had occasion to question his character or personal integrity?—A. Not one bit. As I have said before, I considered him the outstanding younger officer who had served with me for 39 years.

Q. That is high praise.—A. He deserved it. I believe that I must have said it in some of my later reports. I believe I wrote one or two reports in Chungking on Service. I am not sure whether you have them or not, but I think I said it.

Q. If I might say so, you have the reputation in the service of being a tough chief.—A. I don't think I was a tough chief. I think I was fair to my men, and I think I wanted them to get on. There was room at the top for everybody and I encouraged these men to do a lot of thinking of their own and to be free to come in and talk. But I was tough in some respects, I'll admit, but that's another thing.

Q. I don't have anything else.

Mr. STEVENS. Now, I take it from your earlier remarks concerning the responsibility that Mr. Service had to keep himself informed in China you would have considered it just as much his responsibility to read and to get his hands on any information that had a bearing upon that responsibility as well?

A. Oh, yes, quite. As a matter of fact, Jack Service because our, I think, governmental authority on Chinese communism. I don't believe that there was in the Army or the Navy anyone, and certainly not in the Foreign Service, who had made the study of that whole movement in the way that Jack Service did, who had translated these speeches and these pronouncements, and these edicts, and everything else that came out of Communist headquarters, and he did the whole thing. He had to spend a tremendous time documenting that thing to make himself what he needed to be—an expert on that situation—that's part of his job.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Rhettts). Do you want to proceed?

Questions by Mr. RHETTTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Gauss, you have indicated that during the period when you were Ambassador in Chungking, Service was until August 1943 a member of your staff?—A. That's right.

Q. And that thereafter he was detached and attached to the staff of General Stilwell?—A. That's right.

Q. You also indicated that even after his becoming attached to the Army nonetheless copies of his political memoranda were furnished to the Embassy?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. And did you have occasion to read some of those or a substantial number of them as they flowed into the office?—A. Oh, yes, yes, and a great many of them were sent into Washington with covering dispatches, with or without comment that we might have in the Embassy on what Jack had to report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Ambassador's statement is borne out by an efficiency report which he signed dated August 1, 1942, and I think perhaps it would be well if it can be read into the transcript.

Mr. RHETTTS. I would welcome it.

The CHAIRMAN. I won't read it at this time, but I will just indicate to the stenographer that it can be—unless the Board desires to hear it.

Mr. STEVENS. I would just like to caution here as to the use that the Board makes in putting materials that have come in on Foreign Service officers generally into the transcripts of the record. I would like to know how far, in your opinion, Mr. Moreland, we are privileged to do that? To summarize the contents, possibly yes; I just wonder whether it is within our prerogatives to do the other.

Mr. MORELAND. Perhaps an excerpt of the last paragraph would be sufficient.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that is perfectly permissible.

Mr. ACHILLES. I have read the report and I am satisfied that what the Ambassador has said accurately reflects what is in it.

The CHAIRMAN. I will read then portions of the efficiency report dated August 1, 1942 [reading:]

"He is, in my opinion, one of the ablest and most promising younger officers of the China corps and the service in general.

"At present he is assigned to duty as immediate assistant to the Ambassador on political and Chinese-language work; scrutinizing the Chinese press, making special inquiries and investigations, preparing dispatches and reports, etc. He has also become familiar with the administrative work of the Embassy, and is an all-around officer, capable of stepping in and filling any position.

"He is thoroughly dependable; has a fine sense of loyalty and responsibility; is tolerant, just, well balanced; thoroughly devoted to his duties; industrious, cooperative, shows initiative, is ambitious, and displays force and will power. He has an acute mind, and is thorough and exceedingly painstaking in all his work. He has a good political sense; keen in his analysis of political developments and situations, his judgment is particularly sound and just. I have followed the practice throughout my career of encouraging younger officers to frank examination and discussion of the political findings and conclusions of the office. Mr. Service has shown an admirable response in this direction, being frank and constructive in his analysis and criticisms and at the same time showing appropriate modesty and restraint.

"At the moment of writing this report, he is absent on a trip to the northwest with a group of Chinese engineers attending an engineering and economic convention at Lanchow. If the Minister of Economic Affairs, Dr. Wong Wen-hao (one of the ablest men in the government) carries out plans to proceed to the Chinese oil fields in Kansu he has indicated that he will be glad to have Mr. Service accompany him. No other foreigner is to attend the convention or make the proposed trip. The confidence and respect in which he is held by the Chinese is reflected in the invitation extended to him in this instance. He has accompanied other groups of Chinese on tours in Szechuan province when Dr. Wong was present and the present invitation is the result of Dr. Wong's observation of him on those occasions.

"Mr. Service in my opinion is one of the best equipped and most able of the younger officers of the service; head and shoulders over most of his colleagues of equal seniority in the service. I could ask for no more efficient or satisfactory staff officer. He is the outstanding younger officer who has served with me over my 36 years of service.

"I rate him: Excellent."

This is signed by C. E. Gauss, American Ambassador.

A. I wrote it. I didn't realize I had gone into such detail about him at that time, but I wrote it and I still stand by it. I had forgotten about this trip to Lanchow that Jack made, and Dr. Wong Wen-hao, who is mentioned in there as Minister of Economic Affairs, was one of the outstanding men in the Nationalist Government, one of the finest Chinese that I know, a man of great integrity, who appreciated what America was trying to do for China, and who appreciated Service.

MR. ACHILLES. The Chinese officials mentioned in there were all officials of the Nationalist Government?

A. Oh, yes. You see, we had no contact with the Chinese Communists except through that one man, Chou En-lai, down in Chungking until the summer of 1944 when during the visit of Vice President Wallace to Chungking Chiang Kai-shek finally yielded on a demand that we would have a military mission in Yen-an, which was the Communist capital, a military mission for the purpose of gathering military information on what the Japanese were doing in Manchuria and north China. At that time I urged on General Ferris, who was the deputy chief of staff in command in Chungking, and on Colonel Barrett, who was to head that mission, and the only language officer I believe that was on it—I urged that I would like to have Jack Service go along as attached to the headquarters as a language man, which was designed to get him up there to see if he could verify the information that we had had down in Chungking as to what the Communists were doing in China. I didn't believe these darn rascals. I had developed—I would say I liked objective officers on my staff, but I admit I had developed a hate for Communists many, many years before, and I just was unwilling to accept a great many of the reports that we got on what the Communists were doing in the way of agrarian reform, in the way of building up the village councils, in the way of helping the people, troops, and so on. With all stories which we had, there was no verification from people that we had in confidence, no verification on the spot. We got hold of everybody who ever came through there and made them talk, but I wanted Jack Service to go up there because with his political mind he could give us then an estimate of that situation, and he was sent, and he was the only civilian on that group. I was afraid the Chinese might object to having a civilian officer being on that group, but it was all done by the military, and he was sent as an interpreter, I suppose, weren't you, Jack?

MR. SERVICE. It was never specified.

A. Language officer was what I suggested he might be sent as.

THE CHAIRMAN. Did that encourage him to make friends with the Communists that he met?

A. You bet your life, that was his job, to make friends with them in the sense, General, that you have got to make friends with these people if you are going to get them to talk. They have got to feel that you are friendly, otherwise they will clam up. That doesn't mean to say that you have got to pronounce Communist views, but you have at least got to be sympathetic with them and be willing to hear what they have to say and encourage them to talk.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe Mr. Service has reported from time to time that it was his impression that the Chinese Communists were at that time doing more toward fighting the Japanese than the Nationalist Government. Was that impression shared with other members of the Embassy?

A. We didn't know. It was one of the things that those people went up there to find out.

Q. And you relied on his report then in that respect?—A. On his report, yes, and everything else that we got.

Q. You had other confirmatory reports, I take it?—A. Oh, yes, that was the general tenor of all of the information that we were getting, but, of course, they couldn't expect as much from the Communists as might have been the case if they had had arms and ammunition.

Now, I don't know whether I am going ahead of things or not here, but there was at one time out there quite a feeling that our forces, the American Government, should give arms and ammunition to these Communist forces. I don't believe that Jack Service ever expressed that opinion, but it did come to us in the Embassy, and, as a matter of fact, it was an opinion that was shared by a great many of the military people, and I believe by some of this other group of officers that were connected with headquarters—I mean Foreign Service officers who were connected with headquarters. In any case, I think your files will show that as Ambassador I called this to the attention of the Department of State—that there was considerable feeling about this arming of the Communists out there. As a matter of fact, I feel General Stilwell was even accused of it at one time, and I expressed the view that if we had to land on the coast of China, and there came into contact with Chinese forces fighting the Japanese, we might give them assistance without reference to the brassards on their arms, but outside of that I was opposed to any military aid to the Communist forces in China except it be by agreement with the recognized Nationalist Government. I think the white paper will show some indication of an opinion in that respect. I don't recall that Jack Service ever expressed any opinion on it in my day.

Mr. ACHILLES. I believe the record shows that he subsequently did from the Embassy.

A. Well, I am sure he will be able to give you the answer on that.

Mr. ACHILLES. You say that view was held by a considerable number of officers in China at the time?

A. Oh, yes, I think it was probably held by Stilwell.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Rhett). Go ahead.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. As a matter of fact, on that point, Mr. Gauss, as you suggest, the white paper confirms that impression of yours which General Stilwell ultimately did come to view it.—A. Stilwell never expressed himself that way. Stilwell wanted to get control of the troops, Communist troops, quarantine the Communist troops facing the National Government troops, and not facing the Japanese where they should have been. When the big Japanese push came down from the north the comment was made that the Communists hadn't stopped them—the Communists had nothing to stop them with. At that time I remember particularly the military opinion was that we should give arms, equipment to the Communist forces, if necessary fly it over there.

Mr. ACHILLES. One question at that point. In the light of subsequent events, how would you evaluate the accuracy of Mr. Service's reports on conditions there now?—A. I would say they are just about as close to being 100 percent accurate as any human being could present. Those that I saw, mind you—I saw nothing after I left Chungking in 1944, and I admit that I haven't read much of the white paper.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. One further question on that line, if I may. I take it from what you have said that after this military mission did go to Yen-an, to which Service was attached, the reports that came back tended to confirm the information which you mentioned you had been reluctant to accept; namely, that the Communists were doing a pretty good job of, first of all, obtaining popular support, and with their limited means fighting Japanese in a guerrilla way.—A. Those reports I should say were very largely oral. For a long time after they were up there we got nothing. Then I think one or two things did trickle through. You see, you could only send them out when you sent a plane up. And it wasn't very long after that when I left Chungking, so whether or not I received much in the way of written reports from Jack Service after he got to Yen-an I can't say, but I did talk with him whenever he came down and I also talked with Colonel Barrett, who had been my military attaché—I talked with him when he came down. General Hurley had returned, but I got nothing out of him.

Q. Now, in connection with this subsequent matter, Mr. Gauss, it has been alleged that while Mr. Service was in China he was in communication with a Mr. Philip Jaffe, who was the editor of the Amerasia magazine, and it has been further suggested that in virtue of that communication he could have been in some way supplying Jaffe with large quantities, or at least quantities, or classified Government documents. I should like to ask you whether, subsequent to Service's attachment to the Army in August 1943, he had had access to the files in the Embassy, as he had formerly had access to them when a member of the Embassy staff?—A. Oh, no; neither Mr. Service nor any other member of that Foreign Service group attached to headquarters had access to the files. I recall the counselor of the Embassy coming to me with that question. I don't think it was in reference to Jack Service—I think it was with reference to the head of that group coming into the Embassy, and he just asked me the question, whether they were to have access to the files. The answer was "No," that if they wanted any information from the Embassy they could talk to either the political officer there or to the counselor or to me, and if we had anything we could give them that was going to be helpful we would give it to them, but they didn't have free access to the files. As a matter of fact, Jack Service didn't have free access to all the files at any time. My counselor and I had our confidential files—I mean our secret files, if you want to make a classification. Jack may have been instrumental in writing some of those, but they were kept by us, and there were only two of us that had it.

Q. Yes. Now, in that connection one of the charges made by General Hurley against Mr. Service, and, presumably, against George Atcheson, and others, was that they disclosed to the Chinese Communists classified information, information concerning American policy. In particular, General Hurley has charged that a memorandum that Mr. Service wrote in October 1944 was shown to the Chinese Communists. I would like to ask you whether on the basis of your knowledge of Service, and your knowledge of the way your Embassy ran, whether you ever had any reason to believe that there was any possibility that Service might be engaged in such an operation?—A. No. Emphatically no.

Q. In view of the fact that George Atcheson's name has been so closely linked with Mr. Service's in the charges made by General Hurley, and in view of the further fact that George Atcheson is dead, I wonder if you would care to comment here on George Atcheson from the point of view of his activities in relation—whether he, for example, in your opinion, ever undertook to defeat American policy.—A. Oh, heavens! Anyone who makes a suggestion like that is just beneath contempt. Of course, on the one hand, I had with me, in my 39 years' service, Jack Service as the younger officer; on the other hand, the senior officer whom I had the greatest of confidence and trust in and who proved himself worthy of that confidence and trust and in my opinion was one of the outstanding senior officers in the Service was George Atcheson. Go into your efficiency records and you will find that I have said that, and no more loyal, patriotic American served in our Foreign Service than George Atcheson.

Q. I think it fair to say then you would regard such charges as inconceivable.—A. Absolutely inconceivable, no basis at all, a figment of an imagination which is seeking its own glorification, if you can follow that through.

Q. Very good, I would just like to ask one final question, Mr. Gauss: I wonder if you could tell the Board something about the general policy which you as Ambassador and your subordinate Foreign Service officers were expected to pursue in the matter of dealings with American press representatives in presenting them with information concerning political events in China which were known to the Embassy?—A. Well, during the period that I was Ambassador I never held press conferences, but any reputable representative of the press—American, even British—who wanted to come in and talk to me was always welcome. We gave them anything we had in the way of leads because they gave us information that they had in the way of leads. We never disclosed to them anything in the way of confidential or secret information, of course, but we did help them because we wanted the picture that came back here to be as accurate as we could have it, and I consider it is part of the duty of a chief of mission to try to keep press representatives on the track. Now, they would sometimes come in with wild ideas and you could explain the situation. We were never quoted and I don't think there was ever any abuse of any confidence that we gave any of those people when we talked to them. Now I say we never gave them secret information, but we could tell them what was going on and I know in many cases I sent them off on trips from Chungking down to Kunming, and suggested they would find a situation down there worth looking into and they went there and they did.

Q. Now in that connection, when you say "We never told them secret or confidential information," are you referring to what you would regard as subsequently secret information as distinguished from information which may be recorded in a document somewhere which has been stamped "secret" or "confidential"?—

A. I don't mean that type of information that was recorded in a document marked "secret" and "confidential," I mean information that came to us in strict confidence. For instance, unfortunately something I read in the white book, George Atcheson went over and talked to Sun Fo; Sun Fo made some comments there on Chiang Kai-shek and his failure to meet the situation. We would never tell that to the press, but I could get pressmen in who might be representing United Press or Associated Press and we would talk about a situation and I would tell them: "There is a dissident element operating in Yenan which is building up for a secession from the National Government; I think it would be a good idea for you to go down there and look into that."

Q. The report you had on that situation might very well be marked "secret" in terms of its transmission?—A. I even told Chiang Kai-shek that.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you ever have occasion to believe that Mr. Service was disclosing any information?—A. No, sir; no information. I had no indication that Mr. Service was ever disclosing any information, but I will tell you that a situation existed for months in which I was absolutely certain that everything we were sending into Washington that had any vital importance at all was immediately reported back to Chungking. I took occasion twice to make representations to Washington on that. In the first place, I think they traced the source; in the second place—

Q. What was that?—A. It stopped at the White House.

Q. This was information you had sent in from Chungking to Washington?—

A. Information that I or my military or naval attachés had sent in.

Q. Which in Washington was given to Chinese sources here or what?—

A. Which in Washington was given to sources which conveyed it to the Chinese. I had the wife of the premier, if you call him that, the president of the executive Yüan in China at Chungking, say: "We know what you are reporting to Washington."

Q. Those leaks were appearing here or were any of them, as far as you know, in China?—A. Those leaks were purely here, purely here, they could not have been in China, and the result of them, of course, when anything like that occurred was to simply close your source of information, so that in the end we had to be very careful in disclosing our source of information, and for that reason the information didn't have the value when it got here that it might have had if we had been able to say who had told us.

Q. Were you successful in getting action to stop the leaks here?—A. No, sir. The first case was one of suspicion, which I reported from out there, and I think there were in the Government at that time a lot of these people who were dogooders who said: "Now the Ambassador out here reports so-and-so; why I have got my friend who is Fu Man Chu over here in the Supply Mission and all you have got to do is sit down and talk to these people and they will straighten it out." I think it was that type of leak that first came.

In the second case, I think it was a personal relationship, which I have never been able to prove and which I believed existed, a personal relationship between a hireling of the Chinese Foreign Minister here and friends of his in the White House who didn't intend to give information by way of disclosure of secret information, but it was so easy talking amongst these people to get it out of them. Of course, that immediately went to T. V. Soong and after T. V. Soong left H. H. Kung and it was immediately out in Chungking. So for a time I was completely frustrated as to what I could send to Washington.

Q. Did you have any reason to suspect that information sent in by the Embassy was being communicated to other unauthorized sources beyond the Chinese?—A. No, no suggestion of that. Occasionally you would get a rather inkling in your talking perhaps with your British colleague that you had said something which had been mentioned, but that would be a normal sort of a situation, and perhaps you would even mention it yourself if he had asked you, or he would come toddling down and ask you about something which indicated, of course, it had been given through the Department. It was not a leak, it was a communication of information.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Did you allow the same liberties, discretion, and the like, to your political officers, sir, as you exercised yourself with regard to the handling of information with the press, as you just stated you handled it yourself?—A. No. I would with my counselor, but I don't think you would find that any of my political officers were in a position to give the full picture to the press. They might ask about it: "After all, I am going over to see so-and-so; do you mind if I mention so-and-so." Something to trail on, something to help while they were getting the other side of the picture or making inquiries. Now, often you could give them a report we had and ask them if we had anything on it that could help them. There was a certain amount of information that they could naturally give, but over-all, no.

Q. Were they specifically instructed as to how they were to handle themselves at that time, or did you leave it to their discretion?—A. Yes; I left it to their discretion. I never had any occasion to give any instructions. They were not to communicate to these people secret information that the Embassy had, but the whole proposition was we had a cut-out puzzle there and we were filling in pieces constantly and we might have this, that, and the other thing from a purely Chinese source, unofficial source, and their idea was to fill in all those crossword puzzles and those cut-out puzzles, and get the information if they could—an over-all picture was never given.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I wonder here, Mr. Gauss, if you may not be thinking on somewhat higher plain than possibly—at least what I was trying to inquire about. I understand what you have been describing is the extent to which you discussed the over-all—A. Over-all.

Q. The over-all political picture and political developments?—A. Yes.

Q. But, let us take down to a slightly lower level where it is a matter of more or less factual reporting on particular factual situations.—A. Yes.

Q. For example, let us suppose in the case of Service, let us suppose that he had had an interview with say Mao Tse-tung at a time when other newspapermen who happened to be in Yen-an also interviewed Mao Tse-tung. Would you have regarded it as improper for him to talk with members of the press about what Mao Tse-tung had said the Communist policies were in their general political programs, matters of that type, factual though no political character?—A. Are you speaking of an interview in which there were others present, newspapermen present?

Q. No. Let me suggest to you just the type of interview I have in mind. For example, you will recall at one point the newspaper people also went up to Yen-an.—A. Oh, yes; yes.

Q. Now let us suppose Mr. Service had an interview with Mao Tse-tung, in which Mao describes what the official Communist program is and what their policies with respect to this and that will be, and he does that in a private interview with Service. Later, he has a similar interview with a newspaperman, but there is a discussion of perfectly factual character about what the political program is.—A. Those sorts of things I don't think he would go out and inform the newspapermen of what his interview was with Mao Tse-tung. If he gave him anything in confidence he certainly wouldn't divulge it. But as a general proposition of what the Communist policy was in his discussions he might have some knowledge of it, he might mention it in his conversations with newspapermen of reputation and integrity.

Q. You wouldn't have regarded that as improper or exceeding the general discretion which you would expect him to exercise?—A. Oh, no; no.

Q. Or describing purely factual situations. I mean if he says there is a famine in Ho-nan or something of that sort, describing factual matters that he has observed you would regard that as—A. No. Generally—

Q. Appropriate to discuss with members of the press?—A. Oh, in a general way; yes. In a general way; yes.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN (to members of the Board). Any further questions.

Mr. ACHILLES. No.

Mr. STEVENS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Ambassador, very much. It has been very helpful. Nice of you to come in on a Saturday afternoon.

Mr. GAUSS. Oh, it is the best time for me. Good day.

(Mr. John S. Service testified in his own behalf as follows:)

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Now you have listed among the correspondents that you knew in Chungking Mr. and Mrs. Henry Luce, Ray Clapper, and Vincent Sheehan. Were there any other correspondents at that time that you recall seeing much of in Chungking?—A. Well, I listed these people as visitors who stayed only a short while. There were correspondents coming and going. I can't recall all of them now. There was Sonya Tamara I think of the Herald Tribune, Eric Sevareid—there were a number of people there with Time and Life who came and went. There was a man from one of the small magazines. There was a man named McEntire from the Reader's Digest.

Q. During the time you were in Chungking did you know a Chinese actress by the name of Val Chao?—A. Yes.

Q. During what period of time did you know her?—A. Early 1944 until the time I left China I think.

Q. Did she, to your knowledge, during the time that you knew her have any Soviet associates?—A. No; not at all that I know of.

Q. Did you ever discuss political matters with her?—A. Not in any detail, no; do you mean Chinese political matters?

Q. Yes.—A. No.

Q. Did you ever by any chance disclose to her any classified information?—A. Certainly not.

Q. After you went to Yenan, I believe you listed yesterday certain correspondents who came through there, one of their names I believe was Epstein of the New York Times.—A. Well, he was representing the New York Times on a sort of temporary basis during that trip. He wrote for the Allied Labor News and I think several publications, a number of Canadian newspapers, if I remember rightly. He was a man who had lived in China and had had various jobs with newspapers, and the news agencies in China and he wasn't a permanent member of the staff of any news organization that I remember, he was a local employee.

Q. Did he, to your knowledge, have any particular political bias?—A. Yes. He was leftist, but I discussed the question with him once about whether or not he was a Communist, and he insisted and assured me and gave a good many reasons why he was not a Communist.

Q. What was your own opinion of his views?—A. I accepted his statement that he was not a Communist.

Q. And I believe you mentioned Guenther Stein of the Christian Science Monitor, is that it, as being there?—A. That's right.

Q. And did you form any opinion of his political views?—A. I would have said that he was a very conservative person by nature.

Q. How much of him did you see while you were there?—A. Well, I saw a good deal of him up at Yenan because he was by far the most assiduous of the correspondents. He was a German originally, naturalized British at that time, and he had a Germanic thoroughness about him. When he interrogated a person he usually prepared a long list of questions beforehand and went through and tried to get all the information on that he could possibly get in the most laborious and methodical way. Dr. Stein was a useful source of news, and some of my memoranda here transmit long sections of his notes of interviews which he had had with Communist leaders before we arrived up there.

Q. He was already there when you arrived?—A. They arrived there several weeks before we did, and so they had already covered a great deal of the ground and the quickest way for me to get fairly comprehensive news was to forward the views these men had of their own news.

Q. How long was he there after you arrived?—A. I had no recollection of his departure. He may have been there until I left.

Q. And you saw a good deal of him during that full period?—A. Well, particularly during the first weeks I was in Yenan. After that, the correspondents were living some distance from us. During the first 2 weeks we were billeted next door to each other, one compound next to another compound.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. We are talking here about the 1944 period?—A. That's right. Subsequently, we were moved over nearer to the Communist military headquarters and the correspondents were about 2 or 3 miles away. In Chungking it is hard to make a guess—I suppose I may have seen Stein once a week or something like that. Just as I saw most of the other correspondents. The correspondents I saw most of in Chungking and knew best were Brooks Atkinson, and Teddy White.

Q. Was Stein considered a reputable correspondent?—A. Very. He had unusually good contacts with some of the more important Chinese leaders like T. V. Soong. In fact, Guenther Stein had been an employee of T. V. Soong's at one time.

Q. Did you ever give him any classified information?—A. I never gave him any; no.

Q. Would you say that your views in the early days that you were at Yenau were influenced by information which he gave you?—A. No, I wouldn't say they were. In fact, I differed from Guenther Stein on a good many points, and I believed that he was far more willing to accept what he was told than I was. I criticized his book very severely because so much of it is just repetition of things that he was told.

Q. On what points, if you can recall, did you differ with him?—A. Well, chiefly that he took a very idealistic view of the Chinese Communists and I didn't.

Q. How do you mean "idealistic"?—A. He was the man who made the statement, I think, that "this is the most modern place in China," and he would not agree that they were actually far-seeing, shrewd planners of what they were going to do. He would not accept the fact, which I knew to be a fact, that they had made their preparations in 1937 for the coming war and had foreseen the opportunity that would exist for them to expand their control of the guerrilla areas in north China.

Q. Was he inclined to consider them agrarian reformers as distinct from Marxist Communists?—A. That is such an oversimplification that it is hard to analyze—I mean hard to reply to. He certainly didn't think they were merely agrarian reformers, and he had agreed, he recognized the theoretical Marxist basis, but he was not inclined to accept the idea that they had planned it this way and that this was a long-range program toward control of China. His attitude is a little bit like Agnes Smedley. You haven't read Agnes Smedley's book on China?

BOARD MEMBERS. No.

A. She makes some sort of a statement that these were the most Christian people she had ever met. Guenther Stein was stricken with the sweetness and light theory about the Chinese Communists.

Q. At that time had you ever met Philip Jaffe?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you recall ever hearing Stein speak of Jaffe at that time?—A. No, I never heard Stein speak of him at all. I don't think that Stein had ever been in the United States at that point; I don't know.

Q. At that time had you ever known Mark Gayn?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or Lieutenant Roth?—A. We are speaking of the first period I was in Yenau?

Q. The first period.—A. No, I had never heard of Gayn or Lieutenant Roth.

Q. You had not heard Stein speak of those names?—A. No.

Q. When you reported to General Stilwell, as I recall, you had been personal friends in Peiping before?—A. I would say acquaintances rather than friends.

Q. Acquaintances. During the time that you were attached to General Stilwell, was he actually in the theater most of the time, or his command covered India as well at that point?—A. That's correct, his command covered something like 4,000 or 5,000 miles from India through China. He spent very little of his time in Chungking. More of his time in India and Burma than he did in Chungking.

Q. How much of the time, would you say during which you were under his command, were you physically in the same place in Chungking or elsewhere in the theater?—A. Two months out of fifteen, perhaps.

Q. How were your relations with him?—A. Very friendly and informal, but I saw him very seldom. I was not bound by military regulations. If I wished to see him, I could go directly to him. He called me "Jack," had me at his house once or twice. It was not a military relationship—a friendly one.

Q. Did you ever have occasion to differ with him particularly on policy questions?—A. None at all.

Q. After he was replaced by General Wedemeyer, how much of the time were you and General Wedemeyer physically in the same place?—A. I arrived in Chungking on January 18, 1945, and General Wedemeyer left Chungking for the United States on February 19, 1945. I believe that he spent practically all of that month in Chungking, so that I was in the same city with him for 1 month.

Q. Had you ever known him previously?—A. I had never met him before.

Q. And about how much did you see of him personally?—A. Considering the short period, I saw more of him than I had seen of General Stilwell. General Wedemeyer wanted to use the political officers in a different way really. He used me for drafting of a number of communications, political or semi-political nature. He also made arrangements for me to attend the regular headquarters briefing sessions each morning, and I attended several meetings in headquarters, something which I had not done very much under General Stilwell.

Q. How would you describe your relations with him, I mean, primarily official or personal or friendly or—A. They were more official. They were on a friendly basis, again quite an informal basis, but without the background of friendship that I had with General Stilwell.

Q. Were there any pronounced differences between General Wedemeyer's views and General Stilwell's views?—A. I didn't discuss the matters with General Wedemeyer well enough to make a thorough answer to that. There certainly was a difference in circumstances. General Wedemeyer was more concerned in getting along with the Chinese. He didn't want—nobody at that time wanted any more trouble. The Stilwell recall had caused a good deal of bitterness and hard feelings and the general attitude was to try and patch up the harm that had been done. So that the attitude of headquarters was very much more friendly and cooperative as far as the Chinese were concerned. At the same time the situation in China had changed a great deal. The Japanese drive had ground to a halt about the first of December 1944, and they had overextended themselves, and apparently were being pressed in other places so as to abandon any further attempts to capture Chungking, and the heat was off. The hump had been built up at this time so something like 100,000 tons of supplies were coming in a month, far more than had ever come in under General Stilwell, and it was an era of attempts on both sides at cooperation. To a far greater extent than before the army and the political branch of the Embassy were pulling together and General Wedemeyer recognized General Hurley and the Ambassador as the President's representatives sent out for a special purpose to negotiate difference between the two parties and try to bring about unification of the armies, and he was not pursuing an independent line.

Q. Did you ever have any pronounced differences of opinion with General Wedemeyer?—A. None whatever.

Q. You say that General Wedemeyer was inclined to take his guidance from General Hurley on policy questions?—A. Yes, he recognized General Hurley as the boss really as far as the question of negotiations between the two parties went, and of any efforts to utilize or try to utilize the Communist forces.

Q. As I recall, your only personal contact with General Hurley in 1944 was the evening you spent with him on your way back to the United States?—A. That's correct.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Up to that time you had no differences with General Hurley?—A. None whatever, and even on that occasion we had no differences, we agreed completely.

Q. When did you have your first difference with General Hurley?—A. I don't know whether we could dignify it by the term "difference" with him. After I returned to Chungking in January 1945 I received word that General Hurley wanted to see me. I presented myself at his office; he was not—he did not have his offices in the Embassy—and on that occasion he had with him a copy of my memorandum No. 40, Document 193. He discussed it with me, told me that he was there to uphold Chiang Kai-shek and the Central Government, and that he would do all of the policy recommending. I don't think you want me to go into great detail.

Q. No; I just want to get the occasion.—A. He told me on that occasion that if I interfered with him in any way, which I took to mean making any policy recommendations at all, he would break me.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. That was on what date?—A. It would be about January 20, sir, I don't know the exact date.

Q. 1945?—A. 1945.

Q. It was on your return. And did you have occasion between then and your return to the United States in April to make any policy recommendations?—A. Yes, sir; the memorandum which Mr. Ludden and I prepared jointly on February 14, our Document 204, is a policy recommendation.

Questions by Mr. SNOW:

Q. That was at the General's request, wasn't it?—A. Yes, sir.
Mr. RHETTS. General Wedemeyer's request.

Questions by Mr. SNOW:

Q. General Wedemeyer's, I see.—A. The telegram which I helped to draft, Mr. Acheson's telegram of February 26 is, of course, a policy recommendation.

Q. And that was after General Hurley left?—A. Yes. But you asked me between January and April.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes.

Mr. RHETTS. General Hurley was only temporarily out of China at that time.

Mr. ACHILLES. What, so far as you recall, were the nature of General's Hurley's instructions—that no one was to go to Yen-an again?

A. I have no knowledge of any such instructions.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the question?

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. What was the nature of General Hurley's instructions—that no one should proceed to Yen-an?—A. He could not give any such instructions except concerning his own staff.

Q. No authority to give such instructions to General Wedemeyer or people under his command?—A. He could ask General Wedemeyer to issue such instructions but military personnel and the accredited correspondents in the theater were under the army control, and General Hurley could not issue instructions directly to them. He could ask, as I say, General Wedemeyer, but I know of no such instructions; standing instructions in the military theater are that you don't travel on army planes without orders.

Q. I think that he did issue such instructions and that he was highly incensed to find out that you had proceeded to Yen-an at a later date.—A. Shall I describe the conditions of my going to Yen-an, sir?

Q. First, I am trying to find out anything we can about such instructions as he may have given—you knew of no such instructions?—A. I knew of no such instructions.

Q. You knew of no such instructions. Would you tell us then of the circumstances of your trip to Yen-an?—A. Now, we knew in Chungking that the Communist Party congress was about to convene in Yen-an. It was the first congress they had had since 1934, I believe—1935. In view of the situation in China we expected it to be a particularly important meeting. I had spoken once to General Wedemeyer in February about going to Yen-an and he said: "Yes, we want you to go. I know that State Department wants you to go, but as long as General Hurley is here I do not think it wise. Later on it will be all right." He did not want to have any argument with General Hurley at that time. There had already been several frictions between the two of them. As I say, about the first of March we expected the congress was about to convene. I talked to Mr. Acheson, the Chargé d'Affaires, and he agreed that of all the times to be in Yen-an for political reporting this was it. So I wrote a memorandum on that to the Chief of Staff, indicating request for orders.

Miss PETTIS. Two hundred and twelve was the number.

A. I wrote a memorandum to the Chief of Staff, General Gross. This memorandum first had the approval of the Chief of G-2, and had the approval of Mr. Acheson, suggesting the desirability of my proceeding to Yen-an. It was approved by the Chief of Staff, official Army travel orders were issued to me, and I proceeded about March 8 by Army plane to Yen-an. Can we insert this in the transcript?

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a copy?

A. It is a copy of my memorandum. I, unfortunately, do not have the actual orders. I am told they are not in Washington. They were theater orders and those are not forwarded to Washington. I have copies in my personal possession among my effects—those are not available to me at the present time.

Mr. RHETTS. I hand the Board Document 212, which is a copy of Mr. Service's request for Army orders travel to Yen-an dated March 4, 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be put in the transcript, if you would like.

Mr. RHETTS. Again, this is one of those things of which we do not have copies. We can have it put into the transcript.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a secret document—any harm in that?

A. Nothing has been declassified.

Mr. ACHILLES. I don't think that's necessary. I have read it and found it to be as described.

The CHAIRMAN. So that we do not need it to be made an exhibit.

Mr. RHETTS. You would like me to simply show that it has been exhibited to the Board. Of course, this is amongst the papers, all of which were introduced into the record this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; it is included in that list of papers.

A. This is in the 101 to 227 series.

The CHAIRMAN. O. K.

A. I think the only point that needs emphasis is that I went to Yenan under Army orders after the most complete consultations with the Chief of Staff personally, with the Embassy, and with G-2.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was General Hurley at this time?

A. He was in the United States.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Now, General Wedemeyer had returned to the United States with him?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did I understand you to refer a few minutes ago to differences which had arisen between General Hurley and General Wedemeyer?—A. We are getting into a field there that is still classified material.

Q. To your knowledge, did your recommendations to General Wedemeyer have anything to do with his disagreement with General Hurley?—A. No, sir; the disagreement took place while I was away from Chungking. If we look at the chronology on page 4 starting with December 19 in the right-hand column and going down through January 14 in the right-hand column, I suggest that the Board might wish to request some of that material.

Mr. RHETTS. Perhaps we could merely make the suggestion to the Board that it might seek to obtain through its own channels information bearing on this point which we understand to be available in the records of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Referring to what?

Mr. RHETTS. The subject matter of Mr. Achilles' inquiry here.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Are those documents in the State Department's records or the War Department's records?—A. State Department's records.

Q. I think it might be useful for the Board to take a look at those documents.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

(Discussion off the record.)

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Going back on the record again, the Board will endeavor to obtain those and examine them. You say this disagreement between General Hurley and General Wedemeyer was not due to any recommendations of yours?—A. Absolutely not.

Q. I think that's all I have at this point.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Stevens). Have you some questions?

Mr. STEVENS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, no further questions on this point. Do you have some questions you want to ask on this?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, General, there are two points I would like to cover. The first is a question that grew out of a line of questioning by General Snow of Mr. Service earlier in the day. General Snow referred to certain interviews with Mr. Service conducted by the Interview Section of Military Intelligence Service in Washington, at dates not specified, and General Snow inquired of Mr. Service, as I recall it, whether in any of those interviews he, Service, had indicated that he regarded the Chinese Communists, as I recall the phrase was something like "democratic farmers" or, in other words, the implication being that they were essentially democratic—liberal democratic groups and not true Marxian Communists. In that connection, I should like to offer for inclusion in the transcript at this point Document No. 20-1, which is an excerpt from the Congressional Record for October 19, 1949, and, in particular, the remarks of Congressman Judd at the time he first made known to the world the contents of Document 193. At that time he took occasion to criticize Mr.

Service's use of the word "democratic" democracy in connection with the Chinese Communists.

(Remarks of Congressman Judd, Congressional Record, October 19, 1949, p. 15283)

"The memorandum repeats the Communist propaganda slogan 'democratic' or 'undemocratic' eight times. It portrays the Communists in China as more democratic than the government—as more willing to cooperate with us, and equates Chiang Kai-shek's reluctance to arm the Communists and take them into the Government with unwillingness to cooperate with ourselves."

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. Now, I should like to ask you, Mr. Service, if you can explain to the Board the context and the specialized meaning, if any, that the terms "democratic" and "democracy" had in relation to the Chinese Communists in China during the period in question.—A. To explain fully what I meant would require quite a dissertation on China in the background and particularly on conditions of government in the Kuomintang-controlled areas. When I and some other reporters were saying that the Communists were democratic, or more democratic our yardstick, of course, was the conditions in the rest of China; none of us, certainly never at any time said they had a developed democracy or a complete democracy. They had made a start at the very lowest level of village and county, smaller than county, district level. In Document 182, which transmits a memorandum which I drafted on September 4, 1944, on the subject of the growth of the new fourth army I say:

"The conclusion, therefore, seems justified that the peasants support, join, and fight with the Communist armies because they have been convinced that the Communists are fighting for their interests and because the Communists have created this conviction by producing some tangible benefits for the peasants.

"These benefits must be improvement of the social, political, or economic conditions of the peasants, whatever the exact nature of this improvement it must be in the broader sense of the term as the serving of the interests of the majority of the people toward democracy."

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES :

Q. Were you at that time aware of the Soviet Communist use of the words "Soviet democracy" as something to describe their own system?—A. Yes.

Q. And in your use of those words how were you applying it in the case of the Chinese Communists? That is, were you referring to them as democratic in the American sense, or in the Chinese sense, or the Russian sense?—A. Since you put the question in those terms I would say in the Chinese sense. It is certainly not American, and it was an improvement of what I conceived to be the Russian sense, and in my fairly extensive study of the development of Soviet control of their areas in my Document No. 183 transmitting a memorandum which I drafted on September 10, 1944, entitled "The Development of Communist Political Control on a Guerrilla Basis" in a report, incidentally, which was rated excellent by the Department, I go into considerable detail to show that the use of democratic methods in the very lowest echelons where they have direct contact with the peasants and people hasn't hampered in any way the Communist control at the top. In that respect it might be considered to approximate the Communist Russian definition of democracy as perhaps used in the satellite countries, although those examples were not in existence at that time.

Q. But the system was one, was it not, of rigorous control from the top?—A. On the higher levels, yes. You had party control and the party was the strongest influence; however, they went to great lengths to get other groups into the Government.

Q. But in the Communist areas did the people enjoy any political democracy with respect to their choice of rulers or were they subject to direct control from the top?—A. On the local level they had far more choice than they had ever had before—the village governments, the local organizations.

Q. (to the Chairman). Do you have any questions?

The CHAIRMAN. You have finished. No. (To Mr. Rhettts.) You had another question, did you?

Mr. RHETTTS. Whenever you have finished I would like to pursue this a little further.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Would you elaborate a little bit on your last answer, that is, when you say they did enjoy political rights on the lowest level will you describe what they did enjoy, what officials did they elect, and how did it work out?—A. The most exact way of answering the question, of course, is the text of this paper (Doc. No. 183).

Q. Very well, why don't you read from portions of it?

The CHAIRMAN. Is the paper in evidence?

Mr. RHETTS. It is one of the 101 to 227 series, which is in evidence but has not been put into the transcript.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Would you like to read a portion of that into the transcript?—A. I can read portions of it.

Q. Is this a classified document?—A. Yes, sir. It is declassified.

Q. You may read a portion into the transcript, if you wish.—A. Shall I identify it?

Q. Yes, identify the paper.—A. This is an excerpt from document 183, which is dispatch 3022 from the Embassy at Chungking transmitting a memorandum prepared by me at Yen-an on September 10, 1944, entitled "The Development of Communist Political Control in Communist Guerrilla Bases."

Mr. ACHILLES. What you are reporting on is a statement of announced Communist policies, is that it, or of actual practices?

A. Not only announced policies but our observations of them after a period of almost 2 months in the Communist areas.

Q. And according to your observation these policies were being carried out?—A. Yes, sir.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. RHETTS. Let's treat this like another one of those documents and put the whole thing in.

(Mr. Rhett submitted Doc. 183 for insertion in the transcript as follows:)

EMBASSY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

No. 3022.

Subject: Transmitting Report on Development of Communist Political Control in Communist Guerrilla Bases.

The Honorable THE SECRETARY OF STATE,

Washington 25, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a copy of a report (No. 26,¹ September 10, 1944) entitled "The Development of Communist Political Control in the Guerrilla Bases," prepared by Mr. John S. Service, Second Secretary of Embassy on detail to General Stilwell's Headquarters, who is now in Yen-an, Shensi (seat of the Chinese Communist regime) as a member of the United States Army Observer Section.

A summary of Mr. Service's report will be found in the opening paragraph thereof. The report constitutes a comprehensive and revealing account of Communist political and administrative policies and measures and accordingly seems to merit careful scrutiny.

In connection with this general question, it would seem only fair to observe that a good many Chinese, whether Kuomintang officials or civilians, take issue with the thesis that the Chinese Communist Party is democratic or that genuine democracy is being practiced in the Communist-controlled areas. A recent example is to be found in the editorial columns of the influential Ta Kung Pao which, in commenting on the scene at Yen-an, charged the Chinese Communist Party with possessing "almost carte blanche powers over all Party, political and mili-affairs" (see enclosure to the Embassy's despatch 2856, August 9, 1944). For what is probably a typical Kuomintang point of view of the "democracy" of the Chinese Communists, reference is made to the enclosure to the Embassy's despatch 2063, September 15, 1944.

Respectfully yours,

C. E. GAUSS.

[Confidential]

Report No. 26.

U. S. ARMY OBSERVER SECTION, APO 879.

September 10, 1944.

Subject: The Development of Communist Political Control in the Guerrilla Bases.
To: Commanding General, Fwd, Ech, USAF-CBI, APO 879.

Summary. Communist influence predominates in the guerrilla bases because the Communists took the lead in establishing the governments, because there has been no important organized political opposition within the areas, and because the Communists have been supported by the peasants and liberals. The Communists have used their influence in a democratic way and to further democratic ends. End of Summary.

1. The Chinese Communist Party has overwhelming political influence in the various guerrilla bases. In effect, this influence amounts to control. Although the governments of these bases are nominally independent of each other, their form of organization, and their policies and administrative programs, are all similar. Furthermore these policies are identical with those of the Communist Party.

It is sometimes suggested that this fact of Communist control is a refutation of Communist claims of democracy. Considering the history, political development, and present situation of these bases, I do not believe that this criticism is valid.

2. The political history of the guerrilla bases has been discussed at length with a number of Communist leaders. These include:

LIU Shao-ch'-----Member of the Political Bureau, Communist Party.

LIU Pai-ch'u-----Chairman of the Shen-Kan-Ning Border Region Government.

NIEH Jung-chen----Commander of the Shansi-Hopei-Chahar Military Region (General NIEH played a leading part in the establishment of the government of the Shansi-Hopei-Chahar Border Region, which is identical in extent with the Military District).

CH'EN Yi-----Acting Commander of the New Fourth Army. Political Commissar of the Shantung Military District.

YANG Hsin-feng----Chairman of the Government of the Shansi-Hopei-Honan-Shantung Border Regions. (At the outbreak of the war Dr. Yang was a professor in the National Normal University at Peiping and a member of the National Salvationist Group. He was a leader of the first popular resistance in Central Hopei. He joined the Communist Party in 1939).

3. From these talks it appears that the political development in the different bases has followed a generally similar pattern. I have therefore attempted to give a generalized account of this development which will fit all of the bases.

There have of course been minor differences from base to base. In Shen-Kan-Ning there was a Soviet-type government established several years before the war; even after the government was reorganized in accordance with the United Front agreement, the Kuomintang never made any attempt to set up its Party organization. Shansi-Hopei-Chahar was set up at a very early stage of the war when there was still some degree of Kuomintang-Communist cooperation; some Kuomintang Party Organization was maintained and there has been relatively greater Kuomintang participation than in other bases. In Shantung and the areas under the New Fourth Army, the Kuomintang attempted for a while to maintain its own separate governments; the Kuomintang therefore regarded the Communist governments as illegal and has never been willing to allow participation as a Party.

4. The political development of the Communist bases has been, in general, along the following lines.

There had never, even before the war, been much political progress in the area which has come under the influence of the Communist Party. All of it is rural. Much of it is mountainous, isolated, and backward in every respect.

Shansi, Shantung, and several other sections were "warlord satrapies" where the Kuomintang had never been able to develop a widespread and effective organization. What formal Kuomintang organization did exist in all these northern provinces was expelled by Japanese pressure in 1935 (by one clause of the Ho-Umetzu Agreement). In none of them had the Kuomintang, which was (a) chiefly Southern and Central Chinese and (b) tied to the large cities, established itself on a broad base among the rural population. And in none of these provinces had there been permitted the development of any other political party. Political control had always been from above, by small groups; there was no political foundation for democracy.

As the Japanese Army advanced through North China at the beginning of the war, most of the provincial and local governments collapsed. The officials and leading Kuomintang members—usually the same men—fled south with the Central Government troops. Many of the wealthy landlords also fled south, or took refuge in the large cities where there were foreign Concessions or which, even under Japanese occupation, were relatively quiet. North China, outside of the large Japanese-occupied cities, became a political void.

The Communist Armies rapidly overran these areas in their westward advance during late 1937 and 1938 which extended from Shensi to the sea. They came in behind the Japanese into this political vacuum. Some areas they had to fight for, but many fell into their hands because the Japanese had ignored them or had passed on in their swift southern advance which they hoped would defeat the Central Government and bring an early end to the war.

After occupation it was necessary that organized governments be set up to administer these areas and to enable them to serve as supporting bases for the Communist armies. The Political Department of the 8th Route Army (in other words, the Communist Party) set about this task as rapidly as possible. Intensive propaganda and indoctrination of the peasants could create support for the Army's government. But it could not immediately produce leaders. What local government and Kuomintang leaders there once had been had mostly left. The influential local citizens (landlords and gentry) had either fled (the Communist name frightened them into continuing this even after the immediate Japanese danger was passed), or those who did remain were dubious of Communist promises and skeptical that resistance against the Japanese had any hope of success. So these people cautiously remained in the background.

The only important, politically conscious, and experienced group that the Communists found in the areas and willing to join them were large numbers of liberals and intellectuals. Most of these were university professors and students from the great educational center of Peiping. Since the student demonstrations there in December 1935, they had been demanding resistance against Japan. In the first great tide of war enthusiasm they had left Peiping and other cities ahead of the Japanese occupation and gone into the countryside to organize popular resistance. Most of these groups had stayed behind after the Government and its defeated armies fled south. But they were not organized, and were operating individually or in small groups with whatever following their eloquence could attract.

A few of these people were Communists. A larger number were nominally Kuomintang members. Many belonged to no party. But the great majority of them were strongly liberal and in favor of the Communist plan of people's guerrilla warfare based on democracy. This was, in fact, what they were already actively trying to start. The need of coordination and the organization of governments which could serve as bases was obvious. Most of these groups therefore willingly—by inclination and by the logic of circumstances—accepted Communist leadership and joined with them on a United Front basis.

The first governments were thus mainly composed of these two elements, the Communists and these unorganized liberals, with the addition of the few influential local citizens who remained in the regions and could be persuaded to cooperate. These cooperating local elements were also liberal in tendency, as would be indicated by the fact that they had not fled and were nondefeatist enough to believe, in this gloomy and uncertain time, in the possibility of resistance.

The "democratic" nature of these first governments was "confirmed" by the followers of the Communist armies and these liberal groups and by numerous mass meetings organized by them, which often went through the gesture of voting (by acclamation) for the government which had been set up.

The liberals were very useful in this early stage for providing the bulk of the immediately needed administrative officials and hsien magistrates. As democratic machinery was not yet set up, they were appointed to these posts by the government, or in very newly occupied areas by the political officers of the Army (who among many other duties fulfill the function of our Army's civil-government officers).

Most of the partisan bands which had gathered around the liberals were absorbed into the Communist Army; this was one important source of their rapid growth in this early stage of the war.

The Communists were not only the leaders in setting up these governments; they were also the only group ready with a complete and well-thought-out program. They were preparing for a long war and had determined that they would fight behind the enemy lines with guerrilla tactics. Mao Tse-tung's famous booklet, Protracted Warfare, was published at this time. (The broader question of the motives behind these Communist tactics, of choosing a theater where they could be separated and independent of the Kuomintang and develop warfare on a democratic basis, is outside the scope of this discussion.)

In brief, the Communist plan was the following: The apathetic peasant had to be aroused by convincing him that he had something immediate and concrete to fight for. It was also necessary to create a well-rounded, productive, self-sufficient base that could survive being cut off from the cities. This demanded the support of all classes and the return and cooperation of the landlords, local capitalists, handicraft entrepreneurs, and merchants. These conditions dictated moderate policies. Even if there had not been the United Front pledges to the Central Government, extreme policies would frighten away what little local capital existed and leave the base economically disorganized and unable to support the Army. Politically it was also desirable to bring all classes into unified resistance and to prevent the possibility of division by the Japanese. The most effective measure as far as the farmer was concerned was the reduction of rents and interest. But this reduction was to be moderate and limited; and the government would protect the interests of the landlord by guaranteeing the payment of these reduced rates. Private enterprise was guaranteed non-interference and was offered assistance to increase production. Thus the fears of the landlord-merchant group would be calmed. Finally democracy would be instituted. This would interest all groups in joining the government, through the democratic process, in order to protect or advance their own interests in such matters as rent and interest reduction and taxation.

The Communist leaders stress the importance and precedence of these measures: first and basic, limited rent-interest reduction to win the active support of the peasants, who are the bulk of the population; second, democratic self-government to bring all classes, particularly the landlord-merchants, into active participation and hence support of the government. This conception of the importance of democracy as a means of obtaining the participation and support of the capitalist groups is interesting and significant in the study of present and probable future Communist policies. They have no illusions that China can hope to build a proletarian state in anything like the near future.

This Communist program was logical and, objectively viewed in the light of the circumstances, reasonably fair to all. Even though it was only carrying out unenforced laws as far as rent reduction was concerned, it might have been opposed by the landlord-conservative (or even the orthodox Kuomintang) groups. But there were not at the time—for reasons described above—important participants in the governments. The liberal groups, without any strong organization or alternative program of their own, followed the Communist lead. The original Communist program was therefore adopted by these impromptu coalition governments as they were established, first in Shansi-Hopei-Chahar and later in other areas.

The program worked out as intended. As the government became well established and showed ability to withstand Japanese attack, and as the peasants through education (by the Communists) in their new democratic powers began to exhibit interest in more drastic rent-interest reduction and progressive taxation, the landlord-capitalist group was driven to active participation to preserve its own interests.

Within 1 year most villages were under elected governments. By 1939-40 the democratic election of hsien governments was general. And by 1942 most of the bases were governed by popularly elected Peoples Political Councils.

In all of these grades of government there is substantial, though not large, representation of both the land-lord capitalist and peasant-laborer groups. This landlord-capitalist participation has been rewarded (by means of Communist support) with some reduction of the early high tax rates on large incomes, and more extensive government assistance to private productive enterprise.

This institution of political democracy has not, however, been accompanied by political development along definite party forms.

The landlord-capitalist element has formed pressure groups without unified party organization or leadership. Their main object has been merely the preservation of their own interests.

The Kuomintang has not established itself in an organized manner because (1) it had no strong original foundation in the regions and (2) the central Kuomintang authorities (Chungking) have generally taken the attitude that these are "traitor areas" and "illegal" governments. When the Kuomintang has tried to come back into some of these areas, it has done so with the backing of military force and government mandates abolishing the governments already set up and functioning. Such was the case, for instance, when the Central Government sent LU Chung-lin into Hopei to reestablish the Hopei Provincial Government. There seems to be no evidence that the Kuomintang has ever sought participation in these governments in a democratic, cooperative manner. Its attitude has been "all or nothing." The one exception is in the Shansi-Hopei-Chahar region. Its government was given recognition by the Central Government in January 1938. The recognition was later apparently rescinded (the attempt to set up a conflicting government under LU Chung-lin in Hopei would appear ipso facto to have been a cancellation of its authority) and its present status of legality vis-à-vis the Kuomintang and the Central Government is obscure. At the beginning a regular, recognized Kuomintang organization was set up. This still remains in existence, although the obscurity of its legality in Chungking's eyes is similar to that of the government. In any event, this Kuomintang branch has never found wide support and is reportedly in a languishing condition. Shansi-Hopei-Chahar is the only area in which there is a Kuomintang organization.

The increasingly politically conscious peasants have tended to gravitate toward the Communist Party. This can be regarded as natural. In the first place they regard the Communists as responsible for setting up the bases and for the practical improvement in their social-political-economic condition. In the second place, there is no other party with anything to offer the peasants or actively seeking their support. Even if the Kuomintang were active in these areas, it could give little practical attraction to the peasant.

It must, of course, be recognized that the Communists have controlled all political indoctrination and propaganda and have not discouraged this tendency of the peasants to regard them as their benefactors. Furthermore, the Communist Party has actively expanded its Party organization in its newly won areas and has established branches down to the villages. Of the approximately 1,000,000 present members of the Party, it is claimed that more than one-half are peasants. It is reasonable to assume that most of these are in North China.

The only other important group, the liberal-intellectuals, have also failed to set up a separate party organization. They have remained in close support and cooperation with the Communists. Some have actually joined the Communist Party. But it seems that this tendency is not at present encouraged—since the overwhelming domination of the Communist Party is something that the Communists, for political reasons described below, wish to avoid—and that many of those outside the Communist Party might as well, as far as thinking goes, be considered in it.

Even without party organization or their own following, this liberal-intellectual group has remained politically important as holders of elective offices. Reasons for this can be assumed to be (1) the shortage of men in the areas with their qualifications of education and experience and (2) during their first appointed terms they generally made a good impression on the people by their patriotic enthusiasm, democratic leanings, and honesty. Thus many of them have continued to hold posts as magistrates and high administrative officials.

The actual situation, therefore is that no strong opposition has developed to the Communists and they have remained the undisputably dominant political factor.

This dominance tended to become so pronounced that in 1940 the Communist Party decided, as a purely Party measure, to restrict itself to one-third of the membership of any elective government body, and to advocate that the other two-thirds be divided between Kuomintang and nonparty members. The one-third limitation on the Communists was a maximum, not a minimum, limit. It was hoped that this would improve the all-round representative character of the governments, thus helping to keep the support of the numerically small landlord-merchant groups and countering Kuomintang charges of monopoly and violation of the United Front.

This self-restriction of the Communist Party has not had much effect on its leading role. It generally elects its solid one-third (in a few areas it actually continues to hold slightly over this ratio in the Peoples Political Councils). The Kuomintang representation is made up of individuals who were former officials or Kuomintang members but now have no Party machine back of them and are usually of liberal tendencies. It is usually difficult to find enough of these persons, with suitable qualifications, who are willing to join the government: with the present situation between the two parties, a "regular" Kuomintang member knows that he jeopardizes his Party standing and will be accused by Chungking of being a "Communist" if he participates in an "illegal" "Communist" government. As a result the Kuomintang (it would be more correct to say "nominal Kuomintang") representation in most governments is below the sought-for one-third. The remainder of the government is then made up of a few representatives of the landlord-merchant groups (who may also find some representation through the Kuomintang members) and a larger number of the liberal-intellectuals.

The typical composition, then, is one-third Communists, plus a few liberal Kuomintang (or ex-Kuomintang) members, plus a large number of liberal-intellectuals, and finally a relatively small group of the landlord-merchant group.

With this strong representation and a predominantly liberal and sympathetic majority, it is not surprising that the Communists have been the chief initiators of the policies followed by the base governments. Furthermore, since the Communist Party holds the same dominant position in each government, and since it is the one connecting link between these separate governments, it has secured the adoption by all of them of its program.

5. Related to this development of predominant Communist influence in the guerrilla bases are a number of other factors which should be mentioned, even though detailed study of some will be left for following reports.

(a) The Communists have kept their program moderate and within the limits that the liberal-Kuomintang and liberal-intellectual groups affiliated with it would continue to support. This has promoted unity. It has also increased and held support. It might also be said that it has robbed any important potential opposition of any issues.

(b) The Communist program has introduced democracy and improved the economic condition of the great majority of the population. This is the first experience the people have had of these benefits, and their political experience has not had a chance yet to go beyond the stage of being grateful. Nobody opposes Santa Claus.

(c) The Communists at times have played a balancing role. In areas where the landlords were too successful in gaining control over local governments, either through the old awe in which they were held by the peasants or their power over their tenants, the Communists have stepped up their assistance to the people through indoctrination in democracy and active support of the people's organizations. On the other hand, in areas where the peasants "felt their oats" and used their new political powers to monopolize the local governments, the Party used its influence to obtain the election of landlord representatives. Wherever used this policy makes grateful friends. And the Communists admit that when they use their influence to aid the election of a landlord, it is a progressive landlord—in other words, another supporter of their policies.

(d) The Communists have accepted and incorporated into their own program some proposals put forth by other groups. An example was the policy to "refine the Army and reduce the Government" (generally translated as "rationalization"), which was originally introduced into the Shen-Kan-Ning Peoples Political Council by a landlord representative. The Communists make much of this willingness to accept suggestions from others as an indication of their democracy. And they explain incorporation into their own program as the most expeditious and sure means, since they are the only party to all governments, of having these improvements universally put into effect. There is a great deal of merit in these arguments. But it must be recognized that the Communist Party, in a very smart and hard-headed political way, gets the credit for these improvements because the original introducer is not widely known and soon forgotten and it becomes known as another item of the Party program.

(e) The Communist control of propaganda has already been mentioned. This propaganda, except in special instances, does not attack the Kuomintang or other groups. But it does tend to put these other groups in a bad light. And it invariably works to promote the Communist Party.

(f) Finally, the Army is the army of the Communists. This is important because the political effect of the 8th Route and New 4th Armies is tremendous. This effectiveness comes in several ways. The Political Department, which is used in indoctrination of the people, especially of newly occupied areas, is highly organized and experienced, and under wholly Communist leadership (contrary to the rest of the Army). But even greater than this direct effect is the example of the behavior and attitude of the army toward the people, its volunteer character, its completely different attitude of unity with the people, its high morale, and the fact that it fights.

6. I have attempted to show that the political control of the Communist Party in the guerrilla bases has developed from its leadership in establishing and holding these bases, the absence of strong opposition, the adoption of moderate, democratic policies which have benefited the great majority of the population, and political astuteness combined with control of propaganda and the influence of the Army. The policies of the Communist Party have been democratic, and there is little which, under the circumstances, can be called undemocratic in its methods.

The question may be asked whether the Communists would have been so democratic in method if they had been faced with stronger opposition. The question is hard to answer because there has never been a strong opposition willing to cooperate on a democratic basis. In the one area where the Kuomintang has an organization, it has been allowed its own newspaper and other democratic freedoms. But this opposition was weak. In areas where the Kuomintang came in with military force to oust the Communists, the Communists won out because they had the democratic support of the people. The Kuomintang did not have this support and was unable to obtain it. This fact, together with difficulties connected with the war, forced the Kuomintang to withdraw.

The next question is logically the future. I believe that the Communist influence with the people in the guerrilla bases is now so great, and rests on such a strong democratic basis, that the Communists will be willing to contest their political control there with any other party on a democratic basis; and that they will accordingly content themselves with democratic methods, including freedom of propaganda, provided that the other party or parties do the same.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. Now I take it then, Mr. Service, in using the word "democratic" you used it advisedly insofar as you were referring to the fact that in the Communist areas they had for the reasons you have outlined instituted measures bearing the formal characteristics of democracy at the very lowest levels of the administration of the areas they controlled?—A. That's correct.

Q. And am I not correct that in various of your reports, which have already been discussed here, in which you spoke of the growing strength of the Chinese Communists, you refer to this phenomenon as one of the sources of their strength?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But I take it also that you did not suggest that this type of "democracy" bears any resemblance to the completely developed type of democracy which we think about when we use the term in this country?—A. That's correct.

Q. Because of the fact that in the higher echelons of policy determination that remain firmly in the hands of the Communists themselves?—A. Yes.

Mr. RHETTS. Now I would like to turn to another matter. Yesterday the Board will recall that I read a short excerpt from a message from General Hurley for the eyes of the Secretary of State alone, dated January 31, 1945. At that time I explained that I did not then propose to put the entire document in the record because there were certain technical problems about it. The technical problems are these: This document has been declassified and it has been reproduced photostatically. For some reason, in the mechanical process of photostating, what is probably a page, or at least it is the concluding few paragraphs of General Hurley's telegram, simply didn't get fastened into this document.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they been since added?

Mr. RHETTS. I am convinced that it was the intention to have the entire thing reproduced. There are a few paragraphs that aren't here, but which do appear in another copy of the document which I have here.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. RHETTS. I should like at this time to introduce into the transcript document 321, which is a copy of a message from General Hurley for the eyes of the Secretary of State alone, dated January 31, 1945, together with supplemental comment on the telegram by the Embassy staff at Chungking.

The CHAIRMAN. No objections.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

Urgent (321)

(Following message is from Hurley for eyes of the Secretary of State alone:)
31 JANUARY 1945.

PREAMBLE

This Embassy is not repeat not equipped to make reports of the nature that I am now entering upon. The Embassy has but one stenographer. America has never heretofore attempted to use its good offices in actual negotiations to bring about a unification of the military forces of China. We have official personnel who have communicated with, observed and reported on the Communists but we have no personnel who have negotiated with the Communists for the unification of the Communist and National forces. For that reason we have no official personnel in the Embassy, except myself, prepared to make either decisions or reports on the subject which I am covering. I make this statement not as a criticism but as a statement of fact.

We are fighting a relentless enemy. That, in my opinion, justifies our action in attempting to unify the forces of China to help us defeat the enemy. A unification of the military forces of the Communist Party and the National Government would have a battle effect, equal at least, to one fully equipped American army. The result of unification of the Chinese military force is worthy of much more consideration than it has heretofore received from America. As I have heretofore reported to you, my negotiations with the Communists have been with the advice, approval and direction of both the Generalissimo and the American Commander, General Wedemeyer. *Conducting these negotiations between factions in China is viewed, by some of our diplomatic staff, as an unusual and unjustified departure from State Department procedure. My position is that the ends we seek justify the departure.*¹

These reports are being dictated by me to an army stenographer. *There is no process in the Embassy through which I can pass the reports to improve their composition or substance. I do not have the time to properly edit the reports. My reports are going to you literally from the typewriter to the radio.*¹ As you know, I am conducting meetings of the representatives of all American agencies in China with a view of eliminating overlapping and conflicts. We hope to be able to coordinate American activities in China. I am conducting regular military conferences with the American military commander and the Generalissimo. I am also carrying on the routine duties of Ambassador. It is difficult for me personally to attend so many conferences and also to do my own reporting. I have wired the Department suggesting a set-up for this Embassy which I hope will have attention as early as convenient, *as I have no desire to make this a one-man job.*¹

PART I

As indicated by my message to you No. 107, 24 January 1945, conversations have been resumed between the National Government and the Chinese Communist Party. It should be frankly stated, however, that in the very first meeting both sides stated with great emphasis the obstacles to any practical agreement between the two factions. Dr. Soong for the Government and Chow En-lai for the Communists are both able debaters.

At this point I begin giving background that will provide correct outline of my participation in and the progress of the conversations between the National Government and the Communist Party. I had been talking to the Generalissimo at periods during the Stilwell controversy of the necessity of uniting China's military forces so that instead of fighting or watching each other the forces of the Nationalist Government and those of the Chinese Communist party could be united to drive the Japanese from China. I was advised that the crimes committed by the Communists were so grave that reconciliation seemed impossible although the Generalissimo said he was willing for me to negotiate with the Communist Party leaders in an effort to bring about unity.

On 11 September 1944, I received a telegram from General Chu Teh, Commander in Chief of the Chinese Communist troops, inviting me, on behalf of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist party and the new 4th and 8th Route Armies of Communist troops, to go to Yen-an, in the Communist area, for a personal investigation and a visit with the Communist leaders. I immediately made this invitation known to the Generalissimo. For a number of reasons he wished me to postpone the visit but he did not decline to permit me to meet with the Communist leaders. I then began rather extensive work with a committee which had been appointed by the Generalissimo and the National Government to confer with the Chinese Communist leaders. The members of this Committee were Dr. Wang Shih Chieh, now Minister of Information, and General Chang Tze-chung, Director of Political Training of the National Military Council. I found these two gentlemen were committed to the proposition that China must remain under one party rule, according to the will of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, until a period of tutelage would make it ready to support a democratic government. They were of the opinion that the time had not arrived to institute a bi-party or multi-party government. After much work with these gentlemen and with Dr. Soong, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the Generalissimo, I evolved five points, some of them rather innocuous, to which the National Government Committee agreed. These points were suggested by me after conferences with the local representatives of the Communist Party and after meetings between these representatives and the representatives of the government. I was only beginning to understand the issues involved. On the 7th of November, I flew to Yen-an with the advice and consent and by the direction of the Generalissimo and General Wedemeyer. My reception by the Communist leaders was enthusiastic. They expressed great admiration that I had come into Yen-an at a time when it was necessary for my plane to be covered by fighter escort. This seemed to be of great significance to them. In opening our first formal meeting, Chairman Mao Tse-tung stated that our meeting was so important that I had risked my life to come to see him. That fact, he stated, impressed him with the earnestness of our desire to see all Chinese military forces united to defeat Japan and to prevent civil war in China. For two days and two nights we argued, agreed, disagreed, denied and admitted in the most strenuous but most friendly fashion and pulled and hauled my five points until they were finally revised and were signed by Mao Tse-tung to be presented by me as the Chinese Communist proposal to the National Government. I had been able to limit the inclusion of unnecessary details in the five points so that the whole document could be written on one page.

By agreement this document was to remain secret until the negotiations were closed or until Mao Tse-tung and I would agree to its publication. The document is still secret. The National Government has taken every precaution to keep it from becoming public. Therefore, the State Department should know that it would be injurious to our negotiations if this document should become public. I have outlined the document in reports to the President. This is the first time I have given the entire document. I am giving it now because I feel it essential that the State Department be fully informed if I am to expect direction, cooperation and support in these negotiations. The five point proposal of the Communist Party to the National Government is dated November 10, 1944 and is, in full as set forth in EMBTEL 142, Jan. 31, 7 PM.:

"AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT OF CHINA, THE KUOMINTANG OF CHINA AND THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF CHINA

"1. The Government of China, the Kuomintang of China and the Communist Party of China will work together for the unification of all military forces in China for the immediate defeat of Japan and the reconstruction of China.

"2. The present National Government is to be reorganized into a Coalition National Government embracing representatives of all anti-Japanese parties and non-partisan political bodies. A new democratic policy providing for reforms in military, political, economic and cultural affairs shall be promulgated and made effective. At the same time the National Military Council is to be reorganized into the United National Military Council consisting of representatives of all anti-Japanese armies.

"3. The Coalition National Government will support the principles of Sun Yat-sen for the establishment in China of a government of the people, for the people and by the people. The Coalition National Government will pursue policies designed to promote progress and democracy and to establish justice, freedom of conscience, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and association, the right to petition the government for the redress of grievances, the right of writ of habeas corpus and the right of residence. The Coalition National Government will also pursue policies intended to make effective those two rights defined as freedom from fear and freedom from want.

"4. All anti-Japanese forces will observe and carry out the orders of the Coalition National Government and its United National Military Council and will be recognized by the Government and the Military Council. The supplies acquired from foreign powers will be equitably distributed.

"5. The Coalition National Government of China recognizes the legality of the Kuomintang of China, the Chinese Communist Party and all anti-Japanese parties.

"(Sgd) MAO TSE-TUNG, Chairman of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China.

Signed: November 10, 1944.

"(Sgd) WITNESS PATRICK J. HURLEY, Personal Representative of the President of the United States.

Signed: November 10, 1944."

I was also authorized to say to Chiang Kai-shek that the Communists pledged themselves to support and sustain his leadership both as Generalissimo and as President of the Government.

In Yen-an I had contracted a heavy cold. The day after I returned (Nov. 11) I was confined to my room. I sent a signed copy of the Communist proposal to Dr. Soong and the other members of the National Committee and requested that it be translated and given to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. Dr. Soong and Dr. Wang came to my room in a state of considerable perturbation. Dr. Soong immediately said "You have been sold a bill of goods by the Communists. The National Government will never grant what the Communists have requested." He then pointed out all of the defects he found in the proposal, only one of which seemed to me to have merit and that was that the Communists really meant to say that they desired a coalition administration whereas they had actually asked for a change in the name of the Chinese Government. This seemed to me to be trivial and could easily be corrected. I maintained that the offer made by the Communists did outline at least a basis upon which to construct a settlement. Drs. Soong and Wang saw the Generalissimo before I did. They had convinced him that a settlement on the basis suggested by the Communists was impracticable. The Generalissimo's argument was that he could not agree to a Coalition Government without acknowledging the total defeat of his party by the Communists. He also said that the proposed plan would be in conflict with the program outlined for China in the will of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. He said that acceptance of the plan would have a serious effect on the war effort and would cause controversy at a time when the situation in China was already precarious. I, of course, had deep sympathy with him because I well understood that the National Government must be maintained. The collapse of the National Government would have caused chaos.

The Generalissimo was kind enough to say that the basis for settlement that I had obtained from the Communists would, in his opinion, be accepted as a settlement of the same kind of a controversy in Washington or in London but, owing to the peculiar Chinese psychology, it would mean total defeat for him and his party. I suggested to the Generalissimo that he revise the Communist offer and call the result a bi-party, or a multi-party, or a party representative government thus avoiding the use of the word "coalition." I believed that an agreement between the National Government and the Chinese Communist party would strengthen the government both politically and militarily and would prevent the collapse which, at that time, was widely predicted and to many informed people seemed imminent. My arguments were ineffective as were also the arguments of General Chow En-lai, Vice-Chairman of the Central Committee of the Communist party, who had accompanied me from Yen-an to Chungking. The government finally and definitely declined the Communist offer of settlement. The government made a three point counter-proposal. The three point counter-offer of the government was submitted to me on November 21st and I, in turn, presented it to General Chow. The three point counter-proposal of the government is, in full, as set forth in EMBSTEL 143 Jan. 31, 8 PM.:

"1. The National Government desirous of securing effective unification and concentration of all military forces in China for the purpose of accomplishing the speedy defeat of Japan, and looking forward to the post-war reconstruction of China agrees to incorporate, after reorganization, the Chinese Communist forces in the National Army who will then receive equal treatment as the other units in respect to pay, allowance, munitions and other supplies; and to give recognition of the Chinese Communist Party as a legal political party.

"2. The Communist Party of China undertake to give their full support to the National Government in the prosecution of the war of resistance, and in the post-war reconstruction, and give over control of all their troops to the National Government, through the National Military Council. The National Government will designate some high ranking officer from among the Communist forces to membership in the National Military Council.

"3. The aim of the National Government, to which the Communist Party subscribe, is to carry out the three People's Principles of Sun Yet-sen for the establishment in China of a government of the people, for the people and by the people, and will pursue policies designed to promote the progress and development of democratic processes in government.

"In accordance with the provisions of the 'Outline of the Program for the Prosecution of the War of Resistance and Reconstruction,' freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and association, and other civil liberties are hereby guaranteed, subject only to the specific needs of security in the effective prosecution of the war against Japan."

Dr. Wang stated, in a meeting, that the three point counter-proposal of the government was prepared by me and that it represented my idea of a fair compromise. To this statement I replied publicly that there was not one word of the counter-proposal that I considered mine, and that I had not presented it as my idea of an equitable compromise. I did not denounce the document, I disclaimed its authorship. The three-point proposal was not, of course, acceptable to the Communists. I did argue that the three-point proposal with General Chow En-lai and attempted to persuade him that it would be advisable on the part of the Communists to accept the three-point proposal and begin cooperation with the National Government to effect a unification of National and Chinese Communist forces for the defeat of the enemy. I pointed out that the government's three-point proposal did provide for the recognition of the Chinese Communists as a legal political party in China. At this time, in the discussions, the Chinese Communists began to charge the Chinese Government with bad faith. They said the Chinese Government had no desire to effect a unification of China and that the Chinese Government was in correspondence with Japan and, with support of the imperialistic governments of Southeast Asia, intended to keep China divided against itself. The charges and counter-charges of that period are too numerous to be recited here. All the atrocities committed in China during the civil war and much of those committed during the war of resistance were charged to the Communists by the representatives of the National Government. Chow En-lai returned to Yen-an without having made any notable progress in his negotiations with the government.

In conclusion of this Part I of my report on the background of the Communist negotiations, I wish to state that in all my negotiations with the Communists I have insisted that the United States will not repeat not supply or otherwise aid the Chinese Communists as an armed political party or as an insurrection against the National Government. Any aid from the United States to the Chinese Communist Party must go to that Party through the National Government of China. The Chinese Communist Party has never indicated to me that they desire to obtain control of the National Government itself, if and when they achieve control through a political election. The Communist party demands the end of the one-party government by the Kuomintang. The Chinese Communist party is willing for the Kuomintang to still have a vast majority of the government offices. The Chinese Communist party demands representation, both for itself and other anti-Japanese political parties in China, in the policy-making agencies of the government. If proper representation is given to the Chinese Communist Party in the National Government that Party will agree to submit its army to the control of the National Government.

On the other side of the ledger there is opposition to the unification of the military forces of China within both the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communist Party. Members of the Chinese Communist Party oppose unification with the Chinese National Government on the ground that the Government is incompetent, corrupt and destructive of the welfare of China. The Kuomintang party points to the fact that it began as the party of Sun Yat-sen, the party of reformation in China, and has brought China through a revolution and through nearly 8 years of the war of resistance. They believe themselves to have been successful. They believe that they have served China well and are naturally reluctant to surrender their one-party control of China.

There is honest opposition among some of our own military on the ground that the Communist armed party is stronger than the National Army and we should deal directly with the Communists bypassing the National Government. This opposition is, in my opinion, based on erroneous and unsound premises.

In addition to these factors, all of the representatives of the so-called imperialist colonial powers of southeast Asia are opposed to unification. The policy of the imperialist powers appears to be to keep China divided against herself.

The comment offered here is comment on the draft telegram merely as a report, which is the immediate task at hand, and we leave for later discussion the question of suggestions in regard to the negotiations.

We think that part I of the telegram is clear and precise (with the exception of one portion which will be discussed hereafter) and will provide the Secretary of State with a valuable background picture of the course of developments. We have not endeavored, as we usually do with draft telegrams, to work over the language for the sake of seeking greater conciseness or of condensing because we feel that it will be useful to the Secretary to have as full a description of the negotiations as it is possible to provide him. We feel too that, because of your intimate connection with and knowledge of this matter, you can draw in your own words a picture which might be made confused rather than clarified if we endeavored to suggest any radical changes in phraseology.

On page 3, line 14 we suggest "biparty" and "multiparty" instead of "bipartisan" and "multipartisan". The same suggestion is made in regard to page 6, line 19.

In the last paragraph on page 8 we suggest eliminating the numerals in parentheses for the sake of clarity. For example, the sentences following (2), (3), (4), and (5) do not seem to be matters on which you have insisted in your negotiations with the Communists whereas the clause following (1) does seem to be such a matter.

We would question the statement in the next to the last paragraph of the telegram that there is opposition among our own diplomatic representatives. There is no one on the staff who believes we should bypass the National Government in dealing with the Communists. From a recent conversation with Mr. Service (who is not substantively a member of the Embassy staff) I am convinced that he does not think we should bypass the National Government in dealing with the Communists.

II

As regards comment about the staff in the preamble:

We would question the penultimate sentence of the second paragraph. We have not heard anyone on the staff express an opinion that your conduct of the negotiations is an unusual and unjustified departure from State Department procedure. We do not believe that any member of the staff holds such opinion. There is no member of the staff that I know of who has not wholeheartedly hoped for the success of your negotiations and the benefit to the war effort which will obviously result therefrom.

We are at this moment endeavoring, by making these comments, to vitiate the second sentence of the third paragraph that there is no process in the Embassy through which reports can be passed for consultation on composition, and so forth.

The preamble is very damning to the staff. If I were in the Department I would imply from your comments that you feel that the staff is of little, if any, use and should be replaced. We hope that this is not the interpretation which you had in mind. But if it is we do not cavil about it; we feel that we are not in good position to offer comment.

III

We feel that your statement of the case of putting forth every feasible effort to bring unity to China and unity to the military forces of China to assist in defeating the Japanese is excellent. We feel also, from what we have heard and observed of the situation, that your statement of the position and attitude of the Kuomintang and the Communists toward each other is also excellent and succinct. We are sure that the Secretary will be very pleased indeed to have this outline of the negotiations and will consider it to be a clear, forthright, and generally excellent account of them.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, we have discussed General Hurley's charges set forth in Doc. 35-3, and particularly paragraph 5 of that document wherein General Hurley has stated that you and other Foreign Service officers who were pursuing the Chinese Communist Party line were seeking to keep China divided against herself. Now I refer you to page 9 of Document 321, the last paragraph of that page, where General Hurley says:

"In addition to these factors, all of the representatives of the so-called imperialist colonial powers of southeast Asia are opposed to unification. The policy of the imperialist powers appears to be to keep China divided against herself."

Now that is in this telegram to the Secretary of State in January 1945. General Hurley appears to be making a quite different suggestion, does he not, as to who was trying to keep China divided against herself. This does not suggest that this is a Communist Party proposal, does it?—A. No.

Q. I suppose he refers by the "so-called imperialist colonial powers" to Britain, does he? France?—A. He believed that the British wanted to keep China divided and weak, yes.

Q. Was it his belief that the British and the Chinese Communist Party were to that extent following the same line?—A. No, I can't follow his reasoning.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. I would like to call counsel's attention to the fact that the same expression occurs in 35-3, paragraph 5, in which he yokes together the professional Foreign Service men, the Chinese Communist Armed Party, and the imperialist bloc of nations all in one sentence.

Mr. RHETTS. That's correct.

The CHAIRMAN. This other quotation you have read doesn't seem to be any different from that.

Mr. RHETTS. Except that here he seems to suggest that this is only the policy of the proposal of the imperialist powers—he drops the Communist out here.

A. In the same telegram he has already said that the Chinese Communists are not seeking to gain power except by political means.

Mr. RHETTS. You see, I read another excerpt from this yesterday where he showed that he was satisfied that the Chinese Communist Party was not seeking to achieve dominance and control of the Government of China, but only wished participation in it, and indeed subordinate participation.

The CHAIRMAN. What we are trying to get at is the view of Mr. Service and not of Mr. Hurley.

Mr. RHETTS. If I may suggest to you, sir, I want to get at possibly what Mr. Hurley may think he is charging Mr. Service with.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Moreover, General Hurley has also charged that you and other Foreign Service officers were seeking to arm the Chinese Communists and that you were seeking to arm the Chinese Communists for the purpose of bringing about the fall of Chiang Kai-shek, has he not?—A. Yes.

Q. Now I should like to read this paragraph from General Hurley's telegram: "There is honest opposition among some of our own military on the ground that the Communist armed party is stronger than the National army and we should deal directly with the Communists, bypassing the National Government. This opposition is, in my opinion, based on erroneous and unsound premises."

Would you say that General Hurley suggests in any manner there that any person who sought to arm Communists even by bypassing the National Government was in any way seeking to defeat American policy?—A. No.

Q. Here General Hurley recognizes that an honest opinion can be properly held by certain of our military leaders, does he not?—A. Yes.

Q. Now I should like to refer you to the comment of the Embassy on this telegram of General Hurley.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I ask at this point: This telegram was sent by Hurley while he was Ambassador?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, sir. It was dated January 31, 1945.

Mr. ACHILLES. Then how does it happen that the Embassy is commenting on his telegram in the same telegram? Doesn't the whole telegram—

Mr. RHETTS. The Embassy's comment is attached. When you read the document, sir, you will see that General Hurley goes to some length to say that he is having to send this telegram through Army facilities because the Embassy has no facilities to type a telegram or to comment on it. That all appears in the document.

(Discussion off the record.)

The CHAIRMAN. The paper just offered consists of a draft of a telegram from General Hurley to the Department of State, and of a comment thereon by the Embassy at Chungking, both of which papers were found among the Embassy papers at Nanking at the time of the evacuation.

Go ahead.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to read from page 1 of the Embassy comment on this draft as follows:

"We would question the statement in the next to the last paragraph of the telegram that there is opposition among our own diplomatic representatives. There is no one on the staff who believes we should bypass the National Government in dealing with the Communists. From a recent conversation with Mr. Service (who is not substantively a member of the Embassy staff) I am convinced that he does not think we should bypass the National Government in dealing with the Communists."

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask, did you have anything to do with drafting that comment?—A. No, sir. I did not know about the telegram at that time.

Mr. RHETTS. May I say, sir, that the concluding paragraph of this comment states:

"(This memorandum has been written in cooperation and consultation with Messrs. Ringwalt, Yuni, Boehringer, and Freeman.)"

A. I would like to add, however, that the drafter of the memorandum of comment is Mr. George Acheson whose initials appear on the original.

Mr. RHETTS. That's all, I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a witness waiting?

Mr. RHETTS. He is waiting.

The CHAIRMAN. No further questions at this time from the Board. You may produce your witness. Let's have a recess.

(After a 5-minute recess the hearing reconvened.)

(Mr. John Paton Davies, called as a witness in behalf of John S. Service, after being duly sworn, testified in his behalf as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS.

Q. Will you state your full name and address?—A. John Paton Davies, Jr., home address: 1707 Duke Street, Alexandria, Va.

Q. And will you state your present position?—A. I am a member of the Policy Planning Staff of State Department.

Q. You are a Foreign Service officer, I believe?—A. Yes, sir; I am.

Q. Will you describe for the Board briefly your general background and the course of your career in the Foreign Service with a limitation, bearing in mind that we are interested primarily in the China phase and subsequent to 1941?—

A. I entered the Service in 1932, and after a year at a Canadian post I was transferred to China where I became a China language officer, that is, a specialist in Chinese affairs. I served subsequently in Mukden, Hankow, and then was transferred to the Department. Shortly after the outbreak of the war I was assigned to the Embassy at Chungking and detailed to the staff of the commanding general in the China-Burma-India theater. I served in this capacity until early January 1945 when I was transferred to Moscow where I served in the Embassy there until 1947 and returned on transfer to the Department to my present position.

Q. Now will you describe the general nature of the functions which you performed during the period while you were attached to the staff of the commanding general in the CBI theater?—A. To give an adequate impression of that I should perhaps go back to my personal relationship with General Stilwell. I believe it was in 1931 when I first met General Stilwell. I was a language officer at that time and the General was military attaché.

The CHAIRMAN. This was where?

A. In Peiping. In 1938 I saw him again in Hankow. At that period Hankow was under attack by the Japanese. He was then Colonel Stilwell, was then military attaché observing the Japanese offensive on Hankow. I was a vice consul in the consulate there. We worked very closely together, I doing political reporting, he doing military reporting. We exchanged information constantly, and worked very closely with a group of Americans and journalists of other nationalities. We used them to obtain information and we often helped them out with stories. It was on the basis of this considerable acquaintance and intimate contact with General Stilwell that he initiated the request through the War Department for my assignment to him in early 1942 to be detailed to his staff. This was, so far as I know, the first arrangement whereby the military took on to the staff of a commanding general a State Department officer. My functions were not clearly defined. They were left up to General Stilwell. When I reported to General Stilwell in the field early in 1942 at Maymyo, Burma, he was in the midst of the Burma campaign. I asked him what my instructions were. He said he was busy fighting a war and he left that pretty largely up to me. He said he expected me to keep him out of diplomatic trouble, and let it go at that. That was the general basis on which my functions were laid. I received very few specific orders from General Stilwell as to what I should do. My problem was to make a job for myself largely. I began to do political reporting in Burma almost immediately upon my arrival. That was a familiar field for me. I also, with his approval, maintained contacts with the press people. This was a familiar relationship between the General and myself; 1942 was a very bad year for the General.

The Burma campaign was, of course, a fiasco and the high command of the American forces in the CBI theater was scattered in retreat. After General Stilwell emerged from the Burmese jungle he assigned me to do political reporting and to follow the economic situation generally in India. From that developed a rather intensive coverage of Indian affairs throughout my period in the theater. From time to time he would request me, during the 3 years of my stay with him, to go over the Hump into China. He would discuss with me briefly the political situation there and accept the reports which I developed for him. Maybe you would like to lead me out more specifically.

Q. I was going to say I would like to direct your attention— When you joined his staff you were the only one at the outset, I take it?—A. Yes.

Q. Now could you indicate to the Board what has been referred to as the political adviser group, how it came about that other officers, other political officers were attached to his staff?—A. I discussed with General Stilwell the work which I was doing. It became very ramified. It involved not only strict political reporting, it involved also production of indoctrination pamphlets on the Chinese scene for the troops. It involved maintaining contact and political guidance with his commanders in a very scattered theater. For one example the Ramgarh Training Center where Chinese troops were being trained. Later, as we began to prepare for the offensive in Burma there was a whole operation that was separate in Burma that required guidance in civil affairs in that area for which our people were very poorly prepared. There was a whole propaganda operation. We became intimately connected with the policy guidance on OWI. In fact, the General gave us the authority to guide that whole operation. He also drew on me for advice on the OSS operations. The necessity of a larger staff than one person soon became very evident, and I discussed that question with the General. The General then felt that more men were needed for this particular function, particularly as this was such a widespread, far-flung theater. He then took up the matter with the War Department, I believe, in 1943, and the request, as I recall, originated from the War Department for the assignment of three other officers.

Mr. ACHILLES. Were the officers assigned suggested by name by you to General Stilwell, or were they his own selections?

A. They were in agreement. We discussed several names. He specifically asked for Service. There was a complete agreement on that, that was the one man he wanted. He knew Service, of course, quite well. I don't think he knew the other two men. I recommended them. I think he looked into their records and accepted the recommendations.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. The addition of other people, as I understand it, came to fruition roughly in August of 1943?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, can you describe something of what the organization of that group was after additional people were added to the assignment?—A. The organization was extremely loose. It was very casual. That stemmed, I think, really from two things. One is that we had no positive guidance from the Department as to how we should operate, how we should function. We were in a very peculiar position. We were not like the political officers in Europe who were all senior officers who went out and maintained direct communications with the Department themselves. We were junior officer that were assigned to the Embassy, detailed over to the military. Therefore, our position was rather anonymous in the field so far as our chain of command into the State Department was concerned. As far as the military was concerned, there, again, our position was rather vague, and there was no real provision or requirement for a chain of command amongst the political advisers. That grew out of the fact, I think fundamentally, that General Stilwell did not operate on a tight staff concept. His headquarters was his musette bag, and because of my peculiar relationship with General Stilwell, from being a long-time acquaintance with him, the headquarters generally did not attempt to exercise any particular administrative control over our arrangements. For my part, I did not wish to put myself up as boss man over three other brother officers who were the same rank as myself. Finally, the theater itself was a very decentralized type of operation.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you say "decentralized"?

A. Decentralized type of operation with different problems in India, different problems in China, different problems in Burma, and I felt that we could be most effective if each officer went out to perform a specific function, as it were, on a basis of a tacit understanding growing out of a common training that we had had together. By and large I think it worked fairly well.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. In that connection, is it correct that you throughout this operation, you more or less were active at the same places that General Stilwell was; that is, were you attached pretty much to him personally, wherever his personal headquarters was you were?—A. No. I suppose I spent more time in India at his rear headquarters than I did at his forward headquarters or with him, who was very peripatetic, who spent most of his time in a politically inactive area which was the Burma jungle. I also made several trips down to southeast Asia headquarters where I maintained liaison at Mountbatten's headquarters.

Q. Well, would you say that you were in any sense the sort of lead officer of this group of officers, even though you didn't set it up on a boss-man basis in terms of such chain of command as there was to Stilwell?—A. That was tacitly accepted by Stilwell and was tacitly accepted by the officers in the Military Establishment.

Q. Would it be fair to say that in terms of any expressions of desire on General Stilwell's part as to what he wanted to seek from particular members of this group that he would tend to pass the orders or the request through you, or was he dealing independently with each one of them?—A. Oh, he depended upon me to give the general line of what I knew he wanted done.

Q. Now can you give the Board some idea of the—this will be a very large assignment—but some general sketch of the nature of, and the relation of political problems to military problems in the theater?—A. Of course, the theater was a relatively minor theater in the war, militarily speaking. It was probably the most complex political-military theater in the war. That is to say, Stilwell's authority extended from Moslem Karachi off into Communist China by definition of the expanse of his theater. It involved, first, the colonial problem in the Indian subcontinent; the relations between not only the British and ourselves, but the British, ourselves, and the Indians, and at that time the Indians were a very difficult political factor. The Dutch were operating from there into Indonesia clandestinely. Technically, and initially, Stilwell's theater included Indochina. There was that problem there which involved French colonialism. Then, of course, in China there was this looming civil conflict which underlay the whole social political structure in which we were trying to conduct a war.

Q. Now in that connection, can you characterize the general political objectives which Stilwell sought to pursue in order to advance his primary military objectives?—A. Well, we could leave this as merely secondary importance.

Q. In China?—A. The situation in India, that was a base problem. In China, which was what he hoped to become an area of military operations, his problem was to make the Chinese Army an offensive force, which it was not. That involved Lend-Lease to get the arms there, and it involved a greater degree of unification and control over the Chinese armies over which he theoretically had some degree of command. It involved persuading the Generalissimo and the Chinese Communists that if that was possible to forget their internal civil conflict and join together in fighting the Japanese. Both of them claimed that they were fighting the Japanese very hard. We felt that there was much more that could be done on both sides. So in that sense his first problem before his theater could become an effective offensive theater was the political problem of the vitalization of the Chinese military forces.

Q. How did he seek to accomplish this political feat?—A. Well, he tried all sorts of means and it was just try one and if that failed just try another. He tried persuasion; that wasn't very effective. He tried to use Lend-Lease as a bargaining force to persuade the Chinese to become more aggressive, but that wasn't very effective. As I recall, he did not get much support from Washington on that. He sought to obtain later, just before I left, a unified command over both the Chinese National Government troops and the Communist troops, and in that he failed, of course.

Q. Well, now, in the process of his attempts to solve these political questions which had to come preliminary to any real offensive military operations, can you describe for the Board something of what his policy was and what you understood, well, first, what his policy was on the matter of dealing with the media of public information, the press, and others who had to report on these political problems.—A. He realized, of course, that in a democratic society, even during war, that public opinion in this country is necessary for the support of the war effort, an intelligent public opinion. He felt that the American people were being misled about many of the realities in China. He felt that made his job more difficult. He felt that there was a group of Chinese Government publicists in this country and their American friends who were oversimplifying, perhaps, the problems which confronted him. He was, therefore, in his own press conferences very frank with the press about the internal situations in China, the political situation. I have sat in on press conferences with him when he was exceedingly, by my standards, indiscreet in his discussions of the Chinese political situation. He indicated very clearly to me that he wished me to brief the press, and, subsequently, that the other members of the State Department who were detailed to his staff should do likewise. That was based on a very sound democratic tradition of an informed and enlightened public opinion of one's own country. These orders of his to me were oral, there were no written orders on that score. In fact, I don't recall any specific written directives to do a certain job of one type or another that I received from General Stilwell.

Our relationship was of such long standing and on such a personal basis that his instructions usually were oral and often they were only a response to a suggestion that I had made. He on three occasions sent me to the United States for the specific purpose of this briefing, on two planes, one within the Government. He was anxious that I should come back and report to the State Department what his problems were; that I would do. Then, he was also anxious that I should talk to representative Americans, in fact, I remember one occasion when he was here himself, and at his request, I believe it was, I arranged with Eugene Meyer for a dinner which Mr. Meyer was only too glad to give.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Meyer was then publisher of the Post?

A. He was then publisher of the Post. For the dinner were present, I should say, maybe six or eight correspondents, and after dinner there trooped in, oh, I should say about 20, and Stilwell held forth on the military problems that he was confronting in a very, very frank way, and then turned to me and asked me to carry the political picture that confronted him. That was, I think, in '43—it may have been in '42.

Questions by Mr. RIETTS:

Q. May I interrupt just at this point? Would you think it fair to say that most of the information which both of you were discussing was probably recorded somewhere in a document that bore some classification stamp on it?—A. Oh, certainly. The only purpose of a briefing of that type is to provide material that is not readily available in the already open press.

Q. I interrupted you. You were referring to this occasion I think you were going to indicate. He said that there were others.—A. Subsequently, I was sent back on other trips specifically for this purpose. General Stilwell did not send me back for my health. He sent me to do these jobs. As I say, there were no written instructions. I was orally directed to do these things. The only written indication that I have is a travel order in one case, which gives a hint of this, in which it is stated that (looking at travel order) I should proceed without delay to Washington, D. C., on temporary duty for the purpose of carrying out his special instructions, that's all that was said.

The CHAIRMAN. Were those instructions in part to orient the press?

A. Yes, sir; so much for the United States. In the field, of course, again we operated as the general line had operated in Hankow, that was with more than his permission, it was his desire that we work very closely with the American press and with non-Americans likewise that we considered reputable. We were very frank with them in these briefings. The only restraints that we reserved were those in our own judgment we felt that material which originated from the State Department, War Department, containing directives, policy guidance, expressions of view of high American officials should not be shown to the press, but the material which was reportorial about the local situations, political, social, economic—those we felt were the grist for the press mill to provide an enlightened American public about the events that were transpiring in his theater.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you place any limitations on the press as to reproduction of any of the things you told them? You say you were very frank—was it under agreement to secrecy in any respect or was it all intended for publication?

A. Most of it was intended for publication. Some of the material, of course—this is a familiar technique throughout the Government in agencies which deal with sensitive material—sometimes information is given for background, sometimes it is given for attribution, and so forth. I think in all instances during the war such information as we did give was given for background.

The CHAIRMAN. That meant they could reproduce it if they—

A. Well, generally, that was a question of judgment. There was some material—after all, we know that some reports which were classified "secret" were extracts from the New York Times, so it is a question of reproduction backward into the open again. That type of material, of course, there wouldn't be any objection to, if it were overt material.

The CHAIRMAN. I imagine then from what you say some things you told them in confidence; other things you told them were for their own background, for publication or not, as they saw fit?

A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. So you gave them this substance with no identity as to source, is that correct? You gave them the substance of some of the material, but you did not attribute source, or things of that nature, which would have caused you to classify it in some instances?—A. Well, that would be overt material, you mean?

Q. Yes.

Mr. RHETTS. You would give them substantive material, but not indicate the source from which you obtained it?—A. Oh, I see what you mean.

Mr. RHETTS. Which might be the really confidential part of the material—I take it that's what Mr. Stevens had in mind.

A. That is, I don't recall the specific instance, but that is a conceivable category.

Question by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I take it that in political reporting which you were doing very frequently you have material which in itself is not classified at all, not subject to classification, but which becomes classified solely from the fact that it is attributed to somebody which might disclose your source?—A. I see; surely, yes. I get that point, yes.

Q. So in such cases you would feel free to give the information.—A. Provided the source were not compromised.

Q. But not compromise the source.—A. Oh, yes.

Mr. RHETTS. I take it from something you said a moment ago, Mr. Davies, that even apart from that type of material it was common practice, was it not, to classify anything that anybody wrote practically without regard to its substance or sources—it was given some sort of a classification during wartime in a large part?

A. There was a tendency to grossly overclassify.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Let me ask you as to your own practice in that respect. Did you make some written reports from time to time to General Stilwell?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did you put a classification on them?—A. On my own reports?

Q. Yes.—A. I put my own classification on them. However, I have seen reports in headquarters with classifications being put on by sergeants and corporals.

Q. What would you put on "secret" and "confidential" in some cases?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Sometimes "secret" and sometimes "confidential?"—A. Oh, yes. I was guilty of the same vice of overclassification. I think it was epidemic.

Q. Now would you afterward feel free to reveal to the press some of the information contained in those reports without regard to the fact that it was also contained in a report which you had classified as secret or confidential?—A. That would depend entirely on my judgment of the circumstances.

Q. Absolutely, you would make it a matter of judgment?—A. Indeed.

Q. You wouldn't in every case didactically refer to the classification on the paper, but use your judgment as to what you would reveal and not reveal?—A. Precisely, and I believe that is very much the procedure now in Washington.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. On that point, Mr. Davies, you have indicated you never had any general instructions from General Stilwell on the point, but was it your understanding that that was entirely conformable to his own policy and represented his desires as to how you should conduct yourself?—A. Emphatically so. That, I think, he considered—at least as far as I myself am concerned in the situation and the others in their varying degrees—one of our principal values to him, as persons who were trained in the area who could give an interpretation which perhaps not always showed good judgment but in what long term the policy should be, and, nevertheless, who did have a familiarity with the subject matter.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES :

Q. I was going to ask whether in your personal practice you had ever permitted a correspondent to read classified material for background information?—A. Yes.

Q. Was that considered normal procedure?—A. Yes, throughout the theater.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. In such a case you might indicate certain information contained in the report was not to be made public?—A. Yes.

Q. Such as the source?—A. There, again, it was the question of the judgment of the material before you; the correspondent to whom you were giving it, a correspondent like, shall we say, Arch Steele, of the Herald Tribune, who was a long-time operator there whom we had worked with very closely and whom we trusted, we knew him extremely well. There was a man we had great confidence in and we didn't have to make many reservations in what we showed him; others we would say: "Now be sure this must not be attributed to us or to the Government."

Q. Or the source must not be revealed?—A. Or the source must certainly not be revealed; some newcomer would have to be told the source should not be revealed.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS :

Q. Did this course you followed with General Stilwell deviate from the procedure you followed on your various Foreign Service posts, Mr. Davies?—A. No. Would you like two examples?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

A. The first time I encountered this practice was in 1935, I believe, at Mukden. There was a situation—the Japanese had come in and were in control of the country. American correspondents were having great difficulty in getting into the country and in filing information that could get through. Japanese propaganda was trying to build up a certain picture of Manchukuo. My consul general at that time and later authorized me whenever we had visiting Americans—William Henry Chamberlin, for example; there are several others that slip my mind—J. P. McAvoy, John Gunther. Our files were open to them, with discrimination, but material that was classified. The highest classification at that time was strictly confidential and it was put down on the table, and they were left to take notes on it, and they were told: "The only thing you must not do is to reveal that you got it from the American consulate." This, we felt, was an essential operation, or my boss did, for the education of the American people about the realities of Manchukuo, which was then being publicized in very false colors by the Japanese propaganda agencies. That is one example.

During the foreign ministers conference in Moscow in 1947 Ambassador Bedell Smith set up a large file of material collected from our own reports, some of which was classified, for the benefit of American correspondents, not all, because some we didn't know very well, who came in to cover the foreign ministers conference, and they were allowed to come up and take notes and obtain background material from the official material from our files, with the understanding, of course, that it was not for attribution, and that the American Government was not going to be embarrassed by this. We felt again that this was an essential operation, operation prophylaxis, for the American public on the internal situation in the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. Now this practice to which you have just referred was also known to and practiced by the other officers who were working with you on this assignment to General Stilwell?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Under oral instructions from you, Mr. Davies, or was that just a practice that was—

A. Under oral instructions from me.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would include instructions to Mr. Service?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. RHETTS. That is, I take it, you made clear to him that this type of activity was a part of his job in relation to that in China, just as it was a part of your job in India and Burma?

A. That it was the general's desire.

Mr. RHETTS. That is what the general wanted him to do?

A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Now his ability, or your ability, to follow this sort of practice, applied not only to materials which you had prepared but which were available to you, Mr. Davies?—A. As I say, there, again, it was regarded as matter of judgment in our case.

Q. But you exercised the judgment?—A. We exercised the judgment that was delegated to us, on our best judgment we made the decisions of what could or what should not be shown.

Q. That related not only to material which you had classified, but material which had been classified by someone else that was made available for your use, and was a part of your file?—A. Theoretically that was true. In practice I don't think that we ever showed any material that was not our own because we were the only ones in the theater command who were writing political commentary.

Q. I see.—A. In other words, we would not show a military report that was out of our field. In fact, we may have had some in our files, but it was not our practice to—

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a fair statement of the practice: The mere fact that you as a political reporter had written a report and marked it "confidential" at the top did not thereafter foreclose you from making it public to the press?

A. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you thereafter exercised your judgment?

A. That's right.

The CHAIRMAN. The same judgment you exercised when you marked it confidential?

A. That's right. In effect, we were declassifying.

The CHAIRMAN. You classified it and you declassified it to suit yourself according to your own judgment?

A. That's right.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you have occasion to make any material you received from Mr. Service available to the press?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever give anybody copies of his material?—A. Not that I recall.

Q. You never transmitted them to any unofficial person?—A. Not to any unofficial person that I recall.

Q. Do you think there is any chance of your having transmitted any of his reports to any unofficial person?—A. I doubt it because the people we were dealing with were mostly—the people with whom we would transfer documents for holding would be only officials, I mean send copies in to would be officials. For instance, we would send copies of our reports to the Embassy. We would send them back sometimes directly to the Department, extra copies to the Department. Many of my reports were sent to the OSS, and some to the OWI when they dealt with propaganda. So they went to other agencies in transmission.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ever incorporate part of your reports in a press statement, a written press statement to the press?—A. We made no written press statements that I recall.

Q. But you did the next thing to it—you permitted them to come in and take notes from your reports?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Which is practically the same thing?—A. Which is practically the same thing.

Q. Except they did the writing instead of you?—A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. You are not certain you never transmitted any of Mr. Service's reports to any unofficial person?—A. I will say I am reasonably certain I never did.

Q. Now is there anything that raises a doubt in your mind?—A. Only this: that we would occasionally lower classification—not lower classification, but lower what we would call strictly reportorial stuff, with perhaps no sources that would be compromised, which would embarrass us. We might loan a paper to somebody to bring back that afternoon, somebody that we trusted. I don't recall myself ever having done that.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. But you wouldn't see anything reprehensive in doing it?—A. I wouldn't see anything reprehensible in doing it, but I don't recall I ever did it. Perhaps it was never necessary. Perhaps the information could be gotten right from sitting at a table and taking notes.

Q. There is no distinction between taking notes on the premises or off the premises as far as the principle is concerned?—A. As far as the principle is concerned, no, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. If you did have occasion to ever send any of his reports to any private individual, what individual or type of individual might it conceivably have been, or what would be the circumstances? You say you are not positive you ever sent any of his reports to a private individual. I am trying to elucidate under what circumstances such a thing might have happened.

A. Well, I can't conceive of the circumstances under which I would send them to a private individual, send a report to them.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say that, do you mean to elude the press: are you trying to think of somebody besides the press?

A. I am thinking of the verb "send"; that is to say, to put in the mail or to pass by a third courier to somebody. I can't conceive of ever having done that. I don't recall ever having done that.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you are still not positive that you never did?

A. That was a very free and easy theater, but I don't recall ever having done it.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I take it that in pursuing this general practice which you have described in detail, in which the basic principle was that you and the other officers engaged in this work were expected to use your judgment and discretion in relation to the particular persons whom you briefed and the nature of the material that you could therefore appropriately show them, I suppose that throughout you recognized that, given that latitude for the exercise of judgment, you expected that if you exercised it in a manner which your superiors found unacceptable you would pay for it?—A. Yes; we never got any—I never got, and so far as I know the other officers who were working with me never received, any complaint or reprimand from the general or any officer in headquarters over the way we were operating, which was general knowledge.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to come back to the word "send" now, not by a third person, but would you have loaned a copy of Mr. Service's report by hand to a correspondent to have taken out overnight, or 2 or 3 hours?—A. I don't recall having done that, but depending on my judgment of the correspondent and the material at that time, I would not exclude the possibility of doing that.

Mr. STEVENS. That would not have been anything which would have been so unusual for you as to remember it; in other words, it may have been a practice that was followed?—A. Yes.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The real point is you would not have considered it reprehensible in any way?

Mr. STEVENS. That's right.

A. Depending on the circumstances, the individual involved, the material which was passed on, and so forth.

Q. Again, it is a question of the exercise of judgment?—A. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going on to a different subject now? We were supposed to stop at 5, and it is now nearly 5:30.

Mr. RHETTS. I was about to suggest that I am about to turn to another subject now, and let's leave this matter of the policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other question on this particular matter we have been pursuing?

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I would like to ask a question or two, if I may, about the times when you were in China. Take the period from October 1944—were you in China from October to January or at any time in there, Mr. Davies?—A. I was in China the latter part of 1944, and left early January 1945.

Q. Where were you then, Mr. Davies?—A. I was in Chungking, and then I went up to Yenan, and then I came back to Chungking, and then I departed for Moscow.

Q. You went back then to New Delhi, did you?—A. I went back to New Delhi, awaited my orders there for transfer to Moscow, and then proceeded from New Delhi.

Q. You went there early in January from China?—A. From China—from Chungking.

The CHAIRMAN. Anything you would like to ask? We are cleaned up for the moment.

Mr. RHETTS. If it is your proposal to recess, I would like at this point to introduce a document which deals with the matter we have just been discussing, namely, the policy on dealings with the press and other sources.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to offer for inclusion in the transcript Document No. 323, which is an affidavit by Paul L. Jones, colonel of the Infantry Reserve, dated May 23, 1950. Colonel Jones was the public-relations officer for the theater, and his testimony on this point, as a military man, I think, is highly relevant to this question and should go in at this point.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I just wanted to ask the witness: Did you know Colonel Jones?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he was public-relations officer at that time?—A. Yes, sir. He was a very close friend of General Stilwell and the whole Stilwell family.

Q. And he was familiar with this practice you have been telling us about?—A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be admitted.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 323

SAN DIEGO, CALIFORNIA,
May 23rd, 1950.

To: The Chairman of the Dept. of State Loyalty Security Board.

From: Paul L. Jones, Col., Inf. Res., 3876 La Cresta Drive, San Diego, California.

Subject: Public Relations Policy in the China-Burma-India Theatre from 1942 to 1945.

1. At the request of Mr. John Service, I am submitting this statement of C-B-I Theatre Public Relations Policy as Theatre Public Relations Officer under the late General Joseph W. Stilwell during the period 5 June 1944 to 4 Feb. 1945. Prior to this appointment I had been Asst. Theatre Public Relations Officer for almost a year.

2. In order to have this report on the C-B-I Theatre have any meaning, it is necessary to state as briefly as possible the problems facing the Public Relations

Section of the Theatre Headquarters. The C-B-I was a theatre of complex animosities. The British despised and mistrusted the Chinese; the Chinese reciprocated in kind. The British and the Indians and the Burmese were constantly at odds. The Americans were caught in the middle. The relations between the British, Indian Government, the Chinese, and the Burmese were of such a nature that fighting the Japs was a very minor secondary operation. The American fighting forces found themselves involved in a battle for which they had had NO training, for the war in C-B-I was a war of international politics. American correspondents, in the early part of the American stay in Asia, wishing to write the truth about China for American papers would come to India, write their story, have it passed by the British POLITICAL censors and then send it to America. The Chinese returned the favor by allowing American correspondents to file derogatory stories on the British from China. This continued until orders were issued from Washington, on pressure from the British and Chinese Governments, that all stories written about either the British or the Chinese must be cleared by censors of the country about which the story was written, regardless of where they were filed. It was always necessary for an American correspondent to clear any story written on China with the Chinese even though it had cleared American censorship; stories on the British or Indian stories must be cleared with the British censors. I make a rather strong point of this condition for it is the reason for much of our censorship. The American policy of censorship had to do with information which would have proved injurious to the war effort in Asia. The British and Chinese censorship was based on political issues which had little or nothing to do with the actual fighting. The war in China (during the time I was Public Relations Officer at least) was a war of the printed word. I have been in Mr. Hollington Tong's office (then Minister of Information for the Chinese Government) when he would read the daily communiqués of the United States, Britain, and Russia and then sit down and write the one on the Chinese Armies along the lines of those released by the other three allies. This was then released as the official communiqué of the Chinese Government for the day.

3. The above paragraph on the situation is all too brief to set the scene, but it may serve to explain the Theatre's attitude on certain information which was freely given to accredited correspondents and which, because of the political situation in China and our Theatre, carried the stamp of classified material. It was very difficult to explain to American newsmen who had been to the other fronts of the world why certain things were forbidden them from Asia. To clear this point, the newsmen were briefed by competent personnel on the situation in China at that time. It must be borne in mind that all American correspondents in the Theatre had been cleared by the War Department Bureau of Public Relations prior to their coming to the Theatre, and I know of no case where a correspondent released background information of a classified material which was not either passed by the Theatre Censors or the War Department Bureau of Public Relations. Certainly none has ever been released, under any condition, which hurt the NONEXISTENT war effort against the Japs during my period in the Theatre.

4. During this period, the State Department of the United States had attached to our Headquarters as political advisors Mr. John Davies and Mr. John Service. Both of these men had spent many years in China and knew the history, the language, the courtesies, the people, and the Government. As it is impossible for a man to know a country whose language he does not speak, in the three years our group was in the Theatre, we of the Public Relations Office and the Headquarters were very dependent on these men for assistance in clarifying the American position in China to the correspondents in the Theatre. This was in line with the policy set down for the Theatre by the Commanding General, Joseph W. Stilwell. The General's attitude was that the American people deserved to know the truth; that the American people did not want any information released that would cause the life of a single American or Allied soldier; that the American people were not interested in news which if published would delay the end of the war a single day; but that the American people did deserve to know, and were paying enough to know, that all reports released by the Chinese were a long way from the facts of the case.

5. Therefore, in spite of the fact that much of this material was considered classified because it was politically objectionable to the Chinese it did become necessary for us to release information to correspondents as background and informational material so that they could understand and write intelligently on the problems we faced in Asia and what the future held forth. Both Mr.

Davies and Mr. Service assisted in this phase of our work and were expected to do so. In many cases I have referred correspondents to them for historical and political background on China, past and then present, which my office was unable to furnish the writers because of lack of knowledge.

6. I feel I am on very safe ground when I say that neither of these two men had any extensive knowledge of the military plans of the Theatre, for in visiting with them from time to time I was surprised at how little they knew of the military problems. Their knowledge, for which we were thankful, was in the political field; and there the personnel of our Headquarters, with a few exceptions, was woefully lacking. The American Army has never been trained to fight a political battle, and this lack of training made us the only Army in Asia which did not know the political objectives of its country. Perhaps we had none, but we would be better off today if we had had.

7. In closing, I beg forgiveness of the Committee for inserting a personal observation. It seems tragic to me that men like General Stilwell (whose report to the War Department in 1945 predicted the downfall of the Chinese Nationalist Government) and men like Mr. Davies and Mr. Service should be maligned from some quarters of our Government because they were intelligent enough to understand and warn our Government of what was coming in Asia. Had we heeded their warning, the condition in China in my opinion need not be what it is today. It is irony that these men are being blamed, in part, for the situation they predicted. It seems odd to me that we expect our public people to do the best job they know how for our country and then we blame them when they do. Won't such treatment make it impossible to get good people in the Government in the future?

8. May I say again that this is an all-too-brief account to clearly explain the problem. For the sake of the record, I have made every effort to keep it brief. If clarification or further details are desired, I shall be glad to assist in any way.

9. I certify that the above is true and factual insofar as I had knowledge as Public Relations Officer of the China Burma India Theatre.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we can recess until Monday at 10 a. m.
(The meeting recessed at 5:30 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY REVIEW BOARD MEETING IN THE MATTER OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: May 29, 1950, 10:40 to 12 noon.

Place: Room 2254, New State.

Reported by E. Wake, CS/Reporting.

Board members present: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, member; Arthur G. Stevens, member; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhett, firm of Reilly, Rhett & Ruckelshaus.

(The meeting reconvened at 10:40 a. m.)

(After being duly sworn Mrs. Annette Blumenthal testified as follows:)

Questions by the Chairman:

Q. What is your full name please?—A. Annette Blumenthal.

Q. And your residence?—A. 2805 Webb Avenue, the Bronx.

Q. Mrs. Blumenthal, will you state briefly, for the benefit of the Board, your business association with the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. I worked for them for 3½ years and when I left I was subscription manager of their magazine "Public Affairs" and their bulletin "Far Eastern Survey."

Q. Would you give dates?—A. I started working there on a part-time basis in 1933—in March 1933—and I left in June 1942.

Q. In the course of your association with the Institute of Pacific Relations, did you become acquainted with Mr. Philip Jacob Jaffe?—A. Yes.

Q. What was his connection?—A. I don't think he was ever connected with the institute. He started publication of a magazine "Amerasia." I don't remember when it was started. I started working for Mr. Jaffe on a very part-time basis; in fact, I devoted only my lunch hour to working for him on the subscription list of Amerasia.

Q. What was the relationship, if any, between the Institute of Pacific Relations and Amerasia?—A. None that I know of.

Q. How did you happen to meet Mr. Jaffe?—A. Their offices were in the same building as the Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-seventh Street.

Q. New York City?—A. That's right.

Q. What did he employ you to do with reference to the publication "Amerasia"?—A. The girl that was in charge of the office was ill and their subscription list became very tangled up I would say and he asked me to straighten it up for him and the girl did not return to the job and he asked me if I could continue working during the lunch hour. I did that for 2 or 3 years.

Q. What years?—A. If it were 3 years it would start in 1939 to 1942—until I left.

Q. Now in connection with this work that you did for Mr. Jaffe, did you see any papers or did you actually copy papers for him?—A. I did manuscript typing, not Mr. Jaffe's work alone but any writers that offered manuscripts for the magazine.

Q. I pass you certain papers and ask if you can identify them as photostats of papers which you may have copied for Mr. Jaffe?—A. During the time I worked for him or after I left the office?

Q. During the time you worked for him.—A. I left in 1942 and I did work at home afterwards.

Q. Let me inquire as to that. Tell us about the work you did for him at home after you left the office?—A. One time he wrote a book and asked me to type the manuscript. Later on he asked for other material to have copied and I would copy it and return it to him.

Q. What date would you give to that?—A. Mostly on and off between 1942 and the spring of 1945.

Q. Did you at any time type any reports which were purported to be signed by Mr. John Service?—A. I wouldn't remember the signatures but I could identify the papers if I saw them.

Q. I pass you some photostats which may be photostats of papers which you have seen.—A. It is very hard to identify these. If I had the copies I had made myself I could recognize my typing—the general run of my typing, but the contents don't seem familiar at all. If I had my own papers I could identify them.

Q. Do you know where your copies are?—A. I know that they were held in the State Department at one time because I identified them down here in Washington.

Q. I have handed you a report No. 16, dated March 17, 1945, containing at the end the signature of John S. Service and entitled: "Subject: Plans for Relief and Rehabilitation Organizations of the Communist Liberated Areas." Are you able to identify that as a document you copied?—A. No, I couldn't remember it.

Q. You have looked at that paper?—A. Yes sir, I looked at it before. There were no headings on these papers originally? These are the only headings? There were no State Department headings?

Q. No.—A. I think the papers I worked on were all marked "State Department" or "OWL."

Q. Did you work on any papers without headings?—A. I cannot remember.

Q. You have looked at that paper and you are unable to identify it?—A. Definitely.

Mr. RHETTS. May I see this paper so I will know which one you are talking about.

Q. I pass you one No. 15, dated March 16, 1945, which also purports to have the signature of John S. Service and which is entitled: "Subject: Policy of the Chinese Communists Toward the Problem of National Minorities."—A. No, I can not identify it.

Q. I pass you a photostat of a paper numbered 17, dated March 17, 1945, bearing the signature of John S. Service and entitled: "Subject: Clarification of Communist Territorial Claims by Direct American Observation." Can you identify it?—A. I am afraid not.

Q. I pass you a photostat of paper No. 21, dated March 21, 1945, bearing the signature of John S. Service and entitled: "Chiang Kai-shek's Treatment of the Kuangsi Clique." Can you identify it?—A. No, I cannot.

Q. You cannot?—A. No, I cannot.

Q. I pass you an original document, dated March 22, 1945, No. 22, bearing the signature of John S. Service, and entitled: "Subject: Recent Appointments by the Generalissimo Contradictory to Announced Intentions of Peaceful Settlement of Internal Issues," and ask if you can identify that as a paper you copied?—A. No, I cannot.

Q. Now I hand you two original papers fastened together, one of which appears to be dated September 28, 1944, bearing the signature of C. E. Gauss, No. 318, subject: Transmitting Reports of: Interview with Mao Tse-tung; Need of American Policy Created by the Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, and Desirability of American Military Aid to Chinese Communist Armies, which contains as an enclosure original report No. 15, dated August 27, 1944, subject: Interview with Mao Tse-tung, bearing the typed signature of John S. Service, and the further report of August 23, 1944, without title or signature, and report of September 3, 1944, numbered 20, subject: The Need of an American Policy Toward the Problems Created by the Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, bearing the typed signature of John S. Service, and report of August 29, 1944, No. 16, subject: Desirability of American Military Aid to the Chinese Communist Armies, bearing the typed signature of John S. Service, and ask if you can identify any portion of that as a paper which you copied for Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, I cannot identify these papers either.

Q. I pass you a communication No. 3181, dated November 24, 1944, Transmission of Reports on Conditions in the Communist Area and on Kuomintang Communist Relations, which contained as an enclosure report No. 39, dated October 9, 1944, subject: Present Strength and Future Importance of the Chinese Communists bearing the typed signature of John S. Service; report No. 42, dated October 11, 1944, subject: Celebration of October 10 in Yen-an, containing the typed signature of John S. Service, and memorandum of October 11, 1944, Celebration of October 10 in Yen-an, having no signature on it; a report No. 43, dated October 12, 1944, subject: Comments of Chairman Mao Tse-tung and General Chou En-lai on the Internal Situation in China, containing the typed signature of John S. Service; and memorandum of October 10, 1940, Conversation with Chairman Mao Tse-tung, bearing the typed initials "J. S. S.," and the report No. 46, dated October 16, 1944, subject Communist Comment on the Generalissimo's October 10 Speech, containing the typed signature of John S. Service with a translation from the Yen-an Chieh Fang Jih Pao, October 12, 1944, entitled "Yenan Observer Criticizes the Dangerous Character of Chiang Kai-shek's Speech," and ask if you can identify any of those papers as papers you copied for Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, I cannot identify it either.

Q. While you are reading that I will read into the records a quote from this. Don't let it bother you. I am going to give you next photostats of four reports, one numbered 13, dated March 15, 1944, subject: Communist Views In Regard to Sinkiang, bearing the signature of John S. Service; one dated March 16, 1945, numbered 14, subject: Communist Views in Regard to Mongolia, bearing the signature of John S. Service; No. 18, dated March 18, 1945, subject: Establishment of Unified Labor and Women's Organizations for the Communist Liberated Areas, bearing the signature of John S. Service, and one dated March 19, 1945, numbered 19, subject: Communist Report of Kuomintang "Exile" Government Organizations for the Shen Kan-Ning Border Region, bearing the signature of John S. Service, and ask you the same question as to whether or not you can identify any of these reports as papers which you copied for Mr. Jaffe.—A. I am afraid I cannot identify these either.

Q. In your relations with Mr. Jaffe, did you know him as a Communist?—A. I never discussed Mr. Jaffe's political views. I never knew whether he was or was not a Communist. I was an employee in the office and I had no idea what his political beliefs were.

Q. Did you know Mr. John S. Service?—A. No, I did not.

Q. You have never met him?—A. I don't believe I ever did. He was a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations, if I remember correctly. He may have been in the office at one time or another but I never met him.

Q. And in connection with these reports, you had no connection with Mr. Service?—A. No.

Q. Do you recollect you copied any reports that bore his name?—A. I am sure I did copy some that bore his name.

Q. Can you fix the time when you did that?—A. It would be in the spring of 1945. That was when I did that particular work for Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Do you remember whether or not you copied reports that bore the classification "secret" or "confidential"?—A. Yet, I did.

Q. Did any of those reports bear the name of John S. Service?—A. I am sure some did.

Q. Did Mr. Jaffe make any explanation how he came by "secret" reports or "confidential" reports bearing the signature of John S. Service?—A. None whatsoever.

Q. Were you at one time interrogated by the FBI on these reports?—A. I was asked to appear before the grand jury in 1945 in connection with the reports.

Q. Did you identify some?—A. I did.

Q. Were you shown some copies of reports bearing the name of John S. Service?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you able to identify them?—A. I was able to identify my own copies of the reports.

Q. Did you have them?—A. The FBI had all of them. They had taken them from Mr. Jaffe's office, I believe.

Q. Did you have any connection with the taking of these copies from Mr. Jaffe's office?—A. No. Mr. Jaffe brought the material to my home and he called for them when they were ready.

Q. And with reference to the investigation by the FBI, you had no connection except to testify as you stated before?—A. That's right.

Q. Did you have any knowledge whatever of the source of the documents bearing the name of John S. Service, which you copied?—A. No, I did not.

Q. Or of any others of the reports?—A. No, I did not. The fact that they were marked "secret" or "confidential" meant absolutely nothing to us because in our work for the Institute of Pacific Relations we would get papers on and off bearing that sort of heading and we would mimeograph two or three hundred for circulation so it did not seem queer to me at the time. I would not question it. I mean, I didn't question it.

Q. All the papers bearing the name of John S. Service came to you through Mr. Jaffe?—A. That's right.

Q. Not through the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. None at all.

Q. What did you do with the copies that you made for Mr. Jaffe?—A. Mr. Jaffe came to my home and collected them when ready.

Q. How many copies would you make?—A. I believe an original and three or an original and four. I don't remember.

Q. Did he state to you what he intended to do with them?—A. No; he did not.

Q. You have no knowledge, I take it, from what you have just said, as to how Mr. Jaffe got possession of these documents bearing the name of John S. Service?—A. No.

Q. Or any of the other documents which you copied?—A. All I know is that he brought them to me and said he was in quite a rush for them and the quicker I could have them ready and called him, the better it would be.

Q. Did he say that all the time?—A. There was a rush job on all of them and the quicker I could do it, the better.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall when the name of John S. Service first came to your attention?

A. In my work for the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you remember approximately what date?

A. No; that I would not remember. I believe he was a member of the organization, and if he was we would send him our bulletin or the Far Eastern Survey, and his name would be one of the names appearing on the subscription list. He would receive it as a member or as a subscriber.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would you be able to make an estimate of the number of documents bearing his name that you copied?

A. No.

Mr. ACHILLES. What form did Mr. Jaffe give you his documents in? Were they originals or carbon copies?

A. No; I had no carbons at all. They were all originals. There was a tremendous amount of mimeographed material bearing the heading of OWI and they were mostly excerpts of articles run in different Chinese papers and although I did not copy them all in sections, I copied maybe half pages of one and quarter pages of others and on others he wanted the full contents copied.

Mr. ACHILLES. The documents Mr. Service signed would not be the mimeographed ones?

A. No; they would be State Department.

Mr. ACHILLES. You say they were original signed documents?

A. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. You spoke of the number of the Institute of Pacific Relations documents being marked "secret" or "confidential." Were those documents originating in the Institute of Pacific Relations or were they originating in governmental sources?

A. Not from governmental sources at all. They were either office copies, let us say, on economic viewpoints in a certain country or part of a manuscript or whole chapter of a manuscript as a rule. Nothing originated at the office. Some may have been originated by Mr. Carter or Mr. Field or any one of the people employed there but none of them were Government papers.

Mr. ACHILLES. And when some governmental papers of the same classification were given to you to copy, did that attract your attention at all as being unusual?

A. No, because of my contact with things marked "secret" and having stencils and making maybe two or three hundred copies. They would be marked for circulation and we made two or three hundred copies. So it did not seem queer at all.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you terminated your work for the institute in 1942?

A. In June 1942.

The CHAIRMAN. To that date were you aware that the institute was in any way Communist led?

A. No. As far as I was concerned, I was definitely under the impression it was a nonpartisan organization. They would publish articles in their magazine and in the Fortnightly Bulletin giving pros and cons on different subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Mr. Field, up to that date, have anything to do with it?

A. He was secretary to the American Council during my employment there. I don't remember the exact years.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether or not he was a Communist?

A. No, I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you amplify any further the reasons for your impression that Mr. Service was a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

A. The name was just familiar. It just seems to stay there. I am quite sure he was a member of the institute. His name did come to my notice at that time. If he wasn't a member, then he was a subscriber to either their magazine or their bulletin but I am almost positive he was a member.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the difference between a subscriber and a member?

A. A subscriber would just pay for the subscription to either the magazine or the bulletin and a member would contribute anywhere from $5 upward to the organization and if they contributed $5 I think $5 would entitle them to the Fortnightly Bulletin and I think a $10 subscriber was entitled to both plus any other papers or documents the institute circulated among their members.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no recollection as to what type of membership Mr. Service may have had?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You may inquire.

Mr. RHETTS. Thank you. Can I have these original documents?

(Mr. Moreland handed papers to Mr. Rhettts.)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I believe, Miss Blumenthal, you testified a moment ago that as to papers bearing the signature of Mr. Service, which you may have typed for Mr. Jaffe, it was your distinct recollection that all of those were original State Department papers?—A. Not all of them—some of them.

Q. I would like to inquire to see what you mean by original State Department papers. I show you document 177 which is the original of dispatch 3018, dated Chungking, China, September 28, 1944, and I would like to ask you whether that is the type of paper which you regard as an original State Department paper?—A. I don't recall if I did any on this type of paper. The ones I remember distinctly were all 8-by-11 standard size and it was on a much heavier paper and it wasn't flimsy at all.

Q. Did such papers bear a printed or reproduction of printed headings such as "Embassy of the United States of America," or "State Department"?—A. State Department I do remember. I don't remember if there was any Embassy of the United States of America.

Q. Are you familiar with the process of reproducing documents called the ozalid process?—A. No; I am not.

Q. Was the Board able to obtain a specimen of an ozalid?

Mr. ACHILLES. We will ask Mrs. Ivey to get a specimen.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Q. I will come back to this question.

I believe you testified that it is your recollection that the papers which you typed for Mr. Jaffe, which may have borne the name "John S. Service" on them, were all typed by you during the spring of 1945?—A. That is correct.

Q. Is it possible for you to place the dates a little more specifically?—A. I do know it was before May 24 because on May 24 I gave birth to a little girl so it couldn't have been after that. I think it was mainly between February and April. I think it was over a 2-month period.

Q. Mainly between—A. February and April 1945.

Q. By "April" do you mean the first of April or the end of April?—A. I wouldn't know. I think it was at the end of April. I don't think I did anything for Mr. Jaffe in May.

Q. You referred to copies being prepared between February and April. Can you give us some idea of how frequently Mr. Jaffe brought papers to you for copying?—A. I don't know. The first time he came up I think he brought 50 or 60 pages of typing.

Q. Can you place at all what the first time would be?—A. It is quite a long time back but I am quite sure it was about February. I think that is what I would say. That is in my mind, between February and April but I cannot remember exactly.

Q. Your recollection I believe you indicated is that the first time, which you place in February, he brought some 50 or 60 pages?—A. I mean sheets. I don't mean documents—I mean pages.

Q. Do you have a recollection as to whether any of these Service memoranda were among that batch?—A. No, I am quite sure they were not. I believe they were mostly all—they were long sheets of yellow paper—mimeographed material headed OWI. That was the first batch.

Q. Can you place when you think you began seeing papers that bore the name of Service on them?—A. Later on I did get papers marked "State Department." I don't know if there were any other papers from any other divisions but I did have State Department papers.

Q. Is it your recollection that any material bearing Service's name, which you typed, were a part of these State Department papers?—A. Yes, I believe there were some.

Q. Which would bear State Department or other printed headings at the top and would show it was from a Government department.—A. I believe there were some but how many I do not know.

Q. Do you remember any other names which appeared on any of the documents that you copied for Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, the only reason I remember Mr. Service's name is because it is a familiar name. I came across it before in my work in the office.

Mr. STEVENS. In your work for the office—

A. The Institute of Pacific Relations.

Q. I believe you testified you were questioned by the FBI at the time of the Amerasia arrests?—A. That's right.

Q. And I believe you testified you then appeared before the grand jury?—A. In Washington; yes.

Q. Have you been subsequently interviewed by the FBI?—A. No.

Q. Not since?—A. 1945. I came to Washington twice in 1945. The first time I appeared before the grand jury and the second time I don't remember if I appeared before the grand jury but I did come down but I don't remember what happened.

Q. But you are quite sure you have not been interviewed by other FBI agents since that time?—A. Not until Mr. Reynolds came up and asked me to come down to Washington.

Q. Can you recall whether in any of your interviews with the FBI in 1945 you then told the FBI that you recalled typing documents which bore the name of John S. Service?—A. I don't think they asked that question directly. They did show me copies of typewritten papers and asked me to identify. I did, I believe, by putting my signature to them.

Q. Have you ever told the FBI that you recall typing papers bearing the signature of Mr. Service and also papers bearing the signature of the American Ambassador in China?—A. I may have said I typed papers bearing Mr. Service's signature. That question was put to me. I don't know if I was ever questioned about papers with the American Ambassador's signature.

Q. Referring again to document No. 177, I ask you to look at page 4 of this despatch and I invite your attention particularly to the typed words "C. E. Gauss" above which is his signature in ink. Do you think that you ever copied any documents which bore the signature of C. E. Gauss?—A. I may have. The name is not completely new to me. It seems to click. I am sure I have seen the name before.

Q. Do you ever remember typing any documents which bore the handwritten signature of Mr. Service?—A. I wouldn't recall; no. I don't know if they were handwritten or just typewritten.

Q. You have no recollection whatever?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel has asked for a copy of ozalid paper and Mr. Tanquary has appeared with such a copy. Will you give it to counsel please.

(Off the record conversation.)

Mr. STEVENS. Do you ever remember Mr. Service having contributed any articles to the Institute of Pacific Relations, to your knowledge, while working for them?

A. He may have. I am not positive. Thinking back, in 1936 the Institute of Pacific Relations had a conference and I think one of the pamphlets written was called Manchuria 1931, and that was written by John Stewart. I don't know why but I think at the time the impression was that John Stewart was the same party as John Service. That is the only connection I can think of Mr. Service's writing anything for the Institute, if it is one and the same party.

Mr. STEVENS. You stated you remembered typing materials that bore the heading of the Department of State. Do you remember typing any material signed by Mr. Service that did not bear the heading "Department of State"?

A. I don't recall.

Mr. STEVENS. You don't recall whether you did or did not?

A. I don't recall whether there were two types of papers. I know there were some Department of State papers that did have Mr. Service's signature but whether there were any without, I don't remember.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you question any personal notes on the material you copied for Mr. Jaffe?

A. No.

Mr. STEVENS. You stated a little bit ago that you were certain Mr. Service was a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations. What makes you certain he was a member rather than a subscriber?

A. I didn't say he was a member. I said I didn't remember whether he was a member or subscriber. I remember his name from the Institute of Pacific Relations. I am quite sure I didn't say I was positive he was a member. No; I don't think I did.

Mr. ACHILLES. You were dealing with circulation matters for the Institute of Pacific Relations.

A. That's right.

Mr. ACHILLES. Miss Blumenthal, you stated a little while ago that you believed the original typed documents, signed by Mr. Service, had been on paper size 8 by 11.

A. Yes; I believe they were.

Mr. STEVENS. And did the headings of those papers, as you recall, read "Department of State" or "American Embassy, Chungking," or what?

A. I don't remember whether they bore "American Embassy" or not. I do remember there were papers marked "State Department." There were also identifications and classifications on top before the contents started. What those classifications were I don't know.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you recall copying any original papers bearing Mr. Service's name on legal-sized paper?

A. It is possible because I have quite a bit of legal-sized paper. I may have made a mistake on the 8 by 11 size. It may have been on legal size but I think there was some 8 by 11.

Mr. STEVENS. The reason I ask is that documents prepared in the State Department are frequently on 8 by 11 paper, whereas documents from State Department offices abroad are ordinarily on legal-sized paper. You state you are not certain?

A. Not positive. If I saw the papers—not exactly the papers but my copies, I could identify my own papers by the way I type as typists can identify the papers by the type of machine they use but whether I can identify the material I typed from individually, I doubt very much if I could.

(Off the record.)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you wish to examine Mr. Tanquary?

Mr. RHETTS. I would like to ask a question beforehand.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS.

Q. In the last few minutes, Mrs. Blumenthal, you began discussing documents bearing Mr. Service's signature. I take it, from my previous question, that when you used the word "signature" you do not necessarily mean his handwritten signature?—A. No, I do not.

Q. You mean a document that has typed upon it the name "Service"?—A. That is correct.

Q. A little while ago, when we were inquiring about the type of State Department papers that you may have copied—I show you document No. 177, which is an original despatch from the Ambassador in China—you stated, I believe, that the things you type were on much thicker paper than this.—A. Naturally.

Q. Than paper upon which this despatch is written. Now, I have here a three-page document, headed No. 13, and dated April 12, 1950, which is an ozalid reproduction of typewriting on ordinary paper and I ask you if that is the type of paper that you think you copied from?—A. This is not the same type of paper. It was a still heavier paper. I don't know if it was originally typed on this paper or whether it was offset copies but it was definitely heavier paper than this.

Q. Now I show you document 321, which is a positive of a photostat of this material and I ask you if that is the type of paper?—A. This is the type of paper. I definitely worked with this type of paper.

Q. I see. So that what you were given in the way of State Department papers was a photostat of a State Department document which photostat would reproduce the official department heading at the top of the page and you copied from photostats of the State Department.—A. Not all but a good many were photostats. There was mimeographed paper and all kinds.

Q. I am directing my attention exclusively to the State Department papers.—A. I believe most of them were on that type of photostat paper.

Q. Were you ever in Mr. Jaffe's office at Amerasia?—A. Definitely; I worked there.

Q. Did he have photostat equipment in that office?—A. Not that I know of—not during the time I worked there.

A. Did you work in the office of Amerasia?—A. In the office. They maintained two offices in the building. One was Mr. Jaffe's and Miss Mitchell's private office and the other was just a private room consisting of two desks, at one of which the office manager worked and I occupied the other.

Q. This was during a period which came to a close some time in 1942?—A. June 1942.

Q. June 1942. Were you ever in the Amerasia offices in 1945?—A. No.

Q. Or 1944?—A. No; definitely not.

Q. So that as of that latter period, you simply don't know whether they had any facilities for photostating or otherwise reproducing documents?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask counsel, is the paper you just used in evidence?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes it is.

(Off the record.)

Mr. RHETTS. I have no further questions.

Mr. ACHILLES. Just one or two further questions. You described some of the documents which you received and copied as being original documents. I am not quite clear whether by that you mean original typed and signed documents; that is, with the handwritten signature, or were they in some other form with stereotyped signature?—A. Truthfully I couldn't say myself. It is so many years since I handled the material and many came in mimeographed form. Some came photostated. There may have been original copies with signed signatures, I cannot recall. If I saw my own papers I could tell you whether I typed them and in that way you could trace their source but I would not make any statement I am not sure of. I don't remember. I know what the contents of some were—the general idea—but I don't think I remember the State Department papers. I remember what was in the mimeographed papers—the type of work.

Mr. ACHILLES. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be all. You have nothing further counsel?

Mr. RHETTS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mrs. Blumenthal.

(Mr. Harold Z. Tanquary being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

The CHAIRMAN. Your name is?

A. Harold Zimmer Tanquary.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an employee of the State Department?

A. Yes sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In what position?

A. Control officer in the Reproduction Section, Central Services.

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel has some questions he desires to ask. .

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Are you, in your position as control officer in the Reproduction Section, familiar with the various methods and techniques for reproducing papers which are utilized in the State Department generally?—A. Yes sir.

Q. Now I show you document 321, which has previously been shown to Mrs. Blumenthal, and ask you to state by what process that document has been produced, if any?—A. By microfilm on 35 millimeter film and evidently on the automatic machine similar to the one we have downstairs.

Q. I am asking you by what method has the content of this paper been reproduced and what do you call this paper?—A. Well, it is a very good grade of photostat paper.

Q. Is that a photostatic reproduction or something?—A. No sir; it is microfilm.

Q. Can you tell us what the difference between that paper and photostat paper is?—A. It is a little bit lighter. It has a higher grade of rag content. It has to be a stronger paper to go through the machines—the filming and exposing of the paper through the developer, the fixer, and the drier.

Q. Would you say that, from the point of view of a person who is not expert in these matters, the glazed surface of this paper and the general thickness of the paper could easily be mistaken for a photostatic reproduction?—A. Yes sir.

Q. Is it fair to say that this is substantially like a photostat paper is in most respects, comparable to what a positive reproduction of a photostat would be?—A. That's right.

Q. Will you describe the ozalid process of reproduction of a typewritten document?—A. Any transparent piece of paper such as a maximum of about 13-pound paper—what we generally speak of as lightweight paper 13, 15, or 16. Generally it takes 13 and 9 as flimsy material. It does not necessarily have to be carbonized on the back, such as this; in other words, using any carbon image on lightweight paper would produce ozalid copies.

The master is placed on presensitized paper and fed into the machine where light will penetrate through the transparent master onto the presensitized paper.

The color and density of the ozalid copies are determined by an adjustment of the machine allowing so many feet of paper or sensitized material to travel so many feet per minute.

The master is stripped off from the presensitized paper after it passes by the light tube. The presensitized paper is carried up by tapes past tubes of ammonia fumes where the sensitized paper is developed, and thence by same tapes to be ejected as finished copy.

Q. I show you document No. 177 which is an original despatch.—A. That has all been carbonized.

Q. This paper has had a carbon reversed on the back side of each sheet, has it not?—A. Yes sir.

Q. You say that is not a necessary technique in order to be able to make an ozalid reproduction?—A. No, sir; but it makes a better ozalid reproduction.

Q. Referring again to document 177 and the first page thereof, this document bears, does it not, certain stamps, "Division of Communications and Records," and other routings as well as certain handwriting in the upper right-hand corner, indicating distribution which was to be made of that document. Is that correct?—A. That's right.

Q. If this piece of paper here—page 1 of this document—were to be reproduced by the ozalid process, would the reproduction show the handwriting here in the upper right-hand corner?—A. This would be very faint because light is so intense that it will penetrate this and, therefore, expose the presensitized paper which will leave only a faint outline. I mean, with the adjustment of the machine you can make this come up.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me inquire, paper 177 just referred to, is that numbered from your numbering system or the numbering on the paper?

Mr. RHETTS. This is our numbering system. This document is in evidence as an exhibit as No. 177.

Q. I ask you to look at page 4 of document 177 and I ask you—this bears the typed words "C. E. Gauss," doesn't it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And above it is a handwritten signature, is there not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would the ozalid reproduction process reproduce that handwritten signature?—A. It would be very faint.

Q. It would be faint but it would reproduce?—A. It would reproduce.

Q. I show you document No. 2181 which consists of four typewritten pages bearing the handwritten signature of John S. Service, and then, following that, four pages which are identical with the first except that they are on a different type of paper and I ask you whether the last four pages of this document were prepared by the ozalid process?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you unmistakably identify them as having been prepared by that process?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could those last four pages have been reproduced by any other process; I mean, is it possible in other words that these four pages were reproduced by any process other than ozalid?—A. No, sir.

Q. Can you tell whether these last four pages were prepared from the first four pages? By that question I mean, can you, by inspecting the first four pages, ascertain whether they were placed on top of the presensitized paper and had light pass through them?—A. They are identical copies unless there were some notes that were entered later.

Q. I direct your attention to the first page of the reproduction. In the upper left-hand corner there is reproduced certain handwriting which is to the following effect: "Copies to MID-2, ONI, OSS, CA." Is that correct?—A. Correct, sir.

Q. And that same handwriting appears on the first page of the original document, does it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. On the other hand, on the first page of the original document, besides the initials "OSS" there is the figure "2," is there not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Does that appear on the ozalid reproduction?—A. No, sir.

Q. On the original there appears the figure "2" beside the letters "CA." Is that correct?—A. Correct.

Q. Does that appear on the reproduction?—A. No, sir.

Q. On the original underneath the word "CA" appear the letters "CB." Is that correct?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do they appear on the reproduction?—A. No, sir.

Q. There are at least one, two, three, four impressions or rubber stamps appearing on the original copy, do they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do any of those appear on the reproduction?—A. Well, this one here is so faint it won't show.

Q. One of the rubber stamps which appears beside the third paragraph of this document is very, very faintly reproduced on the reproduction. Is that correct?—A. I believe it is 1945.

Q. One of the other rubber stamps—A. Well, this one here—

Q. The one at the bottom of the page—A. There is a faint outline of the document. It is extremely faint.

Q. You would not recognize it unless you had the original to compare with?—A. It isn't a good ozalid copy. It could have been run at a faster speed.

Q. Regarding the handwritten initials which appear in the upper right-hand corner of the original, showing the routing of this document, do those symbols appear on the reproduction?—A. No, sir.

Q. They did not come through at all, did they?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you employed in the Department in 1945?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you come?—A. In 1948.

Q. So that you would have no knowledge of the practices with respect to reproduction of documents in the spring of 1945?—A. From what I heard, sir, there was an ozalid process at the time. Almost all the documents were ozalid and photostated.

Mr. SERVICE. May we have a recess?

The CHAIRMAN. You said we would adjourn at 12. I think we will have to adjourn for the noon hour at this point because two of the members of the Board have appointments at 12 o'clock.

Mr. RIETTS. It appears that we may want to ask this gentleman some further questions so if he would like to come back—

The CHAIRMAN. He will come back.

Mr. RIETTS. I propose we take a 5-minute recess—

The CHAIRMAN. The Board will have to adjourn at this moment.

Mr. RIETTS. Then perhaps Mr. Tanquary will return for just a few minutes after the luncheon recess.

The CHAIRMAN. At what time?

Mr. MORELAND. Two o'clock. We have Mr. Kennan coming in at 2 o'clock.

Mr. RIETTS. Can you be here at 1:45? We may have further questions.

Mr. TANQUARY. Yes, sir.

(Meeting adjourned at 12 noon.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: May 29, 1950, 1: 45 to 5: 30 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building, Washington, D. C.

Reporter: Edna C. Moyer.

Members of Board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Charles Edward Rhetts, Reilly, Rhetts & Ruckelshaus.

(The meeting reconvened at 1: 45 p. m.)

(Continuation of testimony by Mr. Tanquary:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Q. Will you take the stand, Mr. Tanquary? I show you again document 321, which I showed you before the luncheon recess, and I believe you testified this morning that this is not a photostat or reproduced by photostatic process but is instead a photographic reproduction of the microfilm.—A. That is right, sir.

Q. I believe you also testified that the paper on which this photographic reproduction of the microfilm is made is heavier and of higher rag content than photostat paper?—A. Yes, sir, that is right.

Q. It is also accurate that the gloss on this photographic reproduction of a microfilm is heavier or shinier?—A. It is the gloss on the drum that it goes around to dry them.

Q. Is this a heavier gloss than appears normally on a photostatic reproduction?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you have with you copies of a photostatic reproduction of a document?—A. There is a photostatic reproduction [handing a paper to the attorney].

Q. I ask that that be marked for identification as "Document 325," a photostatic reproduction consisting of one page, which is headed at the top, "American Embassy, Stockholm, June 3, 1949." Now, do you have another copy of this?—A. Yes, sir [handed the copy to the attorney].

The CHAIRMAN. Just add for the record, if you will, that this paper is in itself not relevant to the case.

Q. That is correct, it is not relevant except in connection with this technical matter which we are discussing. The substantive content of this document is wholly unrelated to this case. I hand to the Board the document which has been marked for identification as "Document 325." Now you also showed us this morning a copy of an ozalid reproduction. Do you have that?—A. [Handed a paper to the attorney.]

Q. I hand that document to the Board.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to give that a number?

Q. I think we will. I ask that there be marked for identification as "Document 326" a three-page ozalid reproduction, a document headed "American Consulate General, Tientsin, China, April 12, 1950."

The CHAIRMAN. The contents of which are not of themselves relevant to the case.

Q. Now, Mr. Tanquary, would you say that an ordinary typist who is inexperienced on the various techniques of reproduction might easily confuse a document such as Document 325, which you identified as a photostat, with Document 326, which you have identified as an ozalid reproduction?—A. Very easily, sir. I mean, they would not be able to tell. They would know that this is some photographic process.

Q. "This" being 325?—A. 325, resemblance between these two, knowing that there was some kind of photographic reproduction.

Q. When you say "these two," you are saying resemblance between 321—A. 321 and 325.

Q. Now directing your attention particularly to the possibility of confusing the reproduction process used in 325, which is a photostat, and 326, which is an ozalid, would you say that those two might easily be confused by an inexperienced person as being the same type of document?—A. That is right, sir.

Q. Is it fair to say that the weight of the paper in the two is approximately the same?—A. Approximately the same.

Q. I have no further question.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Tanquary.

(The witness was dismissed.)

Mr. RHETTS. Now I should like to offer at this point in evidence documents marked for identification 325 and 326.

The CHAIRMAN. How about 321? It is already in?

(Off-record discussion.)

Mr. RHETTS. I also offer in evidence as an exhibit Document 321, and ask that those be marked as exhibits.

(Document marked "325," headed "American Embassy, Stockholm, June 3, 1949," was submitted in evidence and marked "Exhibit 15.")

(Document marked "326," headed "American Consulate General, Tientsin, China, April 12, 1950," was submitted in evidence and marked "Exhibit 16.")

(Document marked "321," headed "The Following Message Is From Hurley for the Eyes of the Secretary of State Alone, 31 January 1945," was submitted in evidence and marked "Exhibit 17.")

The CHAIRMAN. Now are we ready for Mr. Kennan?

Mr. MORELAND. As soon as he arrives.

The CHAIRMAN. Can Mr. Service go on the stand? Mr. Service is on the stand.

Mr. Service, some reference was made by Mrs. Blumenthal on the stand to an article written by a John Stewart. Did you write any articles under the name "John Stewart"?

A. I have never written any articles under the name "John Stewart."

The CHAIRMAN. Did you write articles for the Institute of Pacific Relations?

A. I have never written any article for the Institute of Pacific Relations nor for any other publication.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

A. I can't answer that question definitely unless I consult my own records. I am a type of member, the type which I believe is the cheapest and lowest in the scale and involving least participation.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is what?

A. I believe it is subscribing member, but I would have to check to state with certainty the type the membership is.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you are that. Were you that in 1942 to 1945?

A. No, sir; I believe I was not. I was a subscribing member from about 1936 or 1937 until about 1941, I believe, and after I went to Chungking during the war it was impossible for us to receive any magazines and I discontinued all of my subscriptions, including my subscription to the Institute of Pacific Relations. I did not resume that subscription or subscribing membership until about 1946.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall what dues you paid for your subscribing membership?

A. The cost of the membership at present is $15 a year. I believe in those earlier years from 1937 or 1938 to 1941 it was probably $10, but it might have been even less than that.

Mr. ACHILLES. You have never had a membership in which the dues involved were more than $15 a year?

A. Never. I couldn't afford it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Bring the witness in.

(Mr. Kennan, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Kennan, your full name, please?—A. George Frost Kennan.

Q. And your residence?—A. Washington, D. C.

Q. Your connection with the State Department?—A. I am the counselor of the Department.

Q. And would you for the record detail in general briefly your experience in connection with the State Department?—A. Yes, sir. I entered State Department 24 years ago this year and shortly after my entry into the Foreign Service was detailed to undergo special study as what they called a "Russian expert." In those days that meant a pretty long course of preparation; normally 3 years of academic training and a year of special preparatory service in the field, so that it was normally a four and a half year course of study. After that I served for 2 years doing research and reporting work on Russian matters in Riga, Latvia, because we had no representation in the Soviet Union at that time. When we recognized Soviet Russia, I went in there in the very beginning, even in advance of the establishment of a mission, with Mr. Bullitt when he went to present credentials, and since then a good deal of my services has been in the Russian field. I have served altogether three times in Moscow and at times in the Department in connection with the Russian matters.

Q. How many years have you served in connection with Russian matters?—A. I have served 9 years in what is now the Soviet Union; about 5 of those were served in Moscow. I think that is correct. I have also had just before and during the war 7 years of service in other places, mostly in Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Lisbon, Algiers.

Q. Mr. Kennan, the Loyalty-Security Board on May 25, 1950, asked you to review certain writings and reports of Mr. John Stewart Service, which were put into your possession. As an expert witness for the Board in that connection, were you given possession of certain documents, about 126 of them, which had for identification numbers attached running from 101 to 227?—A. That is correct. Those are exactly the numbers that I had.

Q. And have you made a review of those documents and are you able to give the Board your opinion with reference to the Communist attitude revealed by those documents, if any?—A. Yes; I have; I have reviewed them as carefully as I could within the limits of the time available to me, which meant that each one has had individual attention, and there are notes here which I could show you if you like. It was a considerable job but there are notes on each one of the documents. They run into quite a number of pages.

Q. Would you like to offer those in connection with your testimony?—A. I would be happy to. They should be retyped. Many of them I typed myself and just X'd out mistakes and that sort of thing, but they are certainly at the disposal of the Board if it can make any use of them in any way; I would be happy to have them used.

(Typewritten copy of notes submitted by Mr. Kennan was admitted in evidence and marked "Exhibit 18.")

Q. Making such use of those notes as you desire, will you state to the Board what you find in these reports?—A. I will, indeed. I should say, I think, that in addition to going through these reports I have also given attention to a number of documents which I thought would be expressive of the Moscow Communist Party line or of the attitudes taken in conversation by Soviet officials during that same period in order that I might have a basis for comparison. The reports here were written by Mr. Service, as I see it, in a number of capacities, some as an official stationed temporarily in the Department, some as a consular official in Chungking, and Lanchow, some as a political adviser to General Stilwell in Chungking, and I think the largest group were written from Yenan in Communist China where Service was stationed for long periods, as I understand it, with the observers' section of the United States Army.

Q. Just to put dates to the period, they begin, I take it, in 1942 and end in 1945?—A. That is correct. They range, the ones that I had access to, from May 1942 to March 1945, according to my copies. They break down roughly as follows: 37 of them are purely factual, involving no comment; another 53 are reports of an essentially factual nature, the material presented objectively and with a minimum of comment or interpretation; 3 of them are special OSS interrogations; 14 of them are generally interpretative in nature, that is analyzing a given situation or an event but of relatively minor importance; 20 of them may be classed as important studies, interpretations and analyses of major problems. I have, of course, given most attention to those 20 as the ones that bear most on the question you have raised.

Now in reviewing those I would like to tell you something of the nature of the reports and the considerations which seemed to me to be applicable to the determination of the question you have before you. I think we should note first of all that all of these reports without exception were written during the period when this country was at war. You will all remember that it was the policy of this Government and it was very frequently expressed that we should concern ourselves primarily with the winning of the war and that we should not allow ourselves to be diverted from this purpose by any ulterior considerations. Our goal in the Far East in particular was primarily, first and foremost, the unconditional surrender of Japan.

Now it is against this background that I think we have to measure the fact that these reports were throughout severely critical of the Central Chinese Government. The picture you get of that Government from the reports is that it was dominated less by an interest in bringing the war with Japan to a successful conclusion as rapidly as possible, less by such an interest than by a determination on the part of the generalissimo and his leading advisers to cling to their own position of power in China and to arrange things in such a way that they might continue to cling to it when the war was over.

You get the impression that following our entry into the war the generalissimo felt that he could depend on us not only to win that foreign war for him but also to help him perhaps in the future in an internal Chinese struggle against the Communists; that for this reason he felt that his own military forces, those who at any rate were most loyal to him and on which he placed the greatest value, need no longer be jeopardized in the war against Japan but could be held in reserve for what he undoubtedly envisaged as the coming internal struggle within China against the Communists; that for that reason he put inferior and unreliable forces in the front line, gave them no dynamic military leadership, did not conduct the war against Japan with full determination. It appears from the reports that Service and others—I know other United States observers, whom he quoted in his reports, were out at that time, had the impression that the Chinese Government was relying on our support not only to help it in a future military conflict against the Chinese Communists but also to relieve it of the necessity of making internal reforms which would have been necessary really in order for it to remain in power on a basis of popular approval. If it could avoid making those reforms it would be able to retain a sort of monopoly position in Chinese political life, and you have from the reports the impression that that was exactly what was in the minds of the Central Government leaders: that with our help they felt that they could dispose of both problems and at the same time be able to avoid venturing into reform projects which might have been dangerous to it.

Now it was Service's view, as I gather it from the reports, that such a policy represented a state of affairs which was unsatisfactory from the standpoint of the prosecution of the war against Japan and highly dangerous because of its lack of realism to the prospects—dangerous to the prospects of future stability in China. In one report he wrote:

"Chiang unwittingly may be contributing to Russian dominance in eastern Asia by internal and external policies which, if pursued in their present form, will render China too weak to serve as a possible counterweight to Russia. By doing so Chiang may be digging his own grave: not only in North China and Manchuria, but also national groups such as Korea and Formosa may be driven into the arms of the Soviets."

Now I believe that he had the impression that it was all the more important that he should make these weaknesses in the Chinese Government apparent, and its policies apparent to people in our Government because it was the deliberate policy of the Chinese Government, as he saw it, to conceal this state of affairs from the United States public opinion, and he felt that unless he and other American observers did their part in bringing this situation to the attention of people at home, it would go unnoticed. I believe that those are the reasons why the reporting was of a nature highly critical of the generalissimo and the Kuomintang. Now I am unable to say from my own knowledge of the history of these matters that it was unjustly critical. My impression is that the facts were substantially as they are here described by Mr. Service in these reports. To the extent that the critical note rings out more sharply than it might otherwise have done, I must say that I find that myself explainable by the natural tendency of all official observers, a tendency that I know very well from my own reporting experience in Moscow and Nazi Germany, to try to debunk the official propaganda of a foreign government which you feel is trying to put something over on your own government. I know that our reporting about Russia was always more critical than it otherwise would have been because we always felt we must at all costs reveal to our own Government the falseness and dangerousness of the line which the Soviet Government was trying to put across to us, and I know that I myself have written report after report trying to break down what I felt was a false concept and build-up in the minds of the people here at home.

It is true that during this period the Soviet press and Communist Party line was also severely critical of the Chinese National Government. Many of its criticisms coincided in one area or another with ones which you can find in these reports. I have given special attention to that and have thought it over very carefully. I can't find any particular significance in it. The Russian Communists and those that follow their line are by and large, it seems to me, excellent critics of their adversaries, very shrewd and very penetrating. They are often as good and accurate and as telling in their criticism of others as they are hypocritical in their defense of their own policies.

I know from my experience that a large portion of their criticism of the Nazi and Japanese Governments during the war not only coincided with our own but won our admiration. When we read the Russian press we thought, "These boys really know something about picking an adversary to pieces." I think therefore it is not surprising that criticisms of our own observers in China should have happened to coincide with ones which were being voiced in the Communist press, and I find no coincidence there that goes beyond what you might have expected by the circumstances.

I think it is also clear from these reports that the attitude reflected in them was not expressive, insofar as it criticized the Central Government, was not expressive of any Communist inspiration or guidance. The material is free from the exaggerations and distortions, from these peculiarly nasty little spins on the ball which the Communist propagandists invariably give to anything they write and which are the hallmarks of practically any material that has Communist origins. We can almost always trace it by certain trains of thought, of avarice, and distortion and certain peculiar nastiness of touch that those fellows have.

Let me give you an example. The Soviet propagandists, I noted, in their treatment of the relations between the Chinese Government and the Japanese at that time gave the impression that important elements in the Chinese Government were out-and-out paid agents of Japan endeavoring as they sit under direct orders from Tokyo to provoke a conflict or exacerbate the conflict between the Chinese Communists and the Chinese Central Government. In other words, the Communist propagandists were saying the generalissimo's own entourage contained important elements, paid agents, up to their neck in a purely subversive type of treason.

There were no such suggestions in Service's reports. They contained no such extremes and distortions. They treated of the same subjects but in a moderate and dispassionate way. In certain important instances these reports take issue with the party line, with the Communist Party line. A notable one is that of the frequent defects to the Japanese of front-line commanders and units on the Chinese side. The Communist Party line alleged that this was by prearrangement between the Chinese Government and the Japanese, that the Chinese Government wanted these forces to go over in order that it might in that way insinuate the Chinese forces into the areas held by the Japanese, so that when the Japanese finally collapsed and left forces, there would be Chinese Government in that area capable of dealing with the Chinese Communists who had organized the territory among and underneath the noses of the people and among the Japanese lines.

Mr. Service takes issue with that view in his reports and interprets the defects as arising more probably from the fact that it was the policy of the generalissimo to place in the front line the forces of the war-lord allies of his in China, which forces were mostly composed of mercenaries and therefore had a poor morale and little conviction and were not very loyal to the generalissimo, the reason for that being on the generalissimo's part that these were troops that didn't matter and if they got shot up in the conflict with Japan that was a matter of relatively little importance to him. I simply cite that as an example of a direct conflict between these reports and the Communist Party line at that period. Now, so much for the attitude with respect to the Central Government in China.

I think I ought to treat also the attitude then toward the Chinese Communists themselves. I think again we must be careful to bear in mind the setting against which the reporting took place. We were at that time allies with Russia, our Government was giving aid on a colossal scale to the Russian Communists, who were the center of the movement. It could therefore not have—there could have been at that time no implication that the granting of aid to Communists or the conducting of relations with Communists in wartime was in itself anything surprising or out of the way from the standpoint of American policy. I simply cite that because I recall for part of that period I was in Moscow where we had a huge lend-lease mission, and anything that interfered with the tremendous flow of aid coming in there was dimly viewed indeed, and I got my own fingers burned at one time for asking why the Soviet Government needed 2 years' supply of film strip in one shipment on the lend-lease. In other words, I am simply emphasizing that at that time all this was not only legitimate but was sacrosanct in the case of the Soviet Government.

Mr. Service seems to have been advocated in these reports from the beginning that we should consider supporting the Chinese Communists in their effort against the Japanese. He did not urge initially that we do this—or at any time, I think—without adequate investigation and study of the Chinese Communists themselves. In 1943 the reports were urging the Department to send observers to the Communist-held areas in order to find out about conditions there and help us determine our policy with regard to Chinese Communists. There was obviously no intent at that time to influence the Government along pro-Communist lines, because Mr. Service complained in those reports that the information then available to our Government stemmed in part from journalists "who appear to have a bias favorable to the Communists" and that therefore we ought to have our own people in there to get unbiased reports, and he warned that any brief visits by United States officials might not be fruitful because these officials would be, if they only went for 2 or 3 days, and I quote again, "would be under the influence of official guides," meaning Communist officials. It seems to me, therefore, that the initial reports urging our Government to make a study of the Communists in China, to send observers there to learn about it, were not written in any pro-Communist spirit, since they warned us clearly of the pitfalls and cited dependence on pro-Communist observers as one of the reasons why we ought to have ones of our own there.

During the period before he himself proceeded there, he obviously had extensive contact as a reporting officer with Communist representatives in the China controlled by the National Government, and he reported extensively their statements to him. Most of these were reported in what we can call deadpan fashion, they were simply relayed to the Department. Some of them were comment. I would like to point out that the matters discussed, the matters treated in the views of these Communist officials, which he reported to this Government, were matters of the highest importance in the conduct of the war against Japan. The Chinese Communist forces were part of the forces opposing the Japanese forces in the Far East. Anything we could find out about the territory from which they were being directed, about conditions in the Communist area, and about the merits and failings and policies and views of the Communist leaders was obviously highly pertinent to the war effort, and there was no greater impropriety in tapping this source of information than was involved in our own efforts in Moscow at the same time to tap the views of the Soviet leaders and to report them faithfully to this Government.

As I gather from the documents, Mr. Service went to Yen-an in the summer of 1944, and from that time on there follows a series of reports from Yen-an extending into the spring of 1945. Many of these reports again were purely factual and dealt with matters which were not really ones of political interpretation—some-what strictly military or economic. Others were of high importance from the standpoint of interpretation of events. Like me and other official observers who went to the Communist areas at that time, he was impressed with a number of phenomena—and which compared favorably with those which he had known in the China under the control of the Nationalist Government—and he was impressed with superior morale, discipline, earnestness of intention, frankness of approach, and integrity of administration among the Communists. I think he was impressed with the greater determination evident in their effort against Japan. They had penetrated the areas back of the Japanese forces; they had organized those areas politically—all that called for daring and courage and for good morale, which there is no question about that they had. He felt that it would be desirable for our Government to take a greater interest in the Communists, to help them in their operations against Japan, and to try to build up such a relationship with them as could constitute one of the foundations of our postwar policy toward China, if I interpret the reports correctly.

He felt that the Chinese Communist Party, and I quote here, "must be counted under any circumstances a continuing and important influence in China." He felt that a hopeful future could be seen for China only if some sort of accommodation could be found between the Communists and the Central Government, that the Communists were already too strong to be defeated by force of arms by the Central Government in a civil war, that therefore some sort of political accommodation would be necessary eventually, that it was important for this that we, as far as we were concerned, have relations with both sides and not just with one. He said that if the conflict then in progress—namely, the World War—were to be followed by civil war, there could be expected to emerge out of such a civil struggle only, and I quote again, "a more progressive Kuomintang government or a Communist state, probably of the present modified Chinese Communist type."

Then, as the prospects for a more progressive Kuomintang government became dimmer, he became increasingly concerned for the future. He believed in the fall of 1944 that the Communists were then sincere in seeking Chinese unity, in the hope of American and on the basis of American support—that is, that if we gave them our support they might accept it sincerely—"But," he wrote, "this does not preclude their turning back toward Soviet Russia if they are forced to in order to survive an American-supported Kuomintang attack." In the early part of his period of service there he felt that basically, as I read it from these dispatches, basically the Chinese Communist Government had in it enough learnings toward democracy to make it probable that if it could survive, if it did survive and continued in power after the war, its power and development along the lines should not be those of a monopoly of power by a single party.

Now it seems to me in reading over these reports that there was in them and in certain places a certain naïveté with respect to the Soviet Union and perhaps with respect to the forces which were already at work though not on the surface within the International Communist movement and within the Chinese Communist movement in particular. The indications of that attitude toward the Soviet Union are conflicting. There are a few which indicate a certain ignorance of Soviet conditions, of the full extent of the ferociousness of the concentration of power within the Soviet sphere and the full ruthlessness and relentlessness of the Soviet Government. There are other indications which would point to a greater understanding of it, but there are certain ones which I would say simply indicated a lack of knowledge of how really bitter things were inside the direct sphere of Soviet power.

When I say that there were also certain signs of lack of appreciation for the deeper forces which were at work in the International Communist movement and perhaps among the Chinese Communists, I mean it this way. In the Russian Communist movement, all of us are convinced that the factors which have forced this movement to become more and more ruthless, more dictatorial, more addicted to a monopoly of power, more intolerant of any rival opinion or opposition opinion, that those factors were planted in it at a very early date, actually at the time of the split between Bolsheviks and Mensheviks in 1904 and 1905, and that the principles of party organization and of methods which were adopted at that time by Lenin were ones which carried with them a sort of logical compulsion toward a greater and greater concentration of power, toward greater and greater excess on the part of the régime toward its enemies and toward the situation we have got today.

Now it may be that the same thing is operable in the Chinese Communist movement to the extent that those Chinese Communists did have their ideological origin in Moscow; that they, in other words, had been infected by some of those same things. You don't see in the earlier ones of these reports from Yen-an any recognition of that possibility. I notice that in the later reports from Yen-an, if I do not misinterpret them, there seems to have been a modification of Mr. Service's opinion and he is beginning to doubt that things will work out quite that happily and to feel that power itself and the struggle for power is going to play a much larger part in the motivation of the Chinese Communist movement.

However, you have to bear in mind in connection with that that he himself had predicted at an earlier date, as I just read to you, that if it were to develop into a Chinese civil war with ourselves on the side of the Chinese Government forces, that the Chinese Communists would be pushed along that direction and pushed into the direction of a closer association with Moscow.

Now I must say that I do not have sufficient knowledge about the Chinese Communist movement and I don't think the world does, I don't think the data are yet available on which to make such a judgment, to determine whether those things which were true of the Russian Communist movement were also true of the Chinese Communist movement. I think it is too early yet in the story for us to know whether the path on which the Chinese Communists have now embarked led from inner compulsions which would have been there anyway or whether it stemmed from the attitudes which we took during the war and immediately after the war, so that I cannot be sure in my own mind that the view reflected in these reports might not have been accurate and that if we had not supported the Central Government at all after the war, if we ourselves had taken a more or less equal attitude toward the two régimes, it is possible that these things would not have turned out in the way that they did.

With regard to this area which I have defined as that of a certain naïveté, if we can call it that, or certain ignorance of relationships within the Communist world, I would like to point the following factors which I think bear on them. In the first place it is my own experience that only or as a rule only those who have actually resided and worked in the Soviet Union for a long time can have a fully adequate picture in their own minds of the way that system works, of the jealousy of the central power, of its intolerance, and its insistence on an implicit obedience by everyone who is under its sphere.

In the second place, I think I detect in his report another thing with which I am familiar from my own experience, and that is a tendency, when we are critical of a régime about which we are writing to be indulgent toward others who are its critics. I know that in Nazi Germany in the thirties many honest liberal observers tended to find themselves at one in their criticisms and their hatred of the Nazi regime with the German Communists and with the Soviet representatives, and they tended to take a much more indulgent view of Soviet Russia because it was against Nazi Germany than they did of Nazi Germany itself. I think there may have been something of the same sort of thing in China. There is no question about it in my mind that the behavior of the Chinese Government throughout those years to an honest American observer was irritating and alarming. It provoked a sort of debunking attitude on the part of those Americans who were there. In that they found themselves often at one with the Chinese Communists in their critical attitude toward that regime. There was a certain natural tendency to assume that another great government like the Russian Government which stood on the side and which was itself to some extent critical of the National Government must really be better. I think that is the thing which has affected all of us and I am to a certain degree guilty in that respect myself.

For example, all of us who served in the Soviet Union were outraged by the way the Russians treated the Chinese consular officers in the Russian provincial towns. That is, they treated all consular officers that way, isolating them, putting floodlights on their houses day and night, guards all around them, not permitting them to have a single unofficial contact in the town, that sort of thing, but they were worse toward the Chinese. When you read these reports you find that the Chinese were applying precisely the same treatment to the Russian representatives in China. Who was guilty of starting it, I don't know. I think it is old Asiatic practice and to look for the origins of it is like trying—well, a sort of chicken-and-egg procedure. All I can say is that we in Moscow sympathized with the Chinese representatives in their plight out in the Russian provincial towns. I see here that our representatives in China sympathized with the Soviet representatives in their plight in the Chinese provincial towns and I think they both reflect something of the same human reactions.

Finally I would like to point out that these deviations toward an attitude indulgent of the Soviet Government and indulgent of the Chinese Communists were no greater than what we might call the danger of the times, that is, the deviations from reality in this respect which were common to the statements of practically all the great war leaders on the Allied side, common to the statements and views of very many people here in Washington. I am sure that the views that Mr. Service expressed at that time in these reports would have been found if anything slightly on the conservative or reactionary side by a number of important people that I could mention here in Washington at that particular period. They are not nearly as "starry-eyed," if I may use that term, as things that you will find for instance in books that were published by prominent people here, by ex-Ambassadors, by people in Government life. This was a time, we must remember, at which Mr. Churchill was advocating a policy with respect to Tito which is almost directly analogous to that which is advocated in these reports with respect to the Chinese Communists, although at that time Tito was entirely a Communist loyal to Moscow and no one remotely envisaged the possibility that he would not be at a later date. Churchill too advocated that we not take a negative attitude toward him, that we supply him with arms and that we try to establish a relationship with him which could be fruitful for the postwar period. In general in our whole treatment of the Chinese problem at that time by prominent people in our own Government—I am thinking of people who came to Moscow and with whom we spoke there—you found a degree of unrealism certainly no smaller in these matters than that reflected in the reports.

I have to recall that when General Hurley came there in 1945 and talked with Stalin, he sent back a telegram to Washington which I, who was the Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow, thought so unrealistic that I had to follow it up with another telegram myself warning our Government please not to be misled by this, in that the Soviet Government was going to behave well after the war, and trying to explain—I said here: "It would be tragic if our natural anxiety for the support of the Soviet Union at this juncture, coupled with Stalin's use of words which mean all things to all people and his cautious affability, were to lead us into an undue reliance on Soviet aid or even Soviet acquiescence in the achievement of our long-term objectives in China." You could cite other examples of that sort of thing. The advocacy of the rapprochement between the Chinese Communists and the Chinese Government itself was one which was carried forward at that time by very important people.

Again I am constrained to recall that General Hurley himself wrote that there was no stronger advocate of negotiations between the Communists and the Chinese Government than himself and that he had done more in an effort to bring about a just settlement between the Communists and the Government than any other man, and that he believed he was the best friend that the Chinese Communists had in Chungking. Now that was not—at this time it was made—in any sense a remarkable statement. I think that was the general policy of our Government at that time and the general atmosphere in which these reports were written.

Now in trying to judge the reports against that background which I have just described, I tried myself to determine in my mind what should be the central point of inquiry, that is, what was the most important thing to determine about these reports. It seemed to me that the important thing was to find out whether they represented Mr. Service's honest opinion and whether they stemmed solely from a desire to give the Department that opinion or whether they resulted from some ulterior motive or some ulterior source. It seemed to me that if Mr. Service was reporting honestly and conscientiously the views at which he had arrived on the basis of an open-minded examination and analysis of the facts, that he had before him, then it was up to the Department or his military superiors to tell him if they felt that his judgment was faulty or inadequate to the reporting function which he was fulfilling, that is, if his reports were found out to have, were discovered to have a bias which rendered them not useful or dangerous to this Government. It was really the matter of his superiors to determine that. They were then at liberty to dismiss him from the Service for incompetence or they were at liberty to transfer him to another field of endeavor where he might have signed invoices or performed some technical function but not carrying on this reporting. If instead of doing that they encouraged him to go on with it, as they did by repeated instructions of commendation signed by high people here in the Department, it did appear to me that then he had no choice but to conclude that the continuation of this activity was his duty in war time and that he would not be subject to reproach later for having done it to the satisfaction of his superiors.

For that reason in my own examination of these documents, I tried to concentrate on that. My conclusion is the following: I find no evidence that the reports acquired their character from any ulterior motive or association or from any impulse other than the desire on the part of the reporting office to acquaint the Department with the facts as he saw and interpreted them. I find no indication that the reports reported anything but his best judgment candidly stated to the Department. On the contrary the general level of thoughtfulness and intellectual flexibility which pervades the reporting is such that it seems to me out of the question that it could be the work of a man with a closed mind or with ideological preconceptions, and it is my conclusion that it was not. Such faults as it may reveal on analysis in the light of hindsight today, which is admittedly a great deal easier than foresight, are ones which appear to me to be explicable in the light of the background against which the reports were written and to have been ones which could and would have been corrected had he by that time had the opportunity for a wider area of service and one which included the Soviet Union as well as China.

Now those, Mr. Chairman, are my honest opinions. They are as objective as I can make them and I hope that they are adequate to the purpose here.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Board is very grateful for this very exhaustive and fine presentation of the contents of these reports. Mr. Achilles, do you have any questions?

MR. ACHILLES. The characterization of the reports has been so complete that there is very little to ask. Very briefly, did you find in any of his reports any indication that his thinking, his presentation was influenced by such themes as are common to international communism, Communist propaganda?

A. No; I can't say that I did. The problems of the Chinese Communists at that time in the middle of the war were so different from those of the average Communist Party anywhere else in the world that the discussion of them in these reports seems to me to have had relatively little relevance, let us say, to the problems and aims of the French Communist Party or Italian Communist Party or the international Communist movement in general.

Now I am glad you asked me that because there was one thing that I neglected to mention in this presentation which I would like to bring out. Throughout a large part of this period I am quite convinced that the Soviet Government was not able to give very much attention to the Chinese Communists, that it was not giving them aid, on the contrary, if it was giving any aid to China it was going certainly primarily to the Chinese Central Government, and it was simply too preoccupied with the tremendous pressures of its own war effort and the resistance of the German attack to bother about these fellows out there at all. I think it entirely plausible that they felt themselves at that time pretty much on their own and were themselves uncertain how their relationship—

The CHAIRMAN. Meaning the Communists?

A. Yes; that the Communists felt themselves on their own and were themselves uncertain how their relationship with the Soviet Government was going to shape up when the war was over. Now that being the case, I think it is quite plausible that during those years they wandered further from the typical Comintern outlook of affiliation with the Soviet Government than perhaps any Communist Party in good standing has ever wandered, and they were also at that time engaged in the war with the Japanese and in the Far East a very considerable battle threatened their own power in China against the Chinese Central Government. For that reason I think it is no wonder that they gave an impression of sincerity and of concentration on purposes which are not normally associated with the Communist movement throughout those years, and these reports which I think reflect quite faithfully what were the real reactions, at least the statements, the actions of the Chinese Communists at that time, in these reports I think it is natural that you don't find much reflection of the sort of thing you asked about.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have any impression that Mr. Service's thinking was influenced by Soviet ideology?

A. Not by Soviet ideology at all. I think you do find in some of these reports—he had to deal with the Communists, he talked with them a great deal—I think in many instances he was subject, as I think perhaps any sensitive and intelligent man would have been, to the sway of the atmosphere which they exuded, especially since it was one that had a greater appeal in many respects to many of us than did the atmosphere in the camp of their Chinese adversaries, but I can find absolutely no indication of any connection there with Soviet influences at all. Such influences as are reflected in this reporting are solely Chinese Communist. There is only one report as I recall it which—one or two there might have been which stemmed from statements of Soviet colleagues, and those were reported objectively and much as many of the rest of us might have reported them from any other place in the world.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you find any indication in Mr. Service's reports or a desire on his part for extension of Soviet domination into Asia?—A. None whatsoever. On the contrary I find that as one of the possibilities to which it seems to me he points with a certain alarm in several instances in these reports. I don't know whether I can find at this moment instances of that in my notes, but I may be able to here. He says, for example, and I quote—well, it is the same quote as before so I don't need to do it except to reiterate that,

“Chiang unwittingly may be contributing to Russian dominance in eastern Asia by internal and external policies which, if pursued in their present form, will render China too weak to serve as a possible counterweight to Russia.”

Mr. RHETTS. Would you refer to the document number?

A. That is number 142. I would gather from that that he viewed the continued existence of China as a possible counterweight to Russia as a desirable thing.

Q. Just one minor question. You characterized his reports as being somewhat less “starry-eyed” than other prominent people including ambassadors. Would you care to name any of those?—A. Well, I would say, for example, that Mr. Davies' book on “Mission to Moscow” reflects an understanding of Soviet realities and international Communist realities much further from actuality than these reports.

Q. The former Ambassadors Nelson Johnson and Clarence Gauss have also testified. Would you include either of them in that category?—A. I am not familiar enough with their thinking to know whether that would apply to them or not and I did not have them in mind when I made the statement. I was reflecting that when I read even my own reports from Moscow at that time I find a slight sense of shame at the extent to which I felt obliged to moderate those reports in the Soviet favor if they were to get any audience in Washington and not appear to be extreme and anti-Soviet and to condemn themselves. I wish today I had been blunter—and we must remember that all of these were written in that period.

Q. You have never as far as I recall been charged as being pro-Communist yourself. Have you ever been as far as you recall?—A. No, I don't recall I ever yet been charged with that.

Q. Have you ever been charged with being anti-Communist?—A. Yes, indeed I have, many times. I served in the Russian field all through the thirties and we were all alleged to be married to Russian emigré princesses and to be a group of black reactionaries. I might point out at the present time that as far as I know or until recently I was of all the citizens of our country the public enemy No. 1 in the Soviet and international Communist press. When I recently visited South America that became very evident, because the walls of every city in Brazil, as far as I know, of any size, even those that I did not visit, were all covered with enormous tar smears saying, "To death with Kennan," and I was buried four times in effigy by Brazilian Communists while I was in Rio, so that I don't think I am very popular.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you find any indication in any of the reports that Mr. Service was attempting to torpedo or sabotage or in any other way oppose the official American policy in China?

A. No, sir, I did not, and I must say that I can find no indication whatsoever of that. There was nothing in any way underhanded about these reports. In them his views are fully exposed to all of his superiors for what they are. The line of conduct they recommended would have been one disagreeable to the Chinese National Government and he repeatedly warns in his reports that it would be exactly that, that they would not like it, and he warned that if we were to send observers to Yenan that would not be appreciated in Chungking, and if we were to give military aid to the Chinese Communists, that would also go down hard. He recommended, if you will, a different policy from the one that we followed in certain respects, not in all respects, that is, his recommendations were different from what was actually followed but that—

The CHAIRMAN. Can you specify that?

A. We did not, as I recall it, ever get military aid to the Chinese Communists on any scale that could be called a realization of his recommendations. We continued to give aid on a very considerable scale to the Central Government of China after the war, although it was embarked on policies which not only Mr. Service but many others of our representatives in China viewed as dangerous and hopeless. I am thinking here, for example, of General Wedemeyer who warned the Chinese Government very sharply in 1945 that it did not have the military potential to reassert its authority in Manchuria and North China by force of arms and that if it attempted to do this, the entire future would be uncertain.

Now, as I understand, these reports of course cease in the spring of 1945, but I am sure the tenor of them was that we should not attempt to back a Chinese Central Government which had not created for itself a greater appeal to popular approval in China against the Chinese Communists in a civil war and in an effort to reassert its authority all over China by force of arms.

The CHAIRMAN. I refer to American policy in China and I refer also and particularly to General Hurley's mission.

A. I cannot find that he does. In fact, I read over specifically today the charges which General Hurley makes here which I suppose relate to Mr. Service. He does not say who, but he says "Foreign Service officers in China," and I suppose it is that. He charges them, as I understand it, with:

"The professional Foreign Service men sided with the Chinese Communist armed party and the imperialist block of nations whose policy it was to keep China divided against herself."

The latter part of that I can certainly find no indication of, that there was any siding with a wider group of nations who were determined to keep China divided. On the contrary, the reports certainly urged anything, or urged consistently all the way through a political accommodation between the Chinese Government and the Chinese Communists which might avoid a Chinese civil war. In that respect, what bewilders me here is that they advocated, it seems to me, the same thing that General Hurley was advocating, which was political accommodation. It was perhaps only a question of on whose terms, that is, whether it should be entirely on the terms of the Chinese Central Government or whether there should be a recognition of the political interests and legitimacy of the Chinese Communists as a movement. Now, my understanding of Mr. Service's reports was that he never went at any time in the reports, as far as I can see, into the question of whether the Chinese Communists ought on moral grounds to have their legitimacy recognized. He advocated that it be recognized because they were already so strong that it was impossible to overthrow them in any way by force of arms and a political accommodation was the only alternative to a civil war. He also did not feel that a hopeful future could be based on the Chinese Central Government in the absence of a reform program.

I am not a very good person to judge the rights and the wrongs of that attitude, but as to how possible it might have been or might not have been for the Chinese Central Government to carry on a reform program, but that the Central Government could not clean up on all of China by force of arms and win a civil war against the Communists without the involvement of this country on a scale which would really have been beyond our resources seems absolutely clear to me and reflects not just the views of Mr. Service but the views of people like General Wedemeyer and I am sure others of very high American officers who had to do with China at that time. As I see this difference it could only be this, that General Hurley felt that we should have been giving greater backing to the Central Government in its differences with the Communists than Mr. Service and others would have recommended.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any questions?

Mr. STEVENS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. Mr. Counsel.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. Kenman, in connection with this line of inquiry which General Snow has just been pursuing, in particular General Hurley has singled out a report No. 40, which is document No. 193 in the list that you have, General Hurley has stated that that memorandum in particular constituted in his judgment—and he has stated this, I may say, in the course of hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in December 1945—he has stated that this was a plan to bring about the fall of the Central Government, and that charge in turn had been picked up by Senator McCarthy and others and elaborated on. I wonder if you have any particular notes on 193?—A. I do, indeed. I would like to refresh my memory from the document itself.

Yes, my notes on it were here that:

"Service's denunciation is strong but based exclusively on the urgency of aiding the American war effort in the Pacific. There is no indication of political bias toward any faction but only against Kuomintang corruption and power politics. There is a tendency to underplay the usefulness of the Kuomintang to the United States war effort and to discount any worth in the movement as an interesting parallel to Yugoslavia."

If I might be excused, I would like to run my eyes over this again (referring to report 40).

The CHAIRMAN. Would you do that again, please.

A. (After reading the report.) Mr. Chairman, may I make a further statement with respect to this, since we are getting into the actual question of the content of these reports. I think that what is said here in one part is extraordinarily penetrating, and that is:

"Encouraged by our support the Kuomintang will continue its present course, progressively losing the confidence of the people and becoming more and more impotent."

That has been directly borne out by the course of events. There is no question about that. It goes ahead and says:

"Ignored by us, and excluded from the Government and joint prosecution of the war, the Communists and other groups will be forced to guard their own interests by more direct opposition."

That you can give as you like, that has happened. I have never known myself, never felt able really to judge, I have always been skeptical about it, I have never known whether any sort of a tolerable political accommodation could have been reached between the Chinese Communists and the Central Government in China. In other countries the Communists have never been comfortable bedfellows for anybody, and the ideologic instructions under which they work tell them to enter into alliance with political groups only for the sake of ruining these groups from the inside, and eventually emerging the sole victors.

Now there is a question of judgment here as to whether it would have been—the Chinese Communists were enough different from other Communists so that they would have gone into any coalition effort in good faith, and all I can say, I believe that there were some hesitations in Mr. Service's mind about that but as I gather it from the reports he felt that this was the only possibility, the only alternative possibility to a civil war which probably would have ended only in the complete Chinese Communist triumph. I think I should explain that. I mean, at the time I would have been skeptical about the possibility of the lion and the lamb lying down together and anything resembling a real regime coming out of it, but on the other hand I don't know Chinese realities remotely as well as he does, and you can balance off the knowledge of Chinese realities on the one hand against the knowledge of the international Communist realities on the other.

Mr. ACHILLES. On that point General Hurley's writings indicate that he had no qualms about the desirability of the Chinese taking the Communists into the government. Had he had enough experience with Soviet communism in Moscow and so on so that he should have known better or was he too new to that?

A. His visits to Moscow consisted only of one or two brief stays in that capital, to my knowledge, and talks with Stalin and Molotov. I don't think that that was enough to enable him to know what he was talking about when he reported on the views of the Soviet leaders. On the other hand, there was ample advice available to him which he showed no desire to tap on these subjects. I mean, it is not surprising to me that Hurley didn't know that he was being given the usual run-around and the usual patter by Stalin and Molotov, but I think that if he had been a wiser and more thoughtful man he would have asked some people who would be familiar with those conditions for some years for commentary on those.

Q. In that connection I take it that what you have commented, that the essential question of judgment as to whether there was any future in attempting to effect a political accommodation is an open question. Is it not fair to say, however, Mr. Kenman, that that question of judgment as a matter of official American policy had been decided by the President and by the State Department and that General Hurley accepted, if he had not been a partial architect of, the judgment that we should seek to effect that political accommodation?—A. That is quite correct, and it is my understanding that General Hurley had in a sense launched the most vigorous phase of our effort to bring precisely that about and went himself to Yenan and brought these Communist leaders down in his own plan and worked very vigorously toward the implementation of that idea.

Q. So that although that may have been questionable judgment, it was the unquestioned policy of the United States Government to seek to effect that accommodation?—A. Yes.

Q. Referring back to this Document 193 and to the other aspects of it, do you see any evidence in that document which would support the charge by General Hurley that it was a plan to bring about the fall of the Central Government?—A. No. My understanding of the document was that Mr. Service said we should not fear the fall of the Central Government and not permit ourselves to be blackmailed by the threat of it, but not that he himself advocated it.

Q. And, indeed, does not the document further suggest that this is the only way to avoid the fall, as he saw it?—A. Let me just finish my reexamination because among 127 documents I don't want to speak about this until I glance at it again.

I must say that I found in this document a strong belief that the Chinese Government as it existed at that time did not have in it the qualities which would have made it possible for it to play a constructive role in the future of China and that we would not help to create those qualities in it by aiding it ourselves in the policies that it was then conducting, but I did not find in it a specific desire that the Chinese Government as existed then should fall from power entirely.

Now again I would say, reverting to a prior questions about conflict, about General Hurley's assertion that this involved some disloyalty to United States policy, that I could find in going through his reports no indication in anything there other than a desire to make plain to our Government what Mr. Service felt our policy should be. Now that has never been considered in Government practice to have in it any impropriety. It would have been, rather, improper if for some reason or other he had failed to tell the Government of his own true thoughts about it, had concealed them from the Government in any respect or for some motives of his own, and I would have found an impropriety in this only if he had been doing this on behalf of somebody else and had not let the Government know the real motives of his making these recommendations. To my mind they stand or fall on the question of whether they were honestly made and honestly believed, and if then they were that, then the only other question could be, about them could have been whether they reflected good judgment or bad judgment, and that was a question, as I say, for the Government, which the Government was at liberty to examine. I would feel very alarmed for the future of Foreign Service reporting if we ever were to permit the implication to creep in that a policy recommendation contrary to the policy that was actually adopted by the Government was a sign of disloyalty to the Government purposes, because as ones who perhaps in making policy every day in this building here we know that—as most of us who are in this position—probably the majority of things we recommended are never accepted, but we must continue to recommend them and out of that discussion and difference of opinion will emerge a policy which people then loyal will accept.

I also gather from what General Hurley wrote here that there is an indication that these observers in Yenan had given the Chinese Communists a false picture of what to expect from our Government. I do not find any indication of that. On the contrary, I notice in one report here that there were warnings given to the Chinese Communists that they should not hope for too much, that no decisions had been made, and that there was a specific effort to keep them from getting their hopes too high and being carried away.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean by that, in his talks with the Communists he had indicated that, as you just stated, to them?—A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not that the report itself had been made available to the Communists?

A. No, no. There would, I believe, have been an impropriety if one had gone to the Chinese Communists and promised them a line of conduct on the part of our Government which had not yet been sanctioned in any policy determinations at home, but I can find no indication of that in the reports. Rather, on the contrary.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions?

A. It was in Document 186:

"Every effort has been made to avoid encouraging any high expectations, to point out the practical difficulties in the way of direct cooperation, and to suggest that Japan may be defeated in other ways than as the Communists insist, a slow process of liquidating the armies on the Asian mainland."

Q. Now, on the basis of your examination of these documents, Mr. Kennan, I should like to call your attention that Senator McCarthy and others have charged that Mr. Service during this period was trying to turn the Far East over to Russia, and it has been further asserted that Mr. Service expressed the view that communism was the best hope of China or the best hope of Asia, variously. Do you find anything in any of his writings that tended in any way to support such statements?—A. No; let me think of those. Trying to turn it all over—

Q. Trying to turn the Far East over to Russia?—A. No; I find the direct contrary to that proposition in these reports. The second was that—

Q. That communism was the best hope of Asia?—A. No; my understanding of what he said in these reports was that the best hope in China, to which his observations were restricted, was a regime which would be considerate of the interests of the opposition elements including the Communists, which is quite a difference.

Q. Yes. By the way, Mr. Kennan, will you state to the Board whether you are acquainted with Mr. Service?—A. I had never met Mr. Service before he returned on this occasion, and I have never spoken with him except concerning the technical arrangements for my appearing here. I purposely did not discuss anything that I was going to say on this occasion with him or with anyone that I thought might be in communication with him and have never discussed the content of his reports. I had also not read the reports before this except insofar as they were contained in the white paper, so that they came to me fresh.

Q. And you have no discussed these reports with Mr. Service at any time?—A. No; at no time.

Q. Or discussed them with me?—A. No; at no time.

Mr. MORELAND. Or members of the Board?

The CHAIRMAN. That is also true of the members of the Board?

A. It is also true of the members of the Board. I had meant to make that clear myself.

I am sure that the only thing I could add, I think, to what I have said so far voluntarily about the reports is that in their entirety there is no question about it, aside from the question of whether they might have a bias in favor of the Communists, that they represent an absolutely outstanding job of reporting, on general Foreign Service terms. Many of them have nothing to do with this matter whatsoever. They are an excellent series of reports and recognized as such by the Department. I don't know whether that has any bearing: that is why I didn't mention it before, except that people who write excellent reports are not apt to be guilty of the great oversimplifications which have been suggested by some people.

Q. Just one question. I believe that during the early forties, as you testified earlier, the officials of the Soviet Union had generally expressed the view that they were not interested in the Chinese Communists and that they did not really regard them as true Communists at all. While necessarily over-simplification, is that generally a correct characterization of the Soviet Communist Party line, that the Chinese Communists were not real Communists?—A. That seems to have been a line taken in conversation by certain of the Soviet leaders during the war. I don't recall ever having seen it in the very carefully controlled written line that they put out, and it is my belief that it was not part of that.

Q. It was at any rate, I take it, clearly the line as put out by Messrs. Stalin and Molotov to General Hurley?—A. That is General Hurley's report, and he reported—I was not there that night, Mr. Harriman went up with him and left that following morning—that Molotov agreed that that was the line that he and Stalin were taking, that these were not real Communists and that—just as you described.

Q. Did you detect any indication anywhere in Mr. Service's writing that he did not regard the Chinese Communists as true Communists?—A. Yes; I had the impression that particularly in the earlier period of his stay in Yen-an he thought it possible the influences of their experience as a political movement, the extent to which they had been thrown upon themselves in their long march around China, and isolation during the war, and the pressures of purely Chinese psychological influences on them might have changed them in such a way as would make them untypical of the majority of Communists, of all the other Communist parties approved by the Kremlin, and might reconcile them to ruling by means which would be more like what we would consider democratic for a long period even if they came to power in China.

Q. In that connection do you recall any of his reports which commented particularly on whether or not the Chinese Communist Party was even though modified by its peculiar experiences essentially a Marxian political party?—A. Yes. There was one from Yen-an in the earlier period there. I would have to look it up to be able to cite the exact one to you which did comment on that point. Just a moment now. It was No. 168, I believe. My recollection is that in that report he said that he believed that the Chinese Communist Party aimed for an orderly and prolonged progress toward eventual socialism and not for violent revolution, and that it would consider the long-term interests of China and would not seek for an early monopoly of political power. I believe however that those views changed in the course of his service in Yen-an and that in the latter part of his service there he felt that there was less likelihood that they would not strive for monopoly of power. I hope I don't misquote him on that. I have here this report—let me see if I can find some of the passages that are pertinent. He did not say that they were not Marxists, I think I should add, but it was a question of what interpretation they would give to their own Marxism, and if you will permit me I will read this report, the passage that I recall.

"The Chinese Communist Party claims that it is Marxist. By this the Communists mean that their ideology, their philosophical approach, and their dialectical method are based on Marx materialism. Marxism thus becomes to it chiefly an attitude and an approach to problems. It is a long-term view of political and economic developments to which all short-term considerations of temporary advantage or premature power are ruthlessly subordinated. This interpretation of Marxist materialism means to them a certain logical development of economic society. It also means that this natural sequence cannot be short-circuited. To try to do so would be disastrous and a violation of their basic principles of strategy. Thus socialism in their view cannot be evolved at one jump from the present primitive agrarian society of China. It can come only after considerable development of the Chinese autonomy and after it has passed through a stage of at least modified capitalism. Their communism therefore does not mean the immediate overthrow of private capital because there is still almost no capitalism in China. It does not mean the dictatorship of the proletariat because there is as yet no proletariat. It does not mean collectivism of farms because the political education of the peasants has not yet overcome their primitive individualistic desire to till their own land."

And he goes on at some length here to describe the view, ending with this conclusion:

"By this view the Communist Party becomes a party seeking orderly democratic growth toward socialism, as is being attempted for instance, in a country like England, rather than a party fomenting immediate and violent revolution. It becomes a party which is not seeking an early monopoly of political power but pursuing what it considers the long-term interests in China. It bases this seemingly idealistic policy on a rigid interpretation of materialism which holds it to be a violation of those materialistic principles to attempt to force the country into socialism before the natural development of the country's economy makes socialism possible."

That is the end of that quote.

Q. That, of course, is essential Marxism doctrine, too, is it not?—A. I would say subsequent history has borne out this analysis insofar as it related to the internal economic policies of the Chinese Communist Government. I don't think that Government has at the present moment any intention of collectivizing all Chinese agriculture or stamping out all Chinese capitalism. There is no question about that. It has a judgment here which I think has not actually materialized today and that is that "It is a party seeking orderly democratic growth towards socialism." However I must bear in mind in connection with that statement that he had prior to that time said that if this thing ended in a civil war with ourselves backing the central government of China these Chinese Communists would be impelled more in the direction of Moscow, and that after this time also his reports reflect greater skepticism on this point of whether you would expect a democratic development in the Chinese Communist Party.

Q. I have no further question.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Kennan, for taking your valuable time for our benefit. You did a very fine report.

(The witness was dismissed, a short recess was declared, and the Board reconvened to hear continuation of testimony by Mr. John Davies.)

The CHAIRMAN. We will recommence questions by Mr. Stevens.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Mr. Davies, you will remember on Saturday I asked you about your trip to Yen-an?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Sometime between October and January. I wonder if you are familiar with Mr. Service's memorandum 40, about which Mr. Hurley commented a considerable amount in his Senate testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. That is Document No. 193.

A. Yes, I recall this document. I had not seen it, I think, since 1944.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you like to have a chance to look at it?

A. Well, I can identify it.

Q. Did you receive that when you were in New Delhi or in Yen-an, sir?—A. I probably got this in Yen-an. I think by that time—I have forgotten, when was Stilwell relieved?

Mr. SERVICE. October 19.

A. I may have gotten that in New Delhi. I doubt if it would have gone through that quickly. If not, I probably saw it in Yen-an or Chungking.

Q. Did you ever discuss the contents of that memorandum with other than a Government person in Yen-an, sir?—A. No. It was certainly our firm policy not to discuss with any Chinese any American official documents. We went so far as to mark our documents, many of them, "for American official eyes only," some such phraseology as that, because we suspected that some reporting documents by Foreign Service officers were being shown to Chinese officials in Chungking, and it was an established policy with us that we should not reveal to any Chinese in any position what we were reporting about the internal affairs in China.

Q. Would you have revealed that to any newspaperman, sir? Would you have shown that document to anyone other than an official of the United States Government?—A. This document I don't think I would have. I can't conceive of having shown this one because this was obviously a pretty hot document.

Q. Your answer then would be that you did not?—A. That I did not.

Q. Thank you, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. You never gave a copy of that or sent a copy of that to anyone not in an official capacity?

A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was examining? Were you, Mr. Counsel, examining?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you proceed?

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. We had, I believe, at the end of the proceeding on Saturday been discussing again this matter of the whole matter of policy and dealings with the press, and I believe the last thing we did was introduce an affidavit by Colonel Jones, who was the public relations officer for the theater, so unless the Board wishes to pursue that general subject matter further, I would propose to go on to some other topics.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, proceed.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask, sir, Document No. 323 is the one you were talking about, that you introduced on Saturday, is it not?

Q. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Was that placed in as a part of the transcript or as an exhibit?

Q. It is part of the transcript.

Mr. STEVENS. Right.

Q. Now, Mr. Davies, I wonder if you can summarize in some way for the Board the general views which the political advisers' group, that is the group of political advisers attached to General Stilwell, came to hold regarding the type of solution of the political problems in China which the United States ought to seek to accomplish in order to further our interests in the prosecution of the war there?—A. I think that those views are fairly well summarized in the white paper on China. I don't see much point in reiterating those. You are familiar with them.

Q. But you would say that the views that are expressed there, and I take it you refer particularly to the annex 47 which deals with this phase.—A. Yes.

Q. Fairly represents the thinking of your whole group on this question?—A. Yes. There is one point in the summary or in the white paper which I would like to elaborate on a bit. I might say that I was the only one of the so-called political advisers who attempted to discuss in any detail the broadest problems of international politics, although the interpretations which I advanced were in no way binding on my colleagues, as they were simply the reporting efforts of one or of another junior officer. I believe I am accurate in stating that Mr. Emmerson went along with what I had to say regarding the international scene. I believe that Mr. Service shared with me a basic assumption that the U. S. S. R. would be the principal power rival of the United States in the Far East and that as such the U. S. S. R. was, although at the moment our ally, also our future enemy.

During the period 1943-45 this was not a theme which was widely proclaimed for obvious and sound reasons. However, it was introduced into our reporting at various times. You will find hints of it in the excerpts from our memoranda which I just referred to published in the white paper. I would, with the Board's permission, like to read several further paragraphs from my reports in an endeavor to throw more light on our attitude toward the U. S. S. R. In a memorandum dated September 17, 1943, I discussed Soviet policy in review of global policy, and I had this to say:

"Absorbed in their struggle with the Germans and realizing that they cannot depend upon Britain and the United States to defeat the wehrmacht for them, the Russian policy appears to have been less political than that of the British and the Chinese. In its singleness of purpose—confined to the defeat of the enemy—it has resembled ours.

"But while we follow such a policy from choice, the Russians have done so from necessity. A mortal struggle for survival leaves little slack for political picking and choosing. British policy in 1940 and 1941 and Chinese policy before Pearl Harbor had the same attributes of simplicity.

"Once the Russians feel, however, that they have won their fight for survival and that they have some leeway for maneuver, it will not be surprising if they begin to make their military strategy subservient to an over-all political policy. That point may already have been reached.

"It is perhaps not too early to suggest that Soviet policy will probably be directed initially at establishing frontiers which will insure Russian security and at rehabilitation of the U. S. S. R. There is no reason to cherish optimism regarding a voluntary Soviet contribution to our fight against Japan, whether in the shape of air bases or the early opening of a second front in northeast Asia. The Russians may be expected to move against the Japanese when it suits their pleasure, which may not be until the final phases of the war—and then only in order to be able to participate in dictating terms to the Japanese and to establish new strategic frontiers.

"At this point it may be worth while to insert comments on our bargaining position. As the Soviet Union's peril diminishes its need for our aid diminishes. In direct proportion as the Kremlin feels its need of American assistance lessening, our bargaining position becomes weaker and we are less able to persuade the Russians to act as we desire. We appear to have made little use of our bargaining strength with the Soviet Union, because, perhaps, we were not prepared to force through what we wanted and because we would not have been prepared to exploit our advantage even had we done so. Now we find our bargaining strength with the Russians slipping away. * * *"

A few months later in June, June 24, 1943, I had this to say:

"It would only be natural that, should Chiang attack the Communists, the latter would turn for aid to their immediate neighbor, the Soviet Union. And as such an attack would probably not be launched until after the defeat of Japan, the Communists might expect with good reason to receive Russian aid.

"This would be so because following the defeat of Japan Russia would no longer be threatened on its eastern borders, because the Kremlin's present need of Chiang Kai-shek's cooperation would have passed, because Stalin would then presumably prefer to have a friendly if not satellite Chinese Government on his flank, and because the Soviet Union would then have surplus arms in abundance for export.

"A central government attack would therefore in all probability force the Communists into the willing arms of the Russians. The position of the political doctrinaires who have been subservient to Moscow would be strengthened by such an attack. The present trend of the Chinese Communists toward more or less democratic nationalism—confirmed in 6 years of fighting for the Chinese motherland—would thereby be reversed and they could be expected to retrogress to the position of a Russian satellite.

"In these circumstances they would not be a weak satellite. With Russian arms, with Russian technical assistance and with the popular appeal which they have, the Chinese Communists might be expected to defeat the central government and eventually to take over the control of most if not all of China. It may be assumed that a Russo-Chinese bloc, with China as a subservient member of the partnership, would not be welcomed by us. The effect of such a bloc upon the rest of Asia and upon world stability would be undesirable."

Then on February 19, 1944, I observed:

"Nowhere does Clausewitz's dictum that war is only the continuation of politics by other methods apply with more force than in the Asiatic theater. If we are to plan intelligently the conduct of our war against Japan we must clearly define and understand our long-range political objectives in Asia.

"Presumably we seek in Asia (1) the greatest possible stability after the war, and (2) an alinement of power favorable to us when we again become involved in an Asiatic or Pacific war."

That is the end of the reading.

Q. Now, in that connection you say that you were satisfied that Mr. Service in general agreed with those views, that they represent views held by him as well as by you?—A. Yes; I was convinced of that, and still am.

Q. Do you have knowledge that Mr. Service shared the views that you have just expressed?—A. We had discussed these questions back and forth. He left to me the reporting on the broader, international picture, but this general approach became really the tacit basis upon which the further development of our political ideas with respect to the local situation was worked out.

Q. And I take it that insofar as Senator McCarthy, for example, has charged that Mr. Service thought to turn the whole Far East over to Russia, you would say that that was not any part of his objective, if he shared the views that you just expressed?—A. It would be fantastic because this was the basic assumption, that there was the power conflict with the Soviet Union as the force which would challenge us in a power rivalry at the end of World War II, and that our next problem would be to prevent the Soviet Union from becoming the dominant power in Asia.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Davies, did you send copies of your reports, such as the ones you have read, to Mr. Service?

A. Yes; copies—well, let me go on. Two of these reports I believe were written before Mr. Service joined me, but he went through the whole files and we discussed this general outlook together, so he was familiar with these and he expressed general agreement.

Mr. STEVENS. Did he express on any of the points you raised disagreement?

A. No, sir.

Q. Now I would like you to look at document No. 35-5. I show you document 35-5, which is already in evidence here, which represents a statement by General Hurley of the policy objectives or slightly varying versions of the policy objectives which he sought to pursue in China.

(Mr. Davies read document 35-5.)

Q. Now I would like to ask you whether on the basis of your knowledge of Mr. Service's writings and your knowledge of his views apart from his writings, whether Mr. Service ever was in disagreement with any of these stated policy objectives?—A. I can't see that he ever was, so far as my knowledge of Mr. Service's reporting and his personal ideas, and so on.

Q. Now referring to document No. 35-3, General Hurley has charged that Mr. Service and other Foreign Service officers in China were pro-Communist. Did you ever hear Mr. Service make any expression of view which would render any support to this charge by General Hurley?—A. American Foreign Service officers are trained to be pro-American first. They are dedicated to that proposition. They evaluate foreign situations—and I say this of Mr. Service now specifically. He evaluated the local Chinese situation, the political factors that were there in terms of what was best for American interests. I never heard him say anything which in my interpretation of the word would be regarded as a bias toward the Chinese Communists. I think that his comments were made as objectively as he knew how to make them, and in that sense I don't see how he could be regarded as pro-Communist.

Q. Do you know who Bishop Paul Yu-pin is, Mr. Davies?—A. I know who he is. I don't know him.

Q. You don't?—A. I am not acquainted with him.

Q. Do you know what his relationship was in 1945 to the Kuomintang, if he had any relation to it?—A. As I recall it, it was a very close relationship with the Chinese Government officials and the Kuomintang. I couldn't go into it any deeper than that because my memory on that question is not detailed.

Q. It has been charged by Bishop Paul Yu-pin, as well as by others including Congressman Dondero and Senator McCarthy, that Mr. Service in effect kept hammering at General Stilwell to force General Stilwell to make demands on Chiang Kai-shek to arm the Communist Party, the Chinese Communist Party forces. Can you tell the board just how close a personal relationship Mr. Service had with General Stilwell?—A. General Stilwell had very few personal intimates. He took very few people into his confidence, including his intimates. His habit was to listen and to make up his own mind, and one was not always certain what his own conclusions were as a result of one's own comments. As for Mr. Service and his relationship with General Stilwell, I believe that General Stilwell had a feeling of considerable friendship for Mr. Service but obviously he regarded Mr. Service as a junior officer whose views he would listen to, take under consideration, but General Stilwell always made up his own mind as to what he was going to do.

Q. During the period Mr. Service was attached to General Stilwell's staff, Mr. Service was first in Chungking from August of 1943 until about July 1944—is that approximately correct according to your recollection?—A. According to my recollection; yes.

Q. And then at that time he went to Yenan with the observer mission, did he not?—A. Yes.

Q. And was there until October 1944 when General Stilwell was recalled, is that correct?—A. As I recall it.

Q. During that period, did Mr. Service have frequent opportunity for personal contact with General Stilwell?—A. I was not in Chungking at the time, so I can't answer it except as I knew from what Mr. Service had told me, which was that it was not frequent.

Q. As a matter of fact, was General Stilwell in Chungking very much?—A. General Stilwell was—he went to Chungking always reluctantly and left always as soon as he could. I don't recall whether General Stilwell was there—

Q. I am talking roughly now about the period August 1943 until roughly the—well, the year from the middle of 1943 to the middle of 1944.—A. You are being very subtle with me now! Wasn't he in Burma then? I have forgotten.

Q. My impression is that he was engaged in fighting somewhere but I don't recall.—A. Yes. I imagine he was in the depths of the Burma campaign. Is that—

Q. My impression has been that he was largely engaged during that period in actual military operations elsewhere.—A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that your impression?

A. Yes. I don't recall definitely; but yes, when the Burma campaign was going on—and that was in late 1943, I believe, and early 1944, and that is the period you are covering, isn't it?

Q. Yes.—A. The great complaint was that General Stilwell was down in the mud in Burma all the time, instead of up in his headquarters in Chungking. When he was in Chungking, as I said, he kept very much to himself. When one saw him, he listened, made his own decisions, but he was a man who operated and lived quite a lonely life with very few intimates. I would not consider Mr. Service as one of General Stilwell's real intimates.

Q. Now, during the period from July, end of July 1944 until October 19, 1944, which is when General Stilwell was recalled, Mr. Service was in Yen-an. Was General Stilwell, as far as you know, ever in Yen-an during this period?—A. No, he was not in Yen-an during this period.

Q. So that any attempts by Mr. Service to influence General Stilwell would have had to have been largely through the written reports that he prepared, is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Are you familiar with—as I understand, all of the reports which Mr. Service prepared, copies of all reports which Mr. Service prepared were sent to you, is that correct?—A. That is right.

Q. Do you have any knowledge of Mr. Service's insistence in any of these reports to General Stilwell that General Stilwell make demands on Chiang Kai-shek to arm some 300,000 Communist troops?—A. I do not recall any such recommendation. Certainly there would be no insistence or importunities on the part of a junior reporting officer to a theater commander.

Q. Bishop Paul Yu-pin is reported to have said that Mr. Service made at least three such insistent demands, kept coming back at General Stilwell, and finally caused General Stilwell to go to Chiang Kai-shek and make these demands on Chiang, and that thereafter Chiang requested President Roosevelt to recall General Stilwell. Does that accord with either your understanding of the circumstances under which General Stilwell was recalled or is it consistent with any activities of Mr. Service that you knew about?—A. On the basis of my information, that is a ridiculous charge. General Stilwell, I might add, had been trying to obtain control over Chinese troops since 1942. That was the beginning of his attempts to get control over the Chinese armies because he had very little confidence in the Chinese generals with whom he was associated and he felt that there was no discipline in the higher echelons of the Chinese Army and that the only way the Chinese fighting forces could be made effective was to have them brought under American control. That was irrespective of what political stripe the Chinese troops might be, whether they were Central Government troops, provincial troops, dissident troops in the southeast, or Communist troops.

Q. Referring back to your testimony for a few moments ago about General Stilwell's personal relations with his associates, whom would you regard as possibly the person who was on most intimate personal terms with General Stilwell, in terms of his associates around him?—A. I should think General—now Colonel—Frank Dorn, who had been an assistant military attaché with General Stilwell in 1938, who was a China language officer from the Army, who had been General Stilwell's aide when General Stilwell first went out to China after Pearl Harbor, and who was later in command of the operations on the Salween River operating from Yunnan Province.

Q. Referring to Document No. 33-6, a newspaper reporter by the name of Ray Richards has stated, Mr. Davies, that Mr. Service allegedly made a special mission to Moscow, roughly in the summer of 1944, to aid the Red group of the United States Embassy there in weakening the will of Chiang Kai-shek not to submit to North China Communist demands. Do you know whether Mr. Service was ever in Moscow?—A. He was not. He was never in Moscow.

Q. And you have personal knowledge that he could not have been there during the year 1944?—A. I do.

Mr. ACILLES. From the contents that looks like a journalistic slip, it is intended to be Chungking rather than Moscow.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have any? (None.)

Thank you very much.

Mr. DAVIES. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been very helpful.

(The witness was dismissed, the board adjourned for a short recess and reconvened.)

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. RILEYS. At this point I should like to introduce into the transcript Document No. 46, which is an affidavit of Arthur W. Grafton, consisting of 12 pages, dated April 24, 1950. May that be included in the transcript?

The CHAIRMAN. That may be included in the transcript.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 46

AFFIDAVIT OF ARTHUR W. GRAFTON

STATE OF KENTUCKY.

County of Jefferson, ss:

Arthur W. Grafton, being first duly sworn according to law, states upon his oath as follows:

I am a practicing lawyer of Louisville, Kentucky. I was born in 1907 at Hsuehoufu, China. My father, the Reverend Thomas B. Grafton, was a native of Mississippi, and my mother, Lettie Taylor Grafton, was a native of Louisville, Kentucky. Except for a year in America when I was five and another year when I was twelve, in the course of my parents' sabbatical furloughs to the United States, I spent the first seventeen years of my life in China. For four school years (1919-1920, 1921-1924) I attended high school in the Shanghai American School, my parents at that time being stationed at Haichow, Kiangsu Province. During the course of my years in China I became well acquainted with John Stewart Service, who was likewise a missionary's son and went to Shanghai to school.

In 1924 I returned to the United States and for four years attended Presbyterian College of South Carolina, Clinton, South Carolina, from which I graduated in 1928. In that year I came to Louisville, attending Jefferson School of Law from which I graduated in 1930. I have been continuously engaged in the practice here since my admission to the Bar in the fall of 1930, except for a short period from January to June, 1942, when I was counsel for the Defense Plant Corporation in Washington, from June 1942 to August 1945 when I was on active duty with the Army Air Forces, and from August 1945 until December 1945 again with Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Washington.

In June 1942 I was commissioned a First Lieutenant in the Army Air Forces, went to the Air Forces Intelligence School at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and beginning about the first of July 1942, was assigned to the Current Intelligence Section of A-2 of the Headquarters, Army Air Forces in Washington. There I was also assigned to the China-Burma-India Theater of operations, with the primary duty of keeping the Commanding General, Army Air Forces, and his Washington staff informed daily as to significant developments in the CBI Theater. I remained at this station until March of 1943. At that time I proceeded under order to New Delhi, India, where I was assigned to the Rear Echelon Headquarters of the Commanding General, CBI Theater (General Stilwell) and placed in the G-3 Section under then Colonel later General Frank A. Merrill. Late in June of 1943 I was transferred to Kunning, China, where I was Assistant G-3 in the headquarters of the Commanding General of what was known as the Y Forces Operations Staff (YFOS), commanded by Colonel later Brigadier General Frank A. Dorn. November 25, 1943, I was transferred back to Delhi, and assigned in the Intelligence Section of the newly established headquarters of the Commanding General for the Army Air Forces in the India-Burma sector of the CBI Theater (General George E. Stratemeyer). In March of 1944 I moved with his headquarters to Hastings Mill outside of Calcutta where I remained stationed until sent home on furlough in April of 1945. My orders to return to General Stratemeyer's headquarters at the conclusion of leave were cancelled and superseded while I was in the United States due to V-E Day intervening, and I remained unassigned until shortly after V-J Day in August when I was relieved from active duty.

During my entire tour of duty in Washington, India, and China, I was charged with the responsibility of keeping informed as to the general situation in India, Burma, and China, as such situation affected current military operations. Beginning in Washington in July 1942 I was required to and did study all available current information concerning our own and the enemy's actions in China in order to keep the Commanding General and his staff informed. This included the study of radio and written reports from the military headquarters in the theater, as well as State Department reports reflecting upon political developments. More than any other theater, the CBI Theater was one in which the political situation played a major role. In 1942 we had no combat troops of our own in China except for a very small Air Force detachment of the 10th Air Force under General Chenault. This force was gradually built up between 1942 and 1945 into the 14th Air Force, but at no time did it constitute a major military force in comparison to our forces in other theaters, and the existence and effectiveness of the 14th Air Force was in large measure wholly dependent upon the cooperation of the Chinese and the ability of the Chinese to provide and protect suitable bases from which the 14th could operate.

Except for the action of the 14th Air Force (severely restricted as to the scope of its operations by the difficulty of supply over the Hump) our forces in China were largely bystanders without the means to influence the outcome of the struggle for the Chinese mainland. The actual fighting with the enemy depended upon the Chinese themselves and General Stilwell's staff was primarily concerned with encouragements and advice to the Chinese and such supplies as could be gradually built up over the Hump. The Chinese effort or really lack of effort was in turn dictated almost entirely by political considerations, and an understanding of at least the major forces in the political background was an absolute essential to any sort of study of the military problems we were considering. In fact, the more one studied and learned about the political forces at work, the more it became apparent that events in China were going to be dictated by political rather than military moves. Increasingly, therefore, it became necessary for me to devote time and attention to the political reports which came to us principally through the Embassy in Chungking and through General Stilwell's political advisers who were in turn members of the Embassy Staff detached to him for that purpose.

From the military intelligence standpoint, evaluation of the information coming out of China was impossible without an understanding of the political situation. In the first place, we had very few primary sources of intelligence of our own. Detailed information as to the enemy Order of Battle, both Air and Ground, their capabilities and intentions, originated almost wholly from Chinese sources and was traditionally edited and colored for the purpose of further political ends. We knew from experience that most of this information was fed to us not for the purpose of informing us as to the facts, but for the purpose of influencing particular attitudes or actions on the part of the Americans. The daily communiques issued by the Chinese Ministry of Information at Chungking were almost wholly fictional and fanciful and were never given any substantial credence by our Intelligence Staff. To a lesser degree, official intelligence reports made to us through Chinese Army channels were likewise suspect and had to be weighed against the known political objectives.

When I got to India in March of 1943 I was delighted to learn that Jack Service and John Davies were acting as political advisers to General Stilwell. I had known John Davies like Jack Service in China as a boy, and I knew them both to have an exceptionally broad understanding of Chinese thinking and politics. Knowing them personally, and particularly knowing their background in China, I felt that they could be of tremendous help in the job of sifting the wheat from the chaff in the intelligence reports which were emanating from Chinese sources. I read every report which came into our headquarters from these two men during my entire tour of duty in the theater.

In the spring of 1943 Davies was primarily stationed in Delhi and Service was in China. Service's reports came through the office of General Stilwell's G-2 in Chungking, who I believe at that time was Colonel Dickey. I am sure that Colonel Dickey was the G-2 later in 1943 and during 1944.

In June of 1943 when I reported to General Dorn's staff, I found our problem more than ever tied to and dependent upon the Chinese political situation. The YFOS was a headquarters set up by General Stilwell in Kunming for the purpose of directing the operations of an Infantry training school and an Artillery training school in the Kunming area, where, according to plan, some fifteen divisions of Chinese troops were to be trained and equipped to combat efficiency. In addition, this staff was charged with the duty of preparation of a plan, in collaboration with the Chinese military headquarters in Kunming, for an ultimate launching of an attack on Burma from the Chinese side with a view of making a juncture with the X Forces, which was a name assigned to the Chinese divisions being trained in India, and which were designed to and ultimately did attack the Japanese in northern Burma through the Ledo Road.

After the establishment of the Infantry and Artillery schools, it was the duty of YFOS to negotiate with the Chinese concerning which troops were to be trained and equipped and to make estimates as to the progress of the training and the combat capabilities of the troops as trained.

The Chinese army then, as now, varied widely in quality as between divisions and armies, being largely the reflection of the personality, ambitions, and political power of their commanders. We obviously wanted to get the best divisions possible assigned for this training, but were constantly faced with the fact that political considerations in China dictated what troops were made available and when.

The determination of which divisions we would try to get for training and the estimate as to whether or not particular troops would be assigned was largely a question of understanding Chinese politics. Repeatedly we were promised that particular divisions would be moved into the training area and repeatedly these promises were broken or countermanded. The best troops, according to our information, were largely immobilized in northwest China facing the Communists and were not made available either for training for eventual combat in Burma or even for the important task of guarding the forward fields of the 14th Air Force from possible enemy ground action. The units that actually were assigned for training were far below these troops in numbers, physical condition, equipment, and morale, and as a result the target date for the beginning of actual operations from the China side was repeatedly postponed. It was one long frustration and in the end the attack which had been originally planned for early 1944 only materialized in 1945 and contributed but little to the reconquest of northern Burma.

While I was in Kunming, Jack Service was there on at least two occasions. The first, to the best of my recollection, was in July, and on that occasion he and I renewed our boyhood acquaintance and discussed the military and political situation in China at considerable length. Jack at that date had spent considerable time in northwest China in the general area where the Nationalist armies were engaged in containing the Communists, and personally knew a great deal about the strength and disposition of the Nationalist forces there. I had previously noted his reports on this subject and was glad to get from him first-hand information as to general conditions in that part of China. He was also able to give me some highly useful information as to the nature and position of the various Chinese political parties then engaged in the constant struggle for power within the Nationalist Government, and filled me in on the personalities of a great many of Chinese political and military figures whose names appeared in the many reports which I was studying.

Another occasion in Kunming when I had a chance to talk with Jack at length was in November 1943, just prior to my return to India.

I did not thereafter have contact with Jack until in April of 1945 when I was returning home on leave. At that time he was likewise returning to Washington to make a report on the situation in China, and he and I traveled in the same plane from Calcutta as far as Casablanca. In the three days we were together then he told me about his recent visit to Yenan and what he had learned of the Chinese Communists first-hand and his general impression, most of which had already been embodied in a series of reports which had come to me through Colonel Dickey's office in Chungking. Some of these reports have since been published, excerpts at least appearing in the State Department publications concerning our relations with China.

During all these times both in the consideration and study of the reports which Service prepared and in the personal conversations and consultations with him, I never had any reason to doubt nor do I now doubt his complete loyalty to the United States. In the face of the almost complete frustration to which we were all subjected by reason of the tactics of the Chinese Government, it was probably impossible for anyone to remain completely objective in reporting on the Chinese, but within this general limitation, I felt that Jack's reporting was the kind of objective, accurate, and searching analysis of the existing situation that was most sorely needed. I have had but little opportunity to check on the accuracy of the details contained in these reports, but the correctness of his over-all estimates of the situation was repeatedly borne out by the day-to-day events. Particularly it seems that his long-range predictions as to the course of political affairs in China were startlingly accurate, especially when considered in the light of the apparent capabilities of the Nationalist forces and the apparent weakness and geographical isolation of the Communists.

In none of the many conversations with Jack did I detect any indication of personal Communist leanings on his part, or any indication of sympathy with the aims of Soviet Russia and world communism. He expressed the conviction that the Chinese Communist had found a way to gain and hold mass support from the people. We at the same time had prepared an intelligence estimate to the effect that the Japanese could at will overrun our forward airfields in China. If his opinion was pro-Communist, then ours was pro-Japanese. Events shortly demonstrated that both estimates were accurate. In my judgment Jack's reports were nothing more nor less than objective conclusions on a subject vital to every phase of our effort in China based upon first-hand observation by a man singularly well trained by background and experience to understand the reactions and probable attitudes of the Chinese people.

Such reporting was in my judgment invaluable. If we needed or could have used intelligence reports tinged with wishful thinking and ostrichlike ignoring of the basic facts, we were abundantly supplied with them through both Chinese military and political sources on the Nationalist side.

Since charges have been leveled at Jack Service based in part at least upon his reports on China, I have reread such of the reports as I could locate, and I am still unable to detect in them anything which would remotely justify the slightest suspicion that Jack was doing any more than the job that was expected of him by the Commanding General to whom he was attached, and that was to ascertain the facts, interpret them in the light of his broad Chinese experience, and express whatever conclusions resulted therefrom. The only thing to be regretted is that we did not have more men doing as good a job as Jack did, and that his reports and those of the few who saw as clearly as he did were not given more serious consideration in the making of our over-all plans for Asia.

I understand that there is some criticism or suspicion directed at Jack because certain of his political information was disclosed to and known by the press both through correspondents accredited to the theater and through reporters and editors located in this country. Without knowing what particular information is thought to have been wrongfully disclosed, I do think it important that people generally realize that in most operating theaters, according to my understanding, and in the CBI Theater, according to my personal experience, there was a very wide range of disclosure to the accredited correspondents of the American press of the type of information that for general security purposes was classified all the way from Restricted to Top Secret. The policy of keeping the press representatives thoroughly briefed was one initiated from the very top. The fact that the CBI Theater was, as heretofore stated, as much influenced by local politics as by enemy action, made it apparent to the respective officers in charge that political background was an essential to an understanding by the American press and people of the manifold difficulties confronting military operations. The representatives of the press in the theater were, with but few exceptions, men of understanding, capacity, and discretion, and in many instances were as well informed or better informed through their own sources than the military headquarters which they visited. There was a constant interchange of information along these lines which was helpful to a high degree. Not only, therefore, was there a general understanding that the accredited American correspondents were to be taken into our confidence in regard to most of our military operations, but we were permitted to discuss freely with them our information and personal ideas as to the political situation. On more than one occasion I was specifically directed by my superior officers to brief correspondents on matters which came to my knowledge through classified documents, and nearly all of the political reports to which I have referred were classified either Confidential or Secret.

The political advisers to General Stilwell were naturally the best sources for this type of information for the correspondents, and it was only natural that they tended to discuss these matters at length. Not only was it well known that such discussions took place, but I am under the impression that they were encouraged by the commanding officers involved. I certainly never heard anyone criticized or reprimanded for frank discussions with American correspondents.

So far as I can recall there were but two military subjects which were beyond the range of permissible discussion. One was anything relating to plans for future military operations and the other was any discussion of the intelligence gained from radio intercepts. These two subjects, however, were restricted within the ranks of military personnel themselves, and even in General Arnold's War Room in Washington, where admittance was only to the highest ranking Air Force officers, these two subjects were never discussed or hinted at.

I would be very much surprised to find that there was any substantial amount of information contained in the political reports which I received that was not well known by at least a half a dozen of the better-informed correspondents for the American press who were operating in China and India during the times that the reports were current.

Dated at Louisville, Kentucky, this 24 day of April 1950.

ARTHUR W. GRAFTON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and County aforesaid, by Arthur W. Grafton, to me personally known, this the 24 day of April 1950.

My commission expires December 19, 1951.

(S) LILLIAN FLEISCHER,
Notary Public, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

Mr. RHETTS. Now I would like to offer document No. 47, which is the text of a communication from Col. David D. Barrett, assistant military attache, at Taipei, Formosa, to John S. Service, dated April 1950.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be included in the record, in the transcript.

(The matter referred to as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 47

"TEXT OF COMMUNICATION FROM COL. DAVID D. BARRETT, ASSISTANT ATTACHÉ AT TAIPEI, FORMOSA, TO JOHN S. SERVICE, APRIL 1950

"Over 1 year ago at request of Department of State I made detailed report on subject of your radio and my letter should be on file. During period we served in Yen-an your views and recommendations on subject of Chinese Communists were set forth in reports submitted through official channels and I believe these should be carefully considered in connection with any investigation of your loyalty. In my opinion, these reports indicated that you, like myself and some others serving in China at that time, were deceived to some extent by Chinese Communist advocacy of agrarian reform, by careful soft-pedaling of their adherence to Marxian doctrine, by ardent professions of support of democratic ideals and undying friendship for the United States, and by other plays intended to gain United States support. I never saw in these reports any signs of disloyalty or desire to hurt the United States. In our discussions of Chinese Communists while we were in Yen-an our primary consideration was part they could play in fighting common enemy and I do not believe any idea of helping communism as such ever occurred to you any more than it did to me. Seems to me essential to bear in mind that Chinese Communists and Soviet Union and other nations and groups then fighting on our side presented much different picture than from what they do today. In my association with you in Yen-an and elsewhere in China theater I always considered you highly security-conscious and intensely loyal to your country. As for charges you passed secret documents to unauthorized persons anywhere it would require more convincing proof than has apparently ever been presented to agencies hitherto investigating you to make me believe them. Above included in written affidavit which follows by pouch."

(Mr. Robert W. Barnett, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, please, sir?—A. Robert Warren Barnett, 4225 Forty-ninth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

Q. Are you acquainted with Mr. John Service, Mr. Barnett?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you describe when you first met him and the nature of your association with him since that time?

The CHAIRMAN. Before you do that why don't you qualify Mr. Barnett? Just state what he is doing.

Q. What is your present position, Mr. Barnett?—A. Mr. Chairman, I am now an employee of the Department of State. I am assigned to the Office of China Affairs, where I have the title of Officer in Charge of Economic Affairs. I have been working in the Department of State since the fall of 1945, and until my assignment to the Office of China Affairs I was in the economic part of the Department working primarily on Japanese questions.

Q. And you came with the Department in the fall of 1945?—A. That is right.

Q. What were you doing prior to that time?—A. I was in the Department of the Army, the War Department, immediately prior to coming to the State Department.

Q. In what capacity?—A. I was in the Military Intelligence Service of G-2, and I had been assigned there in May of 1945. Prior to that time I had been on the staff of General Chenault in China for some 22 months, where I was the assistant A-2 in charge of all combat intelligence for the Fourteenth Air Force Headquarters. Prior to then I was in Army schools in this country.

Q. Now, I believe you have stated that you were acquainted with Mr. Service. Would you tell the Board when you first met him and describe your association with him since that time?—A. My father happens to be the general secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in this country, and prior to that he was the head of the YMCA in China. Mr. Service's father was a secretary of the YMCA, too. Our families were intimately acquainted with each other for many years. The Services were stationed in Szechwan and my family lived in east China in Hangchow and Shanghai. In 1922 I entered the Shanghai American School, which was an American institution and mainly supported by the missionaries throughout China that wanted an American school to which to send their children, and also supported by the business community and some of the official American community in China. Sometime following 1922, I think it must have been about 1925, the Service boys—there were several of them—started coming to Shanghai, and I first became acquainted with Jack in Shanghai in the mid or late twenties. I forget exactly what year it was. Jack was 2 or 3 years ahead of me in high school and grammar school. He was active in the Boy Scouts and various campus activities, and we got to know each other quite well, but not terribly intimately at that time. Jack went away to college and so did I, and our paths did not really cross in such a way that we could get acquainted with each other well until 1940, when Jack was assigned to the consulate general in Shanghai and I was in Shanghai writing a book on Shanghai under the joint sponsorship of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Institute of Pacific Relations.

My book was to be a part of the so-called inquiry series and was published in 1941. Jack was on Consul General Lockhart's staff and I saw a good deal of him socially. I didn't see too much of him in connection with my research because Jack's interests were not primarily economic and my connections with the consulate were primarily with Bland Calder and some of his Chinese assistants. The consulate general's staff was very cooperative in assisting me to make contact with members of the British and American and the Japanese business community and also in providing me with statistical and factual information which would have been quite difficult for me to have compiled myself in the short period that I was in Shanghai.

Jack was at that time hoping to be assigned to west China, and the next time I saw him was in 1942 when I was sent out by United China Relief to do an economic survey of China. The survey was intended to assist United China Relief in developing a program of relief for free China after the Burma Road had been lost. Jack was very helpful to me at that time in making contacts with members of the Chinese Cabinet people, like Wang Chung Hui—I believe he was Foreign Minister at the time—T. F. Chiang, Madame Chiang Kai-Shek, the Kungs—in fact, the whole range of people in Chungking who were anxious to establish an effective working arrangement with the people in this country who were interested in going on supplying relief to the Chinese.

As you know, United China Relief was supported primarily by existing relief agencies but had been brought together through the active intervention of Mr. Henry Luce, who was the principal angel of the enterprise, coming in with financial assistance in a magnitude that would make it worth while for the agencies to work together rather than to work separately. My trip to China that time was a brief one. I was there only six weeks.

The next time I saw Jack was in the fall of 1943, when I had been assigned to General Chenault's headquarters, and Jack, I believe, had just been assigned to General Stilwell's headquarters, and we of course were very glad to see each other for personal reasons, but since his functions were largely in the political sphere and mine were exclusively in the military sphere, we did not have continuous or very close connections with each other during the war. In fact, I left Kunming during my 22 months' assignment out there only once prior to preparing to leave the theater. It was in early March that I had occasion to go to Chungking, and while in Chungking I saw Jack, together with a great many of my other friends there.

The occasion for my going, if you wish me to just continue in this manner—

Q. Go right ahead.—A. The occasion for my going was to obtain theater clearance for a manuscript which I had prepared at the request of General Chennault and General Glenn. This manuscript was entitled, "An Orientation Booklet for United States Military Personnel in China." It was written at a time when we thought that the war might last another year or two and it was intended for use by officers and noncommissioned officers already in the theater or who were expected to arrive in the theater. The Burma Road had quite recently been opened and we expected a huge expansion of American personnel in China. For some 15 to 18 months it had been one of my functions at the Fourteenth Air Force Headquarters to give daily briefings to General Chennault and weekly briefings on the military and economic and political situation in China to all transient personnel passing through Kunming who had any right to this kind of information. We had generals coming in and we had Intelligence sergeants coming in on Friday mornings, map room, and so on, so it was not very much of a trick for me to put in the manuscript what I knew to be the answers to the questions which this type of officer had on his mind.

I am sorry I don't have a copy of the book with me, but it breaks down into some 12 to 14 chapters something on the historical background of the war, organization of the Japanese Army, the organization of our own forces, the economics of the war, the combat record, our own combat record, the history of the campaigns that the Japanese had fought, some comment on the place of the China war and the Pacific war, and I had written a chapter on the Chinese political situation which I knew had to be handled discreetly, because although the booklet was classified "Restricted" we intended to print 10,000 copies of the booklet and it was quite certain that at least 1 copy would fall into the hands of the Chinese.

I chose to write this political chapter in such terms that neither the Kuomintang Party leaders nor the Chinese Communist Party leaders could find offense in it. That was a hard thing to do, but I thought it was a possible thing to do, because at that time both parties argued that they stood on the principles of the San Min Chu I of the Sun Yat Sen, so I described Sun Yat Sen's position in Chinese history, the development of the Kuomintang, an explanation of the way they applied the political doctrines of Sun Yat Sen to the China situation, and then concluded with a section on how the Chinese Communists had interpreted the same principles as their body of doctrine.

This manuscript was cleared by the Fourteenth Air Force Headquarters, the A-2 Colonel Williams, and the Chief of Staff General Glenn, it had been read by other members of the headquarters: Hawk Byroade, for instance, was in headquarters at that time. I went to Chungking to clear this manuscript and it was read there by the G-2 Colonel Dickey, members of the G-2 staff, and other general headquarters staff officers, and generally cleared through all of these people with a few revisions and amendments, but it was felt that the political adviser to General Stilwell's headquarters should have a crack at it and approve it if possible, and that was Jack, so I had a professional reason for calling on Jack. I let him see the manuscript and he kept it a couple of days and he returned it to Colonel Dickey with a recommendation that this political chapter be deleted from the book on the grounds that whereas it was a fair and fairly innocuous treatment of the problem of the Kuomintang-Communist ideological friction, the Kuomintang would find offensive any Government publication which recognized the existence of the Communists. Now that was unquestionably the case, and I had not thought of that. Actually a few weeks later the theater headquarters under General Wedemeyer brought out a directive which prohibited the discussion of any political issues at all by military personnel in China. With that amendment in the manuscript, the manuscript was cleared, I brought it back and it was published. I would be glad to give you a copy at some time.

Q. I don't think that will be necessary.

(Off-record discussion.)

Q. Now, based on your knowledge of and acquaintance and association with Mr. Service, and apart from the instance that you have just given concerning his acute sensitivity to avoid political friction between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists, would you be able to express an opinion to the Board as to whether Mr. Service has ever to your knowledge expressed any views or in any other way conducted himself so as to indicate that he was a Communist or a Communist sympathizer?—A. To my knowledge Jack has never done or said anything which would lead me to think that he was either a Communist or favored the expansion of Communist influence and power anywhere in the world. Jack has, in my opinion, been critical of the Kuomintang Party in the Government of China only where he felt that those criticisms had a bearing on what the United States could do to strengthen Chinese potential as a country which would be aligned with our own in the preservation of a peaceful and progressive world. The criticisms that he has made of China have not been different from criticisms that many people have made, including many Chinese.

Q. Would you say, including many non-Communist Chinese?—A. Certainly.

Q. So far as your knowledge of him goes, do you have any reason to doubt that he is an entirely loyal American citizen?—A. None whatever.

Q. I have no further questions.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES :

Q. Mr. Barnett, you mentioned that you were in Shanghai, I believe at one point, writing a book under the joint auspices of the Rockefeller Foundation and Institute of Pacific Relations. What was your connection, the extent of your connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. In 1937 I received a Rockefeller Foundation fellowship to study Chinese at Yale University. I held that fellowship for 2 years, and at the end of that period of time I was looking for a job. I heard at that time that the Rockefeller Foundation was granting fellowships to a number of people—I don't know whether it was four or six—but a number of people who would serve internships in the Foreign Policy Association, the Council of Foreign Relations, and the Institute of Pacific Relations. Two of these fellowships were to the IPR and were for 1 year. It didn't pay very much. I think it was $1,500 a year. I got one of those two appointments as an intern on the staff. Being an intern, I was treated as a staff member and acted as a staff member. I wrote for the Far Eastern Survey. As a matter of fact, I believe I wrote the first comprehensive analysis of the Chinese industrial cooperative movement. That was a movement which had the warmest kind of support from the fellow travelers who were keenly interested in supporting the Chinese Communist cause in this country. My analysis happened to be very critical of the Chinese industrial cooperatives on the grounds that it could not succeed as an economic venture because cooperatives are too weak in an inflationary situation to be real cooperatives. They had to be subsidized by the government or by big financial interests in order to survive at all.

The other enterprise that I was particularly interested in was an analysis of economic conditions in Shanghai, and my series of articles on that subject interested the foundation, and when my internship expired the foundation found the money to send me out to Shanghai to write the book on Shanghai.

So that was my connection with the IPR before going out. When I came back from the trip to the Far East—I was not only in Shanghai but Japan and Hongkong and Chungking as well—I was employed by United China Relief to work as a member of the committee, executive secretary of the program committee of the United China Relief, and I worked in that capacity for some months, almost a year.

Q. That was still the IPR or United China Relief?—A. United China Relief paid my salary, but the program committee's headquarters of operation was in the same building with Institute of Pacific Relations.

Q. About how long was your connection, such as it was, with the IPR?—A. I would like for these purposes to consider my period of duty with the United China Relief as being a part of my duty with the Institute of Pacific Relations. That is not the case, but since the headquarters were the same, I would like to discuss my associations with those, the United China Relief connection the same as the Institute of Pacific Relations connection. Bearing that in mind, I had an association with the Institute of Pacific Relations from the early fall of 1939 until the fall of 1942.

Q. About 3 years.—A. And during that period of time I was abroad twice, once under the Rockefeller Institute of Pacific Relations auspices, and the second time under the United China Relief auspices only.

Q. Had you any knowledge at that time of Communist infiltration in the IPR?—A. I was aware of course that Fred Field wrote for the New Masses and was occasionally, I believe, a contributor to the Daily Worker. His views on China and the Far East were in my opinion identical with those of Mr. Browder. There were other members of the staff whose political views and prejudices corresponded very closely to those of Mr. Field. However, during that period of time there were on the staff of the Institute of Pacific Relations people who disagreed violently with Mr. Field. I do not like to name names but I will in this connection, Kurt Block, for instance, who is now on the staff of Fortune, agreed on practically nothing with Fred Field. Russell Shiman, who was the editor of the Far East Survey, during that period disagreed with Fred. I disagreed with Fred. The IPR had a staff during the period from 1938 to 1942, when I ceased to have a close connection with it, which reflected practically every prejudice in the whole spectrum of American opinion on far eastern questions. The IPR headquarters in New York was a very stimulating place to study far eastern questions and be exposed to expert discussion on far eastern matters.

Q. May I interject? What I really was getting at is that you did recognize that influence in Field's and some other staff members' writings?—A. Certainly.

Q. Did you find any similarity at any time between the views Mr. Service was expressing and that type of view as expressed in the IPR?—A. Well, it is very important to be exact in what you are talking about in this connection. For instance, Field, Jaffe, and Service probably were all advocating an embargo on shipments of scrap iron to Japan during that period of time. I would have to document that, but I think that that is correct. But Stimson was too, and Stimson organized an organization called the American Committee for Non-Participation in Japanese Aggression. Literally, I mean, that was the name of the organization. A whole missionary group supported that enterprise. A large proportion of the business community supported the American Committee for Non-Participation in Japanese Aggression. So did the majority of the academic community. So a correspondence of views with Communists during that period of time did not necessarily indicate any sympathy with communism.

Q. Did you see anything in his writings which did?—A. In whose writings?

Q. Mr. Service's?—A. I don't think I have ever read anything of Mr. Service's except what appeared in the white paper.

The CHAIRMAN. No questions? Did you have anything further?

Mr. RHETTS. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Barnett.

Mr. BARNETT. I hope I have not taken too much of your time.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

(The witness was dismissed.)

Mr. RHETTS. I should now like to offer for inclusion in the transcript a two-page affidavit signed by Col. Samuel B. Griffith, II, colonel, United States Marine Corps, dated April 19, 1950, as document 54.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the transcript.

DOCUMENT No. 54

NEWPORT, R. I., 19 April, 1950.

STATEMENT OF COL. SAMUEL B. GRIFFITH, II, COLONEL, UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

1. I have known Mr. John S. Service since late 1935. Mr. Service came to Peiping, China, in December of that year as a language officer at the American Embassy. I was then a captain in the United States Marine Corps assigned to the office of the American naval attaché as a Chinese language student. During the next two years a firm friendship, which had grown stronger with the passage of time, was established between our families.

2. I know Jack Service intimately. My wife and I frequently visited his home in China. We have since exchanged visits when possible. I believe that Jack Service is an exceptionally intelligent man, and an able and conscientious Foreign Service officer. I have every reason to believe this, and no reason whatsoever to believe otherwise. Mr. Service has always struck me as a keen observer and a reserved and reflective man whose opinions as to Chinese affairs based on a thorough background knowledge, are entitled to attention and respect.

3. Mr. Service has never given me any reason to doubt that he is a loyal American and a devoted public servant. The idea that he could harbor "disloyal" thoughts, or utter "disloyal" sentiments, or be "pro-Communist" or in any sense be a "poor security risk," could not be entertained by anyone who knows him.

4. I have served nearly 5 years in China, both before and since the last war. I have always tried to keep myself informed of the Chinese situation to the best of my ability. After the war I had several assignments which assisted me in doing this: One of these was as Nanking Liaison Officer on the staff of the Commander of the U. S. Seventh Fleet, Admiral Cooke. If it is alleged that despatches written from China during the war, and later printed in the State Department "white paper" lend credence to the charge that Mr. Service is "disloyal," I would say that they reflect a keen appreciation of conditions, which having had their inception many years ago, were readily apparent to those who served in China after the war and who were attempting to arrive at the truth.

5. My long and intimate association with Mr. Service makes it possible for me to state that he is too loyal to his Department and his country to obscure or distort facts, or to render opinions not based on a realistic appraisal of those facts, or to make recommendations not consonant with the interests of the United States Government, of which he is, in my opinion, an outstanding diplomatic officer of unimpeachable integrity.

DOCUMENT No. 97

THE NEW YORK TIMES,
Times Square, May 10, 1950.

Mr. CONRAD E. SNOW,
Chairman, Loyalty Security Board
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SNOW: Since I will be traveling in other parts of the country for the next two or three weeks I am afraid I shall not be available in person for the hearing of John S. Service. In the circumstances I wish to accept your invitation, contained in your letter of March 23, to send a letter in support of him.

My association with Mr. Service was confined to the years of 1942-44 when I was in China as war correspondent for the New York Times and he represented the State Department there. We were interested in many of the same problems and I was closely associated with him personally and professionally. I encountered him everywhere I went in China, placed a high value on his ability, respected his opinions and comments and liked him personally.

Six years having elapsed since we were in China together I cannot remember in detail our conversations and activities. But everything I know about Mr. Service testified to his complete loyalty to the interests of the United States. Those were war years, and I was interested primarily in everything that bore on the prosecution of the war in China as it affected the United States and the chances of a speedy victory. As an observer for the State Department, Mr. Service doubtless had attitudes that extended beyond the war. I am not now acquainted with them except through the quotations from his admirable and lucid reports contained in the State Department's published volume of China material. But there is not the slightest doubt of his thorough loyalty to the United States in the years that I was associated with him; and I also think the course of events in China since 1944 has proved the remarkable accuracy of his analyses at that time.

Apart from his loyalty, which cannot be questioned by anyone who knows him, I have a high regard for the quality of his work. During the time of my association with him, he was alert, keen, indefatigable, hard-headed, and objective. My only complaint as a reporter was that Mr. Service was too punctilious about State Department security and declined to tell me everything he knew. He never permitted me to see classified material and was cautious and guarded about matters that he regarded as confidential.

Since the subject of Russia has been dragged into the dispute about Mr. Service's loyalty I suppose I must mention it. I am sure we discussed Russia, since we must have discussed everything in one way or another, but I cannot remember anything either of us said. I assume from this that nothing was said that seemed to me in any way remarkable. In those days Russia was one of our fighting allies and I personally hoped that relations with Russia were going to be pleasanter after the war was over. Owing to the long lapse in time I do not know now whether that was Mr. Service's opinion. But if it was it would not have been disloyal to the United States. On the contrary, I should have regarded it as evidence of his loyalty to American interests. I regarded the Chinese Communists as people who were valuable to us because they, too, were fighting Japan. If that was Mr. Service's attitude, as I think it was, I should have regarded it as sound and realistic in terms of American wartime necessities.

I have no doubt that a full investigation of Mr. Service's work and attitudes will prove that he is a reliable, loyal, and valuable servant of the United States.

Sincerely yours,

BROOKS ATKINSON.

DOCUMENT 49

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., April 21, 1950.

Brig. Gen. CONRAD E. SNOW,

*Chairman, State Department Loyalty and Security Board,
 Washington, D. C.*

DEAR GENERAL SNOW: John S. Service has told me that among the questions raised in the review of his loyalty case is the question of his relations with journalists in his capacity as a Department career officer dealing with policy matters concerning the Far East. I would like, therefore, to go on record with this statement of my own journalistic relations with Mr. Service, whom I regard as one of the ablest diplomatic officers I have known in some thirteen years of professional work involving very frequent contacts with department personnel in many parts of the world.

In the summer of 1943, when I was chief Washington correspondent of the Columbia Broadcasting System, my company sent me on a short reporting trip to India and China, and I was, of course, duly accredited by the War Department's Division of Public Relations. I believe I first met Mr. Service in Chungking in September of that year. I sought from him, as I sought from every American authority, civilian or military, all the information I could get as to the political, economic, and military condition of China. This was the common, day to day practice of all responsible reporters. As I recall it, Mr. Service talked with me quite freely, though I do not remember him giving me any specific information which was not at the same time commonly known to other American officials in Chungking, and as a matter of course given by them to the accredited correspondents for what was generally called their "background" knowledge of affairs. If Mr. Service had ever given me any very special or unusual information I think I would remember it, but I do not.

I do remember, however, once asking a small group of American officials about a document which I had heard had been prepared as a kind of summary of the Chinese warlords and military leaders in their various regions, together with their estimated political attitudes and, I think, their estimated military strengths. I was new to China and ignorant of the overall picture in those terms and thought

I would be better prepared to understand and report the general problem if I could read this paper. I have a clear recollection that Mr. Service hesitated, on some manner of security grounds, probably because he felt the document should be given out, for our background knowledge, only by the military authorities. I believe I was shown it, though I do not now remember by whom—it was not by Mr. Service—and, of course, if I used it at all, the information was never used in any objectionable manner.

It should be remembered that Chungking was a small place; Americans, both civilian and military correspondents all lived rather closely together, and all felt themselves involved in a common cause. I suspect there were very few real secrets between them of any nature. I know that various military leaders, such as General Stilwell, and General Chennault and others, most freely answered my questions and told me, as they told other reporters, a great many things of a highly secret nature as far as the enemy was concerned, things involving troop placements and future operations and so on. But this was never regarded as an unusual procedure, there or in any American theater of war with which I became acquainted. Nor was it unusual in Washington during the war. General Marshall, for example, used to see a group of us every three or four months and often told us of our military plans in considerable detail, information which certainly would have aided the enemy, but which we were trusted to use only for our own background guidance. So far as I know, none of that group ever violated such a trust. Certainly Mr. Service, though he helped me to understand the basic forces at work in China, never gave me information of as secret a nature as that I received from the afore-mentioned general officers.

I knew all the American and foreign correspondents living in Chungking at the time, men who were, presumably, of many differing political persuasions. Never, at any time, from any one of them did I acquire any manner of suggestion that Mr. Service had any allegiances except his obvious allegiance to his work and his superiors and his government. Had he possessed any other allegiances I am certain I would have heard some references to that, in view of the intimate conditions in which we all lived and worked.

It was my clear impression at all times, that Mr. Service was held in highest esteem by everyone I knew in China and India, as an unusually able and valuable American government servant.

I was, therefore, completely surprised when he was first publicly referred to as being under somebody's suspicion of disloyalty. Nothing that I have read or heard concerning him since these suspicions were first put about has led me to change my high regard for him in the slightest degree.

Sincerely yours,

ERIC SEVAREID,
Chief Washington Correspondent, Columbia Broadcasting System.

Mr. RIETTS. At this point I should like to introduce into the transcript as document No. 89 a 4-page affidavit dated Paris, May 2, 1950, signed by Theodore H. White.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so included.
(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 89

PARIS 21, RUE DE BERRI—S.
May 2d, 1950.

REPUBLIC OF FRANCE, CITY OF PARIS,
Embassy of United States of America, ss:

CHAIRMAN, LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I hope you will let me bring to your attention information about Mr. John Service which I, as a responsible citizen and one closely associated with American Military Headquarters in China during the war, feel should be entered on his record.

I am writing this letter in whatever confidence and trust covers the proceedings of your board, and hope no part will be made public without my prior permission.

During the war years, I was a war correspondent accredited to Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell's headquarters in the CBI theater, and later, after General Stilwell's relief, accredited to those of Lt. Gen. A. C. Wedemeyer. I write now having frequently heard General Stilwell speak of his affection and trust in Mr. Service and knowing that were the general alive today he would certainly stand publicly in Mr. Service's defence.

There seem to me, on reflection, to be two pertinent sets of facts that should be placed on record.

The first concerns itself with the press policy of our command in China during the war. I can speak on this with some degree of authority for I was President of the Foreign Correspondents Club of China in the years 1944-1945 and this club included all uniformed U. S. War Correspondents permanently stationed in the theater; and because, although it may seem immodest to say so, I was closer to General Stilwell than any other newspapermen at the time. Mr. Service served on General Stilwell's staff and operated within the frame of the General's press policy.

It is difficult to recreate the atmosphere that prevailed in Chungking throughout the war. But it was an atmosphere in which our Theater Command found itself cramped at every turn by the unending publicity and propaganda of the Kuomintang government of Chiang Kai-shek. Any description of the corruption, ignorance, and incompetence of the Kuomintang armies which we were supposed to reorganize must sound now, so many years later, as slightly hysterical. But I know that General Stilwell and other Americans permanently in China were driven almost to the point of desperation by the fictions emanating from the Chinese Ministry of Information and planted in the American press. It was to counteract these distortions of truth that General Stilwell decided that all possible nonoperational information at his headquarters be made available to American and Allied correspondents.

General Stilwell's policy was to treat American newspapermen assigned to him as part of his operating team, a necessary part which had to be kept informed were the American people to be well informed. This policy of the General pervaded his entire staff, not only its political section but its vastly more important military section.

Most of the information we wanted was made available to us from the very top. I believe I do General Stilwell no dishonor when I say that he made available to American newspapermen documents marked "Secret" and even "Top Secret" when he thought the interests of the public information overrode the technicalities of diplomacy. What memoranda and reports I remember seeing attributed to Mr. Service were always made available to me by people higher than he in the Theater hierarchy.

Such practice was current in other war areas; it is still current in many embassies and American outposts around the world. It is, within limits, a good custom and never was it more necessary to the American press than it was in China. It would, literally, have been impossible to ascertain or report the simplest truths about the war in Asia had it not been for General Stilwell's policy.

This wise policy of treating American newsmen with confidence was continued by General Wedemeyer when he took up the command in October 1944.

A word, too, should be said about the process of classification. Many things were classified as "Restricted," "Confidential," or "Secret," simply to keep them out of Chinese hands. It was impossible for our government to publicly submit a report or utter a communique which gave the flat lie to the government of Chiang Kai-shek, our then Ally. Much matter was therefore first classified and then made easily available to those interested or needing to know for any public purpose. I know that sometimes excerpts of my dispatches were classified by the Army; I know that great bales of OWI reports on the Chinese press, with quotations, were classified.

What information Mr. Service may or may not have given Mr. Gayn or any other American newspaperman, I do not know. Mr. Gayn was then writing articles for the Saturday Evening Post, as I remember; I should think it quite normal that if he asked the State Department's experts on China for information they should give him what they could; and, since information arriving from China was classified, that they should try to conduct themselves with the same judgment of classification that prevailed at the point of origin of the information.

I cannot remember ever, once, having heard a single detail of military operations from Mr. Service or any other member of the political staff. Usually, they did not know military matters. Moreover, the press had direct access to the General and his commanders for operational information. With the political staff we traded views and ideas, and if any political information passed from them to us, it was more than balanced by political information which we brought them in return.

I should like to pass to a second set of facts; those concerning Mr. Service's mission in China.

Early in the war, the State Department assigned to General Stilwell's staff a number of political intelligence officers to aid him in the tricky politics of China, whose forces we were attempting to reorganize for war against the Japanese. Service was among these, and, like the others, was subject to military orders and discipline.

It was under General Stilwell's orders that Service made these trips to the Chinese frontal areas under conditions of great hardship and personal danger, which won him his wartime reputation as one of the ablest American agents in the Orient. And it was under General Stilwell's orders that he was sent to Yen-an, then the Chinese Communists' headquarters, in the summer of 1944.

Mr. Service's mission in Yen-an was an intelligence mission: to wriggle his way into the confidence and affection of the Chinese Communist leaders, to learn what they were doing, their strength, their ideas. Mr. Service speaks an almost flawless Chinese and is, as I remember him, a man of ingratiating personal charm. The Chinese Communists accepted him as a friend and exposed through him to our government more of their thinking, than we have ever before or since learned about any Communist group. Moreover they made available to us combat intelligence, vital against the Japanese, which saved numberless American lives.

It is now twelve years since I started, as a foreign correspondent, to report the doings of American diplomats abroad and the mechanics of our statecraft. I have never seen a more skillful technical performance than Mr. Service's in gaining the confidence and learning the inner workings of a potentially hostile group.

I do not know what, specifically, Mr. Service reported to the State Department from Yen-an. But I remember long conversations with Mr. Service during those days and I can testify that never was he carried away by the then prevalent sweetness-and-light theory of the Chinese Communists. He saw them as hard, cold men, vigorously seeking power. He saw them as more able, less corrupt, more shrewd, fundamentally stronger men than Chiang Kai-shek. I submit that this was, in retrospect, first-class reportage.

Writing now from abroad, I do not know the specific charges against Mr. Service. I notice in press dispatches a passing reference to a meeting of his with Tung Pi-wu of the Communist party in the United States. I do not know whether such a meeting took place. But I do know that Tung had been sent to the U. S. A. to represent China at the U. N. at the personal insistence of Ambassador Patrick Hurley, on the urging of our State Department. And that Mr. Service's assignment, which was to keep an eye on the Communists and learn their thinking, would normally have pressed him to seek Tung out and chat.

It is so very difficult six years later to recall now from Paris the persons and policies of Chungking, China, in 1944 and 1945. I have not seen Mr. Service, to the best of my recollection, since early 1945.

Of his political views then I remember above all his devotion to what we in America consider the basic civil liberties, his conviction that in any civil war the faintest liberties the Chinese might hope for would die; that such a civil war would drive the Communists of China directly into Russian hands; and that such a civil war should be avoided at all cost.

I remember him personally as a fine and honest man, loyal, and devoted beyond the trace of doubt to our Republic.

In my opinion, sir, he deserves well of it.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to ask the Board whether it has a letter dated March 28, 1950, addressed to the Honorable Dean G. Acheson, and signed by John K. Fairbank, professor of history, Harvard University. I should say to the Board that this letter which was addressed to the Secretary of State is not in our possession. A copy of it was furnished to us, and we have requested the Department of State to see to it that this letter, together with the other communications relating to Mr. Service, of which we may have no knowledge, be furnished to the Board. The CHAIRMAN. Its receipt will be verified and furnished to the reporter.

Mr. RHETTS. Very well. Then I offer at this time as Document No. 66 a copy of the letter addressed to the Secretary of State, to which I have just referred, and ask that that be included in the transcript.

DOCUMENT No. 66

MARCH 28, 1950.

The Honorable DEAN G. ACHESON,
The Secretary of State, Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ACHESON: Having known John S. Service over a long period and in connection with his work in China during the war, I wish to submit my firm conviction that he is an entirely loyal public servant who deserves the strongest support in the effort to clear his name of recent charges of disloyalty.

I saw Mr. Service on numerous occasions in the period between October 1942 and December 1943, when I was attached to the American Embassy in Chungking on assignment from the Office of Strategic Services and with the title of Special Assistant to the American Ambassador. During this time I had a number of long talks with Mr. Service, in addition to seeing him casually on a day-to-day basis. At no time did I ever hear him express any sentiments or make any statements which were disloyal, subversive, or anti-American in character. On the contrary, he impressed me as having a most unusually strong concern for the national interest of the United States. I never heard him at any time express any belief in or attachment to Communist or Marxist doctrines. Every impression that I formed of him was of a man thoroughly devoted to the American way of life, to his country and its Government, and to the proper performance of his work in the Foreign Service. I have seen Mr. Service a number of times in the years since this period in Chungking and the above impression has been confirmed on every occasion.

As a professional student of Chinese affairs, I have furthermore been impressed with the foresight and clarity with which Mr. Service observed and analyzed the Chinese scene, as evidenced in his writings published in the White Paper on United States Relations with China. There is no more loyal act than a statement to one's superiors of truths which are unpleasant for them to hear. But since no policy founded on wishful thinking can be a safe one, Mr. Service deserves the thanks of all patriotic American citizens for his courage in stating the truth of the situation in China as he saw it, even though it was not at the time and has not since been palatable to some Americans. In stating the truth as he saw it, he performed his duty with courage; and the soundness of his appraisal of the Chinese scene has been in my judgment amply borne out by the record of history.

In the dire struggle in which we are unavoidably engaged against Russian expansion in Asia, it is of the utmost importance to our national defense and welfare that a man of Mr. Service's abilities remain available for effective Government service in the field of his special training. I therefore feel it a patriotic duty, and I believe many other academic specialists on the Far East will recognize a similar duty, to testify in defense of the realistic and fearless approach to the hard facts of our far eastern position which Mr. Service's record represents.

Yours very sincerely,

JOHN K. FAIRBANK,
Professor of History, Harvard University.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to ask the Board whether it has a letter dated May 1, 1950, addressed to the Chairman of the Loyalty and Security Board and signed by Knight Biggerstaff, professor of Chinese history, Cornell University.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the transcript.

Mr. RHETTS. I am asking whether you have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes, we have it.

Mr. RHETTS. I ask that that be included in the transcript at this point as Document 88.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so included in the transcript.

223 THURSTON AVENUE,
Ithaca, N. Y., May 1, 1950.

CHAIRMAN, LOYALTY AND SECURITY BOARD,
Department of State, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I first met John Stewart Service in 1935 or 1936 when he was assigned to Peiping for language study by the U. S. Foreign Service. At that time I was in Peiping doing historical research in the Palace Museum archives. During the months we were both in Peiping I saw him frequently and was impressed with his keen, inquiring mind and his desire to understand China and the Chinese people. This, however, did not particularly surprise me because I had earlier met his father, Roy Service, an able and devoted YMCA worker in China.

As far as I can recall, I did not see John Service again until a few months after I joined the Department of State in October 1944. Thereafter I saw him occasionally in the State Department, or at the houses of friends. In preparation for and in the course of my research while a Country Specialist in the Division of Territorial Studies of the State Department, I read a great many of the reports that had been sent to the Department by the American Embassy and Consulates in China over a period of years. Some of these reports were impressive to a professor like myself not only because of the thoroughness of the research and the breadth of observation on which they were based but also because of the keen understanding of Chinese problems they demonstrated. Among the best of these were a number written by John Service. In fact, Service's reports seemed to me to be models of their kind. Referring to a mass of information gathered from many sources, which he carefully analyzed and considered against the background of his extensive experience in and understanding of China, these reports seemed to me to provide the type of objective and thoughtful "intelligence" which is essential if our government is to have the information required for policy decisions. In none of Service's writings that I have read, nor in any of my personal contacts with him did I ever see the slightest evidence that he was either a Communist or an advocate of Communism.

In April 1945 I left Washington for Chungking, where I spent a year on the staff of the American Embassy. I have seen John Service only a few times since then; but I have never had any reason to change my favorable estimate of his ability and integrity as a Foreign Service Officer or to question his loyalty and devotion to his country.

Sincerely yours,

[S] Knight Biggerstaff,
KNIGHT BIGGERSTAFF,

Professor of Chinese History, Cornell University.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to ask the Board whether it has a letter dated May 11, 1950, addressed to the Chairman, Loyalty and Security Board, and signed by Phillips Talbot.

The CHAIRMAN. We have such a letter.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to ask that that letter be included in the transcript at this point as Document No. 96.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so included.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL SCIENCE,
Chicago 38, Ill., May 11, 1950.

CHAIRMAN, LOYALTY AND SECURITY BOARD,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It has come to my attention that Mr. John Stewart Service has been asked to reappear before the Loyalty and Security Board. I request the opportunity through this letter to express my personal view as to the loyalty and character of Mr. Service.

I came to know Mr. Service well during my tours as a United States Naval Intelligence officer in India and China from 1941 to 1945, especially from 1943 onwards when I served as Assistant Naval Attaché to the United States Embassy at Chungking. Our contacts have continued since the war, when I have been a newspaper correspondent and student of Asian affairs.

Official duties during the wartime period gave me occasions to be informed of analyses and recommendations presented by Mr. Service respecting some of the very complex problems related to the conduct of the war in Asia. At times these assessments did not agree with those expressed by other American officials.

It was then my firm feeling, however—and it remains so today—that Mr. Service reached his judgments on the basis of a superior intellectual grasp of the situation and a sense of devotion to his duty and to his country. When he felt the need to criticize, I believed, and still believe, that he so expressed himself in order to bring about more effective American policy planning.

In my view Mr. Service showed himself an industrious, able, and highly principled officer of the United States Government. I regarded him and continue to regard him as a thoroughly loyal American citizen.

Yours very truly,

[S] PHILLIPS TALBOT.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to include in the transcript at this point as Document 311 a one-page letter addressed to Brig. Gen. Conrad Snow, and so forth, and signed by Nathaniel Peffer, professor of international relations, Columbia University.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so inserted.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC LAW AND GOVERNMENT,

Brigadier General CONRAD SNOW,

*Loyalty Board, Department of State,
Washington, D. C.*

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of writing with reference to John S. Service. Let me identify myself first by saying that I am a professor at this University, that I have been concerned with studying the Far East for thirty-five years and have lived in China many years. Further, I know John Service only casually. I did know his mother and father years ago; they are, incidentally, upright, honorable, decent human beings and good Americans.

I want to speak of John Service only as reflected in his official reports which I have read in the White Paper. From all I know of the period in China—and I have gone over the evidence pretty carefully—I should say that they were accurate, intelligent, and an intellectually honest analysis of China at the time. I got back to China myself only in 1946. Everything I saw, looking with as much detachment as possible, confirmed what he had written.

It seems to me fantastic or a reflection of a perverted mind to see in what he wrote evidence of communist affiliation. If what he wrote constitutes such evidence, then nearly every American in China between 1945 and 1950 was a communist agent—including, or perhaps putting first, George Catlett Marshall. If you doubt that last statement, read General Marshall's statement of January 7, 1947, when he started home.

I repeat, I do not know John Service well personally, but I am confident that in the mind of every professional student of the Far East there is nothing in the record of his views which gives any reason to believe that he was anything but a detached observer.

I repeat that I think the overwhelming majority of professional students of the Far East—diplomatic, military, commercial and academic—not only would agree with what I have just said but shared his views as reported to the State Department. Unless some evidence can be thrown up to show some direct personal connection with Russia or the communist party, I think it is monstrously unjust to attack this man.

Respectfully yours,

(S) Nathaniel Peffer,

NATHANIEL PEFFER,

Professor of International Relations.

Mr. RHETTS. I ask that there be included in the transcript at this point as document No. 90 an open letter dated Paris, May 4, 1950, addressed to Senator Tydings, and purporting to be signed by Joseph Alsop.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so inserted.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

CHINA AND McCARTHY

JOSEPH ALSOP TELLS CHIANG STORY, ATTACKS SENATE METHODS, UPHOLDS LOYALTY OF ACCUSED

The following is a letter to Senator Millard E. Tydings, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee investigating charges of Communist infiltration in the State Department, from Joseph Alsop:

DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: After long hesitation, I am impelled by the appalling effects in Europe of the McCarthy witch to offer my testimony to your committee, for what it may be worth.

I do so for two reasons. First, I have already sharply criticized the conduct of our affairs in China on several occasions. Second, I was intimately involved in the events which led to the loss of China, whereas Senators McCarthy, Wherry, and Taft and their informants are offering second-hand evidence. This evidence is so obviously corrupted by political and other pressures that it is a duty to correct the impression conveyed.

Stating the case as briefly as possible, I think it fair to say that the really crucial years in China were those when General Joseph W. Stilwell commanded the China-Burma-India Theater, from 1942 until 1944. In this period, Professor Lattimore, who was always at best a fringe figure, played his most important role in our China policy, as personal adviser to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. In this rather brief assignment, he accomplished nothing, but he was quite obviously loyal both to the American Government and to Generalissimo Chiang.

Professor Lattimore had no part whatever in the real debate about China policy, in which the different points of view have been fantastically misrepresented by Senator McCarthy and his friends. No informed person ever supposed that offering blank checks to the National government of China would accomplish anything. Those who advocated a strong policy of aiding the National government only did so with the proviso that the aid given would be closely controlled by American representatives on the spot, as it was during the short and successful period of General Wedemeyer's command. It should be noted that the Congressional advocates of postwar aid to China specifically rejected the responsibility involved in this sort of local on-the-spot control in the first major bill appropriating funds for the purpose during General Marshall's period as Secretary of State.

Returning to the vastly more important war period, the other school of thought was composed primarily of General Stilwell and his political advisers. General Stilwell, so far as one could judge, was chiefly animated by his personal detestation of Generalissimo Chiang, arising from their disagreements. His political advisers, among whom was Mr. John Stewart Service, were operating on a more reasoned theory, however.

They asserted, first, that the National government was too feeble and corrupt ever to be reformed, even with direct American help and under direct American pressure. They said, second, that the Chinese Communists were therefore bound to win in the end, no matter what measures might be taken by the United States. In the third place, they argued that the Soviet Union, insofar as it had intervened in China at all, had given all its assistance to the regime of Generalissimo Chiang rather than to the Communists who received no tangible Russian aid whatever until the war was over. Fourthly, they suggested that the Chinese Communists might be induced to declare their independence of the Kremlin if they were treated as friends and allies by the United States.

Opening friendly relations and offering aid to the Chinese Communists was frankly admitted, at the time, to be a bold gamble. The gamble now looks better than it did then. On the one hand, the Yugoslav Communists, whose experience was precisely what the experience of the Chinese Communists would have been if they had received American aid, have now rebelled against the Kremlin. On the other hand, the recent behavior of the Japanese Communist leader, Nosaka, a wartime refugee at Yen-an and intimate friend of Mao Tse Tung, clearly suggests that the idea of independence of the Kremlin must have been in the air in Communist China in war time.

My right to speak, if I may be said to have a right to speak, derives from the fact that in wartime I was one of the chief American opponents of the school of thought I have summarized above. As a member of the staff of the American Volunteer Group, as chief of the lend-lease mission to China, and finally as an assistant to Dr. T. V. Soong, I did everything in my power to present the pro-Nationalist point of view in influential quarters in Washington. Those who wished to develop an American policy of friendship toward and aid to the Chinese Communists were finally and decisively defeated with the dismissal of General Stilwell, in October 1944. This occurred many months after I had finally succeeded in getting into uniform, as a member of General C. L. Chennault's staff in the Fourteenth Air Force. But although I had long before become a mere junior officer in the Air Force, the effect of my letters of Harry L. Hopkins and the other representations I had made was acknowledged by implication in General Marshall's first instructions to General Wedemeyer.

These are, so to speak, my credentials. Having known the situation in wartime China far more intimately than any of the pro-McCarthy witnesses you have yet heard, I think it my duty to say that while I disputed the judgment, I never had the faintest doubt of the loyalty of any of the American officials or others whom McCarthy attacked. They were serving the United States to the best of their ability, with courage and fidelity. This should be sufficient to protect them from the kind of vulgar attack McCarthy has made, even if their judgment was incorrect.

Although our views clashed so sharply, I was particularly well acquainted with Mr. Service. To the best of my knowledge, although I thought then and think now that he was gravely in error, he was a most conscientious and decent American public servant. It is difficult, of course, to offer hard evidence to support such contemporary impressions. But I may cite one fact, at least, to show how erroneous it can be to judge situations from the viewpoint of a later time. Former Vice President Henry A. Wallace has been, in effect, a pliable stooge for the American Communist party for more than two years. From this, many people have inferred that Wallace was a Communist stooge in wartime. In fact, however, nothing could have been more contrary to the party line in wartime than to urge the dismissal of General Stilwell, yet Wallace recommended the dismissal of Stilwell and his replacement by Wedemeyer in a telegram from China to President Roosevelt in the late spring of 1944. Incidentally, the telegram was sent with the full knowledge of Mr. John Carter Vincent, who entered no protest whatever, although he too has been under attack as a Communist stooge.

In conclusion, there are two points which I feel I must make. First, I do not think I was wrong in opposing the policy of gambling on winning the friendship of the Chinese Communists and inducing them to declare their independence of the Kremlin. I do not think I was wrong, simply because I and the others who took the same view could not possibly foresee that when this policy of winning the friendship of the Chinese Communists had been defeated with the dismissal of General Stilwell, there would be a long period after the war during which we had no China policy at all. None of the men now under attack by Senator McCarthy had any important responsibility, to my knowledge, for this singular hiatus. Speaking for myself, if I could have foreseen that the only alternative to a policy of gambling on the friendship of the Chinese Communists was a kind of vacuum of policy, I should have been on the other side in the struggle in China. The gamble on the Chinese Communists, although unnecessary, in my opinion, was at least a reasonable gamble, such as could be reasonably advocated by entirely loyal Americans.

Second, I should like to suggest to your committee that if the test of loyalty is following the line of the Communist party, you had much better launch an investigation of Senators McCarthy, Wherry, and Taft than an investigation of Messrs. Lattimore, Service, and Vincent. Let the test be a tabulation of the key votes on the three Senators above-mentioned on the great postwar measures of foreign policy, and especially of their votes on key amendments by which bills can be nullified. Unless I am gravely mistaken, such a tabulation will show that these three Senators, and most of the others who have joined them in the present clamor, have voted the straight Communist party line on every major issue of foreign policy, as laid down in The Daily Worker, ever since the end of the war. If temporary agreement with the party line is to be made the test of loyalty, let these men be called to the bar, to explain their records.

In summary, I do not attempt to excuse or palliate the grave American mistakes in China, which I have often before denounced, but I submit that we may as well abandon all hope of having honest and courageous public servants, if mere mistakes of judgment are later to be transformed into evidences of disloyalty to the state. And I submit further that the members of the Senate who are now persecuting these men who made, as I think, mistakes in China, have far more to explain, excuse, and rationalize in their own records, I still believe that the loss of China was unnecessary, but I think it far more important that we should not destroy the decent traditions of American political life. These now seem to be endangered.

Very sincerely yours,

JOSEPH ALSOP.

PARIS, May 4, 1950.

Mr. RHETTS. That is the end of the documents I have to offer at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now 5:30 and I think we can adjourn until 10 tomorrow.

(The Board adjourned at 5:30 p. m.)

EXHIBIT 18

SERVICE

1. 5-14-42. Chungking.

Two memos.

The first is solely report to Com. Gen. of conversation.

Second is a similar report but with some interpretive comment, which is factual and does not reveal bias.

Subject of both memos is the "Chinese Industrial Cooperatives."

2. 7-24-42. Chungking.

Despatch (called for) on propaganda and psychological warfare by Chinese Gov't. Generally factual and detailed. Received commendation from Dep't. Repeats some communist criticism of Chinese Government organs, which was probably accurate, as commies have generally been perceptive and keen as critics of others, even when (and especially when) they were guilty of the same things, or worse.

3. 1Z23-43.

Memo praperad in Dep't. A key document. This is a thoughtful and well-written memo pointing to the danger of impending civil war in China, from both military and political standpoints. While it relays, perhaps somewhat naively, certain communist suggestions for bettering the situation, it does not recommend that the suggestions be accepted and followed up. On the contrary, it recommends that U. S. officials be detailed to the communist-held areas to provide the answers to a number of questions concerning the communists and conditions in the area they hold. There was obviously no intent to influence the Government along pro-communist lines, for the author complains that such information as is available stemmed in part from journalists "who appear to have a bias favorable to the communists." And he warns against any brief visits during which our representatives "would be under the influence of official guides."

4. 2-11-43.

Inner-departmental memo drafted by S. and Smyth. Repeats briefly warning of unfavorable course of events in China and points out that "one possible course of action" might be sending U. S. representatives to Communist areas. Warns that Chinese Gov't. will probably not sanction this, but will be resentful if it is done without its consent.

5. 8-6-43.

Despatch from Lanchow. Called for report on Gold Market and Trading. Purely factual. No political implications.

6. 8-6-43. Lanchow.

Reporting experience of an American agricultural expert. Completely non-political. Points out exaggerated hopes for Chinese government organs for U. S. aid and tendency to enlist that aid even when they have no real need for it.

7. 8-16-43. Lanchow.

Reporting forced organization of professional people in Lanchow, for purposes of extortion and political supervision. Unsparing of Party, but factual. Essentially non-political.

8. 8-17-43. Lanchow.

On evidences of anti-Russian and anti-communist feeling in Chinese officialdom. Seems to be purely factual. In describing the restrictions placed upon the local Soviet consul. Service was perhaps unaware that this sort of treatment had been accepted general practise in the Soviet Union for at least a decade. Nevertheless, despatch contains no statement condemning Chinese Gov't for this treatment.

9. 8-17-43. Lanchow.

Service states that Soviet diplomatic representative has been very friendly to himself and to Capt. Tolstoy "and has been willing to discuss general problems with an openness and apparent frankness rather unusual for our Russian colleagues." Otherwise, report contains no independent comment by Service, and is restricted to a recounting of the views expressed by the Soviet representative.

10. 8-18-43. Lanchow.

Military notes. Purely factual. Describes deplorable state of Chinese troops passing through city, and brutality with which they were treated; but description is impassive, and without independent comment.

11. 8-18-43. Lanchow.

A report on political unrest and banditry in Kansu. Little relation to communists. Report is detailed and factual.

12. 8-19-43.

Embassy at Chungking refers in a despatch to certain of Service's reports. No comment on communists involved. Service speculates on Chinese government's plans with respect to communists. No bias apparent.

13. 8-20-43. Lanchow.

On reception of U. S. broadcasts in Kansu. Factual and objective.

14. 8-20-43.

A long report on activities of local Chinese police with regard to foreigners: restrictions of movement, observation, curiosity, suspicion, etc. Speaks of Chinese police using "Russian treatment of aliens as a model."

114. 9-10-43. Stilwell mission.

Reporting statements made to Stilwell by Chinese (Nationalist) General, obviously sympathetic to communists. No independent comment. Views expressed by General are somewhat similar to those expressed by Service in item 3.

116. 9-23-43. Chungking.

Two interpretative memos by Service concerning Eleventh Plenary Session of the Fifth Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang. The memos subject the decisions of the gathering to a searching and skeptical scrutiny, but the conclusions were borne out by subsequent events.

(Note—these memos should be compared with communist publicity at the time.)

117. 9-29-43. Chungking. Stilwell.

Describes the circumstances of the withdrawal of the communist representative from a meeting of the People's Political Council, as represented by a communist source. Service adds no comment of his own.

118. 10-27-43. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo asserting, and stating reasons why Chinese public opinion will be offended if Burma campaign is not soon inaugurated. No apparent relation to communist problem.

119. 10-28-43. Chungking. Stilwell.

Describes the bickering and bad blood between the Government and the minority groups over the composition of the Committee for the Establishment of Constitutional Government. Report is objective and describes the Committee as "not a bad one"; but states that "it is a rather unfortunate omen that the committee is starting its existence with a background of petty and acrimonious politics."

120. 11-13-43. Stilwell. (Military report).

Report on "willingness of Chinese Military leaders to become puppets." An important memo, which should be compared with communist line of the same period. Service rejects the communist thesis that the Kuomintang was encouraging defection to the Japanese-occupied area in order to improve their prospects for combating the communists after the war. Says this is the result rather than the design. Says large-scale defections are due primarily to Chiang's policy of placing in front line war-lord forces which are of doubtful loyalty to himself and which, being mercenaries from the beginning, are naturally amenable to Japanese promises of better pay and treatment.

121. 2-2-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Unimportant. Relaying of report that airport construction is causing discontent in a certain district.
122. 2-3-44.
Memo from Kuomintang source about conspiracy against Chiang. Questions Kuomintang tendency to blame communists.
123. 2-15-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Also about plot against Chiang. Adduces further proof that plot existed, and that it was an inner-army affair.
124. 2-15-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
A further report about the dissatisfaction caused by airport construction and Government's policies concerning compensation to land owners and conscription of labor. Factual.
125. 2-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Giving background on certain feelers for direct negotiations between Government and communists. Factual. Reflects, like all of this reporting, good contacts in the communist camp.
126. 2-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Reporting information released to correspondent by Government on extent of Jap-controlled area. Points out that Government spokesman listed certain communist-controlled areas as entirely Jap-controlled, evidently communist domination the more humiliating. Service points to this as indication of bitterness now existing between two factions.
127. 2-16-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Reporting interview with Madame Sun-yat-sen. Factual.
128. 3-2-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Further report, detailed and objective, on Chinese unrest in Chengau arising out of construction of U. S. air bases. It is evident that Chinese officials somewhere along the line are pocketing funds appropriated for compensation of conscripted labor, knowing that resulting bitterness will attach largely to Americans; but Service does not charge this directly.
129. 3-14-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Commentary on a report submitted by an OWI official from Kweilin. Contains following significant passage:
"The war in China has stimulated political consciousness to the point where loose separatism, which is the goal of the provincialists and which will mean a return to the chaos of the early years of the Republic, is impossible. By present indications it does not seem likely that the existing Kuomintang Government will collapse during the war. But if the present conflict is followed, as do's seem likely, by civil war * * * out of this civil war * * * there can be expected to emerge either a more progressive Kuomintang Government or a communist state, probably of the present modified Chinese communist type."
130. 3-14-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Another interview with Madame Sun Yat-sen. Purely factual. No independent comment.
131. 3-17-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
An excellent analysis of T. V. Soong's position—thoughtful and objective—acknowledged with special commendation by the Department.
132. 3-14-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Commentary on another personal incident in the Chiang entourage. Extremely moderate in tone, ending with the suggestion that "the real importance of this story, and of the many similar ones regarding the misdoings of the Soong-Kung family, is the readiness of the public to believe them."
133. 3-13-44. Military.
Review of second edition of Chiang's book—"China's Destiny." Points out changes since first edition. Severely critical of book ("a bigoted, narrow, strongly nationalistic effort at a special interpretation of history")—says that it reflects "unchanged a bitter anti-communist bias."
134. 3-24-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo on Chinese Territorial Claims in North Burma. Detailed, authoritative, analytical. "Chiang may have great ambition and vision. But his statesmanship does not ordinarily go far beyond shrewd, realistic, but often short-sighted bargaining."

135. 3-23-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo on the rumored plan to reduce China's armies. Service is critical about this.

"China remains a country where life is valued very little, where corruption is deep-rooted and prevalent, where economics have been consistently ignored or not understood, where power derives from military strength and that strength is measured in numbers, where the interests and welfare of the people have not (except perhaps in Communist North China) been a concern of their rulers and where the basic, overriding consideration is the struggle for power."

136. 3-20-44. Military.

Discusses incident of bombing of Chinese forces in Sinkiang, obviously by planes having something to do with the Soviet Union. Reflects a certain naïveté about Soviet Union in assumption that Soviet Kazakhs might have taken initiative in Sinkiang and that Soviet Government might have been "willing to lend a little unofficial assistance."

137. 3-23-44. Military.

Reporting views of Chiang Kai-shek; critical of Chiang's attitude but offers explanation for it. Concludes Chiang is responsible for situation in China and will continue in his present ways until the U. S. formulates and applies a strong China policy. Analysis appears objective and unbiased. (Chiang mentions Amerasia.)

138. 3-22-44. Military.

More about bombing incident in Sinkiang. Warns against U. S. involvement, particularly if we want to run convoy through that area.

139. 4-5-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

More on bombing incident. Without particular interest.

140. 3-26-44. Military.

Transmitting report prepared by Englishman who had been residing in communist area.

141. 4-4-44. Military.

Memorandum. Miscellaneous news items. Purely factual.

142. 4-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Chungking Embassy despatch transmitting memo on situation in Sinkiang. Specially commended by Department. Objective analysis of Chinese Nationalist Government's motives in the Sinkiang incidents and the success of the move. Service's recommendations include: "We should make every effort to learn what the Russian aims in Asia are. A good way of gaining material relevant to this will be a careful first-hand study of the strength, attitudes, and popular support of the Chinese communists. But in determining our policy toward Russia in Asia we should avoid being swayed by China. The initiative must be kept firmly in our hands." * * * "Chiang unwittingly may be contributing to Russian dominance in Eastern Asia by internal and external policies which, if pursued in their present form, will render China too weak to serve as a possible counterweight to Russia. By doing so, Chiang may be digging his own grave; not only North China and Manchuria, but also national groups such as Korea and Formosa may be driven into the arms of the Soviets."

143. 4-17-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Transmitting text of an interview with General Lung Yun. No comments.

144. 4-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo reporting views held by leaders of some of the minor parties of China. Service's comments relate only to the relative importance of these minor parties and are purely factual.

145. 5-18-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Service's critique of a Military Intelligence Despatch. Objectively points out fallacies in the MI despatch. Outlines activities of Nationalist Government in attempting to discredit the Communists in a purely factual manner. Makes three points: 1) that there is a fundamental conflict between Communists and Japanese and puppets; 2) Kuomintang is attempting to convince foreign opinion that Communists are in league with Japs and puppets; 3) that Kuomintang actually is in contact with Japs and expects puppet support. Justifies his points factually. (Rated Very Good in Department.)

156. 6-7-44. Military.
Presentation of the views of David An on Chinese Treatment of Koreans. Reported without comment or interpretation.
157. 6-20-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Important memo, widely circulated with favorable comment in Department. Strong denunciation of the weakness, corruption and venality of Kuomintang. Apparently written partly from exasperation at the Nationalist Government but criticism appears to be justified. Only political bias visible is that of American official trying to turn China into an asset to the American war effort. Encourages American contact with communists as with other minor parties and liberal elements to stimulate the Kuomintang to a reform program. No interest displayed in Communism as a movement in itself. Contact with communists areas desirable from an intelligence standpoint in the war effort. * * * "We should select men of known liberal view to represent us in OWI, cultural relations and other lines of work in China."
158. 6-23-44. Military.
Memo of conversation between Chiang Kai-shek and V. P. Wallace, J. C. Vincent, Gen. Ferris, Owen Lattimore and JSS. Factual account.
159. 6-24-44. Military.
Reporting communist agreement to the sending of a U. S. "observers' section" to Yen-an. Objective report of communist views on the matter, presented without bias or comment.
160. 7-6-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo on communist map showing contraction of communist-held territory. Service cites contemporary Central Government map which contradicts Communist claim. Illustrates distortions of Central Government map and comments that communist map may not be more than generally true and may not give whole picture. Objective, without political coloration.
161. 7-11-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo transmitting a report from communist sources on communist military operations against Japan during May 1944. Relayed without evaluation although several Japanese news items are submitted in conjunction with the report as some possible confirmation of communist claims. No political implications.

162. 7-20-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo transmitting a personal letter from Chinese intellectual expressing disillusionment with present Chinese regime and hopes of constructive American aid. JSS feels letter reflects present state of mind of large part of Chinese intellectuals and liberals. Objective presentation, pointing out strength as well as weakness of viewpoint.

163. 7-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Transmitting a statement of Chinese intellectuals "Appeal for Revolutionary Democratic Rights." Covering memo indicates approval of intellectuals' denunciation of Kuomintang suppression of freedom of speech, thought, study and expression.

164. 8-26-44. Chungking. Stilwell. Yen-an.

Memo of first impressions of Yen-an. Is highly favorable in comparison with Kuomintang-held areas. "There is a bit of smugness, self-righteousness and conscious fellowship" * * * but "most modern place in China." "What is seen in Yen-an is a well-integrated movement, with a political and economic program which it is successfully carrying out under competent leaders. * * * One cannot help coming to feel that this movement is strong and successful and that it has such drive behind it and has tied itself so closely to the people that it will not easily be killed." Service understandably favorably impressed by comparison between Yen-an and Kuomintang areas in matter of material conditions, morale, and efficiency.

165. 8-26-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yen-an.

Memo of conversation with Mao Tse-Tung in Yen-an in which Mao sounded Service on the possibility of opening an American consulate in Yen-an. Factual reporting.

Transmitting reports of interviews with various Chinese communist leaders. Factual.

167. 9-1-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Transmitting report of interview with Chief of Chinese General Staff. Factual account of diametrical opposition of views between communists and National Government.

168. 9-8-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yen-an.

Important memo outlining Service's interpretation of communist motives. Inclines to think the best of communists. Offers arguments in opposition to this attitude but explains why he does not feel the opposing arguments are justifiable. Believes the CCP aims for orderly prolonged progress to eventual socialism, not violent revolution, and in achieving that aim will not seek an early monopoly of political power but considers first the long-term interests of China. Service shows a certain naiveté in his grasp of Marxist doctrine and ignorance of some changes incorporated in that doctrine during and after Lenin's time, e. g., that capitalist development is an unavoidable stage of economic development. Service believes the CCP will initiate (or had initiated) a type of NEP program which will last indefinitely into the future—ignoring or ignorant of the fate of NEP in the USSR. Appears to be an objective analysis of the situation. (The conclusions appear to be what might be expected from one judging on the basis of Chinese experience only, not with reference to experience with communist seizures of power elsewhere.) The Chungking Embassy takes issue with Service's views that the CCP is not aiming for a monopoly of power in the near future.

169. 8-29-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.

Memo reporting on economic conditions in communist-controlled North Shensi. Tone is favorable toward achievement but information is presented in factual manner without comment.

170. 9-19-44. Chungking Observer Section in Yen-an.

Memo on Chieh Fang Jih Pao, communist newspaper in Yen-an. Submitted without comment save that the paper was well edited and of high caliber. Unimportant.

171. 10-11-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yen-an.

Memo summarizes lectures given by the Communist General, Chief of Staff of 18th Group, to officers of United States Army Observers Section regarding the situation behind the enemy lines in North China. Service comments only on the fact that the communist army is a political army as much as it is military. Factual.

177. 9-28-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Well conceived analysis of the strength of the communist movement with the recommendation that American military aid be extended to the Communist forces, to aid in the struggle against Japan. Service expects the Kuomintang will object to such aid and stated the United States must soon formulate a policy to decide the question of this aid, keeping in mind that "the nature, policies, and objectives of the CCP are of vital long-term concern to the United States"; the "CCP under any circumstances must be counted a continuing and important influence in China." Arguments in favor of extending aid are presented factually. The interview with Mao transmitted with this despatch indicates Service's views regarding the question of United States relationship with the CCP parallel to a certain extent those of Mao himself. Service specifies his reasons.
178. 10-11-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo of lecture by communist military leader on strength, distribution, and arms of Communist forces. Factual account.
179. 10-13-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo of lectures by communist military leader on operations of 8th Route Army. Factual account without comment other than to point out the importance the communists attach to political programs as the basis of their military strength and success.
180. 9-29-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Report on possible usefulness of old communist bases in Southeast China. Objective account of facts. Specifies in connection with communist reasoning on matter that "it would be a mistake to assume that the communist consideration of the problem is all on the high-minded and unselfish plane." No political bias apparent.
181. 10-2-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo on personal impressions of communist leaders. Highly favorable of the personal qualities of these men. (Strikingly like the impressions of the old Bolsheviks which foreign observers acquired at the time of the Russian Revolution.) Service's favorable attitude obviously in part stems from the contrast with Kuomintang leaders. Apparently unaware of the potential dangerousness of the type of character molded in the communist school, especially when the CCP holds the reins of power. Objective in all.
182. 10-13-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Report on the popular appeal of the communist party. Outlines tactics employed by the Communists which win popular support, i. e., reduced rents, elimination of banditry, popular election of officials, and converting the army from instrument of oppression to one of aid to peasantry. Service views the accomplishments with favor tempered with reserve. Can find no other explanation of popular backing of the communists.
(NB. Service apparently considers "democracy" as synonymous with popular support, a definition which would apply to Hitler's regime as well. On basis of this definition, Service's opinion that the CCP is democratic is justifiable.)

183. 9-29-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Extremely well-balanced report on the development of communist political control in areas under their domination. (Rated Excellent in Department.) Report is well-rounded, presents a factual picture and appears to be very perceptive in divining the purpose of communist actions in many fields. Explains both how the communist program wins popular support and at the same time serves communist interests. No political bias evident and no effort to condemn or praise. Factual reporting. (Should be noted that CA's comments in Department on Service's reporting consistently put communist in quotation marks, implying something distinct from the Soviet brand. No evidence of this attitude has yet appeared in any of Service's work.)
184. 10-9-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Reports decision of CCP to change its name in foreign publicity to avoid the stigma of "communism." Service interprets it as a desire "to allay any foreign fears and to win foreign good-will." No political comment otherwise.
185. 10-25-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Transmitting communist views on treatment of Japan. No comment made but appears to be evident that Service accepts sincerity of communist spokesman and feels views expressed are honest aims of CCP.
186. 10-25-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Interview with CIC of communist military forces. Service states, "I am in general agreement with the views expressed by such communist leaders as Gen. Chu. Every effort, however, has been made to avoid encouraging any high expectations, to point out the practical difficulties in the way of direct cooperation and to suggest that Japan may be defeated in other ways than as the communists insist, a slow process of liquidating the armies on the Asian mainland." Chu's views followed the usual pattern that cooperation with the Kuomintang was impossible and U. S. strong role necessary in China.
187. 9-27-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Report of interview with Hungarian national. No political content.
188. 9-23-44. Yen-an.
Memo on the orientation of the Chinese communists toward the USSR and toward the U. S. Key document. Essentially, reasons that CCP orientation is exclusively pro-China. Ties with the USSR are of the past. Interests of the CCP are best served by cultivating ties with the U. S. which can aid the industrialization of China. USSR can't and China can't do it alone. Service states, "I believe that the Chinese Communists are at present sincere in seeking Chinese unity on the basis of American support. This does not preclude their turning back toward Soviet Russia if they are forced to in order to survive American-supported Kuomintang attack." Service's account appears to be an eminently fair statement of communist views as evident at that time—his conclusions, a reasoned choice between the lesser of two evils. Reveals ignorance of some of the finer points of communist doctrine, particularly in regard to the manner in which Marxism is to be applied outside the USSR.
189. 10-1-44. Yen-an.
Transmission of communist newspapers. No comments.
190. 10-25-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Memo on communist success in eliminating banditry. Cites communist explanation for this situation—economic improvement, mobilization of entire population in the war effort and removal of feudal basis of banditry—as only apparent explanation for its elimination. Objective reporting.
191. 11-24-44. Yen-an.
Reports of impressions of American medical officer and several foreign correspondents on popular support in communist areas. Presented without comment.
192. 11-24-44. Yen-an.
Transmission of memos on conditions in communist areas and on Communist-Kuomintang relations. Service's observations are, that the communists are fighting the Japanese, successfully because they have the people behind them mobilized. Mobilization based on economic, political and social revolution, gains of which the people will fight to keep. Kuomintang will be unable to repress these mobilized people or the communists as long as the latter have popular support. Communists will continue to be important part of China's future and unless Kuomintang institutes extensive reforms (unlikely) Communists will be dominant force in China in a few years. Service's observations have been borne out by subsequent events.

193. 10-10-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Important memo on need for realism in U. S. relations with Chiang. Anti-Chiang, not pro-communist. Holds Kuomintang dependent on U. S., U. S. not dependent on Kuomintang. We do not need it militarily, we do not need to fear its opposition or fall or its international importance. Chiang does not represent pro-American or democratic groups, we owe him no gratitude and he understands only force. Need hard-boiled policy toward him to aid U. S. war effort. Only reference made to communists is that "we cannot hope to solve China's problems without consideration of the opposition forces, Communist, Provincial and liberal." Service's denunciation is strong but based exclusively on the urgency of aiding the American war effort in the Pacific. No indication of political bias towards any faction, only against Kuomintang corruption and power politics. A tendency to underplay usefulness of Kuomintang to the U. S. war effort and discount any worth in the movement.
194. 10-10-44. Yen-an.
Memo on communist interception of State Department radio bulletin. No political comments.
195. 11-24-44. Yen-an.
Memo on present communist attitude toward relations with Kuomintang. Service displays great insight into tactics of communists in increasing demands as the situation turns more in their favor. Reveals acute observation and understanding of the power politics involved. No personal comments of political nature appended.
196. 10-15-44. Yen-an.
Memo regarding censorship of escape stories coming out of communist territory. Unimportant.
197. 10-17-44. Yen-an.
Memo transmitting the published policies and administrative program of the CCP. No comments.
198. 10-18-44. Yen-an.
Memo on communist propaganda use of statements of foreign correspondents. Deplores the extravagant statements made by some promising American aid to the communists, but comments on the fact that many correspondents have been converted to a procommunist attitude. Unimportant.
199. 10-21-44. Yen-an.
Transmitting communist newspapers. No comments.
200. 11-8-44. Washington.
Interrogation of Service while on consultation in Washington. Views on Japanese communists. Appears to be purely factual information. Service states that he himself helped carry information for Japanese communists, apparently out of Yen-an to Chungking for relay elsewhere. No elaboration.
201. 11-44. Washington.
Interrogation of Service on Washington consultation. Views on probable developments in North China in the event of a U. S. landing. States that communists will cooperate with allied troops as long as allies do not interfere with their politics. Will not allow military considerations to prejudice their political program. Service suggests however "that it would be well to put out a rather large number of U. S. officers," since the communist area is decentralized. Chiefly factual evaluations.
202. 11-8-44. Washington.
Interrogation of Service while on Washington consultation. Predominantly factual information. Service states "China's first need is economic development, and U. S. must do it. Russian help would divide China but U. S. will unite them." * * * "Chinese communists are not radical at present. They are still Marxists, but are against subjectivism. Marxism points to ideal socialism." Little political comment.

203. 2-12-45. Chungking—for Wedemeyer.
Military only.
204. 2-14-45. Chungking—for Wedemeyer.
Memo on military weakness of our Far Eastern policy. States recommendations to aid communists parallel Churchill's policy in Yugoslavia, aiding the faction which would assist most in the war effort. Support of Chiang is only a means to an end but we tend to confuse the means with the end. We must clarify issue to restore our primary objective, defeat of Japan with smallest possible loss of life. Well-constructed analysis of situation.
205. 2-14-45. Chungking.
Recount of the current status of Kuomintang-Communist negotiations. Purely factual reporting.
206. 2-16-45. Chungking.
Views of Russian officials in China. No comments.
207. 2-17-45. Chungking.
Memo on Kuomintang hopes to make a deal with Russia. Service's opinions are contradicted by later events but analysis is interesting. Feels USSR will not deal with Kuomintang in view of its decided objections to the regime, no likely quid pro quo exists and besides Chinese Communists are stronger than Kuomintang. Unaware that USSR would be willing to sacrifice interests of a local Communist party for Soviet interests.
208. 2-17-45. Chungking.
View of Sun Fo. No comments or analysis.
209. 2-19-45. Chungking.
Memo on Chinese feelers regarding Formosa. Purely factual.
210. 2-28-45. Chungking.
Criticism of proposal to declare Shanghai an open city. Military interest primarily. Good analysis. No political application.
211. 2-28-45. Chungking.
Views of Captain (Joseph) Alsop. Diametrically opposed to Service's opinions. Alsop argued on the line that U. S. long-range interests were more important than the immediate ones of winning the war; that long-range interests involved allying China on our side as a balance against Soviet influence—our greatest threat—and destruction of the Chinese communists. Believed in necessity of getting involved in the inevitable civil war which would follow from U. S. complete backing of Kuomintang against communists.
212. 3-4-45. Chungking. Military.
Request to visit Yen-an. No political coloration.
213. 3-21-45. Chungking.
Memo of communist attitude toward Central Government. Notes change in CCP attitude toward U. S. cooperation in China and possibility of cooperation with Kuomintang. Service notes this change dates from Stilwell's departure. Communist expansions southward followed belief that U. S. would support only Chiang. Notes communists seem to be expecting large-scale Japanese activity in North China and are getting out of way of these Japanese efforts to consolidate on mainland. Communist determination to control China proper growing.
214. 3-13-45. Yen-an.
Views of Mao Tse-tung. Factual reporting. Opinions similar to those expressed in earlier papers.
215. 3-14-45. Yen-an.
Memo on communist expectations of Soviet aid and participation in the Pacific war at a late date. Probable course of military tactics to be followed by communists. Notes that communists will strive to gain control of Manchuria, that they have already infiltrated the area, because of its industrial importance. (Feeling that CCP did not expect USSR to strip Manchuria, as CCP intended to have benefits of its industrial potential.) Factual analysis.
216. 3-16-45. Yen-an.
Transmission of communist views regarding Sinkiang. Relayed without comment.
217. 3-16-45. Yen-an.
Communist views on Mongolia. Transmitted without comment.

218. 3-16-45. Yenau.

Policy of the Chinese communists toward the problem of national minorities. Service states that while communists claim their program is based on Sun Yat-sen's, in actuality it is based directly on that of the Russian communists (from whom Sun got most of his ideas). Service feels that some of these ideas (Stalin's "Marxism and National Question") may be unworkable in China because some of China's minority nations exist closes to other strong states and because China is weaker than Russia was at time of 1917 revolution.

219. 3-17-45. Yenau.

Communist plans for a relief and rehabilitation organization in communist liberated areas. No comments. Purely factual.

220. 3-17-45. Yenau.

Evidence to substantiate communist claims as to the extent of territory under their control. American observers evidence. No political comment. Purely factual reporting.

221. 3-19-45. Yenau.

Comments on communist report of Kuomintang exile government organizations in parts of China. Analysis of moves shows no political bias. Factual reporting.

222. 3-20-45. Yenau.

Transmitting information regarding dealings of Chinese Central Government military officials with the Japanese. No political coloration evident.

223. 3-21-45. Yenau.

Memo on Chiang Kai-shek's treatment of the Kwangsi Clique. Decidedly critical of Chiang's activities. Service's interpretation not necessarily accurate—CA disputes some points. Memo involves no mention of our references to communist movement. Factual reporting.

224. 3-22-45. Yenau.

Significance of personnel appointments made by Chiang. Service interprets these appointments are signs that Chiang is preparing for civil war with the communists, rather than peaceful cooperation. Factual.

225. 3-23-45. Yenau.

Memo on contact between the Chinese communists and Moscow. Service's interpretation is good. Gives known facts and distinguishes between governmental contacts and contact between communist parties. Appears to be a realistic view of situation. Service feels communists probably do not have relations with Soviet Government but contact between the Soviet CP and the Chinese is likely to exist.

226. 4-1-45. Yenau.

Statement of communist policy to be adopted by the communist congress as given by Mao and other leaders. Offered without political observations other than to point out high-lights.

227. 3-18-45. Yenau.

Memo on establishment of unified labor organizations and women's groups for the communist liberated areas. Factual account with comment that this step constituted a direct challenge to the Central Government, almost bringing the future conflict into the open. No political bias evident.

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: Tuesday, May 30, 1950, 10 a. m. to 12:30 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State.

Reported by: E. L. Koontz, court stenographer.

Board members present: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles; Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

In the case of John S. Service; Charles Edward Rhett, attorney.

(The meeting reconvened at 10 a. m.)

(Col. Frank Dorn, called as a witness in behalf of John S. Service, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address for the record, Colonel Dorn?—
A. Col. Frank Dorn, Department of the Army, Chief of Information, Pentagon,
Washington, D. C.

Q. You are a colonel in the United States Army?—A. Right.

Q. Will you state your present duties?—A. My present duty is Acting Deputy Chief of Information in the Department of the Army.

Q. Now, would you state for the Board what your duties were during the period from 1941 to 1945: in general the positions you held?—A. In 1941 I was aide-de-camp to General Stilwell, who at that time in the early part of 1941 was in command of the Third Corps in California. Later, I went to Washington with him and after Pearl Harbor when he went to China on his mission, leaving Washington in February of 1942, I accompanied him on the trip. I was his aide until about October of 1942; then became artillery officer of the theater; later, deputy chief of staff of the theater, that is, the China-Burma-India theater; and later what they called chief of staff of the yoke force in Yen-an Province.
From that, I became commanding general of what they called the Chinese Combat Training Command which was stationed in Yen-an Province, and left China in January of 1945 to come back to this country. I was then in headquarters Army Ground Forces for about 3 months. Then, accompanied General Stilwell to the Philippine Islands. Later, to Okinawa and went in with the early troop arrivals in Japan in late August of 1945. I remained in Japan until the end of 1945.

Q. I believe you indicated that during a portion of the period you were commanding general of—what were the forces?—A. The name of them was the Chinese Combat and Training Command, which was an American establishment set up to work with the Chinese troops primarily in Yen-an Province at that time for training purposes, equipment, supply, what advice we could give them.

Q. At that time, I take it, you were a temporary brigadier general?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, are you acquainted with Mr. John Service?—A. Yes. I have known him for about 15 years.

Q. For about 15 years. Would you summarize for the Board the nature of your acquaintance and association with Mr. Service during this period?—A. I first knew him when I was a language student in Peiping. I have forgotten whether it was late 1934 or early 1935, about that time, and he was in Peiping at that time.
I ran into him occasionally in China during that period until 1938 when I felt China to come back to this country. I lost touch with him, ran into him again when I went out to China during the early war period.

Q. And after you met him again in China during the war period would you indicate to the Board something of how frequently you happened to see him and what the nature of your association with him was in terms of intimacy of your knowledge of him.—A. I saw him—I guess the best way to put it—I saw him off and on during that period over there. Sometimes it would be more frequent than others and there would be perhaps a long period where I might not see him.
However, I was acquainted with the work he was doing more than I might say with him personally during that period.

Q. That is, you saw the memoranda and reports which he was preparing and turning into the Army headquarters as part of his work as a political observer?—
A. Well, either that, or else in discussions of the staff heard the results of the reports which was more or less the same thing.

Q. Now, on the basis of your knowledge of Mr. Service over 15 years, and the relationship which you have described, I should like to ask you, first, whether you have ever had any reason to believe that Mr. Service was in any way disloyal to the United States?—A. I had no reason of any kind to think it at all.

Q. Did you ever have any reason to believe from any statements he ever made or any of his conduct that he was a Communist or a Communist sympathizer?—
A. Never had the slightest idea that he might be and no reason to come to any conclusion of that kind.

Q. Were you aware that Mr. Service in the various reports which he sent back to the Army headquarters during the period when he was attached to the Army observers' mission at Yen-an, that he reported generally favorably on the morale of the Communist areas, and also that he reported favorably on their fighting qualities in relation to the Japanese?—A. I was aware of that in a general way, not having seen any of those reports.

Q. Were such reports also made by the members—strictly military members of that mission?—A. Yes. As far as I know, they were from talking to them and from some that I have read.

Q. I wonder if you could indicate to the Board something of your personal relationship to General Stilwell? I have gathered from your testimony that you were in a sense attached to him personally during quite a period.—A. I would say that, to use the expression, that I was "very close" to him in a personal way as well as in an official way. I had known him for a number of years, and had been with him—he was in China when I was a language student acting as assistant military attaché and I had very close connection with him and his family as well and still do with the family.

Q. It has been charged by Bishop Paul Yu-pin that Mr. Service insisted and repeatedly demanded that General Stilwell go to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and demand the arming of some 300,000 Chinese Communist troops. Bishop Paul Yu-pin has stated that Mr. Service put pressure on General Stilwell once, and then went back at him a second time and kept hammering at him until he finally forced General Stilwell to make these demands on General Chiang Kai-shek—could you comment on that assertion?—A. I have never heard General Stilwell say that Mr. Service had put this pressure on him.

Q. Do you think it likely that had Mr. Service been attempting to pressure General Stilwell in this fashion that it would come to your attention? In view of your relationship with General Stilwell?—A. I think in all probability it would because although General Stilwell had spent most of his time in India after 1942, nevertheless he came through where I was stationed in Yunnan Province. I would say, on an average of perhaps every 2 months and always stopped off and usually stayed at my house with me. We talked things over in a very general way and sometimes in a very detailed way, and I am sure that he would have mentioned something about it.

Q. From your knowledge of General Stilwell and your knowledge of Mr. Service would you say that Mr. Service was—in terms of the entire scheme of things in the theater at that time—a particularly potent or significant influence on General Stilwell personally?—A. No; he was not.

Q. Are you familiar with the general views that Mr. Service expressed in his report concerning the desirability of furnishing arms to the Chinese Communist forces?—A. Only in a most general way.

Q. I wonder if you would indicate to the Board what your general understanding of those views was?—A. Well, since I have not seen any of those reports that's not an easy one to comment on. However, I know that the general feeling of the officers that were at Yen-an and of many others in the theater was that the objective, after all, was to defeat the Japanese and as quickly as possible, and use any troops who were able bodied and who would fight for that purpose. So that the big majority of our people in the theater, as far as I know, looked on the Communists, Chinese Communists, more or less as another party; in fact, I frequently made the remark myself to Chinese that you might compare them to the Republicans and Democrats in this country, which was wrong, I realize now, but we felt that if we could get manpower we could do things and we didn't have manpower in the Chinese Nationalist Army.

Q. When you said a moment ago "our people" I take it you referred primarily to the military people?—A. To the military.

Q. Who felt that any able-bodied troops that were willing to fight should be encouraged to do so?—A. Yes. As an example, if I may digress a bit, in some of the troops I was working with in the Salween River area the divisions were depleted down to the strength of 1,500 men. Well, you are not going to accomplish much with that and our effort was to get replacements.

Q. Could you place for the Board in time roughly when General Stilwell came to view that it would be desirable to utilize the Chinese Communist forces in the war against Japan, and, as an incident to that, of course, to furnish them with arms necessary to permit them to fight?—A. As I recall, that would probably have been in late 1943 or early 1944. At that time one of the plans for the final consummation of the war called for an American landing on the coast of China, to use as a base to attack Japan. Naturally, the whole object would be to use whatever we could in CBI to open ports for American troops to use as landing points, and because some of the better ports, and, of course, closer to Japan, were in the north. General Stilwell, and, I believe, other members of the staff, gradually came to the idea to utilize the Communists for the purpose of moving over to the east to be ready to receive American landings.

Q. In placing that, do you happen to recall the date on which General Stilwell was recalled to this country?—A. He left China in October of 1944—roughly October 10.

Q. And you would place, as I understand your testimony, you would place the time when he came to view the Chinese Communist forces should be brought into play more actively against the Japanese, to have been late '43 or early '44?—
A. That's as I recall.

Q. Yes. Now, were you familiar with the—Who was the head of the observer mission at Yen-an, if you recall?—A. I don't recall who was the head of the early one. I know Col. David Barrett went up there, and I believe, as I remember, he took it over.

Q. Were you in close touch at all with the work of that observer mission?—
A. No; only my hearing reports from other members of the staff or from General Stilwell himself.

Q. Did you ever hear it suggested that Mr. Service was supplying information to the Chinese Communists of any improper character?—A. No; never.

Q. It has been charged, Colonel Dorn, that while Mr. Service was in China he was in some way in communication with a man by the name of Philip Jaffe, who was in this country, and who was editor of a magazine called Amerasia. The charge seems to be that Mr. Service was communicating or sending to Mr. Jaffe classified Government documents, including State Department and other documents. I wonder if you would care to comment to the board on the possibilities of Mr. Service being in communication with Mr. Jaffe, bearing in mind your knowledge of the restrictions on communications generally which prevailed in the theater. I suppose we might consider several possibilities. The first possibility, if it can be called possibility, would be that he was transmitting such documents to Mr. Jaffe through the mails. Would you comment to the Board on that suggestion?—A. I would say that it would be virtually impossible to do that for many reasons. The first thing that everything had to go back by air, back to this country, and Mr. Service in Chungking, assuming that he tried it, would have to put mail on a plane from Chungking to Kunming. There it would be changed to fly over the hump to some airfield in Assam; would have to be changed again probably at Karachi, or possibly Delhi, and then when it got on the regular ATC run, either through middle Africa or north Africa, and across the Atlantic, every time the plane flew around 8 or 9 hours the crews are changed, so that it would be necessary to have a very complicated and almost impossible arrangement inasmuch as no one would know who the crews were who were going to take over the plane, even if the plane itself went all the way through. Then, when the plane arrived in this country, there was an inspection of all material that wasn't pouched properly, so I don't see how it could be done.

The CHAIRMAN. What you mean is that it could not be done by any regular method; any communication could go through the regular channels, I assume.

A. No; because mail was opened and censored.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was that done?

A. It was done at the source. For instance, Chungking headquarters would censor—not all. They would spot-check it, of course, out-going mail, and then it was subject to censorship again when it arrived in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it spot-checked by being opened and read?

A. Yes; opened and items cut out. Well, if any—I can't imagine anybody taking that risk because it would be impossible to accomplish it, I think.

Questions by Mr. RHETS:

Q. Well, in the matter of the mails, am I correct in believing that in addition to the spot checks that all mail had to be initially censored before it was sent at all?—A. That's right. However, certain officers, the senior staff, didn't have their mail censored, but they had to sign on the outside of the envelop their name and official title, which would indicate, in effect, an affidavit that the material inside was proper.

The CHAIRMAN. How about political correspondents, like Mr. Service, did he have that authority to sign his own mail, so that it wouldn't be censored?

A. I don't know. However, I would like to add that though that meant it wouldn't be censored at the source that did not prevent it from being censored when it reached this country or censored possibly in India as it went through.

Questions by Mr. RHETS:

Q. So much for the mail. I think you have also testified on the other possibilities—by posting the regular mails would be one, and you have indicated the type of censorship that was applicable, and that in your view it would be a very foolish risk for anyone to take who sought to improperly transmit information that way. Another possibility, of course, would be some sort of a private and illicit personal courier system. I wonder if you could comment on what the possibilities of that type of an operation would have been? For example, who could he have used for any kind of transmissions by some illicit personal courier system?—A. Well, to begin with, if it weren't an authorized courier he would never be allowed to go back because he would have to travel under orders and he would never get the orders, so the only type of courier that could be used would be an official one, and I think everyone is familiar with the instructions and restrictions on what they carry. So an official courier, I don't believe, could accept casual mail from anyone.

Q. Well, now, what would the possibilities be, for example, you have indicated that anybody moving would have to be moving under military orders.—A. Right.

Q. So that, presumably, he would have to develop some illicit arrangements with somebody who otherwise was traveling under military orders if you were to accomplish this thing. Now what would you consider the possibilities of such a system utilizing, we'll say, the crew of airplanes, that is, pilots or copilots, or whoever the other members of the crew might be?—A. Well, I think that would be virtually impossible because though he might be able to give a number of the crew leaving Chungking mail or documents, that crew would have to pass it on in Kunming.

Q. You mean to another crew?—A. Yes.

Q. That is, a crew on a plane from Chungking to Kunming ended its run there?—A. Normally.

Q. And then another crew would take over for the next leg of the run?—A. That's true, and when it came to Kunming, which was an enormous air operation, both combat and air transport, it would be almost impossible to know what crew was going to be handy to take it on, because they were coming in and out all the time, and, again, every time the crew changed I don't see how anybody would know who they would be, so that it would be a system that would be practically impossible to establish.

Q. Let's see if I can explore that a little further: You have one crew from Chungking to Kunming?—A. Normally.

Q. Then you have some one of several possible crews on the next run from Kunming to somewhere in Assam?—A. Yes.

Q. That is over the hump.—A. Yes.

Q. Then would the same thing prevail; that is, some one of a large number of possible crews on the next leg of the run from Assam to Karachi?—A. Right, either Delhi or Karachi.

Q. Yes. And then would the same thing prevail—that you would have again the chance of selecting some one out of a large number of possible crews from Karachi to—A. Probably Khartoum, and then someplace either in north Africa or central Africa, possibly Accra on the Gold Coast, and then Ascension Island, and Natal if it were the southern route, and then with stops all along the way up to Miami, and then, of course, when landing in Miami would be subject to anything.

Q. By "anything" you mean?—A. In the line of the crews.

Q. Inspection?—A. Yes; and examination. So, as a physical proposition I don't see how it could be done.

Q. Do you know whether the individual members of the plane crews were also subject to searches of their accompanying personal effects at any check points along the route from Chungking to the United States?—A. Well, I know they were when they arrived in the United States, all of them, and whether they were checked at any points I wouldn't be able to say. The probability is that where they entered a new country there was some kind of a check.

Mr. RHETS. I think I have no further questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. As I understand, Colonel, you came with General Stilwell in March 1942 to China?—A. That's right; we arrived.

Q. You were then aide-de-camp?—A. Yes.

Q. At a later date you were detached as aide and given an executive position on the staff?—A. That's right.

Q. And what was that position?—A. First, as artillery officer for the theater.

Q. And then later what was the date of that?—A. That was in October of 1942.

Q. And then later on did you make a still further change?—A. Then I was made Deputy Chief of Staff of the theater with headquarters in Chungking.

Q. Now that was at what time?—A. That was either March or April of 1943.

Q. Did you come back with Stilwell in October?—A. Of 1944, no; I did not. I remained for 3 months and then left.

Q. Now, during the period while you were aide to General Stilwell, and later on when you were Deputy Chief of Staff, you were familiar with the various political reportings that were going on in the staff?—A. In a general way always and sometimes in a detailed manner.

Q. You did not regularly read the reports?—A. No; not regularly because after I went from my station at Kunming I was away from the theater headquarters, so that's why I did not read them regularly.

Q. But while you were with the staff you heard them discussed?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you have conversations from time to time with General Stilwell?—A. Yes.

Q. I don't mean Stilwell—I mean Mr. Service?—A. Occasionally, yes, sir.

Q. Did you discuss the political situation in China with him?—A. Well, I don't remember any particular time we did, but I would say, "Yes," because we all discussed it continuously, because the political and the military were so closely involved, and it was our work—it was our main topic of conversation anyway.

Q. So that I take it over that period until you were sent on detached service you were familiar with the general tenor of Service's reports?—A. Yes.

Q. Even though you didn't read the reports themselves?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever either in your discussion of his reports with other officers or in your examination of the reports or in your discussions with Mr. Service discover any indication that Mr. Service was attempting to talk Tito or in any other way oppose the policy of the staff?—A. No, sir.

Q. General Stilwell's policy?—A. No, sir; never.

Q. And I take it from what you have already said that you discovered nothing in his attitude which indicated that he was pro-Communist?—A. I never found anything. I looked in those reports—straight intelligence reports reporting on the situation that existed.

Q. And I also gather from what you have said that the reports were in general in harmony with the feeling among the military officers on the staff?—A. In a general way, yes; because we knew that the Chinese Communist troops were better men physically, they were better fed, they were better clothed. They had better morale than the Nationalist troops and any reports bearing out on that would simply be in line with what we had already had.

Q. So the reports were, as far as you were able to judge, factually accurate?—A. As far as I knew.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions?

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Now it has been stated to us, Colonel, that you were probably as close to General Stilwell as anyone who was with him throughout this period. It has also been stated that General Stilwell was not in the general environment Mr. Service was for a very large part of the time that he was in the theater. Would you consider that Mr. Service was one of General Stilwell's intimates?—A. No, sir; I would not.

Q. Would you consider that Mr. Service had a marked influence on General Stilwell?—A. No, sir; I would not, and, if I may, I would like to add that when General Stilwell made up his mind no one had a marked influence on him.

Q. Yes. I think that's all.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. You have indicated, Colonel, that it would be practically impossible for anyone to devise a system of sending communications by plane crews or anything like that. Would it be possible for someone to send messages by an American official returning to this country, and thus evading censorship?—A. Yes; I suppose it would, if that person had authority to go through the inspection at Miami without having his baggage and other material he might be carrying inspected, but that would normally have to be a pretty high-ranking military person, or a pretty high-ranking civilian official, if it were a civilian, and normally those people are responsible people who are not going to open themselves to any risk of that kind. You might get by with it once by mere chance, but I don't see how you could work it regularly.

Q. Were there many such people who were traveling frequently between the theater and the United States?—A. There were official couriers.

Q. No, I mean not couriers, but just high-ranking military or civilians who might not be subject to inspection?—A. Well, we had a great many people come out and visit out there, most of whom didn't accomplish much. I suppose on their return they would pass through without inspection.

Q. Were there any individuals who were frequently traveling back and forth?—
A. Not individuals; no. Occasionally, a staff officer would be sent back for a conference in Washington. I would say that an individual—well, I think of General Merrell as one—I know he made, I believe, at least three trips back in a period of 3 years. Well, that is not very frequent.

Q. Were returning American correspondents subject to inspection on such trips?—A. Yes. They were supposed to be. I assume that the inspection was carried out.

Q. That's all.

The CHAIRMAN. Further questions?

Mr. RHETTS. No; I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Colonel.

Mr. RHETTS. Thanks a lot.

(Col. Frank Dorn left the meeting at this time.)

(Lt. Col. Joseph Kingsley Dickey, called as a witness in behalf of John S. Service, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Colonel Dickey?—A. Joseph Kingsley Dickey, lieutenant colonel, United States Army; resident 2801 Chesapeake Street NW., Washington, D. C.

Q. Would you state your present duties in the War Department?—A. I am not a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Q. Would you state for the Board what your duties were between the period, we'll say, 1941 to 1945?—A. 1941 I was in Japan as a Japanese language student for the United States Army. I came back from there in September of 1941 to the city of San Francisco where I joined then Colonel Reuchlin, and we ran a school for the teaching of Japanese to Nisei. The school was subsequently moved to Camp Savage, Minn., and I remained there until June of 1943. Then, I came to Washington for a month and I left there the twenty-sixth day of July for China, and I arrived in China, I believe it was, the thirtieth of August, 1943, and I went to Chungking about the fourth of September, and that was my residence until 1945.

Q. And what was your post in Chungking?—A. Chungking I was the G-2 Chief of Intelligence.

Q. In the headquarters of the commanding—A. In the headquarters at Chungking.

In the headquarters at Chungking. Now, you are acquainted with Mr. Service, are you not?—A. I am.

Q. Would you state to the Board when you first met Mr. Service, and describe in general your association with him since that time?—A. Well, the exact time of the meeting, I don't quite remember whether it was a meeting discussing psychological warfare early in September or whether or not I met him over in Delhi, as I went immediately back to Delhi. I believe we came back on the plane at that time. It was either one of those two times I met him first—that was in September of 1943.

Q. That was in September 1943. At that time what was Mr. Service doing?—A. Service was the political adviser to our headquarters.

Q. He was attached to it?—A. Attached to the headquarters; that's right.

Q. To the headquarters staff. Now, subsequent to that time would you give a brief account of your association with Mr. Service?—A. Well, our work was rather close together. Mr. Service worked in Chungking a good deal of the time and he used to be—since he was the political associate for our headquarters he was turning in reports on things happening in China which would funnel through my office and went to General Stilwell and to the headquarters group there. He also acted in the capacity—when we had requests regarding political things they were usually handled by Mr. Service who went to the Embassy and got them. I believe Mr. Service did run one mission for us in which he and some other chap went on a sort of exploratory trip down toward the southeast over to French Indo-China—am I correct in that?

Mr. SERVICE. Yes.

A. And then at the time we set the mission up to go to Yenan, Mr. Service went up there as the political observer.

Q. Now, during this period was he in his capacity as member of the political advisory group, would you say that his dealings with the military staff were primarily through you?—A. I would say "Yes."

Q. Now, during the period when he was in Chungking before he went with the observer mission to Yen-an, could you give a little fuller description to the Board of the type of work that he was doing?—A. Well, it was writing of conditions in China the way it appeared to a man who had access to the military people there, and who knew China, and knew the political figures, knew the civilians, he was writing more or less general impressions of things that were going on and results that might be expected from things that were occurring. He was our liaison man with the Communists. Chou En-lai had a headquarters there in Chungking and in general we relied upon him for the political, the nonmilitary side of the life there.

Q. Now when you say he was your liaison man with the Communists, whose office there was headed by Chou En-lai, could you elaborate a little bit on that for the Board please?—A. Well, in China, of course, the very live question was the Communists—what was their contribution to the war? At that time we were absolutely blind north of the Yellow River. The National Government control went up as far as the Yellow River and stopped. That made our intelligence—from there on north we knew nothing. That was more or less Communist territory. So we cultivated them to find out what they knew and what they could give to us. They didn't give us very much military stuff. There was a great deal of political life evidently.

Q. And, as I understand, it was Mr. Service's job as a part of the military staff to obtain intelligence, of a political character at any rate, from the Communists?—A. That is right.

Q. Then, when you refer to his later going to Yen-an I take it that that also was after you moved north of the Yellow River, and this mission was for the purpose of obtaining intelligence on the ground from and about the Communists?—A. Three things: weather, intelligence, and to help our downed Air members were the reasons always given why we went up there.

Q. Yes. Now, as G-2 in Chungking did you receive all the reports which Mr. Service wrote for the headquarters?—A. I did.

Q. And you had to read them all, did you?—A. I did.

Q. Be familiar with them?—A. Yes.

Q. I wonder if you could, in general, characterize these reports from the point of view of their general objectivity as intelligence reporting, and any political orientation that they may have exhibited on the part of the author of these reports?—A. Well, these reports were not only read, but were studied with a great deal of interest in our headquarters. The political reporting seemed to us, who, as I said, had only a superficial knowledge what we could see around the city talking to people, to be accurate, seemed to be objective in their case. The questions of future in China, we never felt competent to pass on that, we used to read these with a good deal of interest. These reports were circulated in our headquarters and then used to remain on file in my office. The new officers who came in to responsible positions were usually given this file to read.

Q. Did you or any of your military superiors regard Mr. Service as being pro-Communist?—A. No.

Q. Did you ever have any, or do you now have reason to believe that Mr. Service is a Communist or pro-Communist or Communist sympathizer?—A. No.

Q. I would like to show you, Colonel Dickey, what has been introduced in evidence here as Document 193, which is the report No. 40 of Mr. Service, and ask you if you recall that report?—A. (After reading some of report.) Do you wish me to read the whole memorandum?

Q. Well, if you care to refresh your recollection about it, I suggest you do.—A. (Reading.)

Q. Do you have any independent recollection of this?—A. Well, this reads familiarly to me. I have read the white paper on China, whether or not I read part of it in there—that's from my past recollection.

Q. I take it that when this report was filed by Mr. Service, in accordance with your habitual practice, you read it at that time?—A. That's right.

Q. I take it, however, from what you have just testified that you have no clear recollection of it now?—A. No.

Q. General Hurley has testified that this report was a plan to bring about the downfall of Gen. Chiang Kai-shek and Senator McCarthy and others have repeated this charge. Do you have any recollection that when this report was received at headquarters that it was regarded as such a plan?—A. No, I have no recollection of that, nor do I, thinking back, think it would have been regarded as such.

Q. I take it that had you received anything which you so regarded there is some possibility that it would have remained in your memory more vividly, would it not?—A. That's right.

Q. Do you recall that General Stilwell ever regarded this as any plan to bring about the downfall or torpedoing of Generalissimo Chiang's Government?—A. No. I can't remember the message, even General Stilwell's connection with it. I can only presume that it went to him and returned to him.

Q. You were also G-2 in Chungking after General Stilwell was replaced by General Wedemeyer, were you not?—A. That's correct.

Q. Do you have any recollection that General Wedemeyer ever expressed any criticism of Mr. Service for this report or indeed for any other report that he ever filed?—A. No.

Q. On the basis of your knowledge of Mr. Service and your familiarity with his memoranda and reports as they were filed with you, did you ever see anything in his writings or hear him make any statement which would suggest to you that Mr. Service believed that communism was the best hope of Asia?—A. No, never.

Q. Or anything to that effect?—A. No.

Q. You have just read this Document No. 193, do you now regard it as a plan to bring about the fall of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek?—A. No.

Q. On the basis of your knowledge as a G-2 in Chungking would you have regarded the conclusions in that report as either incredible miscalculations or misrepresentations, as Congressman Judd has charged?—A. I would not. I would say that they were more or less what the Americans generally thought, usually they were much more vitriolic than this is after they had been out there awhile.

Q. Now I would like you to look at Document 35-5, Colonel Dickey, just this one page. Now, this represents the testimony of General Hurley before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in which he expresses differing versions of his conception of the American policy objectives in China. From your knowledge as G-2 in Chungking of Mr. Service's activities and reporting could you state whether Mr. Service ever disagreed with any of those policy objectives?—A. I would say he did not. I would say he agreed with all of these objectives.

Q. You would say he agreed with all of them?—A. Yes.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. With further reference to that document you were just looking at, Document 35-5, I note a statement in there by General Hurley that certain Americans could not go along with the American policy or were incompatible with the officials of the Chinese Government with whom we had to deal. Was Mr. Service unable to go along with the American policy?—A. I don't think he ever was.

Q. Was he incompatible with the officials of the Chinese Government with whom you had to deal?—A. No; on the contrary, Mr. Service was the only one we oftentimes had to deal with them; for instance, on one important message he was interpreter for the Generalissimo.

Q. I also notice that General Hurley says that "their objectives had the opposition of most of the career diplomats"—did their objectives have the opposition of Mr. Service?—A. As they are stated here, I don't think that I ever ran into anybody who had any opposition to these objectives.

Q. Thank you.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. Colonel Dickey, I wonder if you could state to the Board whether or not in the light of your knowledge of affairs in China at that time Mr. Service could be regarded in any sense as the principal or even an important force in bringing about the creation of the Army Observers Mission in Yenan?—A. I am afraid I would have to qualify my answer on that. He had a great deal to do with the thinking of us people in the headquarters as to the desirability and the way that we could do it if we approached the Chinese, different means of approaching them, we could get up there, but it was only as advice to us as how to get up there, I believe.

Q. That is, military had quite independent reasons for seeking—A. Oh, we were very independent, we did not—we said the political side of it was entirely the Embassy's and it was for that reason, I believe it was upon Embassy representation that Mr. Service himself went up there. The military reasons were quite different.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. But you had no reservations about Mr. Service being the man chosen by the Embassy to do this job?—A. None at all. In fact, we were very glad that he was going.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. It has been reported that Bishop Paul Yu-pin has stated that Mr. Service kept hammering at General Stilwell to make demands on Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek for the arming of some 300,000 Communist troops. Bishop Paul Yu-pin is reported to have said that Mr. Service exerted great pressure on General Stilwell and came back at him at least three times in order in effect to force General Stilwell to make these demands on the Generalissimo as a result of which the Generalissimo brought about General Stilwell's recall. Do you have any knowledge of any such pressure brought by Mr. Service on General Stilwell?—A. First, I don't think any American could have brought any pressure on General Stilwell. He was a very independent man. And, secondly, he himself considered himself probably the best political observer in China, and what other people fed him was for him to note. I don't believe he other than listened to things to pick up new things, but you must remember General Stilwell himself had had a long background of China and had traveled in China extensively. What people like Mr. Service could give him was merely to bring him up to date on it.

Q. Do you know what opportunities Mr. Service had, apart from the reports which were filed with you, to bring pressure to bear on General Stilwell?—A. Well, if General Stilwell was at our headquarters he would have the opportunity to go to see and talk with him. He wasn't at our headquarters very much while I was there, he was in Burma most of the time.

Q. Would you have known of the occasions which Mr. Service would have had to confer personally with General Stilwell?—A. I believe I would. I think the arrangements would have been made through my office.

Q. If Mr. Service were engaged in attempting to bring about such pressure on General Stilwell do you think it likely that it would have come to your attention?—A. It might have and it might not have, I would have to equivocate that answer. I probably would not have been present.

Q. Did you ever at any time while you were in China, Colonel Dickey, learn or hear any reports to the effect that Mr. Service was transmitting classified information to the Chinese Communists?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you ever hear it charged that anyone was doing that?—A. Let me broaden that question a little bit: Do you mean by transmitting classified information—do you mean documents or just talking about things that were classified, it's hard to make a distinction?

Q. Yes, well, I refer to documents. General Hurley has charged, for example, that Mr. Service showed Document 193, which you have just read, to the Chinese Communists.—A. When you say that Mr. Service is the originator of these things, probably the first classification that was put on them was when they came into the military unless he placed it on there himself.

Q. Did you ever hear it suggested that this document or any other documents had been shown by Mr. Service to the Chinese Government?—A. No, I didn't.

Q. If information to that effect had come to General Hurley's attention, would you suppose that that information would, in turn, have been reported to you?—A. Perhaps not directly. I think I would have heard of it; yes, security also comes under the G-2.

Q. In other words, had Mr. Service, or anyone else on your staff, been engaged in such work, or even reported to be doing so, it would have been your job, would it not, to have conducted the necessary investigation to find out whether it was true?—A. That's correct.

Q. And, if found to be true, to take some corrective action?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you, as the G-2 in Chungking, give Mr. Service access to highly classified material?—A. I did.

Q. Have you ever had any doubt whatsoever to his complete reliability to be trusted with access to such material?—A. No.

Q. Do you recall what Mr. Service's views were on the general problem of supplying arms to the Chinese Communist forces?—A. Well, I believe Mr. Service was of the opinion that we should utilize all the forces we could in China to fight the Japanese. Remember, during the war we were there to fight Japan, and we were certainly trying to use every pressure against Japan we could. Japan was the enemy in '43, '44, and '45.

Q. That being so, was it your impression that he favored utilizing the Chinese Communist forces as well as the Nationalist forces?—A. Yes.

Q. Was that view entertained by General Stilwell?—A. I believe it was.

Q. And by others of the military staff?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Service—whether it was his proposal to arm the Chinese Communist independently of the National Government?—A. I don't ever remember him having proposed that. If he did, he wouldn't have gotten very far. It was understood by everybody that General Stilwell was the Chief of Staff to the Generalissimo. In other words, it was the Central Government whom we were working with and you always had to work through the Central Government for anything you did. If he made such a proposal, I don't remember it.

Q. I take it that as far as you know, Mr. Service's views on this question were not at least more—did not differ from General Stilwell's, as best you understand?—A. No. As far as I know they didn't differ at all. Let me say in that connection if he had he would have written it, and they would have been somewhere in these records because there are written records.

Q. That's the only way he had to get his views across?—A. That's correct.

Q. It has been charged, Colonel Dickey, that while Mr. Service was in China he was in communication with a Mr. Philip Jaffe, who was in this country, and that he in some manner or another transmitted to Mr. Jaffe various classified Government documents. I wonder if you would care to comment for the Board in the light of your knowledge as G-2 of the restrictions on communications, both of the mails and of persons, what the possibilities of such communication by Service with Jaffe might be?—A. Well, Mr. Service was in the anomalous position of being both State Department and working with the military. As a civilian, any mail that appeared anywhere in the mail systems would have been subject to Chinese censorship. It is very hard to get mail out, as a matter of fact, going by air, so if he sent it straight mail, which I doubt he would do, since all civilians who wished would be able to get their stuff into the governmental channels, he would hardly dare to do it that way.

Q. In that connection, if I might interrupt you, do you know whether Mr. Service had authority to initially censor his own mail, that is, put it—A. I don't know how the Embassy worked that. As far as the military is concerned, no. No civilian, to the best of my recollection, was ever allowed to do that.

Q. Well, now, he was attached to your staff, was he not?—A. That's right.

Q. So that—A. You see, he could go over to the Embassy and give them mail to go back through the Embassy pouches.

Q. Through the Embassy pouches, yes, but in terms of anything that he would deposit in the regular American mail system—A. Well, that's the Army system.

Q. That was the Army system?—A. That's right.

Q. As I understand it, officers of certain ranks had authority by writing on the outside of the envelope to make the initial censorship of their own mail, and of their own and others, and that we may call the censorship at the source. Do you know whether Mr. Service had that authority in the theater?—A. No, he wouldn't be allowed that. It was the military officers who had that.

Q. You had to be an officer with military rank?—A. That's right.

Q. Well, now, I interrupted you, would you care to go ahead with your comment on the physical possibilities of transmission?—A. Well, the way of getting these things out through regular channels with the Chinese mail system, as I said, of course, everything would be censored, or he had the opportunity to send it through our channels or through State Department channels, which one he used I really don't remember, and what arrangements the State Department made with their own pouches again I am in ignorance. That was none of our business. On military you have just asked me about—an officer certified on the outside that he had censored that.

Q. And after the initial certification mail was subject to further censoring?—A. Yes, it was subject to some further censoring—whether or not it was was a matter whether or not that letter happened to be picked up later on by censors along the route.

Q. Determined by spot check?—A. By spot checks, yes.

Q. But any mail that he deposited into the Army mail system would have to be censored by someone else at the source?—A. That's right.

Q. Do you have any knowledge whether Mr. Service had access to the Embassy files after he became attached to the military headquarters?—A. To the best of my recollection he did have access to the Embassy files. Mr. Service kept us aware of what the Embassy was doing and likewise he was to keep the Embassy informed of what we were doing.

Q. On what do you base the recollection that he had access to the files in the Embassy?—A. Well, I can remember him coming over and telling us about some of the messages or something that they were going to send back.

Q. Those he could, presumably, have obtained by discussion with the Embassy staff in relation to a particular problem, could he not?—A. That's right, he could have.

Q. That does not necessarily imply that he had free access to the files on his own?—A. That's correct. It is merely supposition on my part.

Q. I understand. As a matter of fact it has been testified by the Ambassador that he did not have access to the files—that all non-Embassy people did not, and I recognize that you are only speculating.

I have no further questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Colonel, the disappearance of General Stilwell from the Chinese scene was due, was it not, to some demand he made on Chiang Kai-shek?—A. I have to say in that respect, General, that even though I had been an officer with him I was rather dark on the whole thing. The negotiations there—what was done was done very secretively. General Stilwell did not confide very much in his staff. I don't believe his own Chief of Staff could give you an answer, and I learned more by reading his book than by living in the house there.

Q. So that from your own knowledge at the time you can't testify on that?—A. No, sir, I can't.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any questions?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, a few questions.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Colonel, it is the usual practice, is it not, for a G-2 to obtain information from all sources possible and place an evaluation on that information?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Any materials, therefore, submitted by Mr. Service were subject to that same sort of treatment. In other words, you gaged his reporting abilities, his objectivity, etc., against the sources that came to you from elsewhere?—A. That's right, sir.

Q. Can you tell us whether any of the reports that you remember having read of his appeared not to be objective and to be so out of line with the tenor of the times and the general reports that you were getting as to cause suspicion on your part?—A. No, sir, I can't think of a single instance.

Q. I think it has been stated to us earlier that the materials that were prepared for the commanding general by Mr. Service were prepared in, I think it was four copies—one to the general, one to Mr. Davies, one to the Embassy, and one that Mr. Service retained in his own file. I think it was further stated that the copies, aside from the one that he retained, came through your channels in dispatch.—A. Could I qualify that, sir?

Q. Yes.—A. That during the period he was in Yen-an and, of course, while he was in Chungking—

Q. In Yen-an, I did not recall, but that would have happened in Yen-an, would it?—A. Yes. In Chungking he could give it right to the Embassy or send it to Mr. Davies.

Q. Now, how did that material come to you? Did it come already in envelopes, and sealed, or did it come open, or can you recall?—A. Well, now, I have got this perhaps not too exact. A plane used to go to Yen-an, our own plane, and come directly back. Then, the material was brought directly to our headquarters. Now, the first time I saw it, of course, was after it had been opened and was ready for distribution, things that were felt of immediate interest to me. I'm speaking now of my own staff there. It was brought to my attention. But our own people handled it throughout, our own headquarters personnel. In other words, mail people went down and met the plane, and brought it to our headquarters where it was handled as mail, except anything other than letters was brought immediately to our section for processing. In other words, we were held responsible for what went up to Yen-an and what came back—my own particular office was.

Q. You were also held responsible, I take it, for anything that came through that channel as to whether it was to be dispatched further or—A. That's right.

We made the further distribution of it other than plane mail going back and forth.

Q. Now, when was it that General Wedemeyer appeared on the scene?—A. Well, it was the end of October, or the first of November, just a matter of days in there.

Q. Did you have the responsibility for briefing him when he arrived with regard to things that had happened prior?—A. That's right.

Q. Do you know what of Mr. Service's materials were specifically called to his attention? Can you remember anything or would you have given him a composite report which would have contained materials possibly reflecting Mr. Service's comments?—A. No, sir; I can't remember specifically. As I said, Mr. Service's reports after they were circulated in our headquarters came back and I used to have them in a file there which I imagine I gave him to read, but I can't state that definitely. I did, of course, do a good deal of verbal briefing.

Q. Yes. Do you know much of Mr. Service's association with General Wedemeyer during the short while that they were together, that they were in the same theater?—A. No; I don't. He didn't have too much chance to see General Wedemeyer during that period that General Wedemeyer came to our headquarters, as Mr. Service was in Yenan most of the time.

Q. I see. Did you know of Mr. Service's relations with the American press during this period in Yenan? Were you any way involved in his relationships, in briefing sessions or anything else with the American press?—A. Not in Yenan I wouldn't have been; no.

Q. That wouldn't have been—

A. No, that would have been done by Colonel Barrett who was on the spot.

Q. I see. I have no more questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you have a relationship with respect to the briefing of correspondents at any other place than Yenan?—A. No, no briefing with relationship to them. I remember after they came back there was some flurry where they wanted to get back to the States rather quickly and I refused them passage.

Q. What I was referring to was the liberty that the correspondents had or that the political reporters had to discuss what they had observed with correspondents, were you familiar with that?—A. No. We took a rather careful position there that anything regarding China was a matter for the Chinese to censor, that we were not going to be placed in the position of censoring Chinese news by our own reporters because we took one definite stand: If it had military implications or violated military security we took out the material that they had. If it concerned Chinese politics and things like that, had we not had the Chinese censorship available we would have censored, that's true, as allies, but since they were, in turn, censored we took the stand: You do the censoring of what you consider objectionable, we will not.

Q. How would the Chinese go about censoring a conversation or a briefing session between, say, a political reporter like Mr. Service and the American correspondents still on the staff, connected with the staff?—A. Well, they wouldn't have had any opportunity to sit in on that. A briefing could have been a conversation.

Q. Yes.—A. But it was the writings, everything was written, every dispatch had to go through Chinese censorship.

Q. That is, dispatched to the home papers?—A. That's right, sir, anything that was to go out for dispatch.

Questions by Mr. SERVICE:

Q. Just as any mail the correspondents might wish to send back was also subject to Chinese censorship if it went through open channels?—A. If it went through open channels, if it went back through our couriers it was not subject to Chinese censorship.

Q. Subject to yours?—A. Subject to ours.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Was there objection on your part to a political reporter like Mr. Service giving background information in a briefing session to American correspondents orally on Chinese matters, not military matters?—A. No, not at all.

Q. Was he expected to do that sort of thing?—A. I don't know if it was actually assigned as part of his duties, certainly there was no objection interposed.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Colonel, you have read Document 193, which is Mr. Service's Report No. 40 of October 10, 1944?—A. Yes.

Q. Mr. Service has stated that he ascertained later that General Stilwell had prior to the date of that report transmitted substantially the same recommendations to Washington. Do you recall from your own knowledge whether General Stilwell had expressed similar views?—A. You place me in a hard position, Mr. Achilles; I lived with General Stilwell. In other words, a good deal of things were said at the table. What was said in messages and what was said in table conversations is a little bit hard—

Q. I was referring to his official reports.—A. Most of his official reports I never read. They were his "eyes alone" message, as back here, and "eyes alone" we were not circulated, of course.

Q. They went as "eyes alone"? On pages 68 and 69 of the white paper are given extracts from certain messages from General Stilwell in September 1940; do you have that?—A. I have it; yes, sir.

Q. Could you state from your knowledge whether those represented General Stilwell's views, personal views at that time or the views of his staff as a whole?—A. I would say that they were General Stilwell's personal viewpoint. This reads like him. General Stilwell did not make use—in other words, a staff paper being drawn up and then revamping it and then sending it, he wrote his own material. And you see he came there early in September and remained there until he was sent home working on this type of thing by himself with General Bergin, and General Merrill came up there, but they actually worked in the general's quarters, and we, of course, were down at headquarters. This was, of course, a separate thing from our normal activity. This reads like the general himself; undoubtedly, he wrote this himself, I would say.

Q. You would say that was the general's statement himself rather than reflecting Mr. Service or his staff, that was the general's statement himself?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. You have stated that as C-2 you were responsible for the security of the intelligence material in the headquarters at Yenan.—A. Well, of anything classified, our counterintelligence, you see, is responsible for.

Q. While you were G-2 in Chungking do you recall any cases of violation or alleged violation of security with respect to material furnished by Mr. Service?—A. No; I can't think of any. There was an occasion after the war was all over—no, right after General Stilwell had left when we had some people there writing up the history now of the history during General Stilwell's time, during which a man lost a notebook which could have contained some of Mr. Service's material, as the fellow had made extracts from all of the different things available, and he lost that on the street.

Q. Was that an official, or a newspaperman?—A. It was an official, one of our officers, but he had it in a musette bag. He was all through and yet he lost his notes. He was sent home in a great hurry, rather harsh disciplinary action taken.

Q. In your capacity as G-2 did you have any view of the public relations director?—A. Yes, I did in Chungking during General Stilwell's time in office there. Public relations were actually a branch of my own office. In other words, I had people there who handled it and I consequently, had knowledge of policy and, in general, what was going on. I usually received a general briefing; under General Wedemeyer we made it a separate office.

Q. Your public relations activities were also under your responsibility as security officer?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were there any cases while you were there of alleged improper briefing by Mr. Service of any correspondents or persons?—A. I don't quite get your implication, Mr. Achilles, of improper briefings.

Q. That is, the improper disclosure of classified information to correspondents or others?—A. No, I can't remember anything like that. You oftentimes take a correspondent quite a bit into the bosom of the family so that he is able to write more intelligently. I refer, for instance, to reporters coming and asking: "Is this a good time to leave Chungking? Are things going to be quiet here? Is it safe to go down to the front? Is trouble going to break out in this spot or this spot?" Now, that is highly classified, and yet you will tell them: "If I were you, I would go to this spot." You have got to move them to the spots where things are happening. It is highly classified, no doubt about it, but you tell them.

Q. I have nothing further.

The CHAIRMAN. We will take a short recess.

Mr. RHETTS. Is the board finished with the witness for the moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Were you through with the witness?

Mr. RHETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, we can excuse the witness. Thank you very much, Colonel. It is very kind of you to come in on a holiday.

A. It is quite all right.

(Lt. Col. Joseph Kingsley Dickey left the meeting at this time.)

(After a brief recess the meeting reconvened.)

(Mr. Philip D. Sprouse, called as a witness in behalf of John S. Service, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address for the record, Mr. Sprouse?—

A. Philip D. Sprouse, Westchester Apartments, Cathedral Avenue, Washington.

Q. What is your present position?—A. I am the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs.

Q. Of the Department of State?—A. Of the Department of State.

Q. Will you tell us, Mr. Sprouse, what your position was and where you were during the period from roughly, well, from 1941 to 1945?—A. Well, suppose I begin really at the beginning of the war with Pearl Harbor—I was on my way back to my post in Hankow. At the time of Pearl Harbor I came back to Washington, stayed here until April of that year, then went to Chungking, arrived in Chungking early May 1942. I was in Chungking from May 1942 until the middle of June 1944—at the American Embassy in Chungking in June of that year.

Q. What was your position in the Embassy at that time?—A. I was the third secretary of the Embassy at that time. In June of that year I was transferred to the American consulate general at Kunning, where I stayed until late November 1944.

Q. Now, are you acquainted with Mr. Service, Mr. Sprouse?—A. I have known Mr. Service very closely since December 1935 when he first arrived in Peiping where I was at that time.

Q. You were also a language student?—A. No; I was a language student later.

Q. Later?—A. Later, but I was in Peiping. I arrived in Peiping in October 1935; Mr. Service arrived in December 1935, I believe.

Q. And would you care to summarize for the board, if you can, in general, your relations with Mr. Service since that time?—A. Well, for the 2 years, a little bit more than 2 years, I think, that Mr. Service was a language student I knew him extremely well. We were very close friends. I knew his family. While I wasn't a language student our relationship was very close and very friendly, and I think in the beginning of 1938 he was transferred to Shanghai. I stayed on in Peiping until 1940. At one time, I think it was in '38, I went home on leave, came back to the United States on home leave. I passed through Shanghai on my way back to Peiping. I think I was in Shanghai for perhaps 2 weeks between boats. I stayed with Mr. Service and his family. In 1940 I was transferred from Peiping to Hankow. I passed through Shanghai again en route to my new post; I think it was approximately 10 days or 2 weeks that I stayed with Mr. Service and his family again. The next time I saw Mr. Service was, I think, '42, May '42, when I arrived at the Embassy in Chungking. Mr. Service was at that time living with Ambassador Gauss and Mr. Vincent, who was the counselor of Embassy. In the first few days until I got a place to stay I stayed in the house with Mr. Service and the Ambassador and Mr. Vincent. Then, later, I moved to another house. Sometime during that summer Mr. Service was sent out on an observer trip—I would say that lasted 3 months approximately—and he came back sometime in the fall. At that point I was living with Ambassador Gauss and Mr. Vincent, and Mr. Service stayed there—I don't know whether it was 2 weeks, 3 weeks, or 4 weeks, something like that. We were closely associated during those days.

Then, later, when Mr. Service was made political adviser and attached to General Stilwell's staff our liaison as political advisers was very close, that is between the Embassy, and I saw Mr. Service almost daily, I would say, when he was in Chungking.

Q. And I take it during the earlier period when both you and he were attached to the Embassy in Chungking you were in daily contact?—A. Oh, yes, in daily contact.

Q. Do you feel on the basis of your association with Mr. Service you are thoroughly acquainted with his mind and his outlook, particularly in political matters?—A. I think so. I don't think you could live with a person, I don't think you could visit his home, I don't think you could see him in daily contacts and know the work he was doing, without being as certain as you could be about anything about another program.

Q. In the course of all your dealings with Mr. Service have you ever had any occasion to believe that he was a Communist or a Communist sympathizer?—A. Not the slightest.

Q. Have you ever had any occasion to question his loyalty to the United States?—A. Not the slightest.

Q. Were you familiar with the political reporting which Mr. Service was doing both while he was attached to the Embassy prior to August 1943, and thereafter while he was attached to General Stilwell's staff doing political reporting?—A. I think I am in a particularly good position to comment on that because when I was at the Embassy I was in the political reporting section, and the reports of Mr. Service which were submitted to General Stilwell; that is, copies of the reports which were submitted to General Stilwell were also submitted by Mr. Service to the Embassy, and the same thing was true of other officers that we had on similar details, and also officers that we had as Embassy observers in these outlying posts which were not consulates, they were simply stationed in various provincial cities as Embassy observers, they were all forwarded to the Embassy, and it was my job to summarize them; that is, in a covering dispatch to submit to the Department and to add any comment that the Embassy might want to. I might add that all those covering dispatches, obviously, were signed by the Ambassador himself. So that during that period from August 1943, or even earlier when Mr. Service was in Lanchow—he was earlier stationed in Lanchow as one of those Embassy observers, of course, I saw all the reports that he wrote. We transmitted all of them, or practically all of them to the Department. We did the same with Mr. Service's reports when he was attached to General Stilwell's staff, always with a covering dispatch on them. So I was thoroughly familiar from say the time he went to the field, left Chungking and went to Lanchow; also during the period from August 1943 when he was attached to General Stilwell's staff up until the middle of June 1944 when I was transferred to Kunming. It is only since that date I think when I came back to Washington on home leave in the winter of 1944 and 1945 that I saw subsequent reports that he wrote during that period. I have seen them since then, but I didn't see them at the time—at a later period.

Q. Now, on the basis of your familiarity with those reports could you tell the board whether you ever saw any evidence in any of them that Mr. Service was in any way seeking to defeat or sabotage American foreign policy in China?—A. I would say definitely not because Mr. Service—I think you have to go back to the atmosphere of Chungking during that period which really started when I was in the Embassy in Chungking. In 1943 you began to see the signs of decay and the deterioration on the part of the National Government, and these things are things that came to us from Chinese within the Government, even extending to Cabinet members who were distressed about the situation, and it seems to me that it all boils down to the role of a Foreign Service officer who was reporting from the field, which is fundamental to our jobs. You report what you think objectively is the case, and it is up to your chief, the chief of mission, whether it is the Ambassador or the chargé to transmit that to the Department or to make such comment as you want, and I know of no indications that Mr. Service was doing anything which would be contrary to the long-range objectives of this country and I think that was the general feeling.

I might add at this point, at the risk of having Mr. Service blush, that Mr. Service was considered the sort of one or two top-ranking political reporting officers and other China language officers from the standpoint of his competence and from the point of his knowledge of China, the history, the language, his almost indefatigable quality of turning out tremendous quantities of work and extremely valuable work, and I do know we received many commendations from the Department on his reporting during the period that I was there.

Q. I believe you testified that you were consul in Kunming during what period, Mr. Sprouse?—A. From late June 1944 until late November 1944, and then again from the first of September 1945 until December, through most of December 1945, a period of about 4 months each time.

Q. So that you were the consul in Kunming on August 1, 1944?—A. I was the No. 2 officer. There was a consul general there, and I was the consul.

Q. Who was the consul general?—A. Consul general was Mr. Langdon who is now consul general in Singapore.

MR. ACHILLES. Pardon. Where were you between the time you left Kunming on that assignment and the time you returned there?

A. I came home, Mr. Achilles, in late November 1944. I think I had 30 days' leave and I was in the Department under temporary assignment working on the revision of our China language course for the postwar period. Then, I was all set to go back to Chungking when I was practically removed from a plane. I was going up to General Hurley, but was sent to San Francisco—this was in April 1945—sent to San Francisco as a member of what they called the International Secretariat, as the liaison officer with the Chinese delegation—I think you remember that period, which lasted from some time in April until early July 1945. Then, I was here during a period of waiting for passage out—I mean it was a matter of priorities at that point. I think I was here for say 2 or 3 weeks waiting for a plane out in July and I returned to Kunming and—this got rather complicated. I returned to Kunming just about VJ-day on way to Chungking. I was to be sent to one of these observer posts at Chengtu. The Embassy in Chungking ordered me to stay in Kunming. They changed their minds at the last minute and sent me to Chengtu, and after 24 hours I was returned to Chungking to take the place of a language officer who was going out to take on Jap surrender ceremonies, and I took his place on September 1, 1945, at Chungking.

Q. Now do you know, was Mr. Service attached to the consulate at Kunming in 1944?—A. As far as I know, Mr. Service was never attached to the consulate. His brother was attached to the consulate at Kunming sometime in 1944.

Q. I wonder if you can recall a dispatch which was sent from Kunming, No. 58, dated August 1, 1944, entitled: "Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek—Decline of His Prestige and Criticism of and Opposition to His Leadership."—A. I think I can deliver on that because I think, looking at the title, that I wrote it myself.

Q. Are you reasonably certain of that?—A. Reasonably certain, yes. I might assemble material over a period of months on this particular subject because it was on of the things that was important on the China scene, and I know Mr. Service could not have submitted a dispatch from Kunming in the first place because he was not assigned there, or detailed there, to my knowledge.

Q. Now referring to Document 17, which is an article appearing in Plain Talk magazine for October 1946, I should like to read to you a quotation from page 34 of that article: "The substance of some of Service's confidential messages to the State Department reached the offices of Amerasia in New York before they arrived in Washington. Among the papers found in possession of Mr. Jaffe was Document No. 58, one of Mr. Service's secret reports entitled 'Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek—Decline of His Prestige and Criticism of and Opposition to His Leadership.'" I take it, therefore that you are quite certain that Mr. Service was not the author of this dispatch No. 58?—A. If it is a report that was submitted he couldn't possibly have been because I was there during that period. As I remember, I did not see Mr. Service during the period that I was at Kunming.

Q. And you think you are the author of a dispatch bearing that title?—A. I couldn't swear it, but I remember I did write one sometime during that period with a title somewhat similar to it.

Q. Now, Mr. Sprouse, at the time Mr. Service was arrested by the FBI on June 6, 1945, in connection with the so-called "Amerasia Case," certain documents were found, documents and papers were found in his desk here in the State Department—among these it appears that there was found "a handwritten letter dated May 27, 1945, addressed to 'Dear Jack' beginning: 'Kung Hai' etc., and ending 'Yours, Phil.'" I wonder if you know from that identification who was the author of that letter.—A. As a matter of fact, I am certain I can identify this letter because it is a letter that I think was written on the occasion of Mr. Service's promotion sometime in maybe April or May 1945, in which I wrote him congratulating him on his promotion and I can identify it even more by the enclosure because this thing came to my mind when I saw Mr. Service in July 1945 when I returned from San Francisco. I might go back and pick up a little background and explain this letter because Mr. Service has no connection with this letter except as the recipient.

Q. Well, glad to have you do so, but I am mostly interested in ascertaining whether you were the author?—A. Yes, sir, I was.

Q. And your name is Philip?—A. Yes.

Q. Are you called "Phil" by your friends?—A. Yes. Might I add that "Kung Hai" means congratulations in Chinese, if that has any pertinence.

Q. Now, another item found in Mr. Service's desk at that time is reported to have been a "handwritten letter" "77 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass., December 11, 1944" addressed to "Dear Jack, I heard that you were back," etc. contains the following: P. S. "heard that Phil is on way here, etc." Do you know anyone who at that time lived at 77 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass.?—A. I can't say definitely, but it seems to me that there was a Chinese girl named Yang Kang who was one of the two outstanding Chinese literary figures, that is among the female side of the vista. She was over here on a fellowship of some kind, a scholarship to Radcliffe and her address was Brattle Street, I am almost certain. I had known the girl in Chungking. She was literary editor of what was then the leading Chinese newspaper, the Ta Kung Pao, and she would have been here during that time, so it is easily possible that this reference is to me during the time I was in the States.

Q. Were you about to return to the States?—A. I was. I was coming home on leave during November and December 1944.

Q. So that it seems possible to you at any rate that reference to "Phil" is a reference to you?—A. It could easily be.

Q. I have no further questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I understand from your testimony that you were very familiar indeed with all of Mr. Service's political reporting in China?—A. Very familiar during the period that I was in Chungking, and then reporting that Mr. Service did after I left Chungking—when I left in June 1944 I saw those reports subsequently in the Department.

Q. That reporting was factually accurate, as you remember it?—A. From the standpoint of facts, I would say it was accurate, because, obviously, in all reporting you run into the question of interpretation, judgment, and so forth. I might not agree with all of it but I never saw any reason—the arguments were equally valid on all sides and I dare say the same thing is true on what any officer does there is bound to be a difference of opinion.

Q. With respect to the controversy existing between the Nationalist Government and the Communist forces in China, were the reports impartial?—A. I would say—of course, there, again, you get into the interpretation. To my mind, they were largely objective reports, and there might be some conclusions that Mr. Service reached that I wouldn't agree with; there might be conclusions that I reached that he and the Ambassador wouldn't agree with, but there was never any feeling on the part of anyone that Mr. Service was doing anything but reporting in an objective fashion.

Q. And you saw no indication in that reporting that he was himself pro-Communist?—A. Not the slightest.

Q. And that, also, is true of your conclusions reached by your conversations with him?—A. Very definitely, sir.

Q. And your knowledge of his political attitude?—A. Yes, sir.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. The materials which were submitted by Mr. Service to the General he was attached to, General Stilwell, you stated, I believe, that it was your job to summarize those and transmit them over through the Ambassador?—A. Yes.

Q. Did Mr. Service at any time request that you dispatch any materials to the United States other than through normal channels of the Embassy? A.—No, sir; never. The only thing we had from Mr. Service were official reports.

Q. That's all.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Mr. Sprouse, what were the security restrictions in the Embassy in Chungking during 1944 on the transmission of personal mail to the Department?—A. Well, it seems to me that we had two means, as well as I remember. One, of course, was by APO, in which you had to sign. They were subject to censorship, of course, by the Army itself, in which you had to sign your name and your title and the name of your organization. The other means was, I think, by open letter through the pouch. I can't swear to this, but it seems to me that the Chief of Chancery had to approve that, and they were forwarded unsealed, so the Department itself back here could check on any mail that went through, because you were always told to be extremely careful because you see these pouches went out by plane over the hump into India and you had frequently cases of planes being downed, and, of course, there was always that chance that a plane would crash and the mail would be lost, in which case some of this material would fall into the hands of either the Japanese or agents of the Japanese, so I would say to that extent there was a very careful security check on what was sent back.

Q. Personal mail from people in Chungking sent through the pouch was also subject to censorship in the Department?—A. If I remember correctly, we had to forward mail in a sealed cover, and the letter itself, if it was personal mail, had to be forwarded unsealed. I am almost certain of that, because I thought it was a little bit of a vote of nonconfidence in the personnel. Obviously, if they were in effect in Chungking they must have been in effect with respect to the use of the Department pouch everywhere.

Q. It has been charged that Mr. Service was in communication from China with a Mr. Philip J. Jaffe in the United States. Can you ever recall seeing any communication of Mr. Service in China with Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; never.

Q. Do you ever recall him mentioning the name Jaffe?—A. No, sir; never remember the name even being mentioned.

Q. That's all.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. There were certain differences of opinion between the Embassy staff and General Hurley.—A. I didn't serve under General Hurley, sir, and I can answer only by sort of second hand, but I know that there definitely were, because Mr. Hurley apparently charged that people on the Embassy staff were sabotaging his policy. That came out in his hearings here in December 1945.

Q. But you were during that period—A. I left Chungking in June '44 and I think General Hurley came out in August or September '44. I was in the Consulate General at that point. The first time that I saw General Hurley was when he passed through Kunning on his way back to the United States. I think maybe sometime in that fall, I'm not certain, I saw him at the airport—my consul general and I went out to the airport.

Q. That was after you ceased seeing Mr. Service's reports?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. No further questions.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I would like to ask just one more question: Do you recall, Mr. Sprouse, whether after Mr. Service was detached from the Embassy and attached to the headquarters of the commanding general of the theater he had free personal access to the files of the Embassy?—A. If I remember correctly, he did not. It seems to me the Ambassador took the stand—I can't swear to this, again, but it is a sort of hazy memory—that the people on General Stilwell's staff who were his political advisers were not a part of the Embassy staff as such, and if they wanted things out of the file they had to get permission to get them. They didn't have access to the files in the sense that the regular Embassy staff did.

Q. When you say "get permission," is it your recollection that they would ask some one of the officers of the Embassy to obtain the information that they desired for transmission back to Army Headquarters.—A. Yes. I would say they would either have to go to the Ambassador or to me or to someone in the political section.

Q. That's all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Sprouse.

[Mr. Philip D. Sprouse left the meeting at this time.]

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to offer as an exhibit at this time Document 327, which is a receipt signed by the Assistant Treasurer of the American Institute of Pacific Relations for membership dues for John S. Service in the IPR for the year ending February 1951 in the amount of $15.

(Received and marked "Document 327—Exhibit 19.")

The CHAIRMAN. The meeting will recess now.

Representative for Mr. Service: Charles Edward Rhetts, Reilly, Rhetts & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 10:25 a. m.)

The CHAIRMAN. (Mr. Conrad E. Snow). The Board will be in session. Thereupon Mr. Emmanuel S. Larsen, being produced, sworn, and examined as a witness in behalf of the Loyalty Security Board, testified as follows:

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Your name is Emmanuel S. Larsen?—A. Yes, Emmanuel Sigurd Larsen.

Q. And you spell that with two "m's"?—A. Yes.

Q. You're a voluntary witness in this case at the request of the Board, is that right?—A. That is right, yes.

Q. Desiring to be of as much assistance to the Board as you can?—A. Yes.

Q. You were taken to China at a very early age, were you not?—A. Yes. I believe I went in 1906. My father went out there as a professor in the old Imperial Chinese—of what was equivalent to a university at that time—Keo Teng Hsich Tang. That is Tang.

Q. You were then about 11 years old?—A. No, I was about 9 years old.

Q. And your father was a teacher in this university that you mentioned?—A. Yes.

Q. You remained there until you went to college?—A. No, I remained there until 1911, early part of 1911, when the revolution broke out in China.

Q. And then you went to college in Copenhagen?—A. Then my father went to Copenhagen to visit his old mother and he took over the management of a school on a 5-year contract, so the family got stuck in Denmark for 5 years.

A. And during that period?—A. And during that period I completed high school and took my B. A. from Copenhagen University.

Q. Then in 1915 or thereabouts you returned?—A. In 1915, in May.

Q. You returned to China with your father?—A. I returned to the United States with my father.

Q. And then did you go to China?—A. Then I worked for some time for Marshall Fields & Co., in their oriental department. I was in the appraising department because of what remained of my knowledge of Chinese characters. And from there I went to China in October 1916 to join the Chinese Postal Administration as a Junior Assistant.

Q. And you remained in China until 1935?—A. Yes, I remained until 1935. I was home on two occasions in between.

Q. And would you roughly outline for the Board your occupation in China from 1916 to 1935?—A. From 1916 to the end of 1927 I was with the Postal Administration, stationed in Canton a year and in Chengtu a year, my old boyhood home, and a few months in Shanghai. I had resigned to go home to the war but when I got to Shanghai the armistice was signed and I was in North China in Taiyuanfu. Then a year in the director general post in Peiping and a year in Taochow and 2 years in Amoy, opposite Formosa, and home on leave 1 year, 1923 to 1924. And a year in Hangchow as postal accountant, and then approximately 2 years in Mukden as postal accountant and the deputy commissioner for South Manchuria.

While on a vacation, a hunting trip in 1927, I met a Mongolian lama in Manchuria, Inner Mongolia, Chinese educated, who took a liking to me for some reason or other and invited me to come up there and start a wool and skin export company. At the same time he gave me an advisorship in which capacity I was to build some roads and put up two sheep ranches and import some Merino rams, some trucks and tractors, some seeds, and so on, a small tannery. I was with him from January 1, 1928, until about October of the same year. In the meantime, the Manchurian warlord, Chang Tso-lin, had been assassinated and there was a change of officials and a rather pro-Japanese group came into Taonan, the town in which I made my headquarters in Inner Mongolia. They horsewhipped me in the street and let me know very emphatically that no Americans were wanted around that area.

So I left, went down to Tientsin, and William B. Christian, of the British-American Tobacco Co., appointed me to go to Peiping to be acting traffic manager of the British-American Tobacco Co. at their railway junction near Peiping, called Fengtai. I was with them from October 14, 1928, until March of 1934. I forget the exact date when I left. At that time reloading at the Fengtai junction was no longer necessary and I was ordered transferred to Hankow, but I did not care to go to Hankow and I resigned and was given a bonus by Mr. Christian and sent home.

Q. That was in 1935?—A. In 1934, March.

Q. During that period while you were in China, did you at any time know John Stewart Service?—A. Yes, I did, but very, very slightly.

Q. When was that?—A. That was approximately 1907 or 1908. My old residence in Chengtu, when I was a boy, was flooded and Mr. Robert Service, John's father, very kindly took us in as refugees for a day or so. I think we were there one or two nights and, as far as I remember, the baby in Mrs. Service's arms was John Stewart, with whom I did not conspire at that time.

Q. That was the only occasion that you met him during your period in China?—

A. Yes. I don't believe I ever met him in China after that.

Q. Now, after your return from China to the United States, you went with the Office of Naval Intelligence?—A. Yes, first I went to the Library of Congress on that Rockefeller scholarship project, I think it was called, the writing up of the Ching Dynasty biographies and the translation of Chinese history. And I held that for about a month and a half.

Then I was approached by Naval Intelligence. I had not made any application to them. And that was at the time when Admiral Ellis Zacharias was a commander and was in charge of the Far Eastern Desk.

Q. What year was that?—A. That was October 1935.

Q. And you were with the Office of Naval Intelligence for some time?—A. Until August 31, 1944.

Q. For some 9 years, in other words?—A. Nine years, approximately.

Q. Then you went with the State Department?—A. Yes.

Q. In 1934?—A. In 1944.

Q. And you were with the State Department about a year?—A. About a year, yes.

Q. In the State Department you were country specialist in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs?—A. Yes.

Q. And did you, in connection with your year in the State Department, know or meet John Stewart Service?—A. Yes, I did on two occasions. One day after the Far Eastern Division meeting I was introduced to him by Mr. Ballantine. I just managed to say "How do you do," that is all.

Q. And the other occasion?—A. The other occasion was when we went to lunch one day. I think Mr. John Carter Vincent asked me to go to lunch with him.

Q. And those were the only two occasions when you met him?—A. Those were the only two occasions.

Q. The only occasions that you had occasion to meet with him or to hear him?—A. That is right.

Q. Now, after you returned to the United States you engaged in a voluntary collection of Chinese data on your own account, did you not?—A. Yes, sir. I would prefer to correct the first few words, "after your return to the United States." I started that in 1923, early in 1923. At that time Sun Yat-sen's revolutionary group in Canton and his army headed by Chiang Kai-shek as the rebel group by the Peiping Government that I operated under as postmaster of Amoy. And the postal administration, that is the director general of the postal administration, wrote me a letter and said "Go down and meet these people and try to find out who they are and how many of them have been affiliated with communism in Russia." And I took a small camera I had and went down and I ate with them and went on a hunting expedition with them and in general just hung around them until they almost got fed up with me. But during that period I managed to collect background material on biographies of about 55 of the leaders of that movement.

Q. That became a hobby with you?—A. That became a hobby. After some time I was told by Peiping to drop it. Instead of throwing my carbon copies away I set up a card system and used it later in China. From time to time I added to it. I gave the American military attaché, Colonel Drysdale, the benefit of that file and also used it and augmented it at a later date, which I forgot to mention, in 1934 and 1935, very late in 1934 and 1935 when I worked for the Chinese military gendarmerie.

Q. In that connection or in some connection, in March 1944 were you introduced to one Philip J. Jaffe?—A. Yes. In March 1944.

Q. Was that the correct date?—A. I don't remember whether that was March 1944.

Q. Would you give such date as you remember?—A. Yes. It may be thereabouts.

Q. Were you introduced to Mr. Jaffe by one Lieutenant Roth?—A. Yes, that is right. I was in Naval Intelligence then.

Q. You were then working for the Office of Naval Intelligence?—A. Yes.

Q. After meeting Mr. Jaffe, from time to time you exchanged information with him?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell the Board the circumstances of that, Mr. Larsen?—A. You mean the meeting, the first meeting with Jaffe?

Q. Yes, and go on from there and tell the arrangements you made with Jaffe.—A. Andrew Roth came to my desk one day and asked me whether I was going out to lunch and I said "Yes," and he said "Well, let's go out together." That was a very common practice, as I'm sure it is in most offices. At the time I had complete faith in the integrity and character of Andrew Roth because he was a naval officer in uniform and I went with him. We walked up Seventeenth Street and he asked me whether I still kept up my card file. I said "Yes." He said "Do you have much on the Chinese Communists?" and I told him "No, I don't." He said "I know a man. I just want to ask you, do you know Philip Jaffe?" I said "No, I don't know him, but I seem to know the name though." He said "He is the publisher and the editor of the Amerasia magazine." And I told him "Yes, I think I have seen it there, the name." "He has been in China and has been living among the Communists and has collected quite a bit of material and he has a hobby very much like yours," he said. "He collects biographical material. Would you care to meet him?" I said "Certainly, that is the way I build up my file." He said "Well, let's go to the Statler Hotel. He is in town today and I'm sure he would like to meet you."

Why, I didn't think there was anything strange about that at the time. And when I met Jaffe we had lunch. We talked over the manner in which I had built up my file and I told him I would be very eager to exchange material with him. We made a system whereby he would come to Washington once in a while or if he had anything special he would write to me. He never did write to me, though. And we would then hand each other lists of persons we were interested in, particularly information we required on persons. And we began that, oh, I believe it was probably July.

Q. In 1944?—A. Yes, 1944. I remember there was quite a lapse of time before he came down the first time. And I gave him a great number of duplicates I had.

Q. Duplicates of what?—A. Of my cards, the Chinese personnel cards, some Mongolians, some special cards on Japanese spies among the Mohammedan population in north-west China, and miscellaneous things, Tibetans, Indians also.

Q. Did you from time to time show Mr. Jaffe certain documents which you had in your possession?—A. I did on a few occasions, yes.

Q. And some of those documents were reports from Mr. John Service?—A. That I don't know. I doubt whether there were any reports. It may be there was one—if Mr. Service wrote material on personalities I would say there might have been some, but I don't remember that.

Q. Well, you had previously been interrogated by the FBI on this subject, haven't you?—A. Very emphatically, yes; very much so.

Q. And you gave a written statement to the FBI?—A. Yes; I did.

Q. Did you not state in that statement that among the documents you showed Mr. Jaffe were some classified documents written by John Service?—A. I have no copy of that and I do not remember exactly what was said. That is on the night of June 6, 1945. I would have to refresh my memory from that document, if it is available.

Q. Well, what is your recollection? Some of these papers are confidential and the Board can't reveal the papers themselves. But I'd like to get your recollection, your best recollection, if you did not show some classified documents written by John Service to Jaffe. Just give me the benefit of your recollection.—A. No; I cannot say that I did not. I showed him some in November 1944. Specifically, I remember there was a change of government in Chungking and there were a great number of charges hurled against the Chiang Kai-shek government that it constituted no more than "old faces and new windows." Well, there was a report to that effect from the field, giving a very excellent description of the various men who came into the government and some erroneous material. I remember I checked it as quite faulty in spots but that was inevitable. There are false spots in all reports. And I discussed that with Philip Jaffe when he came to my house. And I made the indiscreet blunder of allowing him to see it.

He asked me if he could take it with him because it was too long to just jot down notes from. He wanted some of that information. It was not secret.

I would challenge the secrecy of that particular dispatch and many others on the grounds that I think a secret document constitutes knowledge that is restricted to a few and is not to be given to the general public. That would be very good if it were so but if the information, the knowledge contained in the document, is popular and public knowledge, knowledge for, say, a month or so, and it is known generally to 475,000,000 people, it is not important as a secret in a document. Of course I did not have the authority to declassify documents. So in such instances, as I told the FBI right at the beginning: Yes; I'm guilty of an indiscretion in that matter. And I would prefer to tell the truth and then I feel that I have little reason to worry after that. So if I'm on trial here, I'm quite willing to repeat those admissions.

Q. I want you to understand you are not on trial.—A. I'm glad you say that. Nevertheless, I want to add, although you have not asked me: Did you, Emmanuel Larsen, give 1,700 or 2,000 or 3,000 documents—it's already pretty old-fashioned to talk about 1,700 documents. A man is more up to date if he talks about 3,000 documents. But, Mr. Snow, I'll tell you that when this case broke I was permitted by Mr. Hitchcock to see the documents and they were stacked on a table either two stacks—they must have been 10 or 12 inches high in each, and I said, "How many are there there?" And he said, "There must be three or four hundred." Now, how they grew to 1,700 or 3,000 is entirely a mystery to me. But I'll refer to them as the 3,000 documents because they are being referred to in that manner at present by Mr. McCarthy, Mr. Wherry, and various others, Mr. Ferguson, and people who have questioned me.

Q. With further reference to your statement that you might be on trial, the Board understands that you are seeking to help the Board in the case now before it and this is not any questioning with reference to yourself at all.—A. Oh, I'm sorry; I realize that.

Q. I'm reading from a statement which you made and signed and gave to the FBI, as you have testified.—A. I see.

Q. On June 7, 1945?—A. Yes; it probably was June 7. It was early in the morning.

Q. And in that statement you state: "Of the classified documents that I have shown to Mr. Jaffe I remember some written by Mr. John Service."—A. I did write that. I have forgotten some of those things.

Q. "On the subject of Communist relations with the Chinese Central Government."—A. Yes; that may be.

Q. "I believe those documents were mostly classified as confidential and I showed them to Mr. Jaffe because he had known them in advance." Do you remember making that statement?—A. Yes; that is right. He said at one time to me that he knew of that entire story. I cannot say for sure whether he stated to me that he had seen the document or had received a copy of the document or that he had a copy of the document, but he intimated that he knew of that report.

Incidentally, let me add this—and I'm not adding this in defense of anyone, because the implication clearly is here that someone else had given him such a report or a similar report or a report paralleling the official report, and there has been a great deal of misunderstanding among all the people who have investigated the Amerasia case.

In a discussion with Senator Ferguson, I believe it was, I pointed out that any intelligence work or any field work by State Department or other American officials in the field would necessarily depend upon other men not in the State Department who work in the field. There is very little in the way of a first-hand report because, if you knock it down, the first-hand report means that you, Mr. Snow, are sitting here and you see me and see what I do and hear what I say. But if I do these things down on G Street you will have to depend on a second-hand report. And it was the practice—I'm sure Mr. Service will not deny that—that when, let us say, Mr. Service was back in Chungking—he had been in Yenan and had followed the political development there—and he was back in Chungking. Naturally he was interested in the continuity of the development he had been studying and reporting on.

Then let us say that Correspondent Smith comes back. Naturally Mr. Service will get hold of Mr. Smith and find out what the developments are. I doubt very much whether he would definitely refuse to put into his report the material that Mr. Smith gave him. Mr. Smith, on the other hand, is going to send that report home. Mr. Service's report may be a paraphrase of Mr. Smith's findings, his general findings.

I don't make the following as an accusation but this manner of reporting works in reverse too. If Mr. Service goes to Yenan and comes back there is nothing criminal about that. I have done it. I have been in intelligence work plenty in my life and there is nothing criminal in contacting a newsman in Chungking and saying, "Look; here is what I find. Some of these things I'm not quite clear about. What is the background of this," and so on. Well, a reporter with a good photostatic mind can record even without scribbling on paper the essence of Service's findings; whether he did that or not, I don't know. But that is my presumption, that I have given as a theory of why reports were frequently similar.

I remember when I was in Naval Intelligence a naval attaché sent in a very confidential report on something that was not at all confidential because hundreds of thousands of Chinese knew about it. Nevertheless, a report came in and was published in the papers. The same time I was reading it at my desk it was published in the newspapers. One of our better reporters will give it in exactly the same way. Some call it collusion. But—what the heck—the men work out there and they get the material. That is the main point.

Q. Was it in that spirit that you exchanged this information with Mr. Jaffe?—A. Yes.

Q. Let me read one more sentence to see if you recall it: "I loaned him, to peruse,—such reports that I thought would not harm." Correct?—A. Correct. That is right.

Q. "They were recent documents, all March 1945, relating to the position of the Chinese Central Government and Communist forces in the Province of Shansi?—A. That is right.

Q. "Some of them were classified and others were not classified and they were official copies."—A. That is right. They were copies.

Q. In that connection, and in order that you may be of as much service as possible to the Board in this connection, I'm going to show you certain papers, certain official papers, which were originally drafted by Mr. Service and copies of which were found among Mr. Jaffe's papers at the time he was arrested. I'm going to show you these papers to see if you can help the Board by identifying any of these papers as the papers which you may have seen or may have let Mr. Jaffe see. Would you help the Board in that way?—A. Yes; I would.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. May I ask a question. Just as a matter of clearing my mind on a few of the points I'd like to ask you this: When you were in Naval Intelligence, you were then working on the China desk over there, were you, Mr. Larsen?—A. Yes; China desk and Manchuria.

Q. You had access there to materials from what sources—just Navy, or State and Navy, and all the rest of the sources concerning such matters?—A. First of all I'd like to tell you that I had access to no secret material because I was not in uniform. That statement may be verified from Naval Intelligence. I had access to no secret information. When they had secret information and they brought it to a civilian analyst they did it in a very funny way. Sometimes there was garbled information that required the attention of a man who knew Chinese. They they would bring the report and cut a hole in the piece of paper and cover up everything but the pertinent part and very often I would tell these officers "I can't handle the thing out of context. I have to see a little more of the text to know what it is before I can handle it." Well, they would have to go back and get authority to let a civilian analyst see a secret and top-secret report and telegram.

Q. My question is the information that came to you came from sources other than the Navy?—A. I know. I remember your question, sir. I'm coming to that. The information coming to me emanated from, let us say, practically all departments. There were some from the State Department, some from OSS, some from War Department, some from Commerce Department, and some from Treasury Department.

Q. When you joined the Department did you know persons over here prior to your coming? When you joined the Department of State did you have contacts with them in connection with your work prior to joining the Department of State's staff?—A. Official contacts?

Q. Yes; official contacts.—A. Well, I can only say that I went officially from the Navy Department to the State Department on a few occasions to see a man by the name of Boggs who was the chief geographer. I worked on maps in Naval Intelligence. But I don't believe I was ever sent officially, nor did I go over privately, to contact them about any work.

Q. In connection with your employment in the Department of State, will you explain to me just what the job was that you held over here, under whose direction you worked, the things that will let me get the picture in my mind as to where you were located and how you were there provided the tools with which to do your work, I mean the flow of materials.—A. When I went over to the State Department in September 1944 I was classified as country specialist, and it was a research unit that I was attached to that was under orders to scrutinize current events and make basic postwar policy.

Q. Where was that unit located in the Department?—A. It was located in the Walker-Johnson Building, up here on New York Avenue.

Q. It was under the administrative direction of what section, sir?—A. Well, I understand that we were first under the political—I forgot the correct title of that, but this was under Mr. Pasvolosky, Leo Pasvolosky. But then, as far as I remember, January 1 we were made the Research and Planning Unit of the Far Eastern Division and we worked directly under Joseph W. Ballantine, who was the Chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs.

Q. Was Mr. Ballantine's office and the principal desk officer's office located in the Walker-Johnson Building?—A. No; they were located in the other building, on the other side of New York Avenue.

Q. In the main State Department Building?—A. Yes; in the main State Department building. And we went over there three or four times a week and held policy meetings in the meeting room next to his office. The head of the Research Unit was Dr. George Blakeslee.

Q. The information that you utilized in your work came to you to Dr. Blakeslee, or to whom? How did you get that information?—A. I came to Dr. Blakeslee and Mr. Hugh Borton.

Q. And they routed it to you, or did it come automatically to you, when it hit there?—A. Well, secret and such highly confidential material would come on in and we would have very little time to study it. The messenger would wait for it and we generally had to sign a little slip "Received" and the "Returned," giving the exact minutes it took us to read it.

Q. That information was not left in your possession to study, sir?—A. No; not if it was in original and we would sign or initial the originals and that is why our initials also are on all originals.

Q. Supposing it had been reproduced?—A. Then I could request a copy of the division would request copies. And then they would send sometimes several copies. I never knew exactly why they sometimes sent two or three copies.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Could you tell us why you happened to transfer from Navy to the State Department?—A. Well, it was sort of a combination of circumstances. One thing that I must say was decisive was that I was a P-5 in the Navy Department and I was told that I could never rise above that. That would be the limit placed on civilian research analysts. And I think you will agree that every man has a right to have a little ambition. And I thought it over and it worked on my mind for a long time and I thought what the heck, to work as a P-5 and sit the rest of my life at this same desk here and do the same thing—well, I tried in June 1943 to join the Army to get a majority and become a lecturer on intelligence systems in the Charlottesville Military Government School. But Commander Martin, a friend of mine in the Navy, talked me out of it at the last minute, just a few days before I went over to get commissioned, and they got me an increase. So I stayed. Then in 1944 I happened to go in to see Mr. Hornbeck. I've known him for many years, since 1924.

Q. Mr. Hornbeck was then?—A. He was in State. He was not the Chief of the Far Eastern Division any longer. He said "I don't know that I can do anything for you." I mentioned to him "Is there any chance of me coming over to the State Department to work?" He said "I think there is a vacancy in that Research and Planning Unit if you would like to apply for it. But I certainly can't give you any encouragement." And I made application and told him "Navy Intelligence will block it, so I don't think anything will come out of it." He said "If they want to get you they can transfer you by Executive order."

So I came in a few days later and Dr. Blakeslee and Mr. Hugh Borton sent for me. And they questioned me for several hours in the manner in which I would go about a postwar settlement of Manchuria. That was, so to speak, my examination subject with particular references to how Japanese private investment in Manchuria should be handled. And I broke down various classifications, those that had been grabbed from the Chinese and given to the Japanese and those that had been legally bought, and so on. He said my judgment was very fair and he liked my attitude and he said he would recommend me.

The next day I was going on 2 days' leave. I had a lot of leave accumulated and we went down to my wife's home near Roanoke and when I came back my colleague in the Navy Department called me to his unit and he said "Jimmie, how do you like being a member of the State Department," and I said, "I don't know." He said, "Well, you are. An order came down Friday or Saturday saying that you had been transferred by Executive order." So it all happened very easily like that.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Now, you have mentioned occasions on which you got copies of these papers, these classified papers. Those papers, I take it, you could retain?—A. Yes; retain or destroy. They were always mine.

Q. And among those were the copies you have testified Mr. Jaffe borrowed on some occasions to look over?—A. Yes.

Q. Who was A. S. Chase? Was he connected with your State Department employment?—A. He was after Mr. John Carter Vincent became Chief of the China Desk, Mr. Chase—no, that is not right. Let's see, Mr. Ballantine was Chief of the Far Eastern Division and Mr. Vincent was Chief of the China Desk and Mr. Chase was the assistant.

Q. Did you get some of these copies through him?—A. Oh, no.

Q. Now, then, I'm going to show you first a paper which is known as Service Report No. 14 on Chinese Communist Party views on Mongolia, dated March 16, 1945, and known in this proceeding as Document 217, and ask you if you ever saw that report?—A. No, I'm sure I never saw that report.

Q. Now I'll show you a—

Mr. ACHILLES. You mean the substance of the report or the original?

A. I'll read it more carefully now. There are certain things in here. I was a member of the Basic Policy Committee concerning Mongolia. I did not write any papers on Mongolia, so there is a possibility that this went to Mr. Paul Josslyn and that I did not see this at all. Of course I do not remember this paper at all. That is the subject that we discussed at the Policy Committee meeting but I do not remember reading this.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Let me show you a photostat of an ozalid copy of that paper which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and see if you ever saw that.—A. That is the same thing. No.

Q. So you have no knowledge with reference to that paper?—A. No.

Q. I'm going to show you what is known as Service Report No. 13, dated March 16, 1945, on Chinese Communist Party views in Sinkiang, which is known as Document No. 216 in this proceeding. And I'll ask you if you ever saw that report?—A. Yes, I think I saw this report. I remember the substance of it. I can't say for sure that I saw it but I remember the substance of this with regard to Sheng Shih-tsai. Yes, I remember the substance of this.

Q. Now, I'll show you a photostat of an ozalid copy of that paper, which was found among Mr. Jaffe's papers, and ask you if you remember seeing that report? Did you show that report to Mr. Jaffe or allow him to see it or borrow it?—A. This was March 16, 1945. No, I did not have any copy like this. I did not work on Sheng Shih-tsai but I took notes from the material coming in regarding data that would fit into the biography of such men as Sheng Shih-tsai. I did not take notes of the substance of the report to the extent that I would copy what was secret. I may mention to you that in all these notes that I took and in any material that I showed to Jaffe there was never anything that was of national importance, of military importance, of danger to the Allied Military Corps.

Q. I call your attention to the fact that that report is unclassified.—A. Yes.

Q. And I ask you again if you think you showed that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; I did not. I'm pretty sure I did not show that to Mr. Jaffe or give it to Mr. Jaffe. I don't think I handled this beyond seeing it in the Department.

Q. When you say you did not show that report, do you mean also that you did not show him an ozalid copy of that report?—A. Yes, I'm sure.

Q. Now I refer to Service Report No. 15, dated March 16, 1945, on Chinese Communist Party Policy on Minorities, which is known as Document No. 218 in this proceeding and ask you if you saw that report? Or did you see an ozalid copy of it? That is, by the way, an unclassified report.—A. I remember this subject very well. I doubt very much whether this is one of the few reports I gave to Jaffe, although it is not classified it is considerably off the track of my hobby. I was particularly interested in reports that were originally in personalities, biographical material, listing new members of the Government, their background, the background of their affiliations, their present doings, and so on.

Q. But I take it the reports you showed to Jaffe were not necessarily reports you were so much interested in but were reports in which he was interested in.—A. I don't know how to reply to that statement. I'm not evading it. You say you take it that way. He never requested any report from me.

Q. By name you mean?—A. So that would imply that I would have to say to him "Mr. Jaffe, what are you interested in?" I never did.

Q. How did you find out what to give him or what to show him?—A. Well, in the course of a discussion concerning a certain man, a certain personality or a certain list of new Government members. Say my contention was that they were liberals and definitely a departure from the old composition of the Kuomintang Cabinet. Mr. Jaffe on several occasions claims they were not at all. And to enlighten him I brought out my cards and very often I had the same information far long in advance than that that was sent in. Why was it sometimes my own wording in it? Why? Because when I was in Naval Intelligence I prepared hundreds of cards and sent them out to the military attaché, my cards, for nothing. I gave them as a present to the Navy Department. They sent them out to Chungking and when the members of the United States Foreign Service wanted information they could get it from those cards. And their attaché stooped as low as to send in personality reports, verbatim copies of my cards that I had given him when he went out.

Q. What is your testimony on this particular paper?—A. I remember the subject but I'm sure I never gave Jaffe this. May I see the ozalid?

Q. This is a photostat of the ozalid copy of the same paper you have been looking at and this is a photostat of the paper which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. This is a major political discussion and contains very little, if anything, on personalities. I would normally throw this aside because my hobby, be it ever so crazy, is personalities. One Congressman, I think, inquired as to whether I was a screwball on the subject and I told him I was no more screwball on this than he is a screwball in representing the people of his State. I had a theory there that China was not governed particularly by any ideology. Was not, but it is very much now, and that personalities were very important. The armies were strictly warlord armies, even during the war, under Chiang Kai-shek. And I think I quite rightfully maintain that the study of political developments and the probabilities of this or that development through a study of the personalities was the best way of determining what was going to happen.

Therefore, Mr. Stanton frequently called me and said "Jimmie, grab a cab, go home and get the cards on so-and-so. I want to see all the dirt you have on that man, see what we can expect from him as a new Minister or Assistant Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs, what are his past affiliations, whom will he buck, whom he will stick to, and whom he will not double-cross, and so on.

Q. What is your conclusion on that?—A. I cannot swear to it that I did not show this, but I'm pretty positive that I did not. It is not in my field. If I were working here now and I got this I would read it with interest concerning China and I would throw it aside as of no interest to my particular hobby.

Q. Now I'm going to show you Service Report No. 18, dated March 18, 1945, on Labor and Women's Organizations, which is known in this proceeding as Document 227, and ask you if you showed that to Jaffe.—A. This is the report itself?

Q. Yes, this is the report itself. Did you ever see that or an ozalid copy of it?—A. No, sir; I don't think I ever saw that.

Q. Well, just as a further check on that I'll also show you a photostat of the ozalid copy of that which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. No, no. Labor organizations, no; don't know it. I don't know that document at all. I don't remember seeing it ever.

Q. I now show you what is known as Service Report No. 16, dated March 17, 1945 on the subject of relief and rehabilitation organizations, known in this proceeding as Document No. 291, and ask you if you have seen that or an ozalid copy of that report?—A. I never saw that. I have no idea of Mr. Arnold. I never was introduced to the intricacies of UNRRA while I was in the State Department.

Q. I'm also handing you an ozalid copy of that, a photostat of an ozalid copy of that, which was found among Mr. Jaffe's possessions, and ask you if you snowed that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; you see there were policy meetings in which Mr. Moffat was very active that concerned deeper political problems that were of current interest, political and economic problems. I was not present at those meetings. I did not handle this. This subject would not come to me, at least as I remember it, it did not.

Q. Now I show you what is known as Service Report No. 17, dated March 17, 1945, on Communist territorial claims, known in this proceeding as Document No. 220, and ask you if you saw that?—A. No; I don't remember the story or the importance of the area to our military observers. I doubt whether this would ever have been routed to me in the regular course of events.

Q. I'll also show you a photostat of an ozalid copy of the same paper and two typed copies of the same paper and ask if you recall showing or loaning to Mr. Jaffe such papers?—A. Implying that I typed the copies, you mean?

Q. No, no implication at all. I'd just like your information on the subject. Did you type copies sometimes?—A. I typed a copy of one, viz, Sun Fo's speech, which was highly confidential until after it was published in the newspapers.

Q. Do you recall handling any of those?—A. I do not recall handling them.

Q. I now pass you Service Report No. 21, dated March 21 1945, on the treatment of Kwangsi clique. I will also show you the photostat of an ozalid copy of the same paper and the photostat of a typed copy of the same paper, which was found among Mr. Jaffe's possessions.—A. That is an original, but this was not found in Jaffe's possession.

Q. That is right, only the ozalid and the typed copy were found.—A. I remember the report but I'm pretty sure that I didn't have any copy of this. Li Tsung-jen and Pai Chung-Hia were my two particular hobbies. I remember the substance of this report. There probably were a number of reports on this subject, both Military Intelligence, Navy Intelligence, State Department, and OSS, on the subject of the treatment of Kwangsi clique, the shabby treatment of the Kwangsi commanders Li and Pai who came up north to help Chiang fight the Japanese in spite of the fact that up until the middle of 1936 they had been in violent opposition to Chiang. And I personally was a sympathizer with the two because I know General Pai personally and had the inside story of his life from him.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS :

Q. In this connection you say there were reports from other sources?—A. Yes, there were other reports. This was a favorite subject and the reports were true.

Q. Those reports came over your desk from the other sources as well?—A. Yes, I have seen reports on that. They must have come over my desk because I remember seeing a number of reports on this subject, but I can't say that this one here—I don't know whether I ever took this report home. I took a great many reports home and I took them back. I had a gold badge and I was entitled to take them home. Many of these reports were extremely long and if I sat and read, say, 40 reports in the office it would be 4:30 and then I wouldn't have done a stroke of work. Therefore I took them home and I lay on my couch with a cup of coffee and my pipe and I read them and I made annotations—naturally the copies and not the originals—in the margin where I compared them with my cards and when I thought they were a little bit off on the information and where I found information that was vital to the correct analysis of that man I very often took little data, not in the way of a long discussion but the exact data of whom he was affiliated with, and so on.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Would you look at the ozalid copies, the photostats of the ozalid copies and of the typed copies and let us know if by chance you showed them to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I don't know, but I'll volunteer a method of checking it. I still have the typewriter. I don't type as well as this here. I still have the typewriter and I can see at a glance I didn't type this. But I still have the typewriter that I have had during the last 12 or 13 years and you're welcome to check this with my typewriter.

Q. But it is your opinion that it is not your typewriter?—A. It is my opinion, yes.

MR. STEVENS. How about the ozalids?

A. No more than the original.

Q. It is your opinion that you did not let Mr. Jaffe see the ozalid?—A. I did not. I'll tell you when I come to one that I think I can remember showing him. I have not denied to you that there were such, and I have nothing in particular to hide.

Q. That is the assistance the Board is seeking from you.—A. The secrecy, without any intention of casting aspersions on the Loyalty Board, of these hearings I'm considerably disillusioned about because when I went before the Hobbs committee they told me, "You can say anything you know and you can even tell us things you don't know but which are opinions and little things you have heard and little gossip and this and that and tell it all to us and we are not asking you to certify anything or to put it together, but we will do that. We may have other parts of the jigsaw puzzle." And I spoke rather freely and the testimony was published and has become public property. So far as that is concerned, I'm beginning to doubt whether any testimony can in the long run be secret.

Q. Well, you will give us the benefit of your knowledge without respect to secrecy, would you not?—A. Yes, I will. However, I must tell you I'll be extremely cautious in repeating things I have heard because I don't wish to involve anyone. I think it's extremely unfair to involve anyone in this huge mess and I heard so many things and they are of little value. I would like to stick to facts.

Q. Let me say with reference to the policy of this Board that this proceeding is a confidential proceeding and the Board does not make public any transcript of that hearing. However, a copy of the transcript is given to counsel for Mr. Service and we can, of course, make no promise that it will not be made known because Mr. Service can make any disposition of it, as he sees fit. That is the policy of this Board.—A. I'm really not worried about it. I just made the point to show that I'm aware of that.

Q. Now, then, I will show you Service report No. 19, dated March 19, 1945, on the Kuomintang exile governments, which is known in this proceeding as Document No. 221. Did you see that report?—A. I don't remember seeing that.

Q. I'll also show you the photostat of an ozalid copy of the same report which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask you if you let Mr. Jaffe see that ozalid copy or take it.—A. No. This is purely theory on whether those newly established little Shen Kan-Ning local governments were bona fide governments or just a sort of sham. I didn't go into that, nor did I use it for my official work in the State Department.

Q. We won't need to have the contents of the article described because we already have that in the record, so you won't need to outline it, except as you need to to make your answers understandable.—A. Yes.

Q. I now show you photostats of two typed copies and carbon of a Time article by Mr. Theodore White, which has no number in this proceeding. It appears to be a MID document. These are photostats of the papers which were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. No; I certainly never saw this. This was a manuscript of an article for Time magazine, apparently.

Mr. RHETTS. I wonder if this document has any kind of a reference document number that can be used.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be referred to as Q-211.

Mr. RHETTS. Could we have some other number that isn't repeated?

The CHAIRMAN. J-139-F.

Mr. RHETTS. All right.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you see that?—A. No; quite honestly and certainly I don't know this one.

Q. And you never let Mr. Jaffe have it?—A. I don't think I ever handled it or saw it.

Q. I now show you a photostat of two typed copies and a carbon of a document known in this proceeding as 157 on Kuomintang China and the American policy. The original is an OSS paper. I'll show you the original and photostats of copies that were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. This is an original here?

Q. Yes; that is the original.—A. Of course reports came in in that purple ink. No; particularly with reference to this statement here. It's an interesting point but I never did say this. I have not seen this document. It is a secret OSS document and I doubt whether it would come to me. This copy; no, sir.

Q. I now show you what is known—A. I may mention OSS sent very few documents to the State Department, as far as I was concerned, when I was in the State Department. It was very rarely that I saw an OSS document. When it was, it was generally something heavily loaded with personalities and my colleagues promptly gave it to me and told me I could do with it whatever I liked. "This is your hobby, we are not interested in it," they would say.

Q. I now show you two documents known as Service Reports No. 3 and No. 7, dated October 4, 1944, on Chinese Communist Political Views. These two copies are known in this proceeding as Document No. 166 and are photostats of typed copies from MID.—A. I wouldn't get them in the first place. No material was received indirectly. I would never receive State Department material from MID.

Q. Well, would you look at this and see if you recognize it? I'll show you the original paper and photostats of two typed copies found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. The original of the State Department papers, the dispatch, I have seen.

Q. You have seen that?—A. Yes, I have seen that. I know that report. The remarks of Guenther Stein and Maurice Votaw; yes, I remember it very clearly. This would normally have come to me in the Naval Intelligence Office where I was in July 1944.

Q. Is it your recollection that it did come to you?—A. Yes; I remember this. It is Mr. Gauss's report.

Q. Would you look at the photostats of the typed copies and let us know whether you showed that or loaned that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No. I never received photostats in this form here.

Q. No; don't misunderstand me. You aren't supposed to have received the photostats. The photostats are just the possession of the Board. The question is whether or not you handed the typed copies of which that is a photostat.—

A. Oh, I see. That is possible, because that is one question I discussed with him. I asked him about the reliability of these men. That was the first indication I received that Mr. Jaffe was very close with the various reporters out there, as listed here, viz, Mr. Epstein, Maurice Votaw, and one other—Guenther Stein.

Q. So you may possibly have given that report to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I may possibly have shown him this or shown him entries in my card file from it. I can't say for sure. I certainly remember this report. This report I had a great interest in.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. You mentioned a moment ago that your colleagues would send such information to you promptly and tell you that this was something that you were interested in and which they were not interested in. Are you referring to State Department colleagues, your colleagues in Naval Intelligence, or who?—A. I was referring in this particular instance to State Department colleagues.

Q. Did the State Department colleagues know that you were taking material home at night?—A. Yes. My boss even told me one time to take the Korean policy papers home, and it would have been a very bad thing if the arrests would have been made when I had the Korean policy papers home. Blakeslee informed the FBI about that and they promptly called him and verified it. "Did you on one occasion tell Mr. Larson to take papers home?" He said "Yes, he brought them back though. We had them the next morning." I had a gold badge and was entitled to take papers home.

Q. Your colleagues stated to you they were not interested in them?—A. They were not interested in personality material.

Q. Did you not mention earlier, sir, that Mr. Stanton would say to you to go get in a cab?—A. I do not consider him a colleague in my particular branch. He was Assistant Director of the Far Eastern Division and he was over in the Department. When I say "colleagues" I mean those who worked with me on the Policy Committee and the Research and Planning Unit, viz., Barton, Mr. Josslyn, Dr. Blakeslee, and Mrs.—what her name was I forget now, the lady who worked there.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I now show you Service Report No. 156, dated November 13, 1943, on the Willingness of Chinese Leaders to be Puppets, which is a copy of the original and then I'll also show you a photostat of a typed copy which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you see this paper and did you make its contents known to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I don't think so. I don't remember this document.

Q. The paper you're looking at is a summary of the document.—A. I see. No, sir.

Q. Do I understand you to say you saw the original?—A. No; I don't think I ever saw this paper, no, sir.

Q. I show you now Service Report No. 5, dated August 3, 1944, on Communist Policy Toward the Kuomintang, which is Document No. 168 in this proceeding, and ask you if you saw that paper or a typed copy of the same. I give you a photostat of a typed copy which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you see that paper and did you hand a copy of it to Mr. Jaffe?—A. Yes; I remember seeing that report. But I don't remember—there is no personality material in here. It's just the question of whether the Chinese Communists were pursuing a policy of self-limitation. That was a great problem at that time to me in my official work.

Q. This paper that I'm showing you a photostat of is combined with another document.—A. Yes; that is right. This document came into the State Department, this original, as a report from Mr. Service and had a covering dispatch from Mr. Gauss. I have not read the paper yet but I believe this is the one. I shall try to verify it now. This is the one in which Mr. Gauss said he did not quite agree with Mr. Service.

Q. Will you tell us, after you look at the photostat, if you handed a copy of this to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I did not. I did not hand this to Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Now I pass you Service Report No. 1, dated—A. I know this dispatch very well. It was an important problem at that time.

Q. Now I show you Service Report No. 1, dated July 28, 1944, known as Document No. 164 in this proceeding, on The Impressions of the North Shensi Communist Base.—A. I don't remember this report.

Q. I show you the photostat of a handwritten copy of the same report which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. I don't remember this report here. I remember vaguely reading Mr. Service's material in this connection. I think you would find that one of these came to me and I saw it, but I doubt whether I even got copies of it. I wouldn't request it.

Q. Your testimony is you did not give that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. Yes, I feel sure of that.

Q. I also show you Service Report No. 2, dated July 27, 1944, known as Document 165 in this proceeding on the conversations with Mao Tse-tung. I ask if you saw that paper or gave a copy of it to Mr. Jaffe?—A. It was written on August 27, my birthday, the very day when I learned that I was transferred to the State Department. I had very little to do with it. However, it must have come in sometime after I was in the State Department. And I do remember the subject of this report on conversations with Mao Tse-tung.

Mr. RHETTS. May I interrupt a minute. Are you looking at the right paper? He now has before him Document 165, which is a despatch to which there is attached Service Report No. 2 on Conversations with Mao Tse-tung, dated July 28, 1944.

Q. Would you look at that and state whether you saw it?—A. Mr. Service's report is as of July 28, covering despatch of August 26. No; sir; this is concerning the station of an officer at Yenan. I did not have anything to do with that. That was wartime policy. I didn't give a bang whether the station went down or not. It had nothing to do with me and my work. It had nothing to do with regard to my hobby on Chinese personalities. So I'm positive I did not handle this matter at all. I'm sure I never have taken it home and I'm sure I never have shown it to Mr. Jaffe.

Mr. MORELAND [Off the record].

Q. I now show you a document which has no number in this proceeding but can be identified as Q-268, dated June 12, 1944, Service Report on Economic-Political Effects of the Japanese Drive, together with a photostat of an ozalid copy of the same. We have not the original in this case, Mr. Larsen. All we have is the photostat of an ozalid copy which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you see that?—A. Was this document published in the white paper, because it's rather fresh in my memory, this sentence that: "The collapse of the Government, even though it would not come soon, might become only a matter of time." Well, of course that was stated in probably a number of despatches. That is my only key to recognition of this document here.

You know it's very difficult; I hope you will realize it's very difficult to remember. I don't have a bad memory at all. I have a particularly good memory for telephone numbers and dates, historical dates, and Chinese names, but I can't say that I remember many of these here. In many instances, while I have said I'm inclined to believe that I have handled this document, it is because I remember sentences in there that are familiar to me and it's no use denying that I haven't but it would be very difficult for me to say, yes, I took that document and showed it to Jaffe. But I'll tell you if I come across one. I'll repeat that again I'll try to volunteer to say if I did.

Q. About this one, do you think you showed this one to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; I did not. I'm sure I did not. I remember the text there but it's outside my field. It is concerned with the effects on the Chinese Nationalist economy of the Japanese push down through China. That was a thing that we all had to consider in naval intelligence. For instance, I was ordered to make general reports once a month on the possible effect within the next few months of the advance of the Japanese. Well, in a case like this I would have to read a despatch like that and form an opinion as to whether they were now losing so much revenue by occupation of the ports that they would not be able to sustain the army and their general economy.

Q. That is Service report dated September 21, 1944, on charges against General Yen Hsi-shan, which is to be identified as Document 174 in this proceeding.—

A. If this is the story told—now I haven't looked at it yet—if this is the story told by Michael Lindsay, then I have seen it. General Yen Hsi-shan is a personal friend of mine. A bigger crook probably does not exist and I have made a very close study of his life and have written his biography, and I cannot find in here any reference to Mr. Michael Lindsay. But it seems to be the same story. No, sir, the other story was expressly—I don't know whether it was written by Mr. Service or someone else, the story of Yen Hsi-shan's perfidious trickery in Shansi. The particular charges were—I'm sure Mr. Service will remember the story—

Q. I don't think we need to tell the story here.—A. Well, if I can verify that, then I'll verify the document. I'm trying to give an example of how I do this here. No, sir; this is not the story. This is a different story.

Q. I'll show you a photostat of an ozalid copy of the same paper and ask you if you ever gave that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. This is a photostat of an ozalid?

Q. Yes, and I'll ask you if you loaned an ozalid copy of that paper to Mr. Jaffe? This ozalid was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. No, sir; strike it out. I don't know this one here. Furthermore, I remember the occurrence was in the spring of 1945, the crossing of the railroad by arrangement between the Japanese and Yen Hsi-shan.

Q. I show you now Service Report No. 31, dated September 23, 1944, on Post War Treatment of Japan, Document 185 in the proceeding, together with a photostat of a carbon copy of the same which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you see this paper and did you give a copy of it to Mr. Jaffe?—A. Yes. I did see this paper. I entered some cards on Susomo Okano and it is possible that I made a copy of those cards, 5 x 6 or whatever they are, for Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Did you give him a copy of this paper?—A. I don't think I gave him a copy of it. He asked me about Okano; if I knew anything about Okano. He is now known as Nosaka.

Q. Do you think you may possibly have given Mr. Jaffe a copy of this paper?—A. No, I doubt this very much. Well, yes, apparently I must have because—please correct that. I must have because I see my own personal handwriting on this here. That is definite then.

Q. You gave Mr. Jaffe a copy?—A. Yes, it must be. That is definite, it is my own handwriting. There can be no doubt about it. I don't remember the dispatch myself but I see my handwriting, that is enough. It says "entered in biographical notes," and so on. That is quite definite then.

Q. Now, then, I show you a paper which is identified as Document No. 133 in this proceeding, subject Chiang Kai-shek's book. I'm not sure of Mr. Service's connections with it. It is dated March 18, 1944.—A. It's a discussion on his book China's Destiny. I don't remember this. I remember plenty talk about the book itself, but I don't remember this here.

Q. Did you see this paper?—A. I remember seeing something on that before I came over to the State Department, viz., when I was in Naval Intelligence, March 18, 1944. I don't remember this paper here.

Q. I show you a photostat of two carbon copies of this paper which were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask you if you gave copies of this paper to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; I did not. I did not bother with Chiang Kai-shek's book. I never read it all the way through. I had it on my desk in Naval Intelligence.

Q. I now show you a paper which has no number in this proceeding on Chinese Trade in Strategic Materials, dated November 27, 1942, and ask you if you saw that paper or a carbon copy of it, of which I hand you a photostat, which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.

Mr. RHETTS. RF-294 is the identifying number.

A. No; this was way off my track.

Q. You didn't see that or give a copy to Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I doubt whether that ever came to me. I don't remember this despatch at all.

Q. I now pass you Service Report No. 40, dated October 10, 1944, on Greater Realism in Relations with Chiang Kai-shek, which is Document No. 193 in this proceeding, together with a photostat of a typed copy of the same which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you see this report and did you give a copy of it to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; I don't know of this document. I don't think a copy of this would have come to me in the Department. No; I don't recognize it by the viewpoints expressed.

Q. I show you a typed copy of the same, which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you give that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir.

Q. You did not pass that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I did not. I'm quite sure of that.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 15, dated 27th of August, 1944, on an interview with Mao Tse-tung, known as Document 177 in this proceeding. This may be the document you already looked at.—A. It is. May I look at it again?

Q. Yes.—A. Yes, I saw that.

Q. Did you give a copy of it to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I doubt that very much. However, I may have extracted some personality material. I see here I have some information that I'm very well acquainted with. No, I don't think I gave him a dispatch. It's a very long dispatch with many, many other matters in it.

Q. Have you seen the photostatic copy of the carbon copy of that paper that was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession?—A. I would say no, for the simple reason that I always made a tick at the side. Whenever I had entered any personality material I made a tick at the side of the name so I didn't have to bother with it again when I came across it. There is no tick here in this copy and this is the one I would have handled. The original, while it might come to me for a very short period in the Department, eventually a copy would come to me and if he photostated a copy I had given him, then it very definitely would have had those ticks.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. But if he typed from a copy you gave him it would not have the ticks?—A. If he typed, yes.

Q. If he typed from a copy you gave him?—A. That is right, if he typed from a copy I gave him: But then I cannot say I recognize this as a copy I gave him.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. But you may possibly have given him a copy of this particular document?—A. I may have given him a typed version of the particular information on personalities but that is very brief in there. It's only a paragraph this long (indicating), listing Peng Teh-huai, and so on. But would he bother to photograph another document—

Q. He didn't do any photographing. These photostats were made for us of the documents found.—A. I see. Well—no, I don't think I gave him the document.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 34, dated September 28, 1944, on Communist orientation to the U. S. S. R. and the United States, which is Document 188 in this proceeding and I ask you if you saw this paper?—A. "Any orientation which the Chinese Communists may once have had toward the Soviet Union seems to be a thing of the past"—I remember that sentence. Although I did not agree with that and yet it stirred up something in my mind. But in general I can't say that I recognize this document. It would be entirely wrong for me to sit here and say that I handed this document and gave it to Jaffe or showed it to him because I don't recollect that in the least.

Q. I show you a photostat of a typed copy of that paper which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you give him a typed copy?—A. I don't think so. I do not think I gave or showed him this.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 10, dated March 13, 1945, which is Document 214 in this proceeding, on Views of Mao Tse-tung and ask you if you saw that paper.—A. No, sir, I don't remember this, "Wallace and other American statesmen", no.

Q. I show you a photostat of the typed copy of this paper which was found in the possession of Mr. Jaffe and ask you if you gave him or allowed him to copy that paper?—A. No, sir. I do not remember showing or giving that copy of Jaffe. I don't remember even reading that despatch there.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 20, dated March 20, 1945, on the Yen Hsi-shan dealings with the Japanese which is Document No. 222 in this proceeding. Did you see that paper?—A. Yes, sir. This is Mrs. Michael Lindsay's report.

Q. I show you a photostat of a typed copy of the same paper and ask you Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask you if you gave him that copy or allowed him to make a copy of it?—A. I did not allow him to make a copy, but I did show him this report. I remember that.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you allow him to take it with him, sir?

A. No, I doubt whether I did.

Q. But you may have?—A. My interest was the evaluation of Michael Lindsay's and his wife's veracity, which I doubted at the time. I looked upon much of his stuff as propaganda.

Q. You may have allowed him to borrow that report?—A. I know I showed it to him. I asked him who Michael Lindsay was. He told me he knew him very well. I remember I discussed it with him.

Q. But you may have allowed him to take it?—A. I cannot remember whether I let him take the report, sir.

Q. Now I show you Service Report No. 26, dated April 1, 1945, on Communist congress policy, which is Document 226 in this proceeding. Did you see that paper?—A. I don't remember anything so far.

Q. I show you a photostat of a typed copy of the same paper and ask you if you gave the typed copy to Mr. Jaffe or allowed him to borrow the typed copy?—A. No, I don't remember these references at all in here.

Q. Will you look at the typed copy, of which you have a photostat, and tell me if you gave the typed copy to Mr. Jaffe or allowed him to borrow it?—A. No, no, sir. It's not my typing either. My typing had more X's in it than any of these.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 38, dated 9th of October, 1944, on Popular Support of the Eighth Route Army, which is document 191 in this proceeding, and ask if you saw that paper? —A. Never heard of Major Casberg. I don't recognize it at all.

Q. I show you photostats of two typed copies of the same paper which were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask if you gave those copies to Mr. Jaffe or allowed him to borrow such copies?—A. No, sir. I have not seen it. I never have seen it. I'm positive I have never seen it.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 22, dated March 22, 1945, on Recent Appointments by the Generalissimo, which is document No. 224 in this proceeding. Did you see that paper?—A. Yes, I saw that.

Q. I show you a photostat of a typed copy of the same paper which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask if you gave him that copy or allowed him to borrow it?—A. Yes, I remember when this came in I made some entries, particularly regarding General Ho Ying-chin and Admiral Chan Chak. Yes, I remember that.

Q. Did you loan a copy of that paper to Mr. Jaffe? I show you a photostat of a copy found in his possession.—A. That I do not remember. But I know I know I made some entries in my cards on Tang En-po, whom I know very well who was Garrison Commander in Chungking, Hu Tsung-nan, yes, I saw that dispatch and I handled it and I jotted some notes from it, but I do not remember giving it to Jaffe. I made entries on Tang En-po, Liu Shih, Ho Ying-chin, Hu Tsung-nan, and Chan Chek. But I don't remember giving it to Jaffe.

Q. But you may have?—A. But he undoubtedly has received typed slips for those persons.

Q. From you?—A. From me. He was appointed on such-and-such a date.

Q. May you possibly have given him a copy of the original?—A. No, I don't think so, because it was very clearly indexed there and the biographical material was not involved in the discussion and I want everyone to understand that I did not freely give him material just to give him material. When I gave him material it was because it was too darned complicated to sit and type 20 pages of the argument in favor of such-and-such a position or analyze it, and I let him see it and let him read it, and if he could get the implication by reading it, all right. I took it back to the Department of State and returned it to the file, which was usually the burn file of these copies. Nobody wanted copies when you brought them back. There was no place for them except the burn basket and I committed many many documents to the burn basket. There was no place for them except the burn basket. Everything I had in my home, for instance, all went back when I was through with it.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 39, dated the 9th of October, 1944, on Present Strength and Future Importance of the Chinese Communists, which is document No. 192 in this proceeding. Did you see that paper?—A. Yes, I remember seeing Mr. Friedman's note stating that Mr. Service's summary would include that not only should steps be taken to—yes, I remember seeing that.

Q. Now, then, I show you a photostat of a typed copy of this paper which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you show the paper to Mr. Jaffe or permit him to make a copy of it? Or did you give him a copy?—A. No, sir. This is not a report that I ever got a copy of, I'm sure. I have seen this report. It was circulated through the Department. I was always very eager to read the notes by Mr. Friedman or Mr. Chase or Mr. John Carter Vincent attached to the despatch when it was circulated for the simple reason that such reading would give me guidance to the policy of my superiors.

Q. What did you say about the copy, the photostat?—A. It means nothing to me. I have never seen this. I don't recognize it at all. I don't think I took this despatch home at all or showed it to Jaffe. It's a long and involved affair and I doubt whether you could find a little kernel of biographical material in here. Because Chu Teh and Mao Tse-tung said so-and-so, it did not always cover an important biographical report.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 16, dated August 29, 1944, which is a part of Document No. 177 in this proceeding. You have already seen one part of No. 177. It's on the subject of American aid to Communist armies. Did you see that paper?—A. Yes; I saw that. I saw this report, I remember it. No, sir; I would not handle this. I would not bother to take it home.

Q. I show you a photostat of the typed copy of the same paper found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask if you gave Mr. Jaffe a copy?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or did you permit him to see it?—A. No, sir.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 20, dated September 3, 1944, which is another part of Document 177 in this proceeding, on American policy regarding the rise within the Chinese Communist Party, and ask you if you saw this paper?—A. Yes; I'm sure I saw this here. I'm sure that I did not give this to Mr. Jaffe or show it to him.

Q. I show you in that connection a photostat of a typed copy of the same paper, found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.—A. I don't quite understand why this is less than the other, or is it not? I haven't seen that. No; I haven't shown it to Jaffe. I just wondered why one was four pages and the other less than three. It may be an extract.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 19, which was dated August 31, 1944, and is Document No. 180 in this proceeding on use of old Communist bases in southeast China, and ask if you have seen that document.—A. No, sir; I wouldn't have been interested in it, anyway. I was a busy man in those days.

Q. I will show you a photostat of a typed copy of the same which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you give a copy of this to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I didn't handle this at all.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 22, dated the 4th of September 1944, known as Document 182 in this proceeding, on the Growth of a New Fourth Army, and ask you if you saw this paper.—A. I doubt it very much. When I left Naval Intelligence I left behind me interest in armies, movement of troops, strategic areas, bases, and so on.

Q. I show you a photostat of a typed copy which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you give that to him?—A. No, sir; I did not give that to him.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 37, which was dated October 2, 1944, known as Document 190 in this proceeding, on Eliminating Banditry, and ask if you saw this paper?—A. No, sir; I never saw these names or reports. I wouldn't have been the slightest bit interested.

Q. I show you a photostat copy of the same and ask you if you saw this or gave it to Jaffe.—A. I do not believe I saw this, showed it to Mr. Jaffe, or loaned it to him.

Q. I show you Service Report No. 26, dated September 10, 1944, which is Document 183 in this proceeding, on the Communist Political Control in Bases. Did you see this paper?—A. Yes, I saw that. I believe it was one of the first times I saw Liu Shao-chi mentioned in that report because he is a theorist in the first place and in another dispatch on him it was from that dispatch that actually created the interest in him. I had gathered a little information from Agnes Smedley's book. She knew who Liu Shao-chi was, but I remember this was a surprise to me when I saw him mentioned because practically no one knew of him and I asked Jaffe about him. I asked what he was. That was one of the men that Jaffe fell down on and did not supply me information on. When I gave him the list I sent it back several times and asked him why he didn't know the background on Liu Shao-chi's education. If he is a Communist theorist he must have been educated in Moscow. I remember this dispatch. With a certain amount of personal risk I may have shown it to him but I don't remember showing it to him.

Q. You didn't show it to Jaffe?—A. I don't remember showing it to him. I doubt whether I would because a dispatch like this is quite a long dispatch with considerable discussion of these persons and their policies. And I would read it and for reasons of simplicity I would take out, after reading, just what I wanted and put it in my card files. I would type it on a slip and eventually write it into my cards and it would be confusing to take the dispatch and show it to anyone, even a day after, because then you would have to reread it and point out parts or let him photostat it deliberately and I would not do that. I never did that. I never had any understanding to let Jaffe have anything to photostat.

Q. I now show you Service report, a paper on a New Democracy Booklet by Mao. I have an ozalid copy of the same. This is Document Q316F188A55. It has no document number in this proceeding. It's an OWI paper. Did you ever see that?—A. I know the book but I don't remember reading about the book. I have a copy of the book. You can buy it. I think I got it from IPR or somewhere.

Q. Did you let Jaffe have this paper?—A. No, I did not.

Q. Or a copy of the same?—A. I'm sure if I offered it to him he would not bother with it. He knew the Communist literature pretty well.

Q. I now show you despatch 2790, dated July 20, 1944, which is Document 172 in this proceeding, on Chinese Liberal Hopes of Reform. Have you got that?—A. I'll have to admit I don't know Miss Yeng Kang. I don't know the name. I don't think I have her in my file. I don't know the story here. No, I don't know this.

Q. I have a photostat of an ozalid copy of the same which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession, which I'm showing you. You did not give that to Mr. Jaffe that copy, or that ozalid?—A. No, sir, I don't think so.

Q. I show you despatch No. 2604, on Domestic Troubles in Chiang Kai-shek's Household, which is known as Document 148 in this proceeding. Did you see that?—A. I know this story quite well. I read the despatch when it came in but I know I didn't give it to Jaffe. When I had dinner with Jaffe some time after this had come in he asked me "Is it true that Chiang Kai-shek kept a mistress and had considerable trouble with his wife?" and shortly thereafter a statement was made to the press by Madam Chiang and General Chiang, as far as I remember, and it came out in the press. It was somewhat hushed up but it did come out. But I didn't give him anything on it.

Q. I show you a photostat of a typed copy of this paper and a photostat of a photostat which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you transmit either a typed copy or a photostat to Jaffe?—A. No, sir, I did not. I don't think I ever made an entry in my own card about that scandal for the simple reason that I doubted it very much myself. It is possible, but I thought it was not exactly the type of material I wanted. I don't care if he had a mistress or not. It worries me very little. And it would be much more interesting to me to know what political affiliations he had.

Q. I show you despatch No. 2351 of March 23, 1944, on Chiang Kai-shek's Responsibility, and something else—I don't know just what the rest of the heading is—which is Document 137 in this proceeding and ask you if you saw that paper?—A. I don't think I ever saw that. I have heard of this report. Isn't this the one that Mr. Dondero mentioned? I don't think I have seen this despatch.

Q. I'll show you a photostat of a typed copy of this despatch which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and ask you if you gave him this copy or permitted him to copy it?—A. This could look like my handwriting. Yes, I remember the story of this. It is possible that I may have shown him this despatch.

Q. Did you say you see your handwriting on the copy?—A. Yes, it could look very much like my handwriting. I'm inclined to believe it is.

Q. In that event, you gave him the copy?—A. In that event I did.

Q. Because the photostat is a photostat of the copy which was found in his possession.—A. I'm trying to find the reference. Yes, it's my system of making an arrow to anything important. It is not personality material.

Q. Now, then, finally I show you—A. In other words, I would say that this dispatch I did see and there are indications here that I did show this or lend this to Jaffe.

Q. You did more than that, you gave him a copy because the copy turns up with your handwriting in Jaffe's possession?—A. If you loan a man $10 and he doesn't return it that doesn't mean that you gave him $10. He did return in time the things I loaned him but he apparently had some at the time of the arrest. And the FBI confronted me with that and asked me whether that was possible before I had seen any of the dispatches, before I knew his place had been raided. Remember, I was arrested on the night of June 6 and was held incommunicado until I was released from the District Jail on bail. But I corresponded with no one. I didn't talk to Mr. Service nor did I discuss the matter with Mr. Service. I did not know really what the case was. I did not know until I think the second or third morning that Jaffe had been arrested too.

Q. I pass you Document 134 on Chinese Territorial Claims to the North, which is dated March 18, 1944. I don't know that it has any number. I'll ask you if you saw that paper?—A. I remember the subject. It was my field while I was in Naval Intelligence, Burma and the boundary question.

Q. That is a photostat of a carbon copy of the paper which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. Did you give that carbon copy to Jaffe?—A. I don't think so. It was not my subject, later on but it was at the time in Naval Intelligence—Burma, and I know I made maps for Naval Intelligence on the British claims and the Chinese claims on the borderline.

Q. Do you think you may have given Mr. Jaffe a copy of that?—A. I don't see why I would. I doubt that very much.

Q. Now, just as a concluding question on this phase of the examination, let me say as we went over these some 40 documents we found 2, I believe, no. 3 in which you stated positively that you did give Mr. Jaffe copies and perhaps 3 more that you were somewhat doubtful about. At the time you were examined by the FBI, and your recollection was of course fresher than it is now on the subject, I believe you were able to identify some six or eight documents as documents which were ozalid copies of Mr. Service's Yenan reports, which you said you did give to Mr. Jaffe.—A. That is right.

Q. Now, those documents have all been among these that we have been over but you have not recognized them apparently.—A. Yes, they could be among the doubtful ones that I don't remember now.

Q. So it is apparent, is it not to you, that your recollection then being fresher than it is now, that you were able at that time to identify some documents that you are not able to identify then?—A. Yes.

Q. Your recollection is now that you did give to Mr. Jaffe some six or eight documents of ozalid copies of Mr. Service's Yenan reports?—A. That is right, yes, sir.

(The board adjourned at 1 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: May 31, 1950, 2:10 p. m. to 5:30 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building.

Reporter: E. C. Moyer.

Members of board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles; Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhett, Reilly, Rhett and Ruckelshaus.

(The board convened at 2:10 p. m. to hear continuation of testimony by Mr. Larsen.)

The CHAIRMAN. Would other members of the board like to ask questions? Mr. STEVENS. Not at this moment, sir.

Questions by Mr. Achilles:

Q. Mr. Larsen, this morning we went over perhaps 40 documents and reports of Mr. Service which had been found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. You had identified perhaps three of those of which you believed he had been given copies and perhaps three or four others of which you might have shown or given him copies. Have you any idea yourself how those other reports of Mr. Service might have gotten into Mr. Jaffe's possession?—A. No, I have no knowledge that I can put down as definite knowledge.

Q. Do you have any theories even if it is not definite knowledge?—A. Yes, of course I have a theory on that.

Q. Would you care to state what it is?—A. I was told by Jaffe on two occasions that he was in a great hurry because he was going to have a meeting or meet with other persons. It is pure conjecture of course to feel or to think, to theorize on that, whether he had contacts—he mentioned Roth on several occasions, on meeting Roth, and he said on two occasions, "I am not staying at the Statler, I am staying with John K. Fairbank", and I remember he said on one occasion, "I am staying with Franklin and Tootsie." I said, "Who were they?" This was Benjamin Franklin Ray and his wife. And he mentioned that he knew Michael Lee. He is the man who is now somewhat on the spot from the Commerce Department. I can't think of any others now but my theory is from the conversation that time that he did receive reports from FEA, which were first from BEW and—

The CHAIRMAN. What does that stand for?

A. Board of Economic Warfare and then later it was called FEA, which meant Foreign Economic Administration. And, as I say, it is conjecture on my part when I feel very convinced that Roth was the man. I now give you an idea of how I arrived at that conclusion. It wouldn't hold up in court, but Roth was Jaffe's most intimate friend. He was a kind of foster son to Jaffe. I did not know that until after the case had broken, and then I discovered that Jaffe had put Roth through school and that he had helped him get into Naval Intelligence. Well, I figured that whatever Roth was doing or Jaffe was doing Roth would be willing to help him with, inasmuch as they were still friends and inasmuch as they collaborated on that book of Mr. Roth—I forget the name of it now, something about Japan, I read parts of it, I didn't think much of it, Roth had never been in Japan or China—and I do know that from conversation at a luncheon party in the Statler Roth and Jaffe discussed the book endlessly and Jaffe did say to Roth: "No, no; it is no good; that last chapter is absolutely no good. I will have to take that with me and work on it." All right. My conclusions therefore are that those two worked together and apparently shared the strongly pro-Chinese Communist ideology, but beyond that I can't make any statement because it would be false.

Q. Do you know whether Lieutenant Roth had access to Mr. Service's reports in ONI?—A. Oh, yes; oh, yes, definitely. They circulated in the basket, as we called it, and they went to every office and every analyst in the Far Eastern Section, as it was called. Furthermore, if I may interrupt, I have seen reports in various places, in the newspapers, in Dondero's office, in FBI, and so on, of the nature of the reports, the stolen documents, or rather the documents found in Jaffe's place, and I have seen—I have noticed that the subject of a great number of the reports was Japanese shipping and Japanese ships and location of Japanese ships. I know that that was Roth's particular business in OWI. He was assistant at the desk for Japanese ships. It would be a strange coincidence if there was another person at that desk who had given them to Jaffe and that Roth was entirely innocent.

Q. Well, Mr. Service's reports did not, as far as I recall it, concern Japanese ships; did they?—A. I don't think so. The only item dealing with Japan that I remember in Mr. Service's reports was the question of Susumu Okano, and I forget the other men there, Japanese Communists who were staying there in Yanan and who outlined their postwar policy in three or four stages to either Chinese Communists or directly to some of the Foreign Service officers there. I don't remember exactly whether they told it to Mr. Service or Mr. Service reported it as received from the Chinese, but nevertheless that is the only connection with Japan. Now there was quite a bit of material concerning Japan, Japanese forces, interrogation of Japanese prisoners, and so on. They wouldn't have come to Service, wouldn't have come to other divisions than those that handled Japanese affairs or American military affairs. It depended on subject material, of course—questioning of Japanese prisoners.

Q. In your statement to the FBI on June 7, 1945, you stated, I believe, "Of the classified documents that I have shown to Mr. Jaffe I remember some written by Mr. John Service on the subject of Communist relations with the Chinese Central Government."—A. That is a very broad title.

Q. "I believe those documents were mostly classified as confidential, and I showed them to Mr. Jaffe because he appeared to know of them in advance. He knew them by name and number."—A. There were two dispatches. I cannot remember the details of that now. You see, 5 years have elapsed since that time and apparently a couple of them that were rather fresh in my memory at that time—I can't remember now. I would have no reason to conceal any point on that score, but Jaffe did tell me at one time, "I have seen that report."

Q. Well, I am merely interested—A. "I have seen a report on that subject," something like that.

Q. What I am interested in, is how he knew in advance of these reports by name and number. You say there were two instances in which he referred to them by name or number?—A. He mentioned—I don't know name or number and title of the dispatch, and, you see, that would be more correct—what was it I said? Name and number? I tell you, I was in a very bad condition that night, I was yanked away from my dining table and my whole world seemed to collapse over me when they stepped in and said, "You are under arrest." I said, "There must be a joke." They said, "No; it is no joke." From 7 until nearly 5 next morning—how would you feel if you were questioned? Do you not think that you would feel somewhat strained and nervous and excited? I was thinking of my wife at home, of the condition she was in. So my language was probably not legally, strictly to the point, and therefore I wouldn't heckle a lot about the exact words.

Q. No; I am not interested in the exact wording, but in your recollection; do you recall whether Jaffe indicated such knowledge on one occasion or more than one occasion?—A. Oh, it was just one or two occasions.

Q. One or two occasions?—A. He mentioned that he knew of a report, and I believe I asked him, "How do you know about that?" And he said, "Oh, well, you know these newspapermen, they collaborate"—that is where I got the idea—"Epstein and Edgar Snow and so on, they collaborate out there with any Foreign Service officer on these little bits of information that all together form a complete jigsaw puzzle."

Mr. STEVENS. Can you place a time for that, sir?

A. Well, it was probably—it was fresh in my memory that time—probably some time there in the spring of 1945.

I also was rather surprised to be told when I went to New York in August 1946—I had dismissed this Amerasia case as a damn bad dream, and I had gone down to Florida. My father was living in St. Petersburg and I was helping him build his new house. I was knee deep in concrete when two ex-FBI men came, told me they were now working for Plain Talk magazine, Don Levine. They wanted me to go up and write my story of the Amerasia case. I told them, "Nothing doing." Well, they told me this would clear me, would help me rebuild myself. The first day I turned them down flat and they were going back, but the next day they got my wife and myself downtown. We talked it over and they prevailed upon my wife to see the light and make me go up there, so I agreed. For $300 I would write them my story and they would pay my expenses, I would fly up. I flew up to New York. And then I sat in the New Yorker and typed my story. And when I handed it in on the 3d or 4th day, Don Levine nearly blew his top. He said, "Why, you haven't got any story here. That is no good. This will have to be rewritten." I said, "Well, I admit that it is somewhat hastily written, it is more rambling chronology of what I know, but that is what I want to put down."

Q. Pardon me, I would like to come to that—A. Yes?

Q. That "Plain Talk" thing.—A. I am coming to that point. And then, that is exactly the point I am coming to, he said, "Now, let me tell you, you may not know an awful lot about these fellows, but let me tell you one of these things here is this." And they said, "We have investigated Roth and Service very carefully, and as far as we know Service was sending copies of his reports direct to Jaffe." I said, "By golly, that I didn't know." And they hardly believed me and I had a hard time convincing them that I was in no collusion or any conspiracy with Mr. Service nor with Mr. Roth nor Mark Gayn. I didn't know Mark Gayn, I had never seen him in my life, and I had seen Kate Mitchell once—once or twice. I didn't know what she was, up there. I thought she might be an employee. I didn't know anything about Kate Mitchell. I never talked with her, never had anything to do with her. I said, "Hello." I sent Amerasia once or twice.

Q. What I am really trying to find out is how Mr. Jaffe was familiar with Mr. Service's reports.—A. Do you want my theory on that?

Q. Yes.—A. It is no more than theory. I think when the Foreign Service officers in the field got hold of a topic, naturally that was the thing that occurred in China, and everyone knew about it—everyone except the United States Government. That is, the United States Government had not yet been officially informed on the subject. Therefore it was cause for and call for a report on the subject. Now it is impossible to imagine—I will not—well, put it the other way, it is reasonable to imagine that there was collaboration between the Foreign Service men and the various correspondents on the subject. That is putting it very mildly. I will say it is impossible to imagine that there was not some collaboration, since Mr. Service could not be in Yen-an all of the time, and then Votaw or Epstein or these others came down and they compared notes on these things.

Q. But these newspaper stories would not give the names and numbers of official reports.—A. I don't want you to think that I am vicious when I say that it is possible that Emmerson and these men at times showed their entire dispatch and asked for the opinion of, and that maybe there were some, if not exchange of copies, free exchange of ideas and evaluation of these situations and these reports went in.

Q. Do you recall any instances where newspaper correspondents referred to reports by name and by number?—A. No, no; I do not.

Q. In your same statement to the FBI you said: "When I met Jaffe for lunch on May 28, I gave him a list on the notes of personalities and on that evening Jaffe came to Larsen's home and Larsen gave him some newspaper translations. He advised that when he visited Jaffe at the hotel that Jaffe expressly asked him for Jack Service's last reports, which he apparently knew. These were the Sixth Kuomintang Congress and the other on the Election of Officers to the Fourth People's Political Council."—A. I didn't even remember that but I guess that is right. I said it at that time. I suppose it is right. I had forgotten it.

Q. Did you have those reports with you at your house?—A. That I don't know, I don't know whether I had them or not. I may ask you, for my own information, did you find those reports among them, among Jaffe's material?

Q. I have not been able to identify those positively from this list. This has short titles.—A. I would say, I dare say there were 100 reports on the PPC—People's Political Council—during the year or two 1944-45. There must have been a great many, but I can't say which one it was. They were all about the same. The squabbles about the formation and number of members, the manner of selection of members because they were not elected, they were selected.

Q. Turning to your article in Plain Talk—A. May I interrupt and treat that not as my article. I objected strenuously to that article when it was published. I asked—my last words were, "Don't put it as the Espionage Case because I will be a damned fool to call it an espionage case when I don't for one moment feel that there is espionage involved. At the very worst it was the purloining of documents, but I don't think there is any espionage nor has the Government proved any. Furthermore the Government dropped the espionage charges, so why should I call it espionage? I have referred to it in mine as 'espionage'—espionage in quotation marks—and I want you to put it that way." They said, "Well, that would defeat the cause," and this, that, and the other.

Q. What I was interested in was one statement in that article which is similar to the statement which you have just made, in which it was stated that, in the course of the investigation, "it was found that John S. Service was in communication from China with Mr. Jaffe. The substance of some of Service's confidential messages to the State Department reached the offices of Amerasia in New York before they arrived in Washington."—A. I can answer that question by referring to you the copy of my original manuscript which I have given to Mr. Peurifoy, in which there is no such wording, as far as I believe, and that is Mr. Don Levine's wording. They rewrote that article so I hardly recognized it. I had no feud with the Government, with the administration, with General Marshal, and he made it into that.

Q. Do you know of any basis for that statement of Mr. Levine's?—A. No; I don't; except that it could have been as a result of questioning me, that had Jaffe ever said that he had any reports—but that would not imply that he had sent them from China because I knew nothing about that. I had no idea until long after the case broke and I met these men out there, I was told for the first time that he had been sending his reports from China, and they put that in.

Q. But you have no personal knowledge?—A. No, sir. No, sir; I have no knowledge of that. I have nothing even to substantiate a suspicion on it.

Mr. ACHILLES. I think that is all I have.

Mr. STEVENS. One question, sir. You have mentioned your files that you maintained at home.

A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you in the normal course of preparing those files declare either as notes for your master copy or otherwise the source from which the material was taken to go on your card?

A. No; I never put any source. Never. I can prove that because I have a great number of those notes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you, have you still your card file?

A. Yes; I still have my card file. What was that question—did I still have my card file?

The CHAIRMAN. I didn't hear your answer.

A. Yes; I still have my card file. It was seized by the FBI and then it was kept by them over a period, oh, for a period of almost a year, and it was sent to OSS for OSS to check whether there were any entries in that card file that were obviously from OSS documents, and it was likewise checked by the State Department, I was told, and by the Navy Department, and by Military Intelligence. They found five cards on which they had made some green markings—markings in green ink—and I got a little hot about that and I said, "Hell, that stuff is public knowledge." The entries, let us say now because I don't remember, the dates or names, let us say this is an entry as of April 14. I got a lot of that material from the press, and I happened to have my very voluminous clipping file where I had done clipping since 1936, and I went home and it took me a day of so, and I dug up the clipping file for those, of those five cards, and brought them back to the FBI and said, "Here you are. What was the date on that card here? April 14. Well, this is the Washington Post, April 13, and let's compare the texts." There was an abstract from that in the same wording, so the FBI got quite tired of the whole thing, said, "All right, we had intended you to delete the information before you take back these cards, but in consequence—" So I took back all my cards without any one single exception, not one kept by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Has anybody any more questions? [None.]

Counsel for Mr. Service would like to ask you some questions now. They have that privilege in this proceeding.

A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. What was the last time you saw Mr. Service, Mr. Larsen, before you came in here this morning?—A. I don't remember exactly, but I would say it was about, maybe, April 1949. I had a little office on Seventeenth Street, and the Far Eastern Information Service—I supplied information to newspapermen, magazine writers, background information, and I had a man working with me, a man there by the name of Otto J. Dekom. He later—I got rid of him and he went and worked for the Pat McCarran committee. Dekom and I that day went to lunch, and we turned around going westward on I Street. We were going to the New Baghdad Cafe to have some Near East food. And there I met Service on the side of I Street with, I think, one or two other persons, and they went into the Little Garden Shop, or Little Tea Shop for lunch, right there between Seventeenth and Eighteenth on I Street. We didn't say "hello" to each other; I just recognized him as he passed by.

Q. You did not speak to him?—A. No; we did not say "hello" to each other. I don't think he even remembered seeing me, but I am convinced it was him.

Q. You saw him on that occasion and he did not see you, and you did not speak to him?—A. He did not, I think, see me.

Q. When was the last time before that?—A. The last time before that was sometime in May. I can't fix a date, but it was—

Q. What year?—A. 1945. Jaffe was in town and I remember I took my wife and also, I think, my little daughter went along too. We had a Chinese dinner downtown and I was through with him—he said he had to see someone else by Sunday—I believe it was Sunday, it may have been Saturday, but it was, some way or other it seems to me it was a Sunday, he called me about 11 or maybe 11:30 and said "Do you have something on so-and-so?" I don't remember the name.

Q. Is this Service you are talking about?—A. No; I am talking about Jaffe calling me, and he said he was at the Statler Hotel. I said, "I thought you had gone home." He said, "No, I am leaving in a little while; it is urgent." I went to the home file and I saw it. I did not know whether I had it or not. I said, "What do you want me to do, read it to you?" "No, I would like to see the whole thing on four persons." And I said, "All right, I will hop a bus." I am not very far away from the Statler there. I had my pass and went out and got on a bus and went down. I didn't know what room he was in, so I went to the desk, asked them what room was Philip Jaffe in, I got a number, went around to the elevator entrance, and there I saw Jaffe standing—I don't remember whether anyone else was there or not—he was standing there and Mr. Service, it seems to me, was wearing his hat and topcoat. I said, "Hello." "Hello. You know Mr. Service?" "Yes, I know Mr. Service. Here are the cards." I had them, I think in a small envelope and I remember only saying to him, "Be sure you let me have them back because they are important cards." He said, "All right." Then I went home. That is the last time I saw Mr. Service and greeted him.

Mr. ACHILLES. When was that, did you say?—A. I don't know, the FBI has a record of those meetings. I didn't keep a record of them.

Q. You recall it being May 1945?—A. Yes; it was May, pretty close to the time of the arrest there.

Q. You actually saw him the night you were arrested, didn't you?—A. I beg your pardon.

Q. You actually saw him the night you were arrested, didn't you?—A. Saw whom?

Q. Service.—A. Yes; that is right.

Q. In the office of the—A. In Mr. Turnage's office.

Q. So that the last time you saw him was in Commissioner Turnage's office.—A. I beg your pardon; it was not intentional.

Q. And the next time was the occasion in May 1949?—A. Yes; that is correct.

Q. And you saw him but he did not see you and you did not speak?—A. Yes; on I Street. That would be absolutely correct, yes.

Q. Incidentally, did you see ever see me before you walked in here this morning?—A. What is your name please?

Q. Rhetts.—A. No, I don't think I did.

Q. Now, I wonder if you would tell the Board whether you have any reason to all to believe that Mr. Service is a Communist?—A. No, I have no reason to believe he is a Communist.

Q. Have you ever had any reason to believe that he was a Communist sympathizer or fellow traveler?—A. I can't answer that very clearly whether I had any justifiable reason to think that he was a Communist sympathizer, but I can answer that there was a time that I believed that he was extremely enthused over the performance of the Communists.

Q. By the Communists you mean Russian Communists?—A. No, the Chinese Communists. No, I never had any idea that he was enthused over the Russian Communists.

Q. Now, you referred to this article which appeared under your name in Plain Talk magazine. I show you Document 17, which is a copy of that article. I believe you intimated a moment ago that you had very little to do with the actual content of that article. I wonder if you would describe in detail for the Board first of all how you came about to write it. You mentioned that you were in Florida.—A. It was in Florida, and two gentlemen came down. I didn't know them. They introduced themselves as Mr. Kirkpatrick and Mr. Higgins.

Q. K-i-r-k-p-at-r-i-c-k?—Yes, in one word, and Mr. Higgins.

The CHAIRMAN. H-i-g-g-i-n-s?—A. Yes. I remember initials of Mr. Kirkpatrick, W. T. I am pretty sure of that. And I did not seem them first. They went to my residence in St. Petersburg, and my wife was sitting in the garden. They came in, said, "Are you Mrs. Larsen?" She said to them, "Yes." They said they had come from Plain Talk magazine to get hold of me and ask me to write an article, and my wife said to them, "I would have thought you were a couple of FBI men. You certainly look like it." So they kind of got red in their faces and said, "As a matter of fact, we were FBI men. We both worked on the Amerasia case and we resigned in November 1945 and we have been working with Plain Talk magazine, that is Don Levine and Mr. Alfred Kohlberg, who kind of financed the magazine, and we have come down because these two gentlemen in New York, Levine and Kohlberg, believe that you are the key man in this case and that you would have a valuable story and they wanted to publish that story in their first issue." This is the first issue. Well, as I told you, I didn't want to, and eventually I went up. They told me several things and they induced me to go up. They mentioned that my story would help clear me, clear me of being a Communist and a spy and sympathizer and an assistant collaborator with Jaffe, and so on. Secondly, well, they told me, they said that they thought I had a good radio voice and they might possibly put me into radio work and get me a number of contracts that would result in a little financial rehabilitation of myself. That, however, did not materialize, and I can state that according to my judgment there was no attempt on the part of those gentlemen to go further than just get my story, rewrite it as a power piece of anti-administration propoganda, and throw it on the street.

Q. When you say "these two gentlemen," are you referring to Kirkpatrick and Higgins?—A. No; they were just cogs in the wheel, they were research analysts in New York. I am referring to Don Levine and Mr. Kohlberg. Mr. Kohlberg never as much as asked me to become a member of the China-America policy association. He sent me from time to time not complete files of their material but out but occasionally he sent me some when he thought of me.

Q. Now, let's see if we can move back just for a moment. When these gentlemen, Messrs. Kirkpatrick and Higgins, came, did they make—they gave you these various reasons why you should come and do it?—A. Yes.

Q. Then did they make financial arrangements with you for it?—A. Oh, yes; right on the spot. They told me, "We will go now"—when I agreed that second afternoon—"We will go now and pay for your plane ticket. All you have to do is hop aboard the plane."

Q. Did they make some sort of a contract with you as to what you would be paid for the articles when you wrote them?—A. Yes; they made a contract I would be paid $300.

Q. $300?—A. Yes; they didn't make a written contract, they promised me three hundred.

Q. And they were to pay your transportation to New York?—A. Yes; and they booked a room for me and paid for the room, too; otherwise I paid my own expenses there. As a matter of fact, I had to borrow a few dollars from my father when I left.

Q. Will you describe in detail for us your dealings with Levine and Kohlberg after you got to New York?—A. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. The spelling of that Kohlberg?

A. K-o-h-l-b-e-r-g.

Shall I describe my meeting with him?

Q. Your dealings with him.—A. The first evening—I think it was the first evening I was there, I was eager to get to work and start writing. Mr. Kohlberg picked me up and took me out to his residence, out north of the Bronx, a very lovely residence. He is a very wealthy man, and his family members were all away. He was the only one in the house—the housekeeper, maid, was there, and we had a nice little dinner with a cocktail, and later we sat up until about 1:30 and talked, and he asked me—well, I would say very much the same way as you gentlemen here have asked me, what I knew about the Amerasia case. I knew at that time much less than I know now. Of course, I have added to that knowledge by reading papers, magazines, and hearing testimony and talking to Senators and Congressmen, but I was frankly quite shocked at that time. He said, "Do you mean to say you have been a dupe and have associated with a man like Jaffe if you don't sympathize with him?" I said, "I resent that." [Laughter.] "I don't see that you can't, with all your intelligence—you are undoubtedly a brilliant businessman—you ought to be able to get it into your head what I told you over a period of 1 hour, that I had in common with him that interest in Chinese personalities." He said, "Oh, don't get hot. I didn't mean it that way."

Well, I was extremely nervous and worried and I just didn't feel like playing games with any inquisitors, and I felt that I was facing inquisitors who were extremely purposeful. Many things I told them voluntarily that I thought might be of interest were not of interest to them because they did not bear on Republican views of the Democratic administration. I told him I didn't give a damn about the Republican view, sorry I am not politically-minded at all on American affairs. I came home in 1935 after 24 years in China, 5 years in Denmark, and only 11 years in the United States since my birth. I never voted. I am inclined to feel that if I meet a Republican and he is a nice fellow according to my code, he is all right for me. If I meet a Democrat who is a nice fellow, he is all right with me. But I have formed no battle plan one way or another, no political plan in my mind. Therefore, if you are seeking collaboration in Republican attack on the administration, I did not have the inclination of that. You might point out to me something. I agree with you it seems very strange, yes, but I don't know the background of it, I don't know the many ramifications of it. I don't see where it fits in here. And that attitude on my part is very clearly proved in my manuscript because my manuscript was strictly my story. In fact, I entitled it, "They Called Me a Spy."

Q. Do you have a copy of that manuscript?—A. I don't have it with me here but I think Mr. Penrifoy has a copy. I believe he has.

Q. Do you have any copies? Unfortunately, the copy Mr. Peurifoy has isn't available to me.—A. It isn't? No, but if you want a copy, I have one extra photostat at the Statler, photostat of it, and if you want it I would be glad to send it. If you write me your address I will see that it is delivered to you.

Q. Actually I would like to—it would be very useful if you had it a while—in the course of this proceeding. I would like to ask you some questions but since you haven't it with you—A. I don't have it with me; no.

Q. When did you write this manuscript that you did write? You told us—A. About the 8th of August.

Q. This first evening you went out and spent the evening with Mr. Kohlberg and had this chat which you describe.—A. Yes.

Q. And then what?—A. They left me alone for about 3 days.

Q. Back in your hotel?—A. Yes. I sat there and worked in the room.

Q. And that is when you wrote this manuscript?—A. Yes.

Q. And this was early August of 1946?—A. Early August. August 8 that I came up there, so it must have been 9, 10, and 11, like that.

Q. Yes. And then you turned this manuscript over to whom? Mr. Kohlberg or Mr. Levine?—A. To Mr. Levine. Mr. Kohlberg was rarely in the office, editorial office. He came in usually around 4 or 5 in the afternoon.

Q. Now, would you before going further, can you tell us anything about the nature of your dealings with Mr. Kohlberg before you got your manuscript written? If you had any dealings with him?—A. No.

Q. Excuse me, Mr. Levine.—A. With Levine, I see. Well, of course, it was more repetition of what Kirkpatrick and Higgins had said. "I will see that you are given considerable publicity and this will clear you and you have come out with a straightforward story. You have not denied the actual extent of your implication." Very nice talk like that. "Go to it, my boy, go back and finish it up," and so on. And then when—Q. He was going to help you further on this, what you referred to as your financial rehabilitation?—A. That is right, that is right.

Q. And you wrote your manuscript and you say you called it what?—A. "They Called Me a Spy."

Q. "They Called Me a Spy."—A. And I started roughly like this: Many American readers must wonder what became of the Amerasia or the State Department "espionage" case—espionage in quotes.

Q. And after you wrote this manuscript you turned it over to Mr. Levine?—A. Yes.

Q. And what happened then?—A. Then he told me, "Now, go and sleep." I had not slept much. Incidentally, the American Legion had a convention and they were in the hotel, and it was a very hectic week there. They banged on my door many times every night. And I may add, wild women suddenly burst into my room, threw themselves on the bed, and I had to take one and throw her out, and finally I kept my door locked all the time. So when I was through with that I was really very tired. Incidentally, I came up with a case of diarrhea, and I fought that while I was up there. I went to a drug store and got some medicine, some drops to take.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt? When you gave him a copy, did you keep a copy yourself?—A. Yes. I kept a copy, and that is the one that has been photostated.

Then when I went there and I handed it to him, he threw up his arms, he said, "Good God, man, this is a hell of a mess!" So I said, "You don't like my writing, eh?" He said, "It is not that. I mean to say this whole this is nothing but a rambling chronology." I said, "What did you tell me when I came? 'Put down the facts of the Amerasia case, your background and so on.' I did exactly as you told me. If I haven't elaborated on the points that you would prefer, then say so and let's add that to it." He said, "What about this, and that" and he mentioned a number of things. I said "I don't know about these points."

Q. Can you recall any of the things he referred to?—A. Well, it was Marshall's policy, and I really didn't have the facts at my fingertips. The exact dates, etc. I would have to carry with me an enormous file of newspaper clippings, and I didn't do that. I carried with me a few of my notes and I couldn't supply all that. I said, "If you know of these things, dig up the dates locally and find them. That is a mere routine job." "Well, you should have commented on them." I said, "All right, what kind of comment do you want?" We talked back and forth. He said, "I will tell you what you do. You go home and sleep. You look bad. You go home and sleep and then I will rewrite this and you come in tomorrow." And I remember I came in the next day and he was still working on it. He told me, "Could you go and loaf another day?" I said, "Oh, sure; with pleasure." And then I went out and got some tickets to various theaters. By that time I had slept enough, and then I went back again. He said, "Now, have a look at this."

Incidentally, he told me that day, "We prepaid your room and that is up today." I said, "Yes; and I want to tell you something, Mr. Levine. My father, when he left Washington, he left most of his furniture stored in Manassas, down on a farm there, and I have arranged a friend of mine who drives a fruit truck from down there somewhere, Clearwater, he is going back and he is going to drive my father's furniture down. We can load it in the truck when it goes back empty, and I have to be back tomorrow morning at 5. I have to leave for Florida." So he said, "All right, then let me give you some money," but I said, "Now, how about this title here?" We had a battle over that and I remember—

Q. You mean by this time he had rewritten it?—A. He had rewritten it, and rewritten it as the State Department Espionage Case. And Mr. Kohlberg came in, stood in the other window and he was less insistent than Levine was, and he kept on telling me—Levine kept on telling me that it would defeat the whole purpose of the article if we did not call it the Espionage Case and I said, "Well, you could grant me that one concession because it is hurtful to me to call it that, but you could grant me the concession of putting espionage in quotation marks." He said, "All right, we will see if we can work it out that way."

And remember, that was August, oh, say, 18th or 17th, something like that, and, as a matter of fact, I had my suitcase along with me that afternoon. I went straight from his office, walked over because I couldn't get a taxi in a hurry, and walked over to the Pennsylvania Station from Madison Avenue, and got on the train and came down to Washington. And then there was an elapse of time between August and October when this appeared. It appeared about October 6, I think it was. I thought it would be out September but it was not, and in October it came out, and when I got the first copy and I looked at it, I was disgusted. My wife was disgusted.

Q. You mean because of the title?—A. Because of the title, and when I read the whole thing there I found that they had not changed many things I had objected to, they had not left them out.

Q. Had you gone over the rewrite of the article as well as—A. Yes, I had.

Q. As well as the matter of the title?—A. Over the rewrite; yes.

Q. And was it—how much did it differ from what you had written?—A. It differed—in form it differed completely but in items I will say there were five or six items that I did not know about previously, but they had taken the trouble during that afternoon to show me, bring me the files and show me, "We have this" and "We have that," incidentally—

Q. Was that stuff then that you considered you knew about after they had shown you these files?—A. Yes.

Q. You were willing to make the statement on your own responsibility?—A. I was willing to let it go into the article, trusting that they were well-informed on it and that they were not simply fooling me on the subject.

Q. In other words, whatever they showed you was sufficient so that you were willing to publish the material as facts under your own name?—A. That is right, you might say that.

Q. Now I wonder if you would just take a look at the article. I would like to go over it with you to see what—

(Mr. Larsen and Mr. Rhett's looked at Document 17-X, Exhibit 20.)

A. The General Stilwell affair, I had nothing to do with. I had not discussed it with General Stilwell.

Q. Let's try to get at it from the beginning.—A. Nor had I mentioned the resignation of Joseph Grew.

Q. You state here in the second full paragraph of the article that—A. I did not say—

Q. Just a moment.—A. I did not say, "I have devoted many months."

Q. Just a moment. I will turn these in for the record later, but at this point I would like to introduce into the transcript document 17-1.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the whole thing?

Q. No, 17-1.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-1

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 27)

"I have devoted many months to a plodding investigation of the case in which I had become entangled, primarily to rehabilitate my reputation and to establish my complete innocence. I have collaborated with Congressman George Dondero of Michigan, who sponsored the creation of the House committee which is about to undertake an inquiry into all the circumstances of the disposition of the State Department espionage case, and have offered my fullest cooperation to the chairman of that committee, Congressman Samuel Hobbs."

Q. Now in this paragraph beginning with, "I have devoted many months to a plodding investigation"—A. Yes.

Q. Had you in fact devoted many months to a plodding investigation of it?—A. Yes, I had not devoted many months by going to an office every day, in that manner, but during the months prior to my going to Florida I had had occasion to talk to a number of people who knew about the case and I had discussed it very widely with them. Such people—

Q. You state there that you collaborated with Congressman Dondero.—A. That is right.

Q. Would you tell us something about the nature of that collaboration with Congressman Dondero?—A. I did not know Mr. Dondero but I heard one day that—I better give you the right sequence. In March 1946 I was here in Washington and I heard that they wanted men for Korea. I had worked on Korea both in the Navy Department and in the State Department, and someone gave me an introduction to go to the War Department and I went over and they examined me.

Q. Do you happen to know who that was that gave you that introduction?—A. I don't know. I guess it was Maj. Gordon Link. And then I went in to see the military government division that had control of appointments for Korea and they examined me and I asked them, "What about this Amerasia case I was involved in?" They said, "We don't care. We have investigated you very thoroughly and we don't worry about that." Then I had my shots and I was ready to go, I think it was in April I was to go, and then an article appeared in the Journal American, New York Journal American. This article was written by Ray Richards, who has an office downtown in the Times-Herald Building, and he had written roughly as follows: "Now why would the United States Government send a Communist spy to Korea? Mr. Dondero is going to make an investigation of this matter." So I immediately took a copy of this article and I telephoned various friends, said, "Where is Richards? Is he in New York?" And they said, "No, he is in the Herald Building, 60S." So I rushed up there to him and presented myself, and he just let me stand up, and he said, "So! How much did Joe Stalin pay you to spy on the United States Government?" I said, "You are crazy!" He said, "You dare to tell me that?" I said, "Yes, I dare tell you that. I came home here with the idea that American newsmen were of a very superior quality, namely that before they write anything they investigate. You apparently have not investigated." Well, so and so. I said, "Do you want to talk further to me?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Please offer me a chair."

Now I forgot to tell you that I had been up to Dondero that morning before going to Ray Richards, and I had a very similar session with him. He refused to talk to me and he turned his back on me and he walked up and down the floor, and I am that type of person, probably because of my stubborn Danish background, that I don't easily—I get angry slowly but when I get mad it is not very easy to push me off or around or what. So I told Mr. Dondero, "All right, so you think I am a spy and you are going to investigate me and you are going to cause a hubbub about me and damage my reputation when I am looking for a job. You have ruined it already. You are going to listen to me." He said he didn't want to, so I followed him up and down the floor, and I put my arm on his shoulder. He resented that. I said, "Let's get together, Mr. Dondero, because I am a kind of—well, I have a little bit of the Chinese psychology. I can't help it, I grew up out there, and beware of me if I get hysterical. I could put you on the spot. I could refuse to leave this place, and you would have to call the marshal to throw me out, and that would be a nice scandal, and I would tell everything to the paper." I said, "You are a representative of the people in a democratic government. You like to make statements but you don't like to listen. You don't like to question a man. I am yours for questioning. Do you want to start or do you want me to lie down on the floor and cause a scandal?" He said, "All right." He said, "By golly, I begin to believe you." "Mr. Dondero, some of your friends—Mr. H. Carl Andersen, he lived in Minnesota, he lives on Harvard Street, he is my very close friend, and he has told me of you as 'George.' I asked him, 'Who is this George?' 'George Dondero, of Michigan.'" I said, "Do you want to call Carl and ask him about me?" So he said "Yes." By golly he called. And he said, "Yes, I know Larsen and think very highly of him." I said, "Would you like to call another man who is a good friend of mine, I knew him when I was in China—Walter Judd?" "Oh," he said, "a very close friend of mine." I said, "Call him, let us not play around any more." And he got very nice to me and before I left he shook my hand and he promised me that he would do something to make good for what he had—what harm he had done to me, and he asked me would I be honest and tell him my story and would I go before his—it wasn't the Hobbs committee—but he said when a committee is appointed, tell what I knew, and I said "Yes." "Of course you know everything is secret and confidential"—it didn't turn out quite that way, but I went before the House committee and since then Dondero has to all purposes been extremely friendly toward me. He has called me on occasion, asked me what he could do, asked me if I was looking for a job. I said, "Yes, don't tell me you have a job." He said, "No, but if you are looking for a job I will permit you to give my name as a reference." "Thank you, Mr. Dondero." Those are my relations with Dondero.

My relations with Ray Richards turned out very similarly. Before I left there he said, "Well, I realize in other words that you are not the Communist you were made out to be." I said, "You are darn right I am not, I never was a Communist." "Well, did you consider these people in the State Department as pro-Communist?" I said, "No, I considered that many of them were anti-Chiang." And he said, "Well, they reported that the Communists were up and coming, that they were the right thing for China. Do you believe that?" I said, "No, I don't." And I have repeated this statement over and over when they have tried to trip me. They have said, "Well, don't you think they have sabotaged the State Department policy out in the Far East? Don't you think they are pro-Communist?" I have said, "Well, let's put it this way. If I have at any time felt that they were too anti-Chiang Kai-shek and anti-Kuomintang, then it has been my personal opinion, but you must remember this: No statement to this effect on my part would stand up in court or stand up before any investigating committee. No statement of this kind would clinch the argument of whether there was a pro-Communist group in the State Department, for the simple reason that I sat in the State Department and I was not out there." If anyone asked me, "Mr. Larsen, could you state for certain whether your judgment was absolutely reliable in this matter inasmuch as you were in the State Department, not out in the field, and that this type of reporting was pro-Communist, or could you state that it was perhaps not pro-Communist and just realistic reporting?" I said I could not state that because I was not out there. It might have been real strict reporting.

Q. You are referring to the type of reporting that Mr. Service made?—A. Yes, that is what they always were after. I did not like to discuss this—

Q. You are referring to the type of reporting?—A. That Mr. Service and Mr. Davies and Mr. Emmerson and Mr. Ludden and so on made, the field officers at the time.

Q. So that you have always said that you had no basis for asserting that it was pro-Communist?—A. That is right, I can repeat that at any time.

Q. It might have been purely objective?—A. Yes.

Q. You told that to Dondero? And Richards?—A. Yes, and he did not like it and Richards did not like it and McCarthy did not like it, Mr. Wherry did not like it, and Mr. Ferguson just a few days ago did not like it either. They all gave me the impression, all these people, having question me once they don't seem to want to have much to do with me after that.

Q. Let us come back to the article here. We were trying to go through it. At this point I would like to introduce into the transcript Document 17-4.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-4

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 27)

"* * * In the course of my own explorations, I have uncovered sufficient material to convince me that further probing into the matter might assume proportions even more far reaching than those of the Pearl Harbor investigation."

Q. Now I draw your attention, Mr. Larsen, to the portion which begins, "In the course of my own explorations," and you state that you have uncovered enough material to convince you that further probing might assume proportions ever more far reaching than those of Pearl Harbor.—A. That is a lot of bunk, in my opinion. I know, yes, I have let that go in there. In the brief opportunity I had to look over that article that afternoon, the manuscript as it was rewritten by Don Levine, I was lax in putting my foot down. I pencil-marked many things.

Q. You did not write that?—A. I did not.

Q. That sentence?—A. I did not write that sentence.

Q. Now I would like to introduce document 17-5.

Mr. ACHILLES. That has been introduced.

Q. I want it in again.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-5

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 27)

"* * * It is the mysterious whitewash of the chief actors of the espionage case which the Congress has directed the Hobbs committee to investigate. But from behind that whitewash there emerges the pattern of a major operation performed upon Uncle Sam without his being conscious of it."

Q. I refer you to this part: "It is the mysterious whitewash of the—A. I never used "whitewash."

Q. Of the chief actors," etc.—A. I never used "whitewash." I never used it. I was not the author of that term, although I seemed to think at that time that someone was guilty because I had personally seen two very large heaps of documents that I had not given Mr. Jaffe, and I certainly thought that there must be someone who gave that to them. They did not walk there by themselves, and I felt that someone had been let off. This is a rewording of those bitter thoughts of mine, that I had been made a scapegoat and had been taken in and one of those fined $500 and had gone down in history as the spy, the principal culprit in this case.

Q. I take it your testimony now is that you had no factual basis for believing that there was a mysterious whitewash of Mr. Service in any case?—A. No.

Q. Did you have any reason to believe that the failure of the grand jury to indict him was whitewash?—A. Yes; I did.

Q. Now will you tell us what your basis for that was?—A. That was a statement made to me when I was up in New York that time.

Q. You mean with Levine and Kohlberg?—A. Yes; in August 1946 in conversation with Mr. Levine and Mr. Kohlberg. I can't remember exactly which one of us said it, but we talked so much, we were together for lunch, and whenever we met we used the few moments available to us to discuss the case, and it was said to me at that time that the grand jury, before which I did not go for some reason or other—I never did know why my attorney did not take me before the grand jury. Before the grand jury Mr. Service appeared and was asked, "Did you or did you not give some documents to Mr. Jaffe?" According to what I was told, Mr. Service said, "Yes." And they asked him, "Will you then explain why you should not be prosecuted under such and such laws for giving classified material to unauthorized persons?" And Mr. Service is supposed to have taken out of his pocket a piece of paper on which the documents that he admitted giving to Jaffe—I don't know at all whether this is true or not, but I was told about it—they were listed and there was a date that somewhat preceded the date of the arrests, and the document was signed, I believe they told me, by one George Taylor in OWL. This document was a declassification certificate, namely making these documents or declassifying these documents as of the date on that letter, for which reason the transfer of the documents would not be a crime, and that there Mr. Service's case folded up.

And then I was told—possibly now that is conjecture on my part but I thought a lot over what they told me and I think they might have told me the following to incite me to some vicious feeling against Mr. Service, and I don't deny that I did have a darn bad feeling against Service after that story was told to me, namely that the grand jury asked Mr. Service, "All right, then, do you have any idea of who could possibly have done this?" And he said, "I can only imagine that the man responsible for transfer of all these documents is Emmanuel Larsen."

"Well," I thought, "that is a fine thing." I had no association with Service. I don't see how he could say a thing like that. He cleared himself, got a nice letter of congratulation, and here I am, hunted. There was considerable emotion involved in that case, so I don't have to beg your question but I will beg you gentlemen to pardon me if I have been dreaming about this and thinking about it unnecessarily. And finally, I have tried to pin these men down, and they have tried to deny even that they said it, and I say, "You know damn well, Don, you told me that one time." And he said, "Well, I remember hearing about it, but did I tell you that?" And I have thought to myself, maybe it wasn't so. And therefore when Service was ordered home from India, my wife and I talked it over, and I said to her, "I think it is tough on Service. I can appreciate it because of what we have gone through. It makes it very easy for us to appreciate what Service now is going to go through. He is going to be yanked home and I am not going to use any of that rubbish that was hearsay and rumor and so on, because the grand jury is secret and the proceedings cannot come out of the grand jury." I remember even that I went to James McInerney one time and asked him, "Is that true?" and he refused to answer me. He said, "You know that is secret. I couldn't tell you that." Anyway I doubt it very much.

Q. Did Levine tell you where he got this detailed account of Service's testimony before the grand jury?—A. No; he didn't. Unless—I can imagine he got it from Kirkpatrick, because they worked on the case in the FBI. I don't know if they would know about the grand jury testimony. I am not acquainted with the law in that way.

Q. As you understand it, Levine told you first of all that Service was able to show before the grand jury that someone by the name of George Taylor had declassified the documents he showed to Jaffe?—A. That is right.

Q. And secondly that Service testified before the grand jury that you were the person?—A. And implicated me by a—in a vague manner.

Q. And in this way you developed a considerable animosity toward Service?—A. I certainly did. I must say that right now it has worn off, and every day I am less inclined to believe—I had nothing to do with him, I have never been together with him, talked to him until today, and I have—

Q. Do you today have any reason to believe that Mr. Levine's account to you is anything but a lie?—A. I can't say that I am sure of it, but if I am testifying and his magazine turned out to be sensation seeking and not of my liking, and he on subsequent occasions was extremely insistent upon my altering my text. For instance, when I wrote the story in January 1948 of the Democratic League, which was a truly liberal group in China, that was infiltrated by Communists—I was one of the few who knew it at an early date, not through State Department information but through secret Chinese sources that gave me some documents from China in Chinese that proved that the Communists had the plan. In fact, it was the Communist plan to infiltrate it and use the front organization. So after I had left the State Department, years after, I dug into my file, I was showing Dekom that, and I said, "Let's write an article on that," and we wrote the article.

Now I found that Mr. Don Levine is not quite the trustworthy man in many of his human relations I first thought him to be. I hate to say this, but the fact is that I didn't—he didn't pay me the $300, and he paid me $200 and told me the expense account at my hotel, which we had not made quite clear, had run over $100, including rent of the typewriter, and that therefore I would have to bear that, so I got only $200 out of that article, and I paid my own way back to Washington and I billed him for it afterwards.

Q. Did you ever get that?—A. I got that; yes.

Q. Now let us turn back at the moment to this article, if we may.—A. Incidentally, he ordered me to write a number of other articles—this is just in substantiation of my statement that Mr. Levine is difficult to deal with. The agreement was if I ever wrote an article I was to get $50. Well, in Christmas 1948 he still owed me $95, and he came to Washington, and I went over to the Shoreham Hotel to see him, and we were to make up our minds where we were to go for eggnog, and so on. And then I said to him, "Don, do you have a check for me?" He said, "Oh Jimmy, I forgot that damn check. It will be in the mail when I go back. I will put it in the mail and you will get it just in time for the end of the Christmas days." That check I have not received yet. I compromised on the $95 again about the—well, when did my article on the Far Eastern Commission appear? September 26 I mailed it to him.

Q. What year was that?—A. Last year—1949—and I said to him—he called me from New York and said, "You have until September 26 to get in your article on the Far Eastern Commission." I said, "All right, what is the arrangement, Don?" He said, "Well, you know what I have been paying you"—I understood the normal sum—"this time it will be more. We are in better shape now." He always told me it was because they were about bankrupt. "We are in better shape now, I will make it double." So I thought that mean $100, so I agreed, so I said, "Thank you, Don, that is O. K., I will write it for that." Then I said "Don, there is another little matter. I am going to write you a letter about it, but just let me mention it on the phone. You owe me 95 bucks. If you are not too broke, send me some of that. I am broke." So he said, "Well, all right, you write me a letter, see if you can compromise on that a little bit, and I might fix it." So I thought, "All right, I will get $100, I won't strain those fellows, because if I make it $50 I will wait a year and won't get it," so, believe it or not gentlemen, I said, "Don send me $25 and we will call the whole account quits." So he did send me $25, and when he got my manuscript he sent me $50 for the article on the Far Eastern Commission and he has not paid me any more, and if he would give me a thousand dollars today I wouldn't write a darn word for him.

Q. I would like to introduce into the transcript—A. That perhaps is irrelevant but I want you to know my relations with him were not too pleasant.

Q. I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point document 17-6, 17-7, and 17-8.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-6

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 28)

"* * * How did it come to pass that Washington since 1944 has been seeking to foist Communist members upon the sole recognized and legitimate government of China, a maneuver equivalent to an attempt by a powerful China to introduce Earl Browder and William Z. Foster into key positions in the United States Government?"

DOCUMENT No. 17-7

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 28)

"* * * Whose was the hand which forced the sensational resignation of Under Secretary of State Joseph C. Grew and his replacement by Dean Acheson? And was the same hand responsible for driving Ambassador Patrick Hurley into a blind alley and retirement?"

DOCUMENT No. 17-8

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 28)

"* * * The answers to all of these questions came to me as I unraveled the main threads of the tangled State Department Espionage Case. But many more questions still remain to be solved."

Q. I would like to have you look at this document, Mr. Larsen. Now you state here that the answers to all of these questions came to you as you unraveled the main threads—A. Let's take this from the beginning, Mr. Rhetts. "How did it come to pass," and so on, they want to introduce Earl Browder, William Z. Foster—take my word for it, I never mentioned those fellows, I am not the author of that.

"How did it transpire"—I never wrote anything about how it transpired—"that Marshall"—I did not mention Marshall. That is what I objected to.

Q. So you are not the author of the second paragraph?—A. That is right.

Q. And the next one is, "Whose was the hand which forced the sensational resignation of Under Secretary Grew?"—A. I did not worry the least bit about Mr. Grew's resignation. I never asked the questions.

Q. Did you write that paragraph?—A. I did not write that paragraph.

Q. Did Levine write it?—A. Undoubtedly, unless he had Mr. Toledano help him.

Q. Mr. who?—A. Ralph Toledano, the author of that recent sensational book—what is it?

Mr. ACHILLES. Seeds of Treason.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was Toledano—A. Yes; he was the rewrite man.

Q. I see.—A. To put it very crudely, Mr. Don Levine was a volcano of the oil well and Toledano was the engineer who harnessed the wealth. That is the way they worked together.

Q. So that, so far as the last paragraph here, the answer is, "The answer to all of these questions came to me," and so forth—I take it then that none of the answer to any of these questions came to you since you did not—A. I did not; they did not.

Q. Since the questions never occurred to you?—A. That is correct.

Q. Then you did not write that paragraph either?—A. No; I did not write that paragraph either. On this—or rather I would say that my discussion with Don Levine and Mr. Kohlberg tended to show that whereas I had tried to get to the bottom of this case—naturally I was interested in finding out who did perpetrate the principal transmitting of these documents, and although I had worked on that I had not arrived at any very clear conclusions. That I did not like. That was a bad story—a weak story, as he called it.

Q. Now I would like to introduce into the transcript Document 17-10.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-10

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmannel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 29)

"* * * The search in the offices of Amerasia yielded a trove of more than 100 files containing, according to Congressman Dondero, top secret and highly confidential papers stolen from the State Department, War Department, Navy Department, Office of Strategic Services, Office of Postal and Telegraph Censorship, and the OWI at a time when we were at war with both Germany and Japan."

Q. And I direct your attention, Mr. Larsen, to this material beginning here, "The search in the offices of Amerasia yielded a trove of more than 100 files—A. I will ask you, how would I know what transpired in the search of Amerasia?"

Q. That is the question I was going to ask you. [Laughter.] Did you know?—A. No; I did not know. Mr. Dondero, who is mentioned here, had apparently been in very close collaboration with Don Levine. In every detail of the discussions with Mr. Don Levine, Dondero's name was mentioned. "Dondero has a list of this," "Dondero," Dondero was his informant.

Q. He stated to you that Dondero was his source for some of the information?—A. Yes; he stated that, yes.

Q. Some of the information?—A. Yes. And therefore I permitted that to go in. He said, "Dondero said" because I had been up to Dondero's office and Dondero had said those things to me, too, but I didn't remember details of it, but Levine had very detailed lists and stacks of what, shall I say, recounts all the results found by Dondero.

Q. Now beginning at this point here and going all the way down that column—

The CHAIRMAN. That isn't very clear on the record.

Q. I know, I am going to offer the whole thing as an exhibit. Beginning with the material, the words, "The search in the offices of Amerasia"—this is on page 29 of the article—and the remainder of the first column, all of the second column—A. You see, these documents—

Q. First, second, third, fourth, and fifth.—A. Those are the lists that I saw up there, and that Dondero of course had called out to me too, and I said, "Yes, I haven't seen them, I don't know those, but go ahead, investigate—"

Q. You did not write those two columns?—A. No; I did not write those. I didn't know of those.

Q. Mr. Levine or Toledano wrote those?—A. One of those two.

Q. I ask that there be included in the transcript at this point Document 17-11—A. Incidentally, if you are interested in a remark on this paragraph here, "Fifth. Another stolen document, particularly illuminating, and of present great importance to our policy in China, was a lengthy detailed report showing complete disposition of the units in the Army of Chiang Kai-shek, where located, how placed, under whose command, naming the units, division by division, and showing their military strength. It is easy to visualize the consequences of this information in the hands of the Communist forces in China, then and now," those documents were disseminated by the Military Intelligence in many printed copies—not printed but mimeographed copies—and they were interesting inasmuch as they showed the names of the commanders and the names of the subordinate commanders, division commanders, and vice division commanders, and so on.

But I told Mr. Don Levine that time, "Aha, so you got this information. I don't see why you bother to mention that. I will tell you one thing. Those documents, I saw them many times. They were spread all over the place. Damn little security regarding them, that was a fact. They were not the actual distribution. I discovered that many times because I had checked them very carefully with my boss, Major Bales, in the Naval Intelligence, and if one of those reached Jaffe, all right, whom was he spying for? If he was spying for, let us say, the Japanese, believe me, they knew very well where the Chinese units were much better than we knew here. Remember, they had Chou Fu-lai's puppets and so on, they had spies all the way through. They took over Tai Li's assistant No. 2, Tai Li's office, Ting Mo-tsun, and he became a spy for the puppets and they had the complete lay-out. Through him they got the complete Chinese intelligence set-up which had been rebuilt as of March 1938.

Q. You say you checked this with your boss at Naval Intelligence?—A. Yes; I checked these things back in 1936, 1938, 1940, 1943, and we always found them very inaccurate. There was another element of inaccuracy in those military statements, disposition statements, namely the time element. By the time they reached us, there had been large movements and they were not the same.

And may I finish this sentence. I told Don, If you think this is an important document, I could tell you a few things. If Jaffe were spying for the Japanese, it would have been unnecessary. They would have laughed at him if they had sent them that. If he were spying for the Russians, as apparently all the implications are, remember those were handed out to the military attachés, and Panyushkin in Chungking got copies of them to. They weren't worth a damn. The Russians had them all. They would get them in 2 months or so from Jaffe—they would not be worth a single penny in intelligence parlance."

Q. Now, have you finished on that point? I do not mean to interrupt.—A. No; that is quite right.

Q. I have asked that there be included in the transcript at this point Document 17-11.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-11

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 32)

"* * * The question as to whether Soviet Russia would enter the war against Japan was uppermost in Allied councils in these days. China's foreign minister, T. V. Soong, told our Ambassador Gauss that he was convinced that Russia would attack Japan when Germany was defeated, but would do so for the sole purpose of sovietizing the Far East. Soong warned that America's headaches would commence only then. It was a warning which Washington completely disregarded."

Q. I refer you, Mr. Larsen, to this material on page 32 of the article.—A. That is right; I gave that.

Q. You are the author of that?—A. I gave this to Don Levine; yes.

Q. How did you know about that conversation?—A. Oh, I knew about that from studying the reports while I was in the State Department.

Q. Well—A. That was, if you want my personal comments on that—

Q. We would be glad to have them.—A. That was a report which I considered rather interesting and I considered at that time when I read it as quite true. It gave a good picture of Russia's attitude. She would come into the war when Germany was defeated, or in other words very late, and only for her own sake. And I was only interested in the report, I only remembered it because it stuck in my mind as an important warning to the United States that had not been given any consideration at all here. It had not been publicized, it was not made the subject of a discussion in the Postwar Policy Committee—remember, I was a member of the Postwar Policy Committee—and that referred to the end of the war and the postwar situation.

Q. Did you have any authority to disclose the contents of this dispatch?—A. No; I did not. You are right on that point. I was, of course, afterward not in the State Department, but still, you are right, I had no authority to discuss that or to disclose it.

Q. Now, I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point Document 17-12.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-12

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 32)

"* * * John Stewart Service, a junior colleague and friend of Mr. Davies, who was stationed as a field representative in China and acted as political adviser to General Stilwell, tried hard to convince Washington that the rebel Communists were pursuing a policy of avoiding civil war."

Q. I refer you now, Mr. Larsen, to this paragraph here [indicating].—A. That is correct. That is, as far as I remember that, the advice given from the field at that time to the State Department, or the information was that the Communists were pursuing a policy of avoidance of civil war. Mr. Gauss did not agree with that, but Mr. John Carter Vincent attached a note about the size of this here [indicating 5-by-8-inch paper], something like Mr. Chase's note that we saw on the dispatches, and that note said, roughly, Mr. Gauss is wrong. Mr. Gauss sent it in under covering dispatch, and said, "I do not agree with Mr. Service," and outlined the reasons. He said, "I cannot see, in view of the fact that the Communists are building turrets and fortresses along all the railways, and that they are infiltrating large areas of the Chiang Kai-shek-controlled parts of China—I cannot see that they are pursuing a policy of"—what was it he called it here?—"avoidance of civil war." But Mr. John Carter Vincent said Mr. Service is right, and Mr. Gauss is wrong, not exactly in those words, and a vague line to the effect that the real cause of all this trouble is that the Kuomintang or Nationalist Government is not bringing about the reforms that the Communists championed, and that it was not at all a case of Communists making trouble in China, but it was Chiang Kai-shek's backwardness that was causing the trouble.

Q. As a matter of fact, do you know what period of time you are talking about, that you were talking about here when you were reporting that Service—A. Yes; it was spring of 1945.

Q. And it is your impression that the report he was sending them was that the Chinese Communists were in the spring of 1945 trying to avoid the possibility of civil war?—A. It was my opinion that that report was not correct. I did not agree with that.

Q. You think that this was a report written by Service in the spring of 1945?—A. Yes. From memory, I would say that was a report.

Q. But not a report written much earlier?—A. No; it was written—all I can tell you approximately is Mr. Service probably wrote it in February.

Q. February of 1945?—A. Because I remember he came home at the end of March or early April and sat in on one of our morning meetings.

Q. Sat in on what?—A. On one of our early morning Far Eastern Division meetings. That is at the time Mr. Ballantine introduced me to him in the corridor.

Q. You mean a meeting of your unit or some staff meeting?—A. General staff meeting in the State Department. That is where I first saw him; that is where I figure the time he came home.

Q. What is it you recall? Something he said at this staff meeting?—A. No; but I recall that Mr. Service came home around the beginning of April—I am not sure—

Q. Yes, it was in April.—A. But I remember in April, somewhere around the 1st of April we had one of these Friday morning Far Eastern Division meetings where all officers and analysts got together, and I remember seeing Mr. Service in there.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not present at the meeting?—A. Oh, yes, I was always present at those meetings.

The CHAIRMAN. So you heard what he had to say?—A. I don't remember whether Mr. Service had anything to say that day or not. I think Mr. Emmerson gave a little talk that day.

Q. Did Mr. Service ever attend any meetings of your policy committee?—A. Not that I remember.

Q. Well, now, let us go along with this article here. I would like to introduce into the transcript document 17-14.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-14

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 33)

"The day before President Roosevelt announced that Stilwell had been relieved of his command, on October 30, 1944, John S. Service submitted his report No. 40 to the State Department. As disclosed months later by General Hurley in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that report was a general statement of how to let fall the government I was sent over there to sustain. The report was circulated among the Communists I was trying to harmonize with the Chiang Kai-shek government."

Q. I refer you to this [indicating].—A. I did not write that at all. I didn't know any No. 40. I had no record of any document. That is Mr. Don Levine's stuff.

Q. That is Mr. Levine's?—A. His authorship.

Q. I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point document 17-13, and—A. I strongly disagreed with the idea of writing the article this way and mentioning document or report No. 40 because it gave the impression that I still had documents or copies of them and could quote the number. I didn't.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-13

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 33)

"Then came the Stilwell incident. John S. Service, Stilwell's political adviser, accompanied a highly secret military commission to Communist headquarters at Yen-an. Upon the return of this mission, old 'Vinegar' Joe demanded that Chiang Kia-shek permit him to equip and arm some 300,000 Chinese Communists and put them in the field alongside the Nationalist armies against the Japanese. Chiang Kai-shek saw in this American proposal a Soviet plot to build up the very rebel forces which had been waging civil war against his government. He requested the recall of General Stilwell."

Q. Now I ask you to look at this document 17-13. I ask you whether you wrote that?—A. No, I did not.

Q. Mr. Levine wrote that?—A. Levine wrote that.

Q. I now ask that there be included in the transcript documents 17-16 and 17-17.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-16

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 34)

"The Espionage case itself had its origin with the appearance in the December 1944 issue of Amerasia of an article containing unadulterated passages from an extremely confidential report to the Office of Strategic Services. Two employees of the OSS were struck by the passages which they had read in the original and became curious as to how the information turned up in the columns of Amerasia. A preliminary investigation conducted by OSS disclosed that various other secret documents were in possession of Jaffe, Kate Mitchell, and Mark Gayn, all of Amerasia."

DOCUMENT No. 17-17

(Article in Plain Talk, entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 34)

"The FBI then took charge of the affair. As established by Congressman Dondero, the Government agents spent several months on the case. In the course of their quest, it was found that John S. Service was in communication from China with Mr. Jaffe. The substance of some of Service's confidential messages to the State Department reached the offices of Amerasia in New York before they arrived in Washington. Among the papers found in possession of Mr. Jaffe was Document No. 58, one of Mr. Service's secret reports, entitled "Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek—Decline of His Prestige and Criticism of an Opposition to His Leadership."

Q. I am referring now to this [indicating].—A. In justifying the entry of these items regarding Stilwell, such as the one that we have just looked at. "Then came the Stilwell incident. John Service" and so on, about "Vinegar" Joe demanding Chiang Kai-shek permit him to equip and arm 300,000 Chinese Communists, with regard to those statements I said to him, "How do you know these things? I remember vaguely something about that, but how can we put this in, 'Report 40' and so on?" And he said, "I have this material here." And he showed me extracts and retyped items from dispatches, and he had a very voluminous steel file—remember, that is before anything was published about Stilwell. He also had in there even photostats of a letter written by General Stilwell to Mrs. Stilwell in which General Stilwell said, "I get so damned mad with these people that sometimes I feel I would love to take off my uniform and shoulder a rifle in the army of Chu Teh."

The CHAIRMAN. Who was that, army of—A. Gen Chu Teh. Now that was a photostat of a letter. It was in May, it seems to me.

Q. That Levine had in his file?—A. Yes. And I said to myself, "It is amazing. Maybe there was a plot, maybe there was a great pro-Communist element out there in China." If that letter was genuine—of course, it may be, Joe Stilwell was a man of terrific temper and maybe he wrote that not at all as a Communist but on the other hand he did write it to his wife, and it does make a bad impression when you see things like that.

I am mentioning that to give you gentlemen an idea of the extent to which they tried to substantiate and did substantiate many of the things they were telling me about and they were telling me that I ought to know and that they were surprised that I didn't know.

Q. Now referring back to this document 17-16 and 17-17, which is this material [indicating], will you look at that?—A. Yes. I don't know anything about that article which later has been mentioned as a transcript of a secret OSS report on Thailand that was the beginning of the Amerasia investigation that touched off the authorities to the fact that Jaffe had inside information. I don't know anything about that.

Q. Now the next paragraph—A. I may add that I never saw that report on Thailand and I never gave it to Jaffe, so it is out of the question. It was news to me when I went up there and I don't even know that Mr. Dondero had mentioned it to me, but I certainly read plenty about it later.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I take it you didn't write these two paragraphs you refer to?

A. I haven't seen the first paragraph.

Q. Document 17-16, you didn't write that, is that correct?—A. That is right. Now you see, that is also presented here in a manner that would indicate—

Q. You are referring now to the portion that begins, "The FBI then took charge"—A. Yes. "In the course of their quest, it was found that John S. Service was in communication from China with Mr. Jaffe."

Q. Did you write that?—A. I did not write that, that it was found, I did not write that at all, that Mr. Service was in communication with Mr. Jaffe. They told me about it and it is not in my original manuscript.

Q. Did they give you the facts which supported that assertion?—A. No, they did not.

Q. Nonetheless you permitted it to be published under your name?—A. Yes, on the grounds that my knowledge of the case was insufficient, and as Mr. Levine said, we were collaborating on the article. When two men collaborate on an article there inevitably will be information available or known to one and not to the other, and therefore correctly the article should have been signed by him with me.

Q. The fact is though that his name does not appear anywhere in connection with the article.—A. It does not appear.

Q. And he gave you no factual material?—A. No, he gave me no factual material on that score.

Q. To support this, nothing to support the assertion that it was found that Service was in communication—A. Not then and never since.

Q. In the course of any of your discussions with Congressman Dondero, did he ever give you any factual information tending to support this charge?—A. No, no. I may mention that Mr. Dondero, undoubtedly a very excellent man and good lawyer, and so on, he is totally blank when it comes to Far Eastern affairs and knowledge of what went on. He doesn't know the slightest about it. Neither did anybody on the House committee. They asked me the most asinine questions.

Q. Now, the next sentence in this paragraph states that "The substance of some of Service's confidential messages to the State Department reached the offices of Amerasia in New York before they arrived in Washington."—A. That is the same implication. That is not of my doing.

Q. You didn't write that?—A. No, sir.

Q. Mr. Levine wrote it?—A. I suppose so, either he or Mr. Toledano.

Q. Did they give you any information to support that, any factual information to support this statement?—A. No, they didn't.

Q. Now the next sentence states that among the papers found in the possession of Jaffe was document No. 58, and so forth.—A. What page is that on?

Q. The next sentence.—A. Fifty-eight. No, again just like Document 40, I knew of no documents under numbers, I didn't know what that was, that dispatch, Decline of his prestige and criticism of and opposition to his leadership, I did not know of that.

Q. You never heard of that?—A. No, I don't think so; I don't think I ever handled that dispatch.

Q. Did they show you a copy of that?—A. No, they did not; but Mr. Dondero showed me a photostat of the list that he had in his office.

Q. Did he tell you this Document 58 was one of Service's secret reports?—A. Yes, he said so.

Q. Dondero said?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he tell you what made him think it was one of Service's reports?—A. No, I don't remember his elaborating on that. He merely said that Document 58—and I have clippings and so on where I have them filed together and tried to piece it together so I know only from the newspaper reports and the lists that the congressional committee had, that they were such. I don't know, I haven't seen them myself. I haven't seen these documents myself.

The CHAIRMAN. I haven't seen them myself, you said?

A. I haven't seen them myself.

Q. Now I will ask to be included in the transcript Document 17-18.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-18

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 35)

"* * * and that at one time Jaffe had in his possession a message sent by Ambassador Hurley to his wife, advising her not to rent their home in Chesapeake Bay for the summer, inasmuch as he expected to return to the United States before the end of the summer."

A. All this about Lattimore I did not put in. I did not say a word about Lattimore. I don't know Lattimore at all.

Q. You are referring now to material appearing at the bottom of column 1, page 34, and top of column 2 of the article?—A. That is right.

Q. Now I ask you to look at this [indicating].—A. All this about Philip Jaffe, alias Phillips, I didn't know about that. They had a complete file, dossier, on Jaffe.

Q. You are referring now to all of the remainder of column 2 on page 34?—A. That is right.

Q. And you said you were not the author of that either?—A. I was not the author of that.

Q. And now I ask you to look at Document 17-18, which is this material right here [indicating].—A. I did not know about any message sent by Ambassador Hurley to his wife. I don't see how that possibly could ever come to me, but I was told about that.

Q. Did they show you the message?—A. No; I don't think they showed me the message. I still don't know what it was about, but they told me there was proof that he didn't expect to go back out.

Q. Well, that message, as I read the context here, was referred to merely to show what an extensive—A. File Jaffe had.

Q. File Jaffe had.—A. That is right.

Q. But you merely took Levine's word that Jaffe did have such files?—A. Yes; they told me, "We have been through the lists and, to a certain extent, transcripts of the documents"—

Q. Which documents?—A. All of the documents found in Jaffe's possession.

Q. Levine told you he had been through them?—A. Yes; they said they had been through them. There, you see, were the experts who had handled the case while I was mixing concrete in Florida. You don't learn much about the State Department by mixing concrete down there. In fact, I sweated out a lot of dates and details of things I had seen in the State Department when I worked down there.

Q. Where or did Levine indicate to you how he had obtained access to the files or the materials found in Jaffe's possession at the time of his arrest?—A. I don't remember how he told me that, but I remember he said he had together with Dondero had had access to lists and descriptions of the documents.

Q. At this time—this was August, after the Hobbs committee investigation, was it not?—A. Yes; because the Hobbs investigation was during the spring and—

Q. It was during May of that year, wasn't it?—A. Yes; 1946.

Q. And we are now talking about August 1946?—A. That is right. I don't know whether the official report was out or not. I would have to check that.

Q. No.—A. I think I have a copy of that at home.

Q. The official report, however, does not contain any of the testimony.—A. It doesn't? I see.

Q. Testimony or lists of the documents.—A. They still got them through friendly relations with their Congressmen.

Q. With Congressman Dondero.

(No response from the witness.)

Q. Now I ask that there be introduced into the transcript 17-19, 20.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT Nos. 17-19, 20

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emmanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 35.)

"When John Stewart Service returned from China, Miss Mitchell gave a party at which he was present. He had previously attended a special press conference held by the Institute of Pacific Relations in which he supported the position of the Chinese Communists."

Q. And I refer you to [indicating].—A. No, I didn't know that. I wasn't present. I certainly didn't know about it.

Q. You had no personal knowledge?—A. No personal knowledge whatsoever. You may put that down definitely. That is something he told me—

Q. "He" meaning Levine?—A. All right, if you say so, but I did not know of it.

Q. By "he" you mean Levine?—A. Levine.

Q. You are not the author of that?—A. I remember he had that in there, he had talked about it, and I said, "I don't know. If it is anything to you, Don, it is at least to me, it is a good item in proving that I did not conspire with Service."

Q. And did you know anything about the second sentence there, to the effect that Service had attended this—A. Special press conference?

Q. Press conference in which he supported the position—A. No, sir; I meant to say that but I thought it covered—

Q. You didn't write that in?—A. No, sir; not the least bit.

Q. That is also Levine or Toledano, correct?—A. That is right. Don Levine or Toledano, I am not sure which one of those two.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you meet that last gentleman during your conference up there.

A. Yes; I met him there. He was in the outer office and he was a very brilliant writer. I don't like the stuff he writes but he is a good writer. He is a Puerto Rican, a young fellow.

Q. Now I ask that there be included in the transcript Document 17-21. (The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-21

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 38)

"The grand jury proceedings are, of course, secret. But it has been reported to me that John Service had accused me of furnishing Jaffe with documents found in his possession, which was a complete and vicious fabrication."

Q. I refer you to the bottom of column 1, on page 38, Mr. Larsen. You have already testified I believe, on this point [indicating].—A. Yes.

Q. I believe you have already testified that Levine described to you what purported to have occurred in the proceedings before the grand jury, in which Mr. Service—A. Yes.

Q. Incriminated you?—A. It was true what was written here. It had been reported to me that John Service had accused me. It had been reported. The fact is that it had been reported by Mr. Levine. It is typical of Mr. Levine's style.

Q. Now I ask that we introduce into the transcript document 17-22. (The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-22

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," by Emanuel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 38)

"According to Congressman Dondero, for some unaccountable reasons the Government attorneys presented to the grand jury only a part of the evidence in their possession."

Q. I refer you to this sentence here [indicating].—A. How would I know that?

Q. Did you write that?—A. I didn't write that, I didn't write a single word about that.

Q. Did Mr. Levine or Mr. Toledano or Mr. Kohlberg?—A. One of them, one of them just have.

Q. Did they tell you all the evidence had not been introduced?—A. They said they had heard that and that they wrote that down in there, and I made some lines there in the original document, in the original of their rewrite.

Q. Would you think it fair to say, Mr. Larsen, that your willingness to accept these very damaging statements against Mr. Service and have them published under your name was due to the animosity which you had formed as a result of Mr. Jaffe's—A. I wanted to say a minute ago that was partly it. Second was that—

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't finish your sentence. Mr. Jaffe's what?

A. Due to the animosity created within me by the rumors that had been given me. I was, I dare say, unduly lax in criticizing the manuscript of the rewritten article. One reason—another reason for that was that I was under great pressure of time. I had less than 2 hours to catch my train. The last day—they served the finished document to me the last day. There was not even a chance to rewrite paragraphs. Also I was considerably worried about how I would get back, whether I would have money enough for the trip. They gave me my check in the last minute, and I was sick and in a great hurry to get away from the whole thing. I thought, "All right, they have these files here and they have this fulsome evidence and they have impressed me with the fact that it seems that they have gone into it very thoroughly, very thoroughly into it, whereas I have not had occasion to go into it." Where could I go if I went into it? Justice Department, Mr. McInerney, although he was very friendly toward me, he could take out documents, he didn't give me any information, he didn't show me anything. If I came to the State Department, I had been given the cold shoulder. In a remark John Carter Vincent said to me, "I wouldn't touch you with a 10-foot pole."

Q. He said that to you.—A. Yes, he did. Mr. Dondero turned to me—that was just after the arrest and when I was released—"I hear from Mortimer Graves they have collected a fund of $5,000 to defend the State Department people in this case but Mr. Graves tells me, I am sorry I have had news, you are not to benefit from that fund." Oh, oh. I went to the phone when I got home and I called Mr. John Carter Vincent but Mr. Drumright answered the phone and John Carter Vincent was right there at the desk, and I heard him say, "This is Larsen." "What does he want?" "He wants to know what are you going to do about this whole case? Are you going to do anything for him?" And then Drumright turned around to the phone and said, "John Carter Vincent says he wouldn't touch you with a 10-foot pole."

Q. This is who, Mr. Drumright?—A. Mr. Drumright was one of the State Department officers connected with far eastern affairs.

Q. You referred to the fact that a $5,000 fund had been raised. Who told you any such fund had been raised?—A. Mr. Mortimer Graves of the American Council of Learned Societies.

Q. He told you they had raised a $5,000 fund?—A. Yes, he said about $5,000. I remember that figure.

Q. Are you sure it was not $500?—A. It is a long way off. Five hundred is—I can ask him again. You see, Mr. Mortimer Graves was the one who granted me this scholarship to the Library of Congress and he was the one who recommended me for entry into the Naval Intelligence, and recommended to Admiral Zacharias that I be excused from serving the rest of my scholarship on that Rockefeller project. And therefore he considered me as one of his protégés. He was in that field of procuring far eastern men, men with far eastern knowledge for the various Government departments.

Therefore when the case broke and I came out from the District jail, I decided, "I am not going to answer any phones," because the reporters and women came to the door, and my wife held them all off. But finally the second or third day there was a phone call which rang so persistently that I took it. Mortimer Graves. He said, "Larsen, are you doing anything now?" I said, "Certainly not." He said, "All right, would you like to come down here and work on our card files and put them in order, classify the files on the various men in the far eastern field as you know them and as they are listed, collect all the material from their scholarship letters and put them on cards"; just like we do with Chinese personality cards. I said, "Sure, I would love to." He said, "I don't have much money but I know I have $75 right now that would last you for a week or two, and then I will see if I can get up something." So I went down there, started to work at once, and it was the second or third day after I had been there that he called me up and said, "I have some bad news for you. There is a fund being collected and I am the custodian of that fund," and to the best of my knowledge he said that would run to about $5,000 collected from various people within the State Department for the defense of the State Department men involved in this case, but that bad news was that I was not to benefit from that fund. My heart sort of sank within me, and I thought, "All right, another bad stroke."

At the end of the week he said, "How are you coming along"? I said, "I have finished that project." He said, "All right, now as to whether you can continue or not, I don't know, but say come in Monday, and let us see, or give me a ring first." So I gave him a ring Monday, and he said, "Well, come down tomorrow and I will see if I have some more for you." He said, "I have a little tail end of another fund, $60. You do this little job." I had it done in about 3 days. He said, "Well, all right, don't worry. Don't come in for the rest of the week and don't come in until I call you again." And I thought I sensed a cooling in his attitude toward me, although I have always liked him very much.

I went in some time ago and told him, "You remember that time? I just wanted a little understanding with you because I am tired of this going around wondering, 'And how is that man toward me now?' I don't give a damn if I have a clash with you, let's have it out. If we are friends, and you still have decent regard for me, all right." He said, "I have very high regard. I will try to get you one of the Pakistan scholarships," and I am registered for that at present. I did mention to him this $5,000 fund and he didn't deny it.

But I was rather bitter that time. I thought, "Here we go, we are excluded on every point." Even the defense, the lawyers don't want to get together with my lawyer on the defense. Roth's lawyer didn't want to have anything to do with us. Jaffe's lawyer would not have anything to do. And then I read later about the Lattimore litigation. Everyone has asked me, "Were you there"? I said, "No, I wasn't." I am very glad I wasn't. It is one link in my proof that there was no collusion, no conspiracy to remove documents.

Q. As a matter of fact, Mr. Larsen, you complained about why the Service lawyer and other lawyers wouldn't get together with your lawyers—it was your theory that you were not engaged in any conspiracy, why would you want to get together with the other lawyers?—A. We wanted to know what the case was about. We thought they might know something about it. We didn't know—in any battle it is good to know something about your enemy, and we thought we might get something interesting. Now, if we had gotten together then—let's take it this way. If we had gotten together then I would have discussed with Jaffe the fact that I discovered that my apartment had been illegally entered and that my wire, my telephone had been tapped. As Fred Wolfman said to me over the phone a few days ago, "Jimmie, you sure blew up that case when you made that motion that the evidence was all obtained illegally." And I told Fred Wolfman, "Yes, I apparently did." I didn't know at that time anything about the others, and I had nothing to do with them. I had no inclination to go and tell them, "Look, boys, I found out something about my case." I thought, "To hell with them. They don't want to work with me, I don't want to work with them either."

Well, now Ferguson asks me, "What would you have done?"—

Q. This was Senator Homer Ferguson?—A. [Nodded] "What would you have done if you were an investigator?" I told him, "If I were an investigator and I thought that the Nation's security was at stake, I would enter illegally, because I have done so when I was an investor for the Chinese in Peking." I violated all the treaties and extraterritoriality and everything. I went up to Kalgan with a couple men and pistols, took an army officer and shoved him on the train and took him down to Peking. One of Chu Lin's officers.

Q. So that you had no compunction about violating constitutional rights of individuals if you were investigating?—A. No. He asked me, "Why, then, did you make that motion?" I said, "Because I was fighting for my life and I was irritated by so many things that were asked me and said against me."

You know how I discovered that? My father bought a vase in Chengtu in 1908, or I think it was 1907, a black and white vase. He gave that vase to me, and I had it in a little box on top of a shelf in my closet. When the FBI men came to my residence on the night of June 6, they said, "Have you any documents?" And I said, "Yes." "Show them to us." I said, "Why should I show them to you?" They said, "By virtue of this" and I found I was taken in and I showed it to them. "Why do you have them?" "Because, to take stuff home to read it. Long-winded stuff, can't read it in the office." We went around. "Where is it?" "Here is one." I took it out of an envelope marked "Chou En-lai and Tung Pi-Wu"—and files on these Communists. And then one of the investigators, namely Mr.—I can't—oh, Sander, said, "What is in that box up there?" The other fellow said, "That is a vase." And I am hard of hearing but it just happens that although I had my back turned to him I heard that.

Q. It was in a box?—A. It was in that box, in the little box, what you call an old hat box my father had. My father had a top hat in that when I was a boy and it has been in that top-hat box ever since.

I heard that and I stopped dead. I could hardly get going again. I thought, "Oh!" And then, "If the other one knows, then he has been in there." So I let it go, and in my old Chinese way I went about it in a pretty easy way. And one day I went down to the house manager, Mr. Sager—he is a man who likes a drink. When I wanted something done in the apartment I bought him a drink. So I bought him a bottle of Southern Comfort. It always did the trick. I said, "Sager, I got a little stock of this in. I have one bottle for you." He said, "Oh." I sat down, smoked my cigarette, and said, "Say, tell me, Sager, how many times did those fellows from the FBI come in here and approximately when?" So he said, "Oh, you know about that?" I said, "Sure, I know about that. You tell me." So he told me how he let them in with a pass key and he mentioned something about wire tapping. I hadn't thought about that. I said, "Who was that?" There was a girl present when he fixed those wires. "It was Miss Garvey." I said, "I have to talk to her." She is a little lame on one side, just been married to one of Chennault's fliers who had come back, and she told me the story of how they wire-tapped, from what time, since when. So immediately I called Hilland, my lawyer, and I said "Here, I have something here. Now I am going to throw the muck back at them. Enough of this nonsense. I don't see how I can extricate myself. I have some faults but they have some, too. They will have it. If they want to fight, let's fight. I can't pay you but I have a Chinese who will put up $10,000, a little Chinese laundryman I befriended one time." He forged a guy's name on a lease. He took it over and then he extended the lease on his own signature, whereas he should have had the man who had originally taken the lease over extend it.

Q. This was the Chinese laundryman?—A. Yes. I helped him get out of it, went to various people, the rent people, real-estate agent, and I told him, "This is done in China all of the time. He is not a crook, just scared he would lose the place. Now you want to use this like a blackmail case, now you want to put a hell of a pressure on him to get $35 more rent." He said, "O. K. put $35 on, tear up this lease, and sign this one."

This Chin Chew, the Chinese, when my wife was away in her home, he said, "I am going back to China and I have sold my six laundries including my factories out in Front Royal"—he did laundry for all laundrymen here, most of them don't do the laundry, just ironing—and he said, "I have sold it all and I have $43,000. I will put up $10,000 for you, Jimmie, for your defense." And I really had a cheval de bataille there to go to see him with, and so I said to Mr. Hilland, my lawyer, "Let's go up and bruise him up a little." I said when I went up, "What are you going to prosecute me for? I am going to make a motion you got it all illegally. I have ten thousand bucks from a friend and I will go to the Supreme Court." He said, "You know, if you just had one Government pencil marked 'United States Government' in your house, we can slap you in jail for 1 year with a one-thousand-dollar fine." I said, "All right, that is why I am tried. Nevertheless, I still will fight the 'battle of the badge.'" I had the gold badge and I had a right to take stuff home and have it in my home. "It still doesn't make me a thief." All right, then. I didn't know that in the next room they had Jaffe in. They said, "Pardon me, just a minute." They went in and immediately made Jaffe agree to plead guilty before he would walk out on the street and discover I had filed a motion to fight it on the grounds that they had obtained the evidence illegally.

On the other hand, I went out and I think it was the next day I discovered that Chin Chew came with his passport and said he was going back to Canton and he was sorry but he had to withdraw the money to deposit it in some business in New York and I was left without funds. Then they started to work on me. "Will you enter a plea of nolo contendere?" I said, "No."

They discussed the merits of such a plea and finally, one day, I believe it must have been the early days of October—no, the latter part of October—the Justice Department attorney, Mr. Robert M. Hitchcock, said to me, "Jaffe's lawyer has come to us, and he says he feels very guilty about you. You are poor and he has some money and he realized that if he had never asked Roth to go and seek you out for that intercourse with those personality files, you would never have known him, never been involved in the case. Now you are run down, you have lost your reputation, your job, you have no money, etc., can't even pay your lawyer. So he says, 'If Larsen were to enter a plea of nolo contendere he might be fined, that is probably what was frightening him off from that plea,' but if he were to do that, Mr. Jaffe tells us he would be willing to pay this fine for you." I said, "Oh, no, and get linked up with him. No."

Mr. ACHILLES. It was Hitchcock who told you Jaffe would pay the fine?

A. Yes, I did not get that from Jaffe. So I said, "You are just eager to get a conviction, to get some sort of settlement of the case. I know every lawyer wants that. I make no bones about that. Now let me see, I would have him pay my fine and my lawyer; it would make me look pretty bad, I think."

So I went home and told my wife. At that time I had lost a lot of weight, couldn't sleep at night, never slept at night. I was so thin and nervous and we had no money for the groceries. After a few days of acute difficulties, a man came with a bill, and so on, and—well, I would be away, out of it, and I wouldn't have one or two thousand dollars that I owed Hilland and wouldn't have that hanging over me—

Q. He also agreed to pay your attorney's fees?—A. Attorney's fees and the fine and little incidentals such as transcript or report of what was the legal papers and, namely, we got a transcript of Jaffe's court papers, $27 it cost. All right. Then we talked it over night after night, and one night my wife said to me, "Maybe that would be the way out of it." So I went to Hilland. He is a fine, honorable man. He said, "Now, Jimmie, don't do it because you owe me $2,000," because that is what it was up to date. I said, "I know that. In other words, you are advising me not to do that." "Hitchcock told you all the fine things, and now I will tell you all the bad things I learned today from British case history, and so on." I said, "Nevertheless, I came here with my mind made up. I will enter a plea of nolo contendere and scam out of town, become a taxi driver somewhere, or something else." He said, "Don't do that. But all right, if you want to do it, let's do it." So that was October 22.

Then we did two things. He notified Hitchcock that day, October 22, "Larsen is going to enter a plea of nolo contendere." I went that day or next day, I went home, said, "I want to talk to Mr. Byrnes." I had trouble getting him—everybody else but Mr. Byrnes. Finally I got him, told him I wanted to resign, and said I would send in a letter—

Q. You are referring to Secretary of State Byrnes?—A. Yes. "I want to send my resignation and will it be accepted without prejudice?" I said, "You don't have to accept it but I would like to have it accepted that way." He said, "Certainly. You send it in, say it is 'personal reasons,' and I will reply 'personal reasons.'" I said, "I understand that is the right etiquette in State Department: If you are going down to defeat or you have gone down to defeat not to compromise the Department." He said, "That is very nice of you, that is correct." Because I had agreed to go to court, I will admit risk, defeat, and also I knew if I got fined then I would more or less automatically be dismissed from the Department.

I am through with the story. I was permitted to resign and went to court November 2 after a sudden warning Friday afternoon, and in the session on November 2, 1945, I was not asked whether I had given any documents. I was not asked whether I knew about any Communist affiliations. I was merely asked whether I was E. Larsen, whether I had withdrawn—very emphatic—whether I had withdrawn my motion, whether I was now willing to enter a plea of nolo contendere. I said, "Yes." And he said, "I will not lecture to you. You are a grown man. I fine you $500."

(A short recess was declared, after which the Board reconvened.)

The CHAIRMAN. Have you finished this particular line?

Mr. RHETTS. No I have not, General.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not finished?

Mr. RHETTS. I have not finished going over this article.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please go on with that then?

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I believe you testified at the outset of the cross-examination, Mr. Larsen, that while you entertained the view that some of Mr. Service's reports were reporting favorable on the Chinese Communists, that you never had any reason to believe that it would be pro-Soviet communism?—A. That is right.

Q. I ask that there be introduced into the transcript at this point, Document 17-9.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 17-9

(Article in Plain Talk entitled "The State Department Espionage Case" by Emmannel S. Larsen, October 1946, p. 28)

"* * * There I found myself sitting next to John Stewart Service, a leading figure in the pro-Soviet group in the China Section of the State Department * * *

Q. I refer you to this sentence here, "There I found myself sitting," etc.—A. I did not say "pro-Soviet group in the China Section of the State Department."

Q. You did not write that?—A. No; I did not write "pro-Soviet."

Q. Did Mr. Levine show you any evidence to indicate that Mr. Service was part of a pro-Soviet group?—A. No; he didn't, but he spoke of the "pro-Soviet group" continuously.

Q. I believe you testified you never did have any reason to believe that Service was pro-Soviet, let alone a leader of the State pro-Soviet group?—A. That is right.

Q. Yet you permitted this—A. Well—

Q. Yet you permitted this article to be published under your name although it represented a statement directly contrary to what you thought; is that correct?—A. That is right. May I advance a theory in my defense?

Q. Please do.—A. That I don't know—I have no copy of his manuscript, Mr. Don Levine's manuscript. I don't know whether I remember after seeing the manuscript during that short interval in the afternoon there before my departure from New York exactly what was left as it was and what was amended a little bit, a word changed here and there. I have no way of checking on that now.

Q. So that you don't even know whether you even saw this in the revision of the manuscript that was shown to you?—A. That is right.

Q. You think it may have been added?—A. He did not give me—yes; I am sure about some additions, some items. I didn't see them even in the revision, I am sure about some items. I can't say for sure about this one, that they were added, because I didn't even remember seeing them when I saw the first issue of the Plain Talk magazine. I thought, "Now, where did he get that? He didn't even have that in his rewrite."

Q. Do you think you can point to any of those now that you know were not even in the revision that was shown to you?—A. I saw one here a little while ago. There was something in here about Mr. Jaffe, that he had paraded under the name, alias, of J. W. Phillips. I don't think he had that in the original rewrite manuscript. That is all on page 34, second column, just about in the middle of it. I didn't know the history of this, from 34 to 36. He had been a member of the editorial board of China Today. I don't think I ever saw China Today.

Q. The question is whether that was in the revision of the article which—A. That is what I referred to. I don't remember seeing anything about that story, that history of the evolution of the Amerasia magazine and the charges that as editor of China Today he has posed as Mr. Phillips.

Q. Now, coming back to this material on page 28, which is Document 17-9, that we were just talking about—A. Page 38?

Q. Yes, page 28.—A. Oh, 28, I see.

Q. Wherein it is stated that Mr. Service was a leader of the pro-Soviet group, will you try to recall whether or not that statement was in the article as revised, which Mr. Levine showed to you, and see whether you can recall anything about it?—A. To the best of my knowledge I do not remember seeing that in the text, because I would have objected to that. I would have said the group, the anti-Chiang group, or group favorable to the Chinese Communists who were at that time known as the Chinese Agrarian Reformers. We all fell for that at one time.

Q. You think that had you seen that in the revised text you would have objected to it?—A. Yes, I would have objected to it. I can only say that if it were in the text, if we could get Don Levine to reveal the text and he could show that that was in there, then it was gross carelessness on my part to overlook it. I do not subscribe to that statement. I do not believe and I did not believe then that there was a pro-Soviet group in the State Department. I do not believe there was a pro-Soviet group in any other sense in the State Department or in the United States, in any other sense than a group that was, like all other Americans, very happy that the Russians were our allies during the war.

Q. You are aware, are you not, Mr. Larsen, that this statement, like all the other statements in this article, have been repeated by Senator McCarthy as a part of the charges which have been made against Mr. Service?—A. Yes, I am aware of that; very much so.

Q. As I understand you, you repudiated the authorship of this and all other statements we have discussed?—A. Yes, I would. Yes, I would.

Q. Now I would like you to look at the material on page 32, column 2, beginning with "The pro-Soviet group in the China Section, whose views" and going down to the bottom of the column. Were you the author of that material?—A. Little bits here and there. He has taken a word and a clause here and there and—let us take it from the beginning. "The pro-Soviet group in the China Section, whose views were reflected by Amerasia, and whose members were in touch with Jaffe and Roth"—I didn't write that.

Q. You did not write that?—A. I did not write that.

Q. What you have just quoted?—A. I did not write that. "Secretary Ludden of"—I mentioned Ludden as one of those who reported that now we were ready to arm and equip the Communists in case of an invasion of north China coast. So far as I know there was no plan to invade the north China.

Q. But you had seen reports from Ludden to this effect?—A. I had seen reports from Ludden recommending the arming of the Chinese in north China, and I was very much amazed because I had worked in Naval Intelligence on a detail reporting and surveying of the leading beaches along the south China coast, south of Shanghai, south of the Yangtze River.

Q. Now you say you had mentioned Ludden's name?—A. Yes.

Q. But you didn't, did you, mention it—A. Not as a member of the pro-Soviet group, no.

Q. Now, then, you say in the next sentence, "So was John Davies, a native of Chengtu, who acted as State Department"—A. No; that is his wording, that is his authorship.

Q. Then the next paragraph, you state that "He"—referring to Davies—"seemed to believe and report almost anything in the way of information against the Kuomintang and Chiang Kai-shek, swallowing whole and relaying nearly everything about the Chinese Communists" gave him. Were you the author of that?—A. I had something to that effect, that everything that was against the reputation of the Kuomintang was carefully reported and that the dispatches in general carried laudatory remarks on the up-and-coming Communist Government.

Q. Was Mr. Davies reporting things that the Chinese Communists told him?—A. Yes. Mr. Davies had—

Q. Was he in China?—A. Yes, he was in China. He had sent in a number of reports. I remember he was the author of the report stating that the Chinese Communists definitely had a non-Russian orientation. I was a little shocked at that report for a very simple reason.

Q. You are sure that this was a report of Davies?—A. Yes; I am sure. I was shocked that he reported that the Communists had a non-Russian orientation because I had in my hand since the latter part of 1943 the minutes of a congress held in Yen-an on the occasion of the dissolution of the Comintern. It is a printed document, printed on very poor paper, a kind of cheap Chinese bamboo paper and in very poor English and very obviously printed in Yen-an. And, I was told and I am quite ready to believe, printed for consumption in the English-speaking countries. But I was told by my Chinese friend who brought it home from China and gave it to me in 1943, that it was suppressed in this country because the Communist line as dictated by the Kremlin was to influence the people of the United States to believe that there was no Russian orientation among the Chinese Communists and that they were not Soviet, Russian Communists, but my document that I still have is a very valuable document, clearly said, "Now the Comintern is abolished." Mao Tse-tung made that speech May 26. The Comintern was abolished on May 23. He said, "It does not matter. Whereas we have received instructions from the Soviet Union over a long period of years, the change will not be very significant, but we will not any more receive instructions from the Comintern." He didn't say that they wouldn't receive any more instructions, but he said they would receive no more instructions from the Comintern. "Nevertheless," he said, "Communism is Marxist Leninism," and he said it over and over.

And when I read that, just like any person would reading it, I said, "Well, this was said by the Communists on May 26 in Yen-an, and it was printed and published, was labeled 'printed October 1946'"—what did I say, 1946? I meant 1943, in October 1943—"and yet our State Department men continued to report that there was no Soviet orientation and our popular writers on China, Edgar Snow, Agnes Smedley, Anna Louise Strong, and so on, continued to say the same thing." Was that then stupid, ignorant reporting or was it deliberate writing? That was a question that came to my mind again and again in 1944 and 1945 because the document was never sent in. I never saw it in the State Department when I went there. I never saw it in Naval Intelligence. No such document was ever given any publicity. I heard from the Chinese that it was suppressed in the United States. Therefore, gentlemen, will you excuse me if I had the effrontery to suspect that there was a deliberate attempt to confuse the American public and possibly the American Government on the subject of the Chinese Communists and their policies?

Q. Now, Mr. Larsen, I would like you to look at the last sentence of this article on page 39, where you are referring to a conference with Mr. Jaffe in October. "He dropped a remark which one could never forget."—A. What page was that?

Q. Page 39, the last paragraph, in the article, "Well, we've suffered a lot," he said, "but, anyhow, we got Grew out."

The CHAIRMAN. Do you offer—

Mr. RHETTS. There is no exhibit but the entire document.

A. That is right; that is what he told me. That was not October 1945; that was October 1946.

Q. You did write that portion?—A. That is right, I wrote that portion.

Q. That was in this manuscript?—A. No, no; let me see, that date is wrong. It was in 1946 after the case broke and after I had been sentenced, and the whole case was over, that I went to see Mr. Jaffe. I can't remember the date, but I went to see him to ask him, just man to man, "Philip, what was behind this case and what were all these charges against you and to what extent were you involved? Are you interested in telling me or not, and are you a Communist?" And he said, "I am not a Communist. I am not involved in the way they infer, and I would like to call myself a Socialist. I disagreed with Mr. Grew's policy and the idea of getting that damned Emperor back in Japan"—in a sense I disagreed with that too while I was in the State Department—and he said, "After all, we did get Grew out." I said, "Uh huh." I said, "In other words, you did work on that." And of course if you know of Mr. Roth's book, that was an attack on Grew and Grew's policy and the postwar policy of putting the Emperor back, but remember, gentlemen, I have nothing to do with Japan, I didn't give a hoot one way or the other whether they put the Emperor back in Japan because it was not my official function, and I was not a sympathizer with them and ran around and helped them with material they were interested in.

Q. Were you interested to get Grew out of the Department?—A. No; I was not. I liked Grew. He was nice to me. I spoke to him personally on one occasion regarding Mr. Jaffe.

Q. You wrote this last paragraph of the article?—A. I wrote that in my story.

Q. That will appear somewhere in your manuscript?—A. That is right.

Q. Entitled "They Called Me a Spy"?—A. That is right.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did Mr. Jaffe indicate at all how he or anybody else got Mr. Grew out?

A. Well, by attacking his policy and publishing some magazines. My relations—

Q. Can you be more specific?—A. My relations with Grew were very pleasant. I only discussed Mr. Grew with Jaffe twice. At that time when he said, "We did get Grew out"—not meaning in "we" I, because I did not conspire with him, but "we," him, the group, Jaffe's group and his sympathizers. Jaffe never treated me as a sympathizer. I had many pointed arguments with him and told him, "That is nothing but the damned Kremlin line," in many things he said. He told me I was misguided and appeared too pro-Chiang Kai-shek and so on. I am not pro-Chiang Kai-shek. I know Chiang Kai-shek's regime's corruption better than many others. I have always challenged some of these people who spoke against Chiang Kai-shek. I have said, "All right, I will give you 2 hours fast talking, and you tell me what you know about Chiang's corruption, and you give me 2 hours and I will tell you a lot more, but I also know the good points in Chiang's regime."

Q. Mr. Larsen, I would like to read to you an excerpt from an article that appeared in Collier's magazine from March 19, 1949, over the signature of Mr. Louis Francis Budenz, where he states as follows:

"Jaffe, whose magazine faithfully followed the Moscow line on China, pleaded 'guilty.' After paying his fine, he entertained his codefendants (some of whose indictments had been dismissed) and members of the Daily Worker's staff at a party. Toasts were drunk that night to 'the coming victory of communism in China and the defeat of American imperialism.'"

Did you ever hear of any such victory celebration?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever attend any party?—A. Oh, no.

Q. That Jaffe had?—A. Oh, no, definitely no. If I had been invited I would never have gone.

Q. I would like to offer as an exhibit at this time document marked "17-X," which is a complete copy of the Plain Talk article.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be introduced.

(Document marked "17-X," article entitled "The State Department Espionage Case," Plain Talk magazine, entered in evidence as exhibit 20.)

Q. Now I would like to inquire from the Board, I have quite a number of other question that I would like to ask Mr. Larsen. It is now 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any questions you would like to ask on this phase of the examination?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; but I would like to ask one, however, which I failed to ask this morning, and I would like information on before we break up.

Mr. RHETTS. Yes; I was going to inquire, if I might, whether it would be possible for Mr. Larsen to come back tomorrow?

The CHAIRMAN. You have been very good to come voluntarily today.

Mr. LARSEN. Thank you, General, it is perfectly all right, so long as it is not too early in the morning. I would like to get after my check.

The CHAIRMAN. At 10, would 10 be all right?

Mr. LARSEN. 9?

The CHAIRMAN. 10?

Mr. LARSEN. Could you make it 11? That gives me a little extra time.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you can make it 11.

Mr. LARSEN. I haven't done quite my duty to Pathfinder magazine yet.

The CHAIRMAN. If you would like to make it 11, it would be satisfactory.

Mr. LARSEN. I am on their payroll this week and I feel I have absented myself too much.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be satisfactory.

Mr. LARSEN. It. Thank you, sir, I will be here at 11.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you have a question?

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I wonder if you would care to outline first, Mr. Larsen, the financial relationship that may have existed between you and Mr. Jaffe regarding use of your cards and other material. How did that develop? And give us a story on that.—A. He wanted to remove great numbers of my cards and I never lend them to anyone. If I loan one out, I generally have trouble getting it back, just like a book. So when I enumerated a lot of my cards, in 1944 before I was with the State Department, he said, "Could you bring these up to date and type them out for me and give me a set?" There were several hundred cards. And I said, "All right. I haven't got time to do it but I will have a stenographer"—my wife wasn't working at that time so she volunteered to do it, and he paid her, I think it was 50 cents apiece. I remember on several occasions he gave her $20 and $15 for the number of cards—there were stacks, but there was no—let me dispel any idea in your mind that there was a regular fee or a bribery for the theft of documents, for the delivery of documents. There was no such thing at all. And he in addition gave my daughter I believe $2 in the period of 2 years, one Christmastime and one birthday, I think it was, and he gave my wife one or two boxes of chocolates. And if you want to ask me, as some of these fellows in the Senate and the congressional committees have asked me, "What did I think of Jaffe?" I want to make it very emphatic that I thought Mr. Jaffe was a very fine gentleman. I still today in spite of everything that has happened and every evil suspicion that has entered my mind about him utilizing me, I still have a soft spot in my mind—in my heart for that matter, because I thought he was considerate, gentle, not a lousy conspirator as it has been made out. He never on one occasion asked me, "Will you procure me that document?" In other words, "Will you commit a little crime for me?" He never did. I am guilty of showing him documents and loaning them to him voluntarily largely because I couldn't be bothered transcribing or going into it very extensively on a typewriter. I had enough of that.

Q. These are cards that he obtained from you. Were those ones he selected, that he requested, or did you supply him with some he would be interested in?—A. He never selected or requested any. I want to repeat that again. He never selected or requested any. When I showed him voluntarily some dispatches, discussed them with him, he said to me, "Can I copy this, or can I take some notes?" "It will take a long time," I said, "I just don't feel like typing. I will get it into my cards and will give you the essence of it the next time you come." He said, "Would it be awfully bad if I took it with me. I will bring it back." That is where I made my mistake. I let him take such documents, with the exception of some that were found in Amerasia.

Q. Let me understand. Most of the cards you supplied to Mr. Jaffe were those he requested?—A. After I voluntarily showed them to him.

Q. I see. Did you have any idea—A. I am not trying to protect Jaffe, but that is a fact.

Q. Did you have any idea of what Jaffe was doing with your cards, where they reposed, what use he was making of them?—A. Not much. When I visited Amerasia once I saw the cards in a very prominent position on his library table. I opened the drawer and said, "What is this?" It was labeled "Chinese personalities."

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to read you a paragraph a part of a paragraph in this statement to the FBI of June 7, 1945, and ask you for your comment.

"Jaffe offered to compensate me for the work I did for him and presented me with amounts which averaged $75 a month since March 1944."

A. No, you see.

The CHAIRMAN. By cash payment.

A. General, that is not a correct statement. That is a paraphrasing of a number of questions and answers, namely, these two FBI men, when they took me to the field office at about 2, 1 or 2 in the morning, they sat and belabored me with questions and then said, "Do you remember how much that would be?" "Well," I said, "over a certain period when he was still building up his card file from mine, he almost got a duplicate of my card file. In fact, I gave him some. I wasn't interested in Chinese in America."

The CHAIRMAN. You started your answer before I quite finished reading. Let me finish the whole thing. I will read that sentence again.

"Jaffee offered to compensate me for the work I did for him and presented me with amounts which averaged $75 a month since March 1944 by cash payment. The work involved for this payment included the typing of several thousand cards from my card file. Mr. Philip Jaffee never offered me any remuneration for any Government papers."

A. That is right, and how did we arrive at that $75 average a month? Because there was no $75 payment. I didn't rely on any $75 payment. Fifty cents a card, and sometimes a card was actually two or three cards front and back. T. V. Soong's history, for instance, was 20 cards.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you state the same payment you have already testified about?

A. That is right. They asked me what would I say it averaged. My wife kept house, and when she typed, say 150 cards in a month, why that would average about 75, but there were months when she didn't type one card.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. Do you have some questions?

Mr. ACHILLES. No.

The CHAIRMAN. It is 10 minutes past 5 and we can go to 5:30. No we have a meeting at 5:15. We will have to adjourn at this point because we have a 5:15 meeting.

Mr. MORELAND. We can call that off.

The CHAIRMAN. You can call that off. We can go on until 5:30. Is that satisfactory?

A. That is all right with me.

Questioning by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I believe you have testified, Mr. Larsen, or from something you said I gathered you had in recent times had conferences with Senator McCarthy and Senator Ferguson?—A. March 18, yes.

Q. What was March 18?—A. That was McCarthy. March 18. He sent for me.

Q. He sent for you?—A. Yes; he sent for me.

Q. I wonder if you would care to tell us about that.—A. It was a very brief conference. I went over and he received me very nicely, and then he started to ask me, "How did you get involved in the Amerasia case?" I barely got started when the phone rang. I started again, and the phone rang again, somebody came in with a message, he had a conversation with a woman about a cocktail party, and I remember him saying, "Tell them I am dead or gone to France or China, I have had a baby, or something." He said those things. "Tell them anything, I am busy." And then a few minutes later, we hadn't got anywhere yet, he mentioned the espionage case. And I started to say, "Mr. McCarthy, I don't like the word. I called it the 'Stolen Documents Case,'" and then a young man was introduced to me. "This is Don Surine." No remarks about that. And one of his young investigators. So I said, "All right, glad to meet you, Mr. Surine." He said, "Will you take Mr. Larsen downstairs?" So we went downstairs to room 5-A in the Senate Building, down in the basement. That is their chamber of horrors, or whatever you call it. It is bristling with dictaphones and recording machines. There must be 8 or 10 of them around there. We sat down at a desk, he sat on one side and I sat right opposite him. And then he started.

He said, "You might tell me something about yourself." I said, "Yes; with pleasure." And he started very much like McCarthy. "How in the world did you get involved in this case?" I said, "I didn't get a chance to tell the Senator, but I got involved in this case through an introduction from Roth," and so on. He said, "Now maybe we had better do this right." I noticed he had a piece of paper with a great number of questions, and he had loose-leaf paper, he was going to chalk up what he thought. He started, "How old are you, where were you born?" That is as far as he got, and then he said, "In this espionage case—" I said, "Pardon me, Mr. Surine, in this theft-of-document case, if you prefer to call it theft. I call it loan or transmission of official documents." He said, "Why?" I said, "Because, you remember, the Government stuck its neck out and withdrew it, were not able to prove espionage charges. I personally am not aware of any espionage angle and I would be a fool to call it 'the espionage case.'"

He stood up and he roared at me, "Are you defending Amerasia?" And I said, "No, Mr. Surine, I am not defending Amerasia, but I am sorry to say that I am defending myself. I consider that I came in here and I have to defend myself in spite of double jeopardy and whatever the good words are for those lovely laws that should protect me." And he kept standing up and the phone rang, and obviously the master upstairs, namely Professor McCarthy, gave him some instructions, because he said—he took the phone—"Uh huh, uh huh, all right, all right," put it down, so almost simultaneously we said, "I think I'll have to go home." I thought, I am not subpoenaed, I don't have to take this stuff. I can walk out of there anytime, just like I could walk out of this place any time I please—I hope so. And he said, "Yes, I am leaving now, I will have to leave, I will have to talk to you later. Thank you very much for coming in, Mr. Larsen."

And I went out and I thought, the heck with that Gestapo stuff. There was another remark that I have forgotten to mention. He said, "Now, in giving your testimony, if you give me evidence we wanted—you are guilty just like the rest of them—" I said, "You called me in here to convince me of my guilt?" He said, "Well, I mean to say, if you string along with us, then it will go much easier with you." And that is what got me pretty hot, so when he mentioned the espionage case, I started on my version of it, of what it should be called. Then I walked out and I got on the streetcar right outside the Senate house door, and I was riding home about 5:30 or 6, and then I thought, "Yes, this is the bunch who want to go to work on me or any other member of the group. They will go ahead but I will not be a party."

Q. What group?—A. The group, the six people who were arrested, involved in that. "I will not be a party to any accusations, anything in the way of definite statements that will ruin them, and if I am hailed before the Tydings Committee I will get it out somehow that whereas I did one time think that their reports were strongly anti-Chiang and going extremely enthusiastic over the Communists, I am not sure whether I was right or not, whether it was realistic reporting." And I formed those thoughts in my head and I thought, Humm, maybe I should inform Mr. Peurifoy." Why did I think of Peurifoy? I haven't had so much to do with him. I had one or two things. I went and applied for a job—

Q. In that connection, I wonder if I might interrupt, did you discuss at all with either Senator McCarthy or Mr. Surine this Plain Talk article?—A. Didn't get to it. Didn't get to talk about it at all. I began to—he said, "Why, we are going to base the base on the Plain Talk article," and I wanted to say to Surine, "Don't you do that because I am going to kick about that article," but he ignored that and went on with this—

Q. Did you say that?—A. Yes, I did say that but I didn't get down to telling him how I had written it and he had written it different—

Q. You just told him?—A. He probably didn't know what it really involved, that statement by me, that I didn't think he ought to. I said the same thing in McCarthy's office but I got overruled with objections, with interruptions I mean.

Q. I wonder if you could just tell us, you said you did the same thing in McCarthy's office, can you recall?—A. It was very confusing. I got halfway into my statement about the statement that I didn't consider the Plain Talk article as a good basis for the attack because it was vulnerable, and we got no further. I tried it again with Surine. I was very disgusted I hadn't put over the point. When I got home I discussed it with my wife. I said I made the objection to the article being used but never got to the stage to explain why and they didn't seem interested. They said, "You don't need to worry" about one thing and another. McCarthy said, "We will ask the questions and you will answer them, and you will say nothing else."

Q. Did you have any further conferences with either Senator McCarthy or Mr. Surine?—A. Never.

Q. I believe you mentioned also something of Senator Wherry.—A. Yes, Mr. Dondero—

Q. Does that have any bearing on this?—A. Yes, Mr. Dondero went to the House Disbursing Office to get a check, and my wife from October until May 15 was working in the House Disbursing Office temporarily holding down a job of another girl, but of course they have local patronage so as soon as the other girl was available my wife had to go out. And Surine went in—I mean Dondero, Representative Dondero went in and met her and said, "Yes, yes, you are Mrs. Larsen. I know your husband. He is a fine man" and all that. She said, "That is certainly nice to hear somebody say that. Tell him I would like to see him. Tell him to get in touch with me tomorrow morning, come to see me." Next morning I called Dondero and he said, "Come up to my office." The person present besides Dondero was Kent Hunter. I don't know him, was introduced to him for the first time. He is a newspaperman, violently—

Mr. ACTULES. When was this.

A. Oh, it was before May 15.

Mr. ACHILLES. Of this year?

A. Yes, while my wife was still up there, maybe about the first of May. And Kent Hunter seemed to know the story of John Service very well and he knew the story—for the first time I learned the story of the visit to Lattimore. He asked me, "Why weren't you invited?" I said, "That is easy, I don't know Lattimore." All right. Then Dondero said to me, "Would you care—I don't want to question you myself but a very good friend of mine is Senator Wherry." I said, "I have heard of him." He said, "He is particularly interested in the homosexual side of the attack on the State Department and he wants to ask you." So I told him, "Well, let's get this straight. I am no homosexual and I don't know any homosexual." "He is interested in Lattimore." I said, "I don't know Lattimore. I could give you no information on Lattimore, but I am willing to go over there lest you think I am scared." "Let's go over there." So we started over. He had to go to the Capitol for some documents, walked through and said "hello" to my wife, walked on over to the Senate, and when we got in there, Mr. Wherry told me in a rather humorous vein, "You know I am the expert on homosexuality." I said, "Uh huh, very interesting." He said, "Do you know what kind of a guy Lattimore is?" I said, "I am sorry, I don't know what kind of a guy Lattimore is, particularly with reference to homosexuality." "Well, what do you know about Lattimore?" I said, "That is a big order. I have read most of his books. I will tell you right frankly that a book called the Mongols of Manchuria is a famous textbook. It is nonpolitical, especially as regards the Communist-Kuomintang dispute, because it was written before that time. I consider it a very fine book. I have always used it. I lived in Mongolia, in that area where the Manchua who went up into Mongolia to fight Gol Dan during Kanghsi's time, they didn't return from that expedition and they settled down there and became Mongols, married Mongolian women, and they are still living there, and they are to all purposes Mongolian, and they speak Mandarin, fluent Peking Mandarin. I verified that statement. Nobody else in the world I knew knows about that. They are a very small group. I was among them and I admire Lattimore for his intimate knowledge of the Mongols."

That was not very interesting to them. I don't think it is so interesting to you either, but nevertheless the picture is that he was very disgusted with my lack of knowledge. Here I was in the State Department. "Had you ever seen Mr. Lattimore in the State Department?" "No, sir." "But you knew that he was connected with the State Department?" "No, sir, I never in the State Department heard anyone mention him as connected with the State Department. I never saw material in the State Department written by Lattimore, of any kind."

Q. Did he ask you about Mr. Service?—A. Oh, yes. "Do you know John Service?" I said, "No, I don't know him." "Could you say that he is a pro-Communist?" I said, "No." I said, "I have felt at one time that he leaned strongly toward the so-called agrarian reformers, as they were known, and I myself was guilty of the same thing. Yes, it looks like they are, but I will repeat the statement to you as I have made to others who have asked me: I don't think I could say for certain that Mr. Service's statements and reports were not realistic reports because I was not out there myself at that time." He said, "When in the hell were you out there?" "From 1906 to 1935, with certain intervals abroad." So the interview ended rather brusquely.

Mr. Wherry struck me as one of these very hearty old men, slapped me on the back, said, "Well, if I call you again you will come in?" I said, "Certainly I will." Goodbye and thank you very much. We hope you will cooperate with us in this case." "Yes, to the best of my ability." "Fine." He never called me back again.

Now the third one, Mr. Ferguson—

Q. Senator Ferguson?—A. Senator Ferguson of Michigan called me some time ago when I was not home and the following morning I got in touch with his office, and he asked me if I could come immediately. I went over there and we talked about 20 minutes, and it was roughly the same story. He asked me, he said to me, "Now, you won't be mad with me, Mr. Larsen, if I ask you a very humiliating question?" I said, "No, I won't get mad." He said, "All right. How could you have been so naïve—I am putting it mildly, but if I were to use the word that came to my mind, so stupid—as to deal with a man like that." I gave him the same answer. "I thought, very honestly, thought very highly of Mr. Jaffe. I did not suspect he was a Communist spy, still do not quite believe it. I had a common interest with him. I do not believe I was too stupid. I was indiscreet, yes, put me down for that, but I will answer your question in this way. I was not stupid and I was not criminal in my dealings with Mr. Jaffe," and he didn't seem to like it very much. He said, "I don't think you have very much you can give me." I said, "That is up to you, Mr. Senator. You are perfectly welcome to ask me a lot more of embarrassing, humiliating, and pointed questions." He said, "I think I will have to get home. If we need you again, Mr. Reed, my assistant here, will call you." They have not called me.

Q. And you did not discuss the Plain Talk article with either Wherry or Ferguson?—A. No.

Q. Didn't attempt to?—A. No, I didn't attempt to. I answered their questions.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now 5:30. We will adjourn. Thank you very much. We will see you again tomorrow at 11?

Mr. LARSEN. 11 o'clock.

(The Board adjourned at 5:30.)

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: Thursday, June 1, 1950, 11:08 a. m. to 12:45 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State.

Reported by: E. L. Koontz, court stenographer, reporting.

Hearing in the above-entitled matter was reconvened at 11:08 a. m., Gen. Conrad E. Snow, chairman, presiding.

Board members present: Gen. Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, member; Arthur G. Stevens, member.

Also present: Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Appearances: Charles Edward Rheets, Esq., for Reilly, Rheets & Ruckelshaus, appearing on behalf of Mr. Service.

(The meeting reconvened at 11:08 a. m.)

Mr. RUETTS. Is Mr. Larsen here this morning?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Larsen advised us this morning that some other engagement prevented his being here this morning, but we could get in touch with him at 6 o'clock tonight as to the possibility of his appearance tomorrow morning.

Mr. RUETTS. His "possible" appearance tomorrow morning or probable? Does he intend to return?

Mr. MORELAND. Mr. Larsen phoned this morning and indicated that he had an appointment today with a prospective employer and that whether or not he could come tomorrow would depend on his conversation with his prospective employer and he indicated that if he couldn't come this week—this is a possibility—he could come next week.

Mr. RHETTS. Well, in that event, since we have to put off further cross-examination of Mr. Larsen I would like to call another witness. I assume that we shall proceed with other witnesses?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. RHETTS. In anticipation that Mr. Larsen will eventually return for further examination, I would like to call in Dr. Mortimer Graves at this time.

(Mr. Mortimer Graves, called as a witness in behalf of Mr. John S. Service, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RUETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Mr. Graves?—A. Mortimer Graves; office address, 1219 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

Q. And what is your occupation, sir?—A. Administrative secretary of the American Council of Learned Societies and have been for 25 years almost.

Q. Now, are you acquainted with Mr. Service, Dr. Graves?—A. Yes, I am acquainted with him. We are not closely acquainted and never have been closely associated.

Q. At the time Mr. Service was arrested in June of 1945, did you participate in any way in the collection of any funds to assist Mr. Service in his defense at that time?—A. I acted as treasurer for a group of his friends who asked me if I would accept contributions from them and convey them to Mr. Service or his representative, in this case I believe his sister-in-law, all of which I did.

Q. Could you indicate to the Board how this came about?—A. When the notice of the six arrests appeared in the newspaper I realized, of course, that I really knew three of them. Mr. Larson had held a fellowship under us about 1934, and I had followed his career. It was my job to know everybody who was working in the far eastern field—that was part of my field, Far East, Russian, Near East, and so forth. I knew Mr. Larson, I knew Mr. Roth, I knew who Mr. Service was, I think I have met him but I am not completely certain. I saw the opportunity to employ Mr. Larson, since he was free, on work of mine, which I did with the consent of my own superiors.

Q. This is after he resigned from the State Department?—A. Well, this was immediately after the business started and before we knew anything much about it. I happened to be discussing the question with a group of Mr. Service's friends at that time; naturally, people talked about this thing. This was exciting news, and they asked me if I would act in the way I have said, that's it.

Q. In other words, as I understand it, you happened to be with persons who were personal friends of Mr. Service's and they requested you to perform this function as treasurer of this fund?—A. Precisely. I was naturally in more or less constant touch with people in the far eastern field, that's my job.

Q. And how was the fund raised? Can you describe just briefly the mechanics of it?—A. Yes. The first suggestion was that 20 friends of John Service he discovered who would make themselves responsible for a sum of $50 apiece, that is to say, a total of a thousand dollars. We—at least the friends, not so much I—began to find people who would take this responsibility, and found a number of them, and the $50's began to come in. Now in some cases some of these people would just write out a personal check and send it in. In other cases it seemed to me they probably went around and collected it in smaller amounts from other friends of Mr. Service's because in some cases they came to me with the cash in hand in smaller bills and that is obviously what had happened. I kept no record because the group had said Mr. Service was sensitive about the matter. He didn't want to know who was helping him. There were, of course, people, friends of his, who couldn't afford to make contributions, at least couldn't afford to make substantial contributions and they wanted this element of anonymity preserved in the gift which presumably is the reason they asked me to act as treasurer. So that I never made available to Mr. Service, or any of his representatives, any information about who it was that was giving this money. It came into me in increments of $50 and it certainly never reached the $1,000 that we were shooting at, because Mr. Service refused to take—or at least his sister-in-law refused to take—the second installment that I tried to send her. I have in my mind a figure of $775, that is sheer memory, but I have every reason to believe that it is substantially accurate.

Q. That is the total amount of money that was raised?—A. I am not quite certain whether that is the total amount or whether that is the amount that I turned over to Mr. Service's sister-in-law, whose name for the moment escapes me, in the amount of $500, and I tried to make a subsequent payment and she sent the check back whereupon I found myself under the necessity of returning this fund to the donors, and since I kept no real record of it, aside from three or four persons whom I could remember, I spent most of the next year asking people whom I met: Did you contribute to this Service fund because if you did I owe you $10, and giving them $10 back.

Q. To the best of your recollection, then, you gave Mr. Service's sister-in-law, who is, I believe, Mrs. Service—A. Wright, naturally. I don't know what her first name is—

Q. To the best of your recollection you gave her one check for $500 which she accepted?—A. Yes.

Q. And a subsequent check which she returned?—A. Yes—well, I'm not, I think that's the story. I might have given her two subsequent checks, but I don't believe so.

Q. Now, as I understand it from your testimony this fund was raised exclusively by personal friends of Mr. Service and was raised exclusively to be devoted to assistance to Mr. Service; is that correct?—A. Absolutely, there was never any other question. It was a John Service Friendship Club.

Mr. ACHILLES. It had nothing to do with Mr. Larsen?

A. Nothing at all to do with Mr. Larsen. I employed Mr. Larsen, because he was free, on records which I had to have brought up to date, but I employed him from other funds, funds in my own office, a small amount in my office which I could trace, but it was certainly not a very large amount.

Questions by Mr. RHETS:

Q. So there was no suggestion at any time that this fund was being raised to be devoted to anyone other than Mr. Service?—A. Not the slightest; no. This was a completely friendly effort on behalf of Mr. Service by his friends.

Q. I believe you also indicated a moment ago that the funds came in in varying amounts, the largest of which I believe you said was $50?—A. Well, there were $50 increments. It may have been that at sometime somebody gave me two of these increments, but certainly no larger sum than that.

Q. No larger sum than $50.—A. As I say, the people—each member of the group made himself responsible for securing and giving to me $50.

Q. You indicated that your original objective was to raise a thousand dollars and at some point Mr. Service through his sister-in-law declined to accept further funds, and you abandoned your original target.—A. Yes.

Q. Is that correct?—A. Yes.

Q. I wonder if you would care to tell the Board what occurred after this? You had some money left on your hands—what happened next?—A. You see, I had this two-hundred-odd dollars, and when Mr. Service refused to accept it he suggested that it be turned over to Mr. Larson. I asked the donors whether they would agree to that—I asked a couple of them, I don't think I asked all of them—and their reaction was immediately to the effect that they had raised it for Mr. Service and that they didn't want it paid to Mr. Larson.

Q. Did Mr. Service talk with you about this problem personally?—A. I think Mr. Service made this suggestion.

Q. Do you know what occasioned this suggestion that the balance of the funds be made available to Mr. Larson?—A. Well, I shouldn't know, excepting that he was the one person who at that time was still in serious difficulties, I suppose.

Q. Do you recall what Mr. Service may have said to you in that connection?—A. No. I think it was more or less in the nature of an off-hand remark on his part, and whether it was a telephone conversation or a conversation in my office I couldn't say at this time, but I have a very definite recollection of the fact that at least two of the donors said: "No, indeed, this is for Mr. Service, and for nobody else."

Q. Now, in a news story appearing in the Washington Post from May 6, 1950, it is said that Mr. Louis F. Budenz had stated on the previous day that the former treasurer of the Communist Party, one Robert W. Weiner, who was also known as Mr. Welwel Warsover, was active in leading a drive to raise funds for the defense of the six defendants in the Amerasia case. Did you ever hear of Mr. Weiner or Warsover?—A. To my recollection I had never heard of him until I read this news report, nor had the slightest connection with him, never knew that he had assisted in it.

Q. You have indicated that the donors of this fund expressed a desire for anonymity, but would you care to state to the Board whether any of the funds which came to you as treasurer were from Mr. Weiner or from Mr. Warsover either directly or indirectly according to your knowledge.—A. To my knowledge they could hardly have possibly been unless he paid a $5 contribution to one of the people making the collections.

Q. I have no further questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I think perhaps there is something in your testimony that escaped me, but as I understood your opening remarks Mr. Service was the least known of the three to you?—A. To me, yes.

Q. How did it then happen that he was the only one with whom you became concerned in the raising of funds?—A. He wasn't the only one with whom I became concerned, General. I knew, as I said, Mr. Larson and Mr. Roth. I could tell a longer story if you want to listen to it, but the fact is that my records on Chinese people due to the war—I mean Americans who know Chinese—were very much out of date, most of the people that I had recorded had gone into Government and I had no records. I was looking for somebody who knew the situation with respect to the Chinese people—American students of China, to bring my records up to date. When Mr. Larson and Mr. Roth were temporarily out of employment, and since I was not dealing with any secret matter of any kind, this was an opportunity for me to get a man who would bring my records up to date, so that I employed Mr. Larson, as I said before, for a short time, as long as I could afford it, from funds that I had for the purpose of my records and he did a good job. I asked Mr. Roth at the same time if he would like to work on this operation and Mr. Roth said "No," that he had other things to do, and that sort of thing. Mr. Service I didn't know so well, but I did know, it is my business to know, most of these people in the Chinese field who happened to be friends of his, and in the course of my discussion of the matter with these people, whom I saw regularly more or less, this question of special assistance to Mr. Service arose. Now, the only reason to get the special operation in the case of Mr. Service is that Mr. Service did have this group of friends who wanted to do that for him and the others did not.

Q. They made the suggestion to you, I take it then?—They made the suggestion excepting that, in general, I probably said, as I usually do: "Well, is there anything we can do about this thing?"

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions?

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Had you known Mr. Larson and Mr. Roth for a long time?—A. Mr. Larson—in 1933 or '34 I put on an enterprise at the Library of Congress in the compilation of a biographical dictionary of China which appeared in two volumes and is called Eminent Chinese of the Ching Dynasty and is a major work in the Chinese field in the last quarter of a century. At that time I had a series of fellowships to give to people to work on this enterprise. Mr. Larson held one of those fellowships for a year or probably a year and a half, so that it was necessary at that time for me to have a dossier on him and to make the appointment for this fellowship. After that, of course, I more or less knew him because, again, it was my business to know these people and, in general, to discover what they were doing, so I had a dossier on him. From time to time he would come into my office, as he still does, as indeed most of these people still do.

Q. How about Lieutenant Roth?—A. Roth? Much the same story excepting that I followed his career. He probably had a couple of little fellowships from us for summertime study or something like that. So far as I can remember he had no such large fellowship. But, again, it was my business to know these youngsters, I still know most of them, and I would meet him probably once or twice a year. They would come into my office and talk over problems—when they were looking for jobs or for fellowships or publications I was the person to whom they would appeal.

Q. Were you concerned with the political orientation of these people?—A. No. Of course, we have never had the facilities for making any such investigations and, of course, in those days this wasn't the kind of thing that arose. Our concern was always with the development of a body of Americans scientifically competent in these areas and that still is my concern.

Q. You didn't consider the effect of their possible political orientations on the material that they were furnishing to the Council?—A. No; this was a question that would never arise with us, certainly, not then. I mean probably now when we are a little more awake to that kind of thing you would raise questions which you wouldn't have raised 15 years ago. I don't think the question ever occurred to us.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you aware, or did you have any knowledge of any other funds raised on behalf of any of the six persons arrested?

A. Not to my knowledge. I know of none.

The CHAIRMAN. No further questions?

Mr. RHETTS. I have none.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for coming in.

(Mr. Mortimer Graves after testifying left the meeting.)

Mr. RHETTS. Well, now, what is the pleasure of the Board? Shall we return to Mr. Service in connection with this phase of the case?

The CHAIRMAN. It is all right with the Board if that is what you would like.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to ask Mr. Service to take the stand and at the outset I would like to offer for inclusion in the transcript at this point Document 93-2, which is part 2 of Mr. Service's personal statement, and deals with the Amerasia phase of the case. This consists of page 34-a through 43 of the personal statement.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"PERSONAL STATEMENT OF JOHN S. SERVICE—PART 2

"During my period of consultation after my return to the Department on April 12, 1945, I saw a number of newspapermen and writers on China. This was in the normal course of events and a part of the usual function of officers on consultation who have newly returned from the field and are in a position to give background information. One of the people I remember seeing was Lawrence Rosinger of the Foreign Policy Association. I recall that he was having an interview with one of the officers in the Division of Chinese Affairs and as their discussion apparently concerned recent events in China I was called in to answer some questions. Another contact, I remember, was Raymond Swing, who was referred to me by my superior, Mr. Vincent, for background information in regard to some news report of the day. After discussing the particular point, Mr. Swing asked me for some comment on General Hurley and an opinion as to whether his negotiations were proceeding successfully. This I declined to discuss and referred him back to Mr. Vincent. Another press contact was with two members of the editorial staff of Fortune magazine which was preparing an exhaustive article on China. These researchers had approached General Olmstead who was G-5 on General Wedemeyer's staff and was then in Washington. General Olmstead had referred them to me for political background.

"I mention these instances, and I know there were many others, as indication that it was current policy to permit responsible officers to give background information to the press. At this time, of course, I had just returned from Yenan and was in possession of a great deal of recent information of great interest.

"Shortly after my arrival I received an invitation to meet on an off-the-record basis with the research staff of the IPR in New York. This invitation was in a brief letter addressed to me by Edward C. Carter. I discussed it with Mr. E. F. Stanton, Deputy and then Acting Director of FE, who approved my accepting. This meeting with the IPR took place on April 25. I believe that there were ten or twelve people present. Practically all of them were writers, including T. A. Hiss, Lawrence Rosinger, and a New Zealander named Belshaw. I did not give a prepared talk and most of the time was spent in answering questions and in general discussion.

"About April 17 or 18 I was looked up in the Department of State by Mark Gayn. I had never previously met Gayn but we shared a China background and he had been at Claremont College with my brother. I had read at least one of his books and seen articles on the Far East which he had written for Collier's. On this occasion he told me that he had a contract for a series of articles for the Saturday Evening Post and I had no reason to doubt his bona fides. We had lunch together, and he said that he had an extra bed in his apartment in New York which he would be glad to have me use if I ever visited that city. As background to this meeting with Gayn it should be mentioned that soon after I left Washington the previous November I had received a letter from Gayn saying that he had hoped to see me in Washington but had missed me by a few days. This was our only previous contact. Gayn did not mention to me his close association with Jaffe.

"About this same time I had received an invitation from Lieutenant Roth, whom I had met the previous November on the occasion of my talk to the IPR at Washington, for supper at his home on the evening of April 19. During that day he telephoned me saying that Philip Jaffe was also going to be at his home that evening but was anxious to see me before then, since there would be a number of people at the party and probably little opportunity to talk. Roth asked that I telephone Jaffe at his hotel and I did so. I knew of Jaffe as the editor of Amerasia but I had never previously met him nor had any contact by correspondence or otherwise with him. However, as he was the editor of a well known specialist magazine on the Far East I saw no reason why I should not meet and talk to him on a background basis as with any other reputable newspaperman or writer.

"In view of the later unhappy consequences of my meeting with Mr. Jaffe, I think I should emphasize at this point that this was in no sense abnormal, since it was entirely conformable to the policy concerning relations with the press which I had pursued under instructions in the field attached to General Stilwell's Headquarters and also the policy of the Department permitting Foreign Service Officers to provide background information to members of the press.

"The only time that we found suitable was for me stop at his hotel in the late afternoon and to go together to Roth's.

"When I prepared to leave the office before going over to Jaffe's hotel I had on my desk a number of my personal copies of memoranda written during my last visit at Yen-an. My eye alighted on a report of an interview with Mao Tse-tung about the end of March in which Mao had given details of the current Communist position and the probable line to be taken at the imminent Communist Party Congress. It occurred to me that Jaffe would probably be especially interested in recent news from Yen-an and particularly in recent statements of the Communist position in the controversy going on in China. I therefore put in my pocket my personal copy of this memorandum which contained nothing except the Communists' own presentation of their position. I believe this was my memorandum of April 1, Document 226. During the conversation Mr. Jaffe, as I expected, asked concerning the present Communist attitude and instead of trying to remember in detail I let him read the memorandum which I had brought with me. Jaffe was extremely interested and asked at once if I did not have other similar reports about Yen-an which it would be possible to show him. Since many of these memos were purely reportorial, containing only statements or observations available to and continually being obtained by newspapermen on the spot, I agreed to let Mr. Jaffe see some of this type of material. It was agreed that I would have lunch with him the next day at the hotel. I remember very little about the evening at Roth's except that a number of people mostly interested in the Far East were there, and there was some discussion of a book on Japan which Lieutenant Roth was in the last stages of completing. I am under the impression that as the party at Roth's broke up he gave Jaffe a portion of the manuscript to read. This was later published, after Navy clearance, under the title of 'Dilemma in Japan.' There was also some discussion during the evening of a book on China which Jaffe was writing. This was published in the fall of 1945 as New Frontiers in Asia.

"The following day I went through my personal copies of my Yen-an memoranda and carefully selected several. I think about eight or ten, which were purely descriptive and did not contain discussion of American military or political policy. These I considered it would be appropriate to allow Jaffe, as a writer, to see. I took these with me to lunch, which I found that Jaffe had ordered in his room. Roth was also there. Jaffe surprised me by saying that he was leaving Washington that afternoon and wished to take the memoranda with him for several days. I hesitated, but after considerable discussion and in view of the nonpolicy and purely factual nature of the papers, allowed Jaffe to keep them. It was arranged that I would pick them up when I visited New York.

"It was not usual to allow writers to have access to this type of factual material for background purposes, since reading the material or taking notes on it was always more satisfactory from the viewpoint of accuracy than merely relying on one's memory and oral recital. It was not, however, customary to loan such material and I have always regretted having turned it over to Jaffe, although at that time I had no reason to doubt his responsibility.

"Gayn learned that I was coming to New York for the meeting with the IPR and telephoned me that he was planning a small party and wished me to spend the night and to arrive early enough for supper. I agreed to do this and found at his home on the evening of April 21 about ten or twelve people, including Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe, Miss Kate Mitchell, William Sloane, a newspaper correspondent who had been in China, named Pepper Martin, and his wife, and Mr. and Mrs. Geddes who had just completed a book on President Roosevelt, and the editor of the Sunday book review section of the New York Times.

"The next day I saw various old friends in New York, had my meeting with the research staff of the IPR, and stopped in at Mr. Jaffe's office to pick up my memoranda. I slept that night again at Gayn's and learned to my surprise that he had been shown my memoranda by Jaffe and that they worked very closely together and pooled their information.

"About May 3 Jaffe again visited Washington and got in touch with me to request my help in getting him a copy of an FCY monitor report of a broadcast summary from Yen-an of an important policy speech given by Mao Tse-tung to the Communist Party Congress. I told Jaffe that I did not handle such material and had no idea whether it was classified. I suggested that he come to the Department and that I would introduce him to the responsible officer who would be able to give him a copy if permissible. Jaffe came to see me and I took him in to the executive officer in the Division of Chinese Affairs, Mr. A. Sabín Chase, and explained what Jaffe wanted. Mr. Chase had a copy of the monitor report, and said that it was quite customary to give such material to interested writers, and gave Jaffe a copy on the spot. The Yenon radio was very weak and the reception of its broadcasts often badly garbled. This was the case with this particular speech. Late in the afternoon Chase called me and said that FCC had received a much clearer second broadcast. Chase recalled that Jaffe had been interested and asked how he could contact him. I said that I knew where Jaffe was staying and would be glad to take it to him. This was just about closing time in the afternoon. I picked up the monitor report from Mr. Chase, walked over to the Statler Hotel where Jaffe was staying, and called him from the lobby. My recollection is that he came down in the elevator, I handed the report in an envelope to him, and left. The care with which the FBI interrogated me about this incident gave me the impression they had observed my handing Jaffe the envelope and had attached great significance to it.

"About May 8 Jaffe was again in Washington and called me up. I think it was during this visit that Jaffe said that he was well acquainted with T. A. Bisson and that Bisson hoped I would be able to come up to New York some week end and have a Sunday lunch at his home. I was already annoyed at Jaffe's rather aggressive manner and put him off with some statement that I would prefer to have an invitation direct from Bisson. A few days later Jaffe telephoned me and said that Bisson would like me to come up on Sunday, May 19. At the same time he gave some excuse why Bisson was unable to contact me directly. I agreed to go and arranged to spend the Saturday night at Gayn's. Later Jaffe telephoned again and said that the Gayns were spending the evening at Kate Mitchell's and that I should come there to meet them. I did not go up to New York until in the evening and arrived at Miss Mitchell's about 10 or 10:30 p. m. Although so described in Plain Talk, the party was certainly not for me. There were a number of people there whom I had never met and do not remember. They had already finished dinner and the party was watching a crap game (which I do not play). I had one or two drinks, and then went home with the Gayns.

"The plans, it developed, were that the Jaffes, Miss Mitchell, and the Gayns were also going to Bisson's. Jaffe picked us up the next morning and drove us all there in his car. The Sunday lunch was a picnic in the Bisson's garden at their home on Long Island. One of my few memories is that Gayn and Jaffe got into an argument over the relative freedom of the press in the United States and Russia. Jaffe followed the Party line while Gayn opposed it. During the afternoon we took a short walk down to a nearby beach. Miss Mitchell outlined a book which she was writing on China, and said that she was particularly interested in getting material on the recent trend of the Kuomintang toward greater emphasis on Chinese classical ethics and philosophy. She asked for suggestions on recent material and from memory I mentioned several publications and other public materials which I knew of. This was the only conversation with Miss Mitchell of which I have any specific recollection.

"On May 29 I was invited by a Miss Rose Yardounian, whom I had met at the Washington office of the IPR and at several social functions, to attend a farewell party for Andrew Roth, who had been transferred to the Hawaiian Islands. I had not known that Jaffe was coming, and was rather surprised when he again telephoned me and asked me to see him in his hotel and go with him to the party. I do not like to be "monopolized." I agreed, however, to stop by the hotel and go on to the party with Jaffe. Apparently his reason for wanting to see me was to press the request for information on the trend toward Confucianism of the Kuomintang. I recalled that a Confucius society had been established in Chungking under very high official auspices in 1942 or 1943 and suggested that he look up newspaper files, especially the Chinese News Service, as the event had been given great official publicity at the time. Jaffe was afraid that it would be difficult to find files that old and wanted me to look up any dispatches on the subject. I agreed that the Embassy had certainly reported on the matter but explained that I could not and would not think of taking from the files or turning over to him any official dispatches. I did agree that if I had an opportunity I would try to find the approximate dates to help him in a search of newspaper files (incidentally, I never did anything about it). Continuing the same line, I mentioned that he could get some material on this subject from a study of Kuomintang propaganda. This was a topic on which I had prepared a very exhaustive report while on duty in the Embassy. Jaffe again pressed me to allow him to see my report and again I explained to him that this would be impossible. I remembered a few common wall slogans which seemed pertinent to his subject and mentioned them to him. This party on May 29 was the last time I ever saw Jaffe. I have had no communication with him since.

"It may seem unusual that I was so accessible to Jaffe, Gayn, and these other people. The fact, however, is that my family was still in California and I was staying alone in a small downtown apartment. I had most of my meals with friends and if I received an invitation and did not have a previous engagement I usually accepted.

"Since my return from China I had had several casual contacts with either Mr. or Mrs. Lattimore, whom I had known since 1936 in Peiping, and they had spoken of having me down for a week end during November 1-44. I was finally invited for the first week end in June. Without my knowing it in advance, Roth and Rose Yardounian were also invited for the same week end and Mrs. Lattimore suggested that we come down together. Roth, I remember, was very pleased by the invitation because he was about to publish his book on Japan (it had already been cleared by ONI) and was very anxious to become better acquainted with Lattimore and to have Lattimore's comments on some sections of the book. We went to Baltimore on Saturday afternoon and that evening was spent in general discussion. As I recall it, Lattimore took the galley proofs of the book with him when he retired for the night. I do not remember ever reading the galley proofs myself. The next day we took a walk through the woods in the morning, and several friends of Lattimore's from Johns Hopkins University came for a picnic lunch. This is the incident described in McCarthy's statement of March 30 concerning Lattimore. I do not recall that we spent any of the time by ourselves; on the contrary I spent my time being sociable with people whom I had not previously met. I had no documents with me, but Owen had previously mentioned that some of his graduate students were doing research work on Chinese Communism and were searching for recent Communist publications. I had told Owen that I had a new edition of Mao's papers and he had asked if he could borrow it. I took the volume with me on this trip and left it with Lattimore. This book was my personal property.

"I was arrested by the FBI just after leaving the office on the evening of June 6. When informed of the charges, I told the arresting agents that I was not guilty and of course wished to do what I could to clear up the matter. I was forthwith interrogated extensively and gave a detailed voluntary statement. I have asked that this statement be made a part of the record. The following day my sister-in-law obtained the services of a bondsman and I was released from detention in the District jail. Subsequently a fund of $500 was raised by various friends to cover the cost of the bondsman's services.

"With my attorney's approval I requested a personal hearing before the grand jury and appeared briefly on August 3 and again on August 6. On August 10 the Department of Justice announced that the grand jury had returned a no true bill in my case. On August 11 I appeared before the Personnel Board of the Foreign Service and immediately afterward was informed that I would be reinstated on active duty as of August 12 (I had been on leave with pay since the time of the arrest)."

(Mr. John S. Service, a witness in his own behalf, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. RHETTS. The Board has supplied to Mr. Service typewritten copies of certain documents which were shown to Mr. Service when he appeared before the grand jury in the summer of 1945 and about which he was questioned before the grand jury. I should like to ask the Board at this time to furnish me with the actual documents which were shown to Mr. Service at that time, or such reproductions of them as the Board has in its possession.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you identify the documents?

A. Yes, sir. Documents consisting of Documents 216 through 220, and Documents 221, 223, and 227. They have been numbered in this proceeding.

Mr. RHETTS. In short, we were given typewritten copies of documents. I should now like to have the original documents which were in question, if the Board has them.

The CHAIRMAN. This will be done.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. As I understand it, the documents which Mr. Moreland has just handed me consist of photostats of ozalid reproduction, is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. Correct.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you a photostat of an ozalid reproduction, Document 216, and I ask you whether the ozalid reproduction was one of the documents which were shown to you by the grand jury, and about which you were questioned?—A. I believe it was; yes.

Q. This, as I understand it, is one of the documents which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession at the time of his arrest?—A. That is what I was told by Mr. Hitchcock during a grand jury hearing.

Q. And I believe we have been further advised here by the Board that that was the case, is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. Correct.

Q. Now, did you give this ozalid to Mr. Jaffe at any time?—A. I did not.

Q. Had you ever seen this ozalid before it was shown to you in the grand jury?—A. No; I did not.

Q. That is an ozalid reproduction of one of your memoranda, is it not?—A. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. Had you seen any ozalid of that?

A. No; I had not. I had not had occasion to consult the files of the Division of Chinese Affairs where such ozalids would be kept. I was familiar with the subject matter since I myself had written it, and while I was on consultation in the Division of Chinese Affairs, or actually in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, I was not on the routing list, so that I did not have material going over my desk.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Did you have a typed carbon copy of this memoranda in your personal files?—A. Yes, I d'd.

Q. In it—and I am referring to the period from April 12, 1945, onward after your return here from China?—A. Yes. I had a personal copy which I had brought back with me from Chungking with authorization of the Army headquarters there.

Q. Now I show you a photostat of an ozalid reproduction of Document No. 217, Mr. Service, and I ask you whether this ozalid was one of the papers shown to you before the grand jury about which you were questioned there?—A. I believe it was; yes.

Q. This is a reproduction of one of your memoranda, is it not?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you give this ozalid or any ozalid reproduction of this memorandum to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had you ever seen an ozalid reproduction of this memorandum before this ozalid was shown to you before the grand jury?—A. I am positive that I never did. As a matter of fact, I was very surprised when they showed me these ozalids because I had never realized how the Department had reproduced these memoranda. I brought them in in the form of typewritten originals without having placed a reverse carbon behind them, which is customary in making ozalids, and I was very surprised to see that they had succeeded in reproducing them by the ozalid process at that time.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I ask at that point whether these two documents, 216 and 217, were ones which had first been brought to the Department by you by hand?

A. Yes, sir. I brought them back with me from China, and immediately after my arrival in the Department of State—I arrived here on April 12, and probably that same day, or at the latest the next day, I delivered the originals myself by hand, as I remember it, to Mr. Sabin Chase, who was, I think, in the position of being executive officer for the Division of Chinese Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. Were these two reports Yenian reports?

A. Yes they belong to the 1945 series of Yenian reports.

Mr. STEVENS. Is that the series which you brought back by hand?

A. I didn't bring the entire series, sir, I brought back, well, I couldn't tell you now. Some of the 1945 series were prepared in Chungking and some of the early ones which I prepared at Yenian were forwarded to Chungking. I brought back the latter part of the series, which had not previously been delivered to the Embassy in Chungking. I brought those back at the Embassy's suggestion since it was far faster.

Mr. STEVENS. Will you be able to identify those, Mr. Service, that you brought back?

A. I can't positively no. I don't believe so.

The CHAIRMAN. But you have stated these ones were ones you brought back?

A. Yes. I am not quite sure where the group would commence. It would commence, I think, after my Report No. 10. I am not sure, or it might even include my Report No. 10.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you the original of this Document No. 217, which we have just been discussing and I ask you to state what distribution was made of that document according to the handwriting appearing at the top of the paper?

The CHAIRMAN. Will you first indicate if it appears, please, the date of receipt of that original by the Department?

A. The earliest date I find stamped on here is April 27, 1945. There is a story back of that, sir, and I think that—I hope that Mr. Chase, if he arrives here in time, will be able to clarify it. These were handed to Mr. Chase and he was swamped with work, and I was told that they simply got to the bottom of his basket and stayed in the bottom of his basket for a long period before he did anything about putting them in circulation or getting them reproduced and it was only after some of the other officers of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs checked on the reports and what had happened to them that they were put into circulation. They did not go to DC R first because I handed them directly to the officer on the desk and he did not put them into circulation and send them down to DC R until the 27th, apparently.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Returning to my question about the distribution of the document, which is indicated. A. Well, there are two series of distribution symbols. Up at the top of the page I see the following: Copies to: MID, 2 ONI (with no number written after it, presumably one copy), OSS, 2; CA, 2. That distribution was normally written on by the responsible officer in the Division of Chinese Affairs who determined the number of copies that should be made to guide the Reproduction Section.

Q. That listing there would be the clue to how many copies the reproduction section would make of the document, is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Presumably, as to this document, the reproduction section would have made seven ozalids of this original paper, is that it?—A. They would make at least that number. I believe it was customary to make a few extras because there are other offices that have authority to request copies and so on. Now, over at the top right-hand corner there is a series of personal initials and divisional symbols showing divisions to whom this was routed. I see the initials of: Everett F. Drumwright, Paul W. Meyer, Edwin F. Stanton, and then the initials of the divisional symbols, CA for China Affairs under it name of Mr. Chase; then the divisional symbol DC/L.

Q. What does that mean, if you know?—A. I would say it is a liaison division. I am not sure, liaison division of DC, I think.

Mr. ACHILLES. I believe that's correct.

Mr. RHETTS. Liaison between what and what?

A. I am sorry, I am not—

Mr. ACHILLES. As I understand it, that is the section of the Division of Communications and Records which is responsible for transmitting copies to other Government agencies.

Mr. RHETTS. I see. Thank you.

A. The next symbol is FC/L which is the Division of Foreign Activity Correlation. Under that divisional symbol there are these various personal initials: H. J. C.; V. A.; O. S., what appears to be "E. S." and C. P. E. Then, the last divisional symbol DC/R which is the Records Branch of the Division of Communications and Records.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do those same distribution symbols appear on the ozalid copy?

A. Some of them do. The ozalid copy clearly shows the series of distribution symbols which I mentioned first and they appear at the top closer to the left-hand side of the page. In other words, copies to MID, ONI, OSS, and CA.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. However, it shows two copies to MID, does it not? It does not reflect the numerals 2 beside OSS or beside CA, does it?—A. No; which would indicate that those might have been added later, the numerals there.

Q. Or that they did not come through in the ozalid reproduction?—A. Yes; since we know that the ozalid process reproduces rather poorly handwritten or pencil writing.

Mr. ACHILLES. In other words, the indications for distribution to MID and the other agencies were added to the original before it was reproduced?

A. That's correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. Whereas the others were added to the original afterward?

A. Probably, although we can't say with certainty because some of these initials here are written in pencil rather faintly and might not be reproduced by the ozalid process, but it is probably correct that the officer in the Division of Chinese Affairs received the document, wrote on the instructions for distribution to MID, ONI, OSS and CA, and it then probably went to the reproduction division.

Mr. ACHILLES. Presumably all of the ozalid copies would have those same indications of distribution which were penciled on the original before it was reproduced?

A. That's right.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. To complete your answer, do any of the divisional distribution which you described beginning with E. F. D. and ending with DC/R—do any of those appear on the ozalid reproduction?—A. They do not, but—

Q. And that, you suggest, is accounted for by the fact that they were added on the original after it was reproduced.

Mr. RHETTS. Is there anything further on that document the Board wishes to ask?

Mr. ACHILLES. Can you think of anything which would appear on any ozalid copy of that document which would indicate whether that particular ozalid copy was a State Department copy or one which was furnished to MID or another agency?

A. Just to check that we are looking at the same, this is document 217. Yes; written at the top is "return CA," this would tend to indicate to me that it is one of the two ozalid copies which were made for CA.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that also true of 216?

A. Yes, sir. It also appears on the ozalid, the writing at the top "return CA."

The CHAIRMAN. Now let me ask you as to 216 and 217—if you gave copies in any form to Mr. Jaffe of these two documents?

Mr. RHETTS. We can go into this now, General, or deal with that whole problem later.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you like to reserve that question for the moment?

Mr. RHETTS. It had been my intention to cover that phase of it after going over the actual documents found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, we will take it later.

Mr. ACHILLES. One further question on those distribution symbols: Is there anything to indicate those words "return to CA" were written on the original or only on the ozalid copy—do they appear on the original as well?

A. No, sir; they do not appear on the original and customarily such instructions would not be written on the original since the original must be sent eventually to DC/R for filing there. It would only be written on an ozalid copy or some reproduced copy which is to be retained in the files of a working division rather than DC/R.

Mr. ACHILLES. Then it appears that those words "return CA" were written on the ozalid and appear here due to photostatic reproduction and, therefore, those words would not appear on the ozalid copies furnished to other agencies.

A. No; they would appear only on the two ozalids. I assume, which were made for CA, and, in fact, I remember very clearly in the grand jury when I was shown these documents that the "return CA" was written on, as I remember, in red pencil. It was not a part of the reproduced document, the letters weren't on there as part of the ozalid.

Mr. ACHILLES. And you were shown before the grand jury the actual ozalid that was found?

A. That is my recollection.

Mr. ACHILLES. That was said to have been found in Jaffe's possession?

A. That is my recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. You conclude, then, from this marking that in the case of these two papers the ozalid copies which were before the grand jury were actually taken from CA files?

A. Well, they were intended to be a part of CA files. The very fact that "return to CA" was written on them implies that CA had sent them to some other unit or branch or office, otherwise there would be no necessity to write on them "return to CA."

Mr. RHETTS. Is that necessarily true? May that have been written on there in the Division of Reproduction?

A. That is possible. Of course, it is possible. I really can't give a positive answer to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Whoever put "return to CA" on there was probably somebody in CA who intended to get the paper back; right?

A. That's a hypothesis.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. Now I show you, Mr. Service, a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of document 216. That is a copy of one of your memoranda, is it not?—A. It is.

Q. Were you shown this ozalid before the grand jury and questioned about it?—A. I believe I was.

Q. Did you ever give that ozalid or any other ozalid reproduction of that document to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Had you ever seen an ozalid reproduction of that memorandum before it was shown to you by the grand jury?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Did you have a typed carbon copy of that memorandum in your own personal files?—A. I did.

Q. Will you state what distribution of the document is indicated by it?

The CHAIRMAN. Now is this going to be a repetition of what you have put in before?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Just ask then, if it is the same distribution, to shorten the examination.

Mr. RHETTS. Well, I don't know if it is the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Do we need to go into the individual distribution list of each document separately?

Mr. RHETTS. Well, I proposed to, because one of the things I wish to show here is the opportunities for others than Mr. Service to have had an access.

The CHAIRMAN. My only object is to shorten the examination, not to engage in a debate. Do as you like, but make it as short as you can.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Chairman, I think it might be useful to go into that in some detail because in the case of documents 216 and 217 I think we have established that the ozalid copy physically in Jaffe's possession was one of the two copies meant for CA.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, if you can reach the same conclusion more rapidly in the other documents I would appreciate it.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. Now, directing your attention to the original of document 218, am I correct that this shows distribution: 2 copies to MID, 1 to ONI, 2 to OSS, 2 to CA?—A. That is correct.

Q. And then on the right-hand side of the paper it shows divisional distribution similar to that which you have indicated for document 217, is that correct?—A. It is generally similar except that a copy does not seem to have been sent to FC/L.

Q. Now on the photostatic reproduction of the ozalid, does this also indicate "return CA"?—A. It does.

Mr. ACHILLES. Thus indicating again, does it not, that the ozalid copy in Jaffe's possession was one of the CA copies.

Q. Now I show you a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of Document No. 219 and I ask you whether this is a reproduction of one of your memoranda?—A. It is.

Q. Were you shown this ozalid by the grand jury and questioned about it?—A. I believe this is one of those I was shown.

Q. Did you ever give that ozalid or any ozalid reproduction of that memorandum to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Had you ever seen an ozalid reproduction of that memorandum before it was shown to you by the grand jury?—A. No; I had not.

Mr. STEVENS. You had had a copy of that in your own file?

A. I had a copy; yes.

Q. Now directing your attention to the original of this document it shows distribution: 2 copies to MID, 1 copy to ONI, 2 copies to OSS, and 2 copies to CA; does it not?—A. It does.

Q. And it also shows in the right-hand corner certain divisional distribution within the State Department; does it not?—A. Yes.

Q. Now does the ozalid reproduction of this document indicate "return CA"?—A. Yes; it does.

Q. Thus indicating that the ozalid found in Mr. Jaffe's possession was one of the two copies of the ozalids which were sent to CA?—A. That is correct.

Q. I now show you a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid reproduction of document No. 220 and ask you whether that is a reproduction of one of your memoranda?—A. It is.

Q. Were you shown this ozalid at the grand jury and questioned about it?—A. I believe I was; yes.

Q. Did you ever give this ozalid or any other ozalid to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you ever see this or any ozalid reproduction of that memorandum before it was shown to you in the grand jury?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have a typed carbon copy of that memorandum in your personal files?—A. Yes; I had a personal copy.

Q. Directing your attention to the original of the document 220 it shows distribution of 2 copies to MID, 1 to ONI, 2 to OSS, and 2 to CA; does it not?—A. It does.

Q. And it also shows certain divisional distribution within the State Department on the right-hand corner?—A. It does.

Q. Does the ozalid reproduction of this document indicate also the words "return CA"?—A. It does.

Q. Indicating that this ozalid also was one which was found in Jaffe's possession, was one of the two ozalids distributed to the CA; is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. Now in that connection two other copies of this same paper were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession—typed copies. Will you look at those and see if they can be identified?

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you a photostatic reproduction of two pages of typewriting and I identify it by referring to certain handwriting in the upper right-hand corner which shows 110b, that is to say, lower case "b", not capital "B", and ask you if you have ever seen the document of which this is a photostatic reproduction?—A. No; I have not.

Q. This is a copy of one of your memoranda, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. Can you say more definite: This is a copy of your report which is Document No. 220?

A. Yes; it appears to be. At a glance it appears to be. I haven't checked it exactly, but it appears to be a copy my Report No. 17, which is Document 220. I have noticed a number of typing mistakes and so on. There may be other errors in copying.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. ACHILLES. I have got a question: Can it be told by comparing the reproduction of the typewritten copy with the original of the same document whether the typed copy was a carbon copy of the original or was typed subsequently? Can that be told by the arrangement of the paragraphs and spacing?

A. Oh, yes; this is definitely not a carbon copy of the original because it—For instance, take the very first words—the date and number are placed differently on the copy than they are on the original. It is on a different kind of paper. It is on short paper, whereas the original was on long paper. The margins are different and as I mentioned a while ago there are certain obvious typing mistakes, copying mistakes even in the title. The fourth word in the copy is "terkitorial" instead of "territorial".

Mr. ACHILLES. And the typed copy which you had in your possession was a carbon copy made when the original was made?

A. That is true; that is correct; it was an exact carbon copy of the original. I typed all those things myself on a portable typewriter and I never made any additional copies at all. I did them all at once.

Mr. ACHILLES. You never had an occasion to make a subsequent copy of that?

A. Never.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you a photostatic reproduction of two typewritten pages also bearing the words "March 17, 1945—No. 17" and on the right-hand side of this photostat there are in handwriting the figures 118a, lower case, and I ask you to tell the Board what that is?—A. I believe that is an exact duplicate of the copy which you have just shown me, a photostat of the typed paper.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that contain the same misspelling?—A. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. That answers my question.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you a photostatic reproduction of an old ozalid copy of Document 221 and I ask you if that is a reproduction of one of your memorandums?—A. It is.

Q. Were you shown this ozalid at the time of your questioning before the grand jury?—A. I believe I was.

Q. Did you ever give this ozalid or any ozalid reproduction of this memorandum to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you ever see this or any other ozalid reproduction of the memorandum before it was shown to you in the grand jury?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Directing your attention to the original document, this shows distribution as follows: MID, two copies; ONI, one presumably; OSS, two copies; CA, two copies; does it not?—A. It does.

Q. And it also in the right-hand corner shows certain divisional distribution within the State Department?—A. That's correct.

Q. Now directing your attention to the photostatic reproduction of the ozalid does this show "return CA" as on the other documents?—A. No; it does not.

Q. Did you have your carbon copy of this memorandum in your personal files?—A. Yes; I had a personal copy.

Mr. ACHILLES. Is there anything that you can see on that ozalid copy which would indicate in any way whether that came from CA or some other unit?

A. No, sir; I don't think I can see anything on here that would tie this particular ozalid or the ozalid from which this was copied to CA, or any other specific division.

Mr. ACHILLES. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. May I look at it a minute?

(The Chairman read the ozalid.)

Mr. ACHILLES. I can see no indication from those copies as to which agency that might belong to.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you the photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of Document 223, and ask you if that was one of the ozalids which was shown to you and about which you were questioned before the grand jury?—A. This is a reproduction of one of my reports, and I believe it is one of those concerning which I was interrogated by the grand jury.

Q. Did you furnish that or any other ozalid to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Had you ever seen that or any other ozalid reproduction of your memorandum before it was shown to you in the grand jury?—A. No.

Q. Did you have your own copy of that memorandum in your personal file?—A. I did.

Q. Directing your attention to the original of Document 223, it shows distribution: Two copies to MID; one presumably to ONI; two, to OSS; and two, to CA; does it not?—A. It does.

Q. In the right-hand corner it also shows certain divisional distribution within the State Department of the original?—A. That's right.

Q. Does the ozalid copy indicate "return CA"?—A. It does.

Q. So that this indicates that this ozalid was one of the two ozalids made and distributed in CA?—A. That's correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in that connection, are you going to go on to the typed copy?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say for the record that a typed copy of the same paper was found in the possession of Mr. Jaffe.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I show you a four-page photostatic reproduction of certain typewritten material headed March 21, 1945, No. 21, and I ask you if you ever saw the typewritten material of which that is a photostatic reproduction?—A. I did not.

Q. Is that a copy of document No. 223?—A. It appears to be.

Q. It is not a carbon copy, however, is it?—A. No, sir; it is not.

Q. Of the original?—A. No, sir; it is not a carbon copy of the original.

Q. It is on different size paper, is it not?—A. It is on different size paper and different arrangement of the heading, and actually with the omission of some of the typewritten symbols on the original.

Q. That is to say it is not an exact copy of the original document?—A. Not an exact copy.

Q. Now I show you a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of document 227. I wish to correct that—227 is not an original of Mr. Service's memorandum No. 18, it is a typed copy of the original, so that it is not correct to say that I have shown you a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of document 227. Instead I show you a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of your original memorandum No. 18, dated March 18, 1945, and ask you if that ozalid was shown to you in the grand jury.—A. I believe it was.

Q. Did you ever give that or any other ozalid copy of that memorandum to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you ever see that or any other ozalid reproduction of your memorandum before it was shown to you in the grand jury?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have your carbon copy of that memorandum in your personal files?—A. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't asked about the "CA"?

Mr. RHETTS. That's correct, excuse me, there is nothing on it. On the photostatic copy of the ozalid it shows distribution of two copies to MID; and one, presumably, if this is faithfully reproduced, the distribution on the original, one each to ONI, OSS, and CA, does it not?

A. Yes. But it should be noted that the ozalid reproduction is perhaps not complete there and not clear.

Q. That is, the numerals beside each of these symbols may not in every case have been reproduced by the ozalid?—A. That is right.

Q. Is there anything on this—does this bear the words "return CA" on it?—A. No, sir; it does not.

Q. Is there anything on the face of that document that indicates to what agency or division it was distributed?—A. I see nothing.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. No, I see no indication.

Mr. RHETTS. Now, I would like at this point to ask the Board whether there is any allegation from the FBI or elsewhere that Mr. Service ever transmitted any documents other than the documents which have just been discussed to Mr. Jaffe?

The CHAIRMAN. The meeting will recess.

(The meeting was recessed at 12:45 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY REVIEW BOARD MEETING IN THE MATTER OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: June 1, 1950, 2:30 to 5:35 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State.

Reported by: Elizabeth Wake, court stenographer, reporting.

Hearing in the above-entitled matter was reconvened at 2:30 p. m., Gen. Conrad E. Snow, chairman, presiding.

Board members present: Gen. Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, member; Arthur G. Stevens, member.

Also present: A. B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhettts, firm of Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you ready to ask your questions?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Ask your question again for the record and we will eliminate the question and answer at the end of the morning session.

Mr. RHETTS. Were you questioned before the grand jury about any other documents than the ones we have just discussed?

Mr. SERVICE. As far as I can remember, I wasn't.

Mr. RHETTS. Were you asked general questions as to whether you supplied any other documents, do you recall?

Mr. SERVICE. No, I don't recall.

Mr. RHETTS. I would like to ask the Board whether it has any evidence or whether there is any evidence that Mr. Service has transmitted to Mr. Jaffe any other documents found in Mr. Jaffe's possession?

The CHAIRMAN. The Board has evidence before it that some parts of Mr. Service's reports, or copies of them, were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. The Board is interested as to what extent, if any, Mr. Service is responsible for these copies being in Mr. Jaffe's possession.

Mr. RHETTS. May I inquire, Does the Board refer to documents about which it questioned Mr. Larsen yesterday?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the same.

Mr. RHETTS. Very well; I would like at this time to question Mr. Service about the remainder of those documents.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me add this: That I understand from Mr. Service's statement, which has been made part of the record this morning, that he admits he loaned to Mr. Jaffe copies of about 8 or 10 of his reports. The Board would like to have identified, if possible, the 8 or 10 reports of which copies were loaned to Mr. Jaffe.

Mr. RHETTS. I think, General, if you refer to Mr. Service's statement, I do not know of any place where he indicates he loaned Mr. Jaffe 8 or 10 of his personal copies of these reports. He does state that he recalls for certainty that—

The CHAIRMAN. I refer to page 38 of the statement: "The following day I went through my personal copies and carefully selected several, about 8 or 10." I understand from the rest of the statement that he loaned the 8 or 10 to Mr. Jaffe.

Mr. RHETTS. You are correct. I had not recalled whether he attempted to specify the number. What is your request?

The CHAIRMAN. As to the 8 or 10, we would like to have them identified as far as possible, and we would like to know whether or not Mr. Service had any connection with any of the other Service reports which were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession: and if so, under what circumstances?

Mr. RHETTS. Very well; I will undertake to elicit all that information as we go along in the examination of these documents.

In view of the request the Board has just made it may be well, before going on to additional documents, that I go back and ask Mr. Service some questions with respect to the first eight that we have just discussed, to cover one of the points which you raised.

(Continuation of testimony by Mr. Service:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I believe you testified that you recalled specifically having lent to Mr. Jaffe your personal copy of your memorandum reporting on a conversation with Mao Tse-tung. What date, do you recall, did that memorandum bear?—A. April 1, 1945.

Q. It would have been your number—A. It was my report No. 26.

Q. Now you have also testified that in response to Mr. Jaffe's request you also showed him certain additional memoranda which you had in your personal files. Are you able to recall which of your memoranda you showed Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; not with certainty. I could not recall it in 1945 and I cannot recall now exactly which ones I allowed him to see. I remember going through my reports and exercising a judgment in each case as to whether or not the material was such as would be appropriate to allow him to see it for background purposes; in other words, if the material was factual and was available to the other correspondents in Yenai and presumably was being incorporated in the books which at least two of them were writing at the time. I concluded that it would be permissible to allow Jaffe to see my personal copies, which were the only notes I had of my observations and conversations at Yenai.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the reports you allowed them to see exclusively Yenai reports?

A. Yes, sir, because I had no other personal copies in my possession except these personal copies of reports which I had written in Yenai.

The CHAIRMAN. Among the reports, copies of which were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession, could you indicate for the record how many of these were Yenai reports? I take it that the eight you already discussed this morning were all Yenai reports.

A. They were.

The CHAIRMAN. What other documents, among the list found in Mr. Jaffe's possession, were Yenai reports?

A. Would you like me to list them, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. Has Mr. Service been shown a complete set of the documents found in Jaffe's possession?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; Mr. Service has a list of the Service papers found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. This is the same list Mr. Larsen was examined on yesterday.

A. The list was not in any chronological order that I can see, sir, and in a little time I will straighten them out. Would you like me to straighten them?

The CHAIRMAN. You may go through the list as it is and indicate when you come to a Yenau report.

A. The first item on the list?

The CHAIRMAN. Following the part that you have testified about this morning. (Off the record.)

The CHAIRMAN. We have already Documents 217, 216, 218, 227, 219, 220, 223, and 221 as Yenau reports. What other Yenau reports are in your list of documents?

A. Suppose I just give the list of 1944 reports.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those Yenau reports? Let me ask you before you do that, did you have with you copies of the 1944 reports?

A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not complete the list of 1945 reports first?

A. All right. My report No. 10, document 214; my report No. 20, document 222; my report No. 26, document 226; my report No. 22, document 224. I think that is all, sir, for 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. You also had with you, when you returned, copies of your 1944 Yenau reports?

A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you show any of those?

A. I may have shown one or two of those.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the 1944 Yenau reports?

A. Report No. 3, document 166; report No. 7, document 167; report No. 5, document 168; report No. 1, document 164; report No. 2, document 165.

(Off the record.)

A. Report No. 13, document 174; report No. 31, document 185; report No. 40, document 193; report No. 15, document 177; report No. 34, document 188; report No. 38, document 191. Excuse me, sir, in that list the document appears twice. There is no need to list it twice. Report 39, document 192; report No. 16, document 177; report No. 20, document 177; report No. 19, document 180; report No. 22, document 182; report No. 37, document 190; report No. 26, document 183. That is all of the Yenau reports that I see, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It was from among that group of reports that you showed him, as stated in your statement, some 10 or a dozen reports?

A. Yes, sir; the ones that I allowed him to see were from among those two lists.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have at the time copies of other of your Yenau reports? Did you have in your possession at that time copies of others of your Yenau reports not on this list?

A. Yes, I had very nearly a complete file. There were some reports which I did not have. I am not sure just how many may have been missing but I had a number of reports in my own possession which are not listed here.

Mr. ACHILLES. Have you a complete file from the time you first went to Yenau with the military mission?

A. Yes, from the time of my arrival in Yenau on July 22, 1944, I think, until I left Yenau on about October 23, 1944, and again from the time of my arrival in Yenau, I think, in the spring of 1945 until my departure. I am not sure. I may have had in my possession my file copies of all the reports which I wrote—personal memoranda I wrote in the spring of 1945, from my arrival in Chungking until my departure.

Mr. ACHILLES. And you had those copies here in the Department with you?

A. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. What happened to those copies?

A. Well, I understood that the FBI had searched my office after my arrest and removed the entire contents, or practically the entire contents that seemed to pertain to me in any way. They returned some of the material to me fairly soon after the arrest and another batch of material was returned to me after the grand jury action, and a final batch was retained by the Department of Justice. I inquired of one of the attorneys handling the case about the matter and he said they would all be returned to me as my personal papers. They wished to retain them temporarily until the case was concluded against some of the other men arrested, and he promised me they would be returned to me after that time.

I had to leave the country and the next time I returned to the United States I got in touch with the Department of Justice. They found the record and promised to return the papers, but they told me they were not able to locate the papers, so those papers are still in possession of the Department of Justice.

The other papers which were returned to me—I have a few packed amongst my effects—copies of any memoranda or anything of that sort that I had written, I left in the Department of State with the Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs in 1945 and search has been unsuccessful in locating these.

The CHAIRMAN. Were these personal copies that you retained marked with the classification indication?

A. Not with any official stamp. I simply typed it on when I put the paper in the machine and started typing. They had not been through any official hands—through any hands except my own. They had not been processed by the Army Headquarters or the Embassy, so they did not bear any official stamp.

The CHAIRMAN. Such classification as they bore was merely the classification you put on at the time you wrote the report?

A. That is correct, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Were there any of those documents which you can recall in which you had two carbon copies in your file?

A. No, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Only one?

A. If I can elaborate, I did all my own typing on a portable machine which is not too good for making copies. I am not a stenographer. I am a one-handed typist and it is quite a chore and I never made any extra copies. When I came back from Chungking I went through my files and tried to build a complete set as far as I could but there was only one copy of everything. I don't have any recollection of having more than one copy. I cannot conceive of any reason why I should. Most times I typed the four copies necessary for my distribution.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you have in any of those files—your personal files—any copies made from any other sources than your typewriter? Did you have anything prepared in the Department—any transmittal notes coming from the Embassy or G-2?

A. No, sir; not to my recollection at all. This is strictly a one-man operation. I did all my own typing and never received copies back from anyone. Could you elaborate what you mean?

Mr. STEVENS. My point is simply this: Were there in your personal files any of the critiques that had been prepared by the Embassy or G-2 or anyone else?

A. Absolutely not. In almost every case I never saw those transmitting despatches. I had no knowledge of those. I usually did not know if any use had been made of them.

Mr. STEVENS. But one of those was included in your personal files.

A. No; I am positive of it.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time of your arrest, did you have in your personal files all the papers you had originally come back with?

A. As far as I know, I believe I did. I occasionally loaned these reports to agents at other agencies, specialists who wanted to pursue some particular subject they were specializing in. I remember several people coming over from R. & A., Research and Analysis of OSS and if they were interested in one particular thing I would let them borrow it but as far as I know, those copies had been returned. I don't remember any being on loan.

Mr. STEVENS. Can you identify any people to whom you gave any of those copies, Mr. Service?

A. Yes, I loaned some to Mr. Wilber, who was head of the Political Branch—I am not sure of the exact title now—but head of the Political Branch of the Far Eastern Section of Research and Analysis—

Mr. RHETTS. Of OSS?

A. Yes; and there were at least two other men who came to the Department and had further consultation with me but I cannot identify their names. They were junior analysts—

Mr. STEVENS. From OSS?

A. I believe from OSS and I have a vague recollection also of somebody in MID but I met a great many people in those days and I went to interrogation sessions and there were three or four people and it was a case of quick introductions and I don't remember the names of these people. There was one fellow, short and dark, as I remember, and bristling hair. I might recognize him if I saw him but that is as far as I can go.

(Off the record.)

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. STEVENS. Before we get into detailed examination now, I wish Mr. Service would comment upon the statements which have been made as to his access to documents that were in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, which were not a part of his personal file. I would like you to put that in.

Mr. RHETTS. Would you like to put it in now? It is a topic I was going to cover later.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like it before we get into a detailed examination of this. We have taken up the fact that he has had his Yen-an reports and we would like the other point handled at this time.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. You returned to Washington on April 12, 1945. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Will you describe in detail for the board what your assignment was—where you were physically and what you did from April 12 on to June 6, 1945?—A. I was placed on consultation with the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. As I remember, the Director of the Office, Mr. Ballantine, was away and I was told to sit at his desk, which was at the end of one of the corridors in the old State Department Building. It would be in the southeast corner. The set-up in those offices, you may remember, was that there was a small anteroom usually where there were two stenographers, right at the end of the hall, and two large offices opening off, one at each side.

Mr. Stanton, the Acting Director, had the office across the reception room, and I sat in Mr. Ballantine's office with a Mr. Turner, whom I believe was also in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs on temporary status. I believe Mr. Turner took the desk and most of the time I simply used a large table in the office.

I wasn't assigned any specific duties or any regular duties. I wasn't a part of the permanent working organization. I was spending practically all my time outside of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, going over to various other Government agencies and I made several visits, for instance, to the Pentagon Building, Research and Analysis, ONI, etc., and therefore, it wasn't particularly necessary for me to have a desk, and I did not see the material that was normally circulated through the office.

Q. You did not?—A. I did not. I should explain that the Division of Chinese Affairs was about halfway down the hall from the suite of the Director and the Deputy Director where I was sitting. I have forgotten the room numbers but I have a very clear picture in my mind that I am sure could be verified.

The Division of Chinese Affairs is in a very large room opening off the hall with the Chief of the Division in a small office in one corner and the Assistant Chief in a small office off the other corner with three or four officers in the main room and three or four secretaries and stenographers.

Q. Were the files of the Chinese Affairs Division in that large room also?—A. Yes, sir. I was coming to that point. The working files of the Division of Chinese Affairs was in a bank of filing cabinets along the wall between this large office and the corridor that faced out into the room. There must have been 10 or 15 filing cabinets and there was a large table near one end of the room, I think.

As I was saying, I think I knew all the officers in the Division of Chinese Affairs, so I was in and out of the office for personal conversations, and occasionally called down for what might be called consultation, specific points that some officer was interested in. I could—theoretically I did have access to the files but I don't believe that I ever did go to the files to get out any material because I wasn't doing any research work. I wrote one or two memoranda during that period but they were just memoranda on spot things that came up on the day's business.

I remember writing a memorandum, for instance, on a broadcast that Mao Tse-tung made on May 1, pointing out the further development of the lines that were obvious lines. They were obvious when I was in Yen-an in March and April, but that was nothing that required my going to the file.

I think that if I had been going to the files to get any amount of material or going to the files fairly often, it would have been obvious and it would have been observed by some of the people in this large office since there were five or six people sitting in that large office in plain view of the files.

Q. Was there someone in charge of the files?—A. It was quite informal actually. If an officer was busy he might call his secretary and tell her to get something and she would go to the files and get it but generally somebody wanting something looked at the files, arranged by subject and each subject was defined, but most people working there knew the general lay-out so they would go and take what material they needed or return it or gave it to the secretaries to return. I had no secretary or stenographer and there was a woman named Mrs. Savage who worked there as one of the secretaries, who had something to do with the files but I don't believe anyone was commissioned as file clerk at all.

Q. Did you have any occasion during that period to obtain material from the Division of Communications and Records?—A. No, sir; not that I remember, on any occasion. I wasn't doing any work that required my going to the files.

Q. There again you would have had, theoretically, in fact, access to them as you desired material?—A. As a Foreign Service officer I was able to get material from the files but I was on consultation and the only thing that I was able to contribute—the only thing that people were interested in—the reason of my being on consultation was the fact that I had just come back from Communist territories and was the only person available who had had that experience and knew them by direct observation. That is the one subject on which people were consulting me and I had my own personal file of my reports which I continually referred to and used in those consultations and it was far easier for me to simply thumb through my own personal copies and pick out the one pertinent to our discussion.

I think there was one occasion when I did go to the files in CA, when Mr. Walter Robertson was being assigned to Chungking as Minister Counselor. Mr. Vincent asked me to talk to Mr. Robertson. He had never been to China; he wasn't a Foreign Service officer; he was new to the Government; he was a banker from Richmond, Va., and he asked me to give Mr. Robertson some fairly basic briefing, and on that occasion I remember digging out from the CA files one or two of the more comprehensive memoranda which I had written.

We could verify when Mr. Robertson left, and just a day or two before he left my recollection is that one of the things I dug out of the files and suggested he read was that memorandum I wrote in June 1944. I believe it is our Document 157. I believe that I did get that from the CA files and turned it over to Mr. Robertson.

I think if I might say a little more along that same line, the rather special character of my consultation—the fact that I did not have any duties in the Division or Office—for instance when I was in the Department on consultation in January 1943, I was given specific duties, and that is sometimes done. I was assigned to writing these summaries—tags—on some of the despatches coming in from the field and I was also assigned to writing one on the situation in China, which is Document 103. That was a project that required a great deal of research and I had a great deal of recourse to the CA files during the visit in 1943 but on neither my visit of 1944 of consultation or 1945 was I performing any research or other duties that would require access to the files.

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you Document 157 and ask you to tell us what that is.—A. Well, it is a hectograph document, apparently a copy of a memorandum which I wrote, I think, on June 20, 1944, and it is our Document 157.

Q. This is our Document 157. Do you have a copy of the document you actually wrote? Is this a copy of the document you wrote—an exact copy?—

A. As far as I can see, it is.

Q. Does it have your name on it?—A. No, sir; it does not.

Q. Did the document you wrote have your name on it anywhere?—A. It would have had my name on the end.

Q. This is not an exact copy of the document you wrote?—A. No, I don't have the original copy for comparison. Certainly the heading is different and leaves off everything at the end.

Q. This is not an exact copy of the document you prepared?—A. That is correct.

Q. I believe you indicated that your name does not appear anywhere on that document, does it?—A. No.

Q. And does the document indicate where it was prepared?—A. Well, there is written in handwriting at the top "Not to be shown outside OSS," and I know this was obtained from DRF and I believe from the files in their possession, Research and Analysis Branch of OSS.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say for the record that the document referred to has to do with three papers which were found in the possession of Mr. Jaffe, all identical to typed copies and one carbon of a document on the subject of a Kuomintang China and American policy.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did Mr. Service just state this was a hectograph copy; in other words, this is not the document found in Jaffe's office but a hectograph copy of which typed copies were found in Jaffe's possession?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Q. Even that is not correct. You say it appears on the face of it—it says, "Not to be distributed outside OSS."—A. "Not to be shown outside OSS."

Q. Now I show you photostatic copy of certain typewritten material headed "Kuomintang China and American Policy." Underneath that heading appears the wording: "Written in China June 24, 1944, by John S. Service." This document consists of 13 pages and in handwriting at the top right-hand corner appears the number "15." This, I understand, is a photostatic copy of a typewritten copy found in Jaffe's possession.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Q. Referring back to Document 157, you attempted to locate, did you not, the original of the document which you prepared.—A. I requested the Department to locate it; yes, sir.

Q. And is Document 157 the best thing they could find—the nearest approximation to your original document they were able to locate?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it does contain, as far as you know, the substance of what you wrote?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But does not bear anywhere an indication of your name or your authorship?—A. Yes.

Q. The document marked "15," which I have shown you, does indicate on its face that it was a report prepared by you; does it not?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever see the document?—A. I never saw the document from which this was copied or reproduced.

Q. Was the document, which you prepared, prepared in the format of your other reports and addressed to the "Commanding General, Military Headquarters"?—A. Memoranda were addressed in various ways. I don't know how this may have been addressed. Some of them were not addressed to anyone.

Q. Where were you when you wrote the memorandum of June 24, 1944?—A. I was in Chungking.

Q. And you were then attached to the military headquarters, were you not?—A. That is correct.

Q. You think you may or may not have addressed it to the military headquarters?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. You don't know?—A. No.

Q. Is there any indication on the face of this photostatic document, which I will refer to as Document 15, that it was copied from the Document 157?—A. Although the heading is different and the title is different, I notice repetition of several obvious mistakes, apparently copies of typing mistakes. About 2 inches from the bottom of the first page, for instance, both documents have the word "newsreel" where the obvious meaning was "reversal." It appeared one was copied from the other.

Q. Although the Document 15 has your name at the top of it, whereas Document 157 does not?—A. That's right.

Q. Is Document 15 an exact copy of Document 157?—A. No, not exactly.

Q. Is it, apart from the fact that it bears your name, an exact copy?—A. I just mentioned the heading and the subject are different.

Q. Did you ever see Document 157 until it was obtained in the course of these proceedings?—A. No sir.

Q. Did you ever see that document in any form other than the form in which you originally prepared it?—A. No sir.

Q. Now I show you two additional sets of papers, one of which is marked, in the upper right-hand corner "31B" and one of which is marked in handwriting "No. 93." Do these appear to be copies of the same document as No. 15?—A. Exactly the same.

Q. Your testimony with respect to that would be the same as with respect to document 13?—A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they all three made of the same typing?

A. That seems to be. If you look at the very top of the page you have "Kuomintang China and American Policy—written in China" and if you look at the capital "C" of China you will see it is blurred in the same way in all three copies, indicating they are all of the same typewritten text.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have with you, on your return, a copy of your report on Kuomintang China and American Policy?

A. You are referring to the same document we have just discussed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

A. No; I did not.

Mr. ACHILLES. If I might try to clarify the situation on that last document, Mr. Service, you have transmitted a report dated June 24, 1944, on that subject, "Kuomintang China and American Policy." You had prepared a report?

A. Yes, sir; I had prepared a report.

Mr. ACHILLES. The documents which we have here include one which is apparently an OSS reproduction or excerpt from the report which you have written?

A. That's right.

Mr. ACHILLES. And the others are reproductions in slightly different form apparently on the OSS report?

A. That is the assumption since it contains some of the same rather unusual mistakes.

Mr. ACHILLES. Is there anything on the photostatic reproduction to indicate that that might have been obtained by Mr. Jaffe from State Department or from OSS, either one?

A. I see nothing at all to indicate origin.

Mr. ACHILLES. In examining these documents I note from the fact that the hectographic copy bears the notation "Not to be shown outside of OSS," and from the fact that the same mistake of the word "newsreel" is used where it should obviously be "reversal" that the typewritten copy was presumably made from an OSS copy.

(Off the record.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Counsel, I turn over to you from the files of the Board documents which have been numbered B-1 to B-52, inclusive, which are the various documents relating to Mr. Service, which have been found in the possession of Mr. Jaffe, or rather, they are photostatic copies of such documents. This morning you examined Mr. Service with reference to documents which have been numbered B-1 to B-11, inclusive, and in order to keep the records straight, I will indicate what those documents are.

B-1 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your Document 217; B-2 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your Document 260; B-3 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your Document 218; B-4 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your document 227; B-5 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your Document 219; B-6 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your Document 220; B-7 is a photostat of a typed copy of the same paper; B-8 is another photostat of the typed copy of the same paper; B-9 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your document 223; B-10 is a photostat of the typed copy of the same paper; B-11 is a photostat of the ozalid copy of your Document 221.

These documents are turned over to you to enable you to examine Mr. Service with reference to the rest of the documents found in Mr. Jaffe's possession which related to Mr. Service.

Mr. RHETTS. Before going any further with the examination on these documents, I think I should go back and ask Mr. Service a series of questions relating to Documents B-1 through B-11, which I did not ask this morning and which I think should be asked.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. You testified, Mr. Service, that you recalled specifically giving Mr. Jaffe one document in particular which you have identified as a memorandum concerning the views of Mao Tse-tung—A. My memorandum No. 26 of April 1, 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you identify that by a "B" number?—A. That is B-35, sir.

Q. B-35 is the identifying symbol. B-35 is not the document you gave, or is it?

Let us come to that. Then you further testified that you recall giving some additional documents, possible 8 or 10, but that you could not now or could not in June 1945 identify precisely which of your personal copies you showed to Mr. Jaffe.—A. That is correct.

Q. I should like to show you document B-1, and ask you whether you have any recollection at all as to whether you might have shown that document to Mr. Jaffe?—A. That is not quite right, not that document.

Q. You answer that question and I will give you the next one.—A. I believe that I probably showed Mr. Jaffe my personal typed copy of this memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right.

Mr. ACHILLES. But not the ozalid copy of which that is a photostat—A. No sir. I never saw the ozalid. I never had it in my possession.

Q. I show you document B-2 and ask you whether you think you may have shown to Mr. Jaffe your personal copy of this memorandum?—A. I believe this is one of which I showed Mr. Jaffe my personal typed copy. It is the type of informative material derived entirely from Chinese Communist sources.

Q. When you say that you believe you did, you mean by that that you have any present recollection or do you mean it is of the type you would have shown?—A. I cannot say that I have any positive recollection. There was a series of reports—memoranda that I wrote dealing with Communist thinking about certain geographical areas. This one is on Sinkiang. The one we just discussed was on Mongolia. There was another I wrote on the minorities question and it is my recollection I allowed him to see the whole series, which is a group of informative descriptive memoranda or material entirely from communist sources and available to any correspondent or any other person in Yenan.

Q. I show you Document B-3 and ask you if that is one of the memoranda of which you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your personal carbon copy?—A. Yes; I think I may have shown him my personal carbon copy on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Just as a matter for the record, both B-1 and B-2 are unclassified.

Mr. ACHILLES. B-1 and B-3.

The CHAIRMAN. B-1 and B-3.

A. I may say, if I may, it is incomprehensible to me now, looking over these three, why I marked it "secret." The type of material is the same and the sources are the same and if I considered the suitability of giving the material—background information—to a writer on China, I would have been guided more by the content type of material than by the typed rating up there.

Q. Which you, yourself, put on it?—A. Yes.

Q. I show you Document B-4 and ask you whether you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your personal carbon copy of this memorandum?—A. I would say that I may have possibly shown him my typed one. I don't have the same certainty with this as with the three just mentioned.

(Off the record.)

Q. This Document B-4 is also unclassified; is it not?—A. I see no classification on it. It is quite likely this was amongst the group I showed him.

Q. I show you Document B-5 and ask you whether you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your personal carbon copy of this memorandum.—A. I cannot say. I rather think I did not. It discusses plans rather than events which had already taken place.

Q. I show you Document B-6. May I ask whether you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your personal carbon copy of this memorandum?—A. I do not believe I did.

(Off the record.)

Q. I show you Documents B-7 and B-8 and ask you whether or not they are merely copies of Document B-6?—A. Yes.

Q. So that your answer with respect to them would be the same that you gave with respect to B-6?—A. That is correct.

Q. I show you Document B-9 and ask you whether you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your personal carbon copy of this memorandum?—A. I may have. It is historical material. It does not discuss American policy.

Q. I show you Document B-10 and ask you if this is not a copy of Document B-9?—A. It appears to be.

Q. So that your answer with respect to this would be the same?—A. Yes.

Q. Now I show you Document B-11 and ask you whether you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your personal carbon copy of this memorandum?—A. Yes, I think I did. This is a matter of public knowledge.

Q. The classification on this is what?—A. "Confidential."

Q. You placed that there yourself?—A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Service, what do you mean by "a matter of public knowledge"?

A. It is available to every newspaper man. It is no secret that they were setting up these exiled government organizations. They had similar organizations for the Manchurian Provinces, for instance.

Mr. ACHILLES. Why did you classify it "confidential"?

A. Well, because I make some comments on their probable motives for doing it which should not be attributed to me and should not be in the hands of the Chinese for circulation among all the various agencies and allies in Chungking.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you still thought your comments on that were not of such a nature as to make it improper to give to a newspaperman for background.

A. No, sir, I did not. I mention the Communist view which I state I think is extreme—the Communist view for preparation of civil war. I said it is much more likely that the Central Government would use them for selecting representatives to political bodies like the projected congress. By having a sort of dummy organization they would be able to nominate delegates to the Congress. It is common political usage.

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you Document B-12 which consists of a 2-page covering memorandum, dated Chungking, China, 13 February 1944, bearing the name "John S. Service" at the end together with an enclosure of 22 pages, which is entitled "Article Written by Theodore H. White for Time Magazine." This is a photostatic copy of typewritten material. Can you tell whether that is an exact copy of a memorandum which you prepared?

A. I cannot tell whether it is an exact copy without having the original here to compare it with. I do not have the original.

Q. Did you ever give the material, of which this is a photostatic copy, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. Absolutely not. I did not have any copy of this in my possession in 1945. This was written in Chungking, February 1944. I did not retain any personal copies of this memorandum.

Q. You had no personal copies of it?—A. No.

Q. And you never showed it to Mr. Jaffe in this form or any other form?—A. No, I did not see this until this time—after my writing.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was your memorandum transmitted to the Department?

A. There is apparently no record of its having been transmitted to the Department since DC/R did not locate any dispatch transmitting it.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine the document?

The CHAIRMAN. That being so, how did this document arrive in this country?

A. I have no idea unless it was reported through other channels such as the Army Joint Intelligence Collection Agency, which is part of the Army. Some of our reports in China, I believe, were given to OSS and OSS may have forwarded some of them.

Mr. ACHILLES. I see nothing on the document to say that it was transmitted officially either to the State Department or any other Department.

Q. I call your attention, Mr. Service, to a covering sheet on this document which bears the signature of James M. Horan, major, AGD, and ask you what that covering sheet states?—A. It states as follows: "This document comprises an excerpt from a confidential report now on file in the Intelligence Library, Military Intelligence Division, War Department, General Staff."

Q. That would suggest that your memorandum and enclosure was in fact transmitted by the military headquarters at Chungking to the War Department in Washington, would it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Where did you find that information that you have just given?—A. That was on a sheet attached to the photostat, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. I see.

The CHAIRMAN. I take it, Mr. Achilles, you examined the photostat without looking at the cover sheet.

Mr. ACHILLES. That is correct.

Q. Now I show you Document B-13 and ask you if this does not appear to be a copy of Document B-12?—A. It appears to be an exact copy.

Q. And I show you document B-14 and ask you if it does not appear to be a copy of B-12?—A. It is an exact copy.

Q. So that the answers you have given with respect to Document B-12 apply equally to B-13 and B-14?—A. They do.

Q. Now I show you Document B-15—

The CHAIRMAN. For the record, I wish to say at this point that Documents B-15, B-16, and B-17 have already been covered in the testimony. The testimony was, as I recall, Mr. Service, that you did not have a copy of this document in your possession.—A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And that you did not give a copy to Mr. Jaffe?

A. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. You did not have a copy so therefore you could not.

A. I didn't have one.

Q. Now I show you Document B-18 which consists of a photostatic copy of a typewritten copy of what appears to be all or some portion of a despatch from the American Embassy at Chungking to the State Department, together with 44 pages of material, including a photostat of a typewritten copy of a 1-page memorandum dated September 8, 1944; subject, "Communist Criticism of Chiang Kai-shek's Opening Address to the People's Political Council," and bearing the name "John S. Service" at the end, which encloses certain translations of a Chinese newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN. What number is this?

Mr. RHETTS. B-18.

Q. I ask you whether you ever showed any of this material to Mr. Jaffe?—A. If I understand your question correctly, the answer is "no." This is an Embassy despatch and I did not at any time ever show Mr. Jaffe, nor any other person outside the Government, an Embassy despatch. As for the part of this which appears as an enclosure memorandum I wrote, which I believe is my memorandum No. 25, that is the type of material which I would have considered quite proper to show to Mr. Jaffe. I don't have any specific recollection of whether I did or not. I would have shown him my own personal carbon copy of my memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of the memorandum?

A. September 8, 1944. It is simply reporting public newspaper criticism of a speech by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and I believe is unclassified, and although it may have been transmitted by classified despatch, I don't know, there is no indication here of the classification of the original despatch.

Q. Did you ever see any of this material—this translation?—A. No, sir.

Q. Called Status of Conversations on the Communist Issue.

A. I am sure I never saw the whole despatch or any part of it except of course my memorandum, which is an enclosure.

Q. But all this other material, consisting of some 20-odd pages of translation, did you ever see that before in your life?—A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any indication as to what agency of the Government this despatch is addressed to?

A. It is addressed to the honorable, the Secretary of State.

Mr. RHETTS. It is a typewritten copy of a despatch and the first page of the typing is single spaced. The second page is single spaced and runs for a half page and continues on to the next page, which is typed and double spaced, and the fourth page is double-spaced typing down to the middle page, and stops in the middle of a sentence and goes on to the final page which is again in single-spaced typing and bearing at the end, in typing, "Respectfully yours, C. E. Gauss."

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that?

Mr. RHETTS. * * * indicating it was typed by a number of different people and in no sense an exact copy of an original dispatch, nor that the content may be exact.

Mr. ACHILLES. I notice no handwritten signature appears on this photostat. Mr. Service, were any dispatches from Chungking at that time sent in on 8 by 11 paper?

A. No, sir. All I have ever seen were sent on the long legal size paper.

Mr. ACHILLES. This appears, I believe, to be a copy subsequently made of a dispatch rather than a carbon copy of the original.

A. That is correct.

Q. Now I show you document B-19, Mr. Service, which consists of a one-page covering memorandum, dated October 4, 1944, Chungking, China, bearing in typewriting at the end "Joseph K. Dickey, Colonel, GSC, Forward Echelon, USAF CBI," and enclosing an excerpt from a memorandum evidently prepared by you and bearing in typewriting at the bottom, the words "John S. Service," which memorandum encloses memorandum of interviews and conversations with prominent Communist political and military leaders held by Gunther Stein, Maurice Votaw, John Service, and Isaac Epstein, and I ask you if you ever saw the document of which this is a photostat?—A. No, sir; I never saw the document of which this is a photostat.

Q. The attachment is an excerpt from a memorandum which you prepared, is it not?—A. Yes, it appears to be practically the full text of my Memorandum No. 3 from Yen-an, dated July 30, 1944.

Q. And that is Document No. 166?—A. It is part of Document 166.

Q. This excerpt here leaves off the heading of your memorandum?—A. It leaves off all the heading.

Q. And retains the remainder of the text?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever show this material to Mr. Jaffe? I am referring to Document B-19, or the material of which it is a photostat.—A. No, sir; I never had it in my possession.

Q. Did you ever show your own carbon of your memorandum on this subject to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I am reasonably certain I did not because although it is merely interviews with correspondents and a couple of interviews with me of exactly the same character, it would have been, you might say, a violation of confidence to the newspaper correspondents for me to have given Mr. Jaffe access to the notes of Mr. Epstein or notes of other correspondents. They were generous in turning over their notebooks to me when I first arrived in Yenan so that I could very quickly get the advantage of their stay of 3 or 4 weeks in Yenan previously.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand from your testimony, Mr. Service, that you had carbon copies of your reports that appear as enclosures in both B-18 and B-19.

A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But that you did not show either of those to Mr. Jaffe.

A. No, sir; and of course the carbon copy which I had in my possession—the memorandum—it was in different form.

Q. The carbon copy of your memorandum which is contained in B-19?—A. In 166.

Q. It was in a different form than it appears in B-19?—A. That's right.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice your report appears as an enclosure in B-19, your Document 166 in this proceeding. Is there any document number to your report which appears in B-18?

A. No, sir. No, I am sorry we have no document.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of 166?

Mr. RHETTS. The date of 166?

The CHAIRMAN. Your report which is Document 166.

A. My memorandum No. 3.

Q. No. 166 is a despatch enclosing— A. It encloses two reports.

The CHAIRMAN. I should have asked what is the date of your Report No. 3?

A. It is July 30, 1944. It was forwarded to the Department by a Chungking despatch 2923, dated September 1, 1944, and I see the stamp of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, indicating it was received in the Department prior to September 19, 1944.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the classification of B-19? Is it unclassified?

Mr. RHETTS. B-19 itself bears no evidence of any classification. That may have been left off in the course of the copying.

Mr. ACHILLES. I notice a cover sheet to the effect that this is an excerpt from a secret report now on file in the Intelligence Library MID.

Q. Now I show you document B-20, Mr. Service, which is a photostatic copy of four typewritten pages of material headed, "Subject: China—Communist—Kuo-mintang Relations," which commences with a quote "Brief" and bears the typewritten words "V. F. Meisling, Major, Infantry, Acting Executive, JICA CBI Branch." There follows certain material which is evidently an excerpt from a memorandum of yours and bears on the top of page 2 the words "John S. Service," and I ask you if you ever saw that before?—A. No, I never saw the report of which this is a reproduction.

Q. I take it you did not give the report, of which this is a reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. Certainly not. I never had it in my possession and never even saw it.

Q. Did you ever give to Mr. Jaffe your own copy or any copy of the substantive content of this document?—A. This appears to be a drastic condensation of a memorandum which I wrote in Chungking on November 3, 1943, which is our Document No. 120. I had no copy of that memorandum of November 3 in my possession and could not and did not show it to Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Now I show you Document B-21. This document consists of three separate sets of papers which are stapled together. One consists of four pages and is headed "Department of State, Division of Chinese Affairs," and bears the date, "September 26, 1944." The second page of this material bears the heading at the top of the page "U. S. Embassy, Chungking, September 8, 1944." It is addressed to the Secretary of State and bears the typewritten signature at the bottom of page 3, "Respectfully yours, C. E. Gauss." Can you indicate what the first page of this material is?—A. Well, the first page is a summary and comment on the dispatch, apparently drafted by Mr. Chase in the Division of Chinese Affairs. As Mr. Larsen mentioned yesterday, if a dispatch came in from the field that seemed to be of particular interest, one of the officers in the Division of Chinese Affairs, and I believe it is customary in other divisions, was assigned the chore of digesting it and commenting on it before it was circulated. Mr. Larsen mentioned that he was particularly interested in these comments by the officers of CA since it gave a clue as to the policies or thinking of the Department on the policy.

Q. The first page of this material appears to be one of those summaries and comments?—A. That's right.

Q. And the remaining three pages appear to be copies of the dispatch?—A. The remaining three pages seem to be a typewritten copy. It isn't a carbon copy but a typewritten copy of dispatch 2944.

Q. Did you ever see that dispatch prior to June 6, 1945?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or this covering summary and comment?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any report of yours in there?

A. Yes, the dispatch No. 2944, enclosing my Report No. 5 as an enclosure.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that a moment?

A. The dispatch and my report appear as our Document 168.

Mr. ACHILLES. I notice again that the copy of the dispatch is on short paper and indicates no handwritten signatures so I assume that that again is a copy subsequently made of the dispatch and presumably also of the summary memorandum on the first page.

A. That is correct. You can also see, by comparison with the summary memorandum, that it isn't an exact copy. The summary memorandum was typed on 5-by-8 paper whereas this is full-sized letter paper.

Mr. ACHILLES. That is correct.

Q. Now the second set of material, stapled together here, consists of five pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material which bears the heading, "U. S. Army Observer Section, APO 879, August 3, 1944, subject: Communist Policy Toward the Kuomintang," and bears at the end of the material, on page 6, the typewritten words "John S. Service." Does that appear to be the substance of your Report No. 5?—A. Yes, sir. It is not an exact copy.

Q. Does it bear the number?—A. It does not bear the number and omits the last paragraph.

Q. But otherwise it contains the substance of your Report No. 5, which was in fact transmitted by Dispatch No. 2944?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you ever seen the material, of which that is a photostatic copy?—A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I take it the dispatch is your Document No. 168?

A. That is correct.

Q. And I take it, therefore, you never gave that material to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you ever give Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of your Report No. 5?—A. I don't think so; no.

The CHAIRMAN. You did have that in your possession?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now I show you the third set of papers that are a part of this document, B-21, consisting of four pages stapled together, bearing the heading, "Subject: The Communist Policy Toward the Kuomintang," in handwriting. At this material is a photostatic copy of handwriting and I ask you if you ever saw that before?—A. No, sir, I do not recognize the handwriting and I have never seen it.

Q. You did not give that to Mr. Jaffe, did you?—A. No, sir.

Q. What do these notes appear to be?—A. These handwritten notes appear to be excerpts from the memorandum—my Report No. 5.

Q. I show you Document B-22, which consists of two sets of papers, stapled together, one consisting of seven pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material headed, "Subject: First Informal Impressions of the North Shensi Communist Base." The material under this subject continues for the first 3½ pages and in the middle of page 4 appears the words, "Subject: Desire of Chairman of Communist Central Committee for Continued American Representation of Diplomatic Character at Yen-an." I ask you if you ever saw the material, of which this is a photostatic copy, before?—A. No, sir, I never have.

Q. Can you indicate to the Board what this material appears to be?—A. It appears to be a copy—I should say an excerpt from my Report No. 1, written at Yen-an on July 28, 1944.

Q. All of it?—A. I should say that the first 3½ pages are an excerpt from my Report No. 1. The second half—the lower half of page 4 is an excerpt of my Report No. 2, written at Yen-an on July 28, 1944, and the last two pages—

Q. Just a moment. I should add, in terms of my attempts to describe this document, that the last two pages are headed, "Subject: The Communist Policy Toward the Kuomintang."—A. Which is an excerpt of my Report No. 5, which was described under B-21.

The CHAIRMAN. We are talking about B-22?

A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That contains parts of—

A. Of three reports.

The CHAIRMAN. One, two, and five?

A. That is correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. And the document itself is a dispatch?

A. It is just a sheaf of excerpts without any identification—excerpts from three different reports.

The CHAIRMAN. These are carbon copies?

Mr. RHETTS. Those are photostatic reproductions of typewritten material.

Q. Does your name appear anywhere in this sheaf of excerpts, Mr. Service?—

A. I don't see it anywhere.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you prepare those excerpts?

A. No, sir; I have never seen them before.

Q. I take it, therefore, you did not give them to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I did not.

Q. In any form?—A. In any form.

Q. The other portion of this Document B-22 is a photostatic reproduction of two pages of handwritten material headed, subject: "First Informal Impressions of the North Shensi Communist Areas by an American Observer from Observer Group, July 1944." I ask you if you ever saw that before?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you recognize the handwriting?—A. I do not.

Q. Are you satisfied it is not your own?—A. Absolutely.

Q. Does this refer to any memorandum or report that you have prepared?—A. Yes; this is an excerpt of my report No. 1, drafted in Yenau on July 28, 1944.

Q. That is the same report that we have been referring to in the other portion of this Document B-22?—A. Yes.

Q. I believe you already testified you have never shown that report to Mr. Jaffe in any form?—A. Excuse me, I understood you to ask me if I had ever shown these documents (17 pages of typewritten material). I am sorry. I misunderstood your question because this memorandum, No. 1, of which I had a personal copy in my possession may be one I did show to Mr. Jaffe. It is purely first impressions and I might say that prior to this time it had already—some parts of it had already appeared in print.

Q. Some parts of what—your memorandum?—A. I would not say some parts. It was obvious from an article written in Life magazine that the author had read this memorandum. The similarity of language indicated someone had shown it to him.

Q. Who was the author of the article in Life magazine?—A. Theodore White.

Q. Did you show him your memorandum?—A. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the date of your report No. 2?

A. July 28, 1944.

The CHAIRMAN. The same as No. 1?

A. I might say my impression of the classification of the early Yenau reports is that when we first went to Yenau—the Observer Group first went up—there was no release of information of the fact that we were there. The press correspondents were not, for instance, allowed in their dispatches during the first weeks we were there, to mention our presence. Therefore, there was an abnormally high classification on early reports. Later on it became general knowledge and it was allowed to be mentioned in the press and the need for classification of some of our reports was reduced. The classification of "secret" on this is influenced, I am sure, partly by the fact that the whole matter of our presence there was a secret at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. You have testified that you might have shown a copy of your report No. 1 to Mr. Jaffe. What about 2 and 5?

A. I think I already testified on 5 that I would not, and similarly on No. 2, that I would not show that. No. 2 was a conversation with Mao Tse-tung in which he indicated his desire to have continued American representation. That was as close to a diplomatic note up there that we had. It was a request from the head of the Communists which I was forwarding to the Embassy.

Q. I show you Document B-23 which is a photostatic reproduction of three pages of typewritten material, headed: "First Informal Impressions of the North Shensi Communist Areas by an American Observer from Observer Group," July 1944.

Mr. ACHILLES. Isn't that Document B-22?

Mr. RHETTS. B-23.

Q. Appearing above it in handwriting is the word "Service." I ask you if you ever saw that document before?—A. No, I never have.

Q. Or the document of which it is a reproduction?—A. No.

Q. What does that appear to be?—A. Well, actually, this is practically identical with B-22 in that it contains excerpts from three separate reports; from my report No. 1, "First Informal Impressions of the North Shensi Communist Area by an American Observer from the Observer Group"; from my report No. 2, "Desire of Chairman of Communist Central Committee for Continued American Representation of Diplomatic Character at Yen-an," and report No. 5, "Communist Policy Toward the Kuomintang." I haven't compared it to see if they are the identical excerpts but it may well be a copy of the handwritten excerpt.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this paper a copy of the same material that is in your Document 165?

A. Well it is excerpts, sir, from several documents, 165, 164, and 168.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Q. So that insofar as the substantive content of this Document B-23, your testimony relating to Document B-22 is applicable to this document?—A. That is right.

Q. You never saw the material of which this is a photostatic reproduction?—A. That's right.

Q. Now I show you Document B-24 which consists of what appears to be a photostatic reproduction of dispatch No. 2667 from Chungking, dated June 12, 1944, and signed by C. E. Gauss, which dispatch encloses a memorandum No. 76, dated June 2, 1944, bearing the typewritten words at the end, "John S. Service." Now, I ask you if you ever saw the dispatch of which this is a copy, prior to June 6, 1945?—A. I do not believe I ever did see the dispatch.

Q. In the handwriting on the first page of this dispatch, what is indicated there?—A. It isn't awfully clear. "2 War, 1 Navy, 1 FCL, 2 CA, 1 JA, 1 POL files." Also there is written on the face of it "Not sent to OWI," followed by the initials FPL."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of an ozalid, isn't it?

Mr. RHETTS. I do not know. It could be the photostat of the original or it could be a photostat of an ozalid.

A. I would say it is more likely to be a photostat of the original because of the clarity of the signature at the end.

Mr. MORELAND. It is a photostat of an ozalid copy.

Mr. ACHILLES. If that was a photostat of an original, that would be the first original document we have yet found in Jaffe's possession.

A. Somebody who was in CA at that time may be able to tell us; for instance, "FPL," which is Frank Lockhart, who was liaison officer of OPI.

The CHAIRMAN. I may say for the record that this is a photostat of an ozalid in possession of the FBI.

Q. Did you ever show this dispatch, of which this is a copy, or the ozalid of which this is a copy, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any indication on that paper as to whose copy this ozalid was?

A. No, sir. There again it might be a question of somebody, who was in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs or Chinese Affairs, knowing whether it was customary for these instructions regarding routing to OWI to be written on one of the FE copies or CA copies or the original. My own guess would be, and it is purely a guess, that it was probably written only on the ozalid that circulated in the Division of Chinese Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. This is probably one of the CA ozalids.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now attached to this dispatch is a copy of a memorandum of yours; is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever give the copy, of which that is a reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I did not have it in my possession. I did not have a copy of this memorandum with me.

Q. So that you could not have given Jaffe the substance of this?—A. No; I could not have—

Q. And did not?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we have to adjourn at this point.

(Meeting adjourned at 5:35 p. m.)

(The Board reconvened at 10:10 a. m.)

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. Conrad E. Snow]. May we proceed?

Mr. MORELAND. Mr. Chairman, I'd like to say that Mr. Larsen has indicated that he will appear at 2 o'clock this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. You may proceed, Counsel.

Mr. RHETTTS. Will you take the stand, Mr. Service?

Thereupon, Mr. John Stewart Service, a witness previously produced and sworn in his own behalf, resumed the stand and testified further, as follows:

Questions by Mr. RHETTTS:

Q. Continuing our examination of the documents which were under discussion at the close of yesterday's session, I show you Document B-25, which is a photostat of an ozalid copy of dispatch No. 2986, dated September 21, 1944, and which consists of three pages and is signed by C. E. Gauss. Attached to this is a four-page memorandum which is report No. 13, dated August 19, 1944, and bears at the end the typewritten words "John S. Service," and attached to this memorandum are five pages of material headed "Hsin Hua News Agency, English Broadcasts.". I show you this Document B-25, Mr. Service, and ask you whether you ever gave the ozalid, of which this is a reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Did you ever see this dispatch prior to June 6, 1945?—A. To the best of my knowledge, I did not.

Q. I ask you to look at the original of this dispatch, which is document 174; this shows distribution: MID, 2 copies; ONI, 1 copy; Foreign Activity Correlation, 1 copy; Special Political Affairs, 1 copy; OSS, 2 copies; CA, 2 copies, does it not?—A. Yes. It also shows, Political File, 1 copy.

Q. Now, the enclosure to this report No. 13 is a memorandum prepared by you, is it not?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever show your own personal copy of this report to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I doubt very much whether I did. I believe I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a copy of it?

A. Yes, sir; I had a personal copy of this. It is based on published information, but I don't believe that I would have shown my personal copy of this to Mr. Jaffe.

Mr. MORELAND. Off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

A. I might mention that this dispatch No. 2986, which is our document No. 174, was received into the Department of State prior to October 11, 1944. It bears the stamp of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs on that date.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there indication on the ozalid copy as to whose copy that was?

A. There is written up on the top "Not sent to OWI," with the initials "FPL." Mr. ACHILLES. Do you know whose initials "FPL" are?

A. Frank P. Lockhart, who was acting as the Office of Far Eastern Affairs liaison officer with OWI at that time, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Would that indicate to you whose copy this ozalid was?

A. I rather believe, sir, that sort of notation was written only to CA or FE copies, but I'm not positive on that point. That is a sort of question that Mr. Chase might be able to help us on, or somebody else who was in the Division of Chinese Affairs at that time.

Questions by Mr. RHETTTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you document B-26, which consists of three pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, the first page of which is labeled "Report No. 31," dated September 23, 1944, and various typewritten words at the bottom "John S. Service." Attached to this is a 2-page memorandum labeled "Memorandum of a Part of a Conversation With Po Ku on September 12, 1944." I ask you if you ever gave the material, of which this is a photostatic reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?

In that connection I direct your attention to the material written by hand in the upper right-hand corner which says: "See: Okano, Susomo in Biographical Notes." Do you recognize that handwriting?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Is it yours?—A. No; it's not.

Q. Now, to revert to my question, which I didn't give you an opportunity to answer, did you ever give the material, of which this is a photostatic reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I'm sorry, I don't understand your question exactly.

Q. My question is whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the three pages of typing, of which this is a photostat?—A. No, I did not give him these three pages of typing, of which this is a photostat.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you explain what, if anything, you may have given him?

A. It's possible, sir. I may have allowed him to see my personal copy of this memorandum. This is a memorandum based entirely on statements by the Chinese Communists, which were not given in confidence to me and were available to other people, simply their statements and views regarding postwar treatment of Japan. This is the type of material which I think I would have been willing to allow Mr. Jaffe to see or any other interested writer.

Q. I take it that with respect to this, as with respect to all the others except the one memorandum you have no actual recollection that you gave them to Jaffe?—A. No; and I'm positive that I did not give him the original sheets of which this is a photostat because there are several typing mistakes, and so on, here.

Q. Is that an exact copy of your original memorandum as you prepared it?—A. Well, I don't know, sir, since I don't have my original copy here. But I don't believe it is.

Mr. ACHILLES. Is this the document which Mr. Larsen admitted having given to Jaffe? Is it the one where he recognized the handwriting as his own?

Q. Yes; it is one of those.—A. The dispatch 3092 which transmitted my memorandum, Memorandum No. 31, of which this is a copy, to the Department reached the Department prior to November 18, 1944, since I see it is stamped by the Office of Far Eastern Affairs on that date.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Will you examine the photostat of the carbon copy which you have, which bears the handwriting identified by Mr. Larsen as his, and see if there is any indication where that copy was prepared?—A. I see no indication, sir.

Q. There are no marks on it indicating any division of the State Department?—A. No. It is merely a typewritten copy and, except for the handwriting on here, I see no other indication of origin.

Mr. RHETTS. May I inquire, according to the information in possession of the Board, this does not purport to be a photostat of an ozalid copy?

The CHAIRMAN. No. This is a photostat of a carbon copy.

Mr. RHETTS. A carbon copy of something?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; typed material.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Referring to the original dispatch which transmitted your report No. 13, the distribution of this dispatch is indicated as follows, is it not? MID, 2 copies; ONI, 1 copy; OSS, 2 copies; Foreign Activity Correlation, 2 copies; Political File, 1 copy; Japanese Affairs, 2 copies; and CA, 2 copies. Is that right?—A. That is correct.

Q. The stamp appearing on the face of the dispatch also indicates that this document, the original dispatch, went to the Division of Territorial Studies, does it not?—A. Yes, sir; it does.

Mr. ACHILLES. I can see no indication on the photostat as to the source of the carbon copy.

Q. Now I show you document B-27, which consist of six pages of photostatic reproduction of certain typewritten material. It is dated March 25, 1944, and after the first full paragraph of the material on page 1 are the typewritten words "V. F. Mesing, Major, Infantry."

The CHAIRMAN. This is the photostat of a carbon copy.

Q. Thank you. Now I ask you, Mr. Service, if you ever saw this material, of which this is a photostatic reproduction?—A. No, sir; I have never seen it before.

Q. Will you describe very briefly to the Board what it appears to be?—A. I believe it is a copy of a report forwarded by Joint Intelligence Collection Agency at Chungking. I think that the name "V. F. Mesing" is a typing mistake and it should be "V. F. Meisling," whose name has appeared on several other copies of JICA reports.

Q. When you say "forwarded by JICA," where was it forwarded?—A. Forwarded to the War Department by JICA. The report itself appears to be an excerpt and extensive quotation of a memorandum which I prepared in Chungking on March 18, 1944, and which appears as our document No. 133 in the proceeding.

Q. Since you have never seen the material, of which this is a reproduction, I take it that you did not give that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I did not; and I did not have a copy of my memorandum with me in the United States.

Q. So you did not give your personal copy of your memorandum or in any way give him this material in substance?—A. No, sir; I did not. I could not.

Q. I show you document B-28 and ask you if this appears to be another copy of the same material?—A. Yes, sir; it is.

Q. I invite your attention to the cover sheet on this document and ask you to indicate what it states?—A. The cover sheet is signed by James M. Horan, Major, AGD, and states, "This document comprises an excerpt from a secret report now on file in the Intelligence Library, Military Intelligence Division, War Department, General Staff."

The CHAIRMAN. Have you indicated that this is a copy of your document No. 133?

A. It's an excerpt, sir. The material is excerpted from our document 133.

Q. Now I invite your attention also, Mr. Service, to an additional page attached to this document B-28 which is headed, "Secret, Joint Intelligence Collection Agency, China-Burma-India, Intelligence Report," and I ask you to look at the material at the lower right-hand corner of this document which indicates the distribution of the document made by MID, and ask you to indicate what that is, the distribution shown here?—A. It shows the following distribution: FE/SEA, original; Special BR, 2 copies; CIG, 1 copy; ONI, 3 copies; OSS, 1 copy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any indication on the photostat whose copy this was?

A. I see none, sir.

Q. I take it that, with respect to the material involved in B-28, your answers are the same with respect to B-27 of which it is a copy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now I show you document B-29 which consists of five pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, the first page of which is dated "Chungking, November 27, 1942, No. 758," and addressed to the Secretary of State and bearing the typewritten words at the bottom "C. E. Gauss."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a carbon copy.

Q. Thank you. Attached to the first page are three pages headed "Subject: Chinese Trade in Strategic Materials with Japan," and bearing the typewritten words at the end "John S. Service." The last page of this material is headed "Wolfram," and at the bottom appears the words "Source: No. 758, Chungking, November 27, 1942, BEW File No. 520866," and I ask you if you ever saw the material of which this is a photostatic reproduction?

A. I never saw the material of which this is a photostatic reproduction because this is not typed in a way the Embassy submitted the original dispatch. It is typed on short paper instead of long paper.

Q. Do you think you ever saw the actual Embassy dispatch before June 6, 1945, the dispatch of which this appears to be a typewritten copy?—A. Yes, sir; I probably did, because this was prepared, the original dispatch, on November 27, 1942, when I believe I was still in the Embassy in Chungking, in which case I probably would have seen the dispatch when it was prepared. I can check the dates here. No, sir; I left Chungking on November 26, 1942, so that lets it out. Since the dispatch was dated November 27, 1942, I probably never even saw the original dispatch.

Q. I ask you whether you gave material, of which this is a photostatic copy, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Referring to the attachment which appears to be a copy of a memorandum prepared by you, can you identify that as a memorandum you did prepare, Mr. Service?—A. Yes, sir; I remember the subject. It bears my initials. I believe it is a copy of a memorandum which I prepared after that long trip I took through the northwestern provinces of China in the summer and fall of 1942.

Q. Did you ever show your own personal copy or any other copy of this memorandum to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I had no personal copy of this memorandum. I never showed any copy to Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Will you look at the last page of this material and point out the portion which indicates the source and tell us whether that suggests where this material came from?—A. Well, this last line reads, or contains the words "BEW File No. 520866." BEW to me would indicate the Board of Economic Warfare. This type of file number is not a Department of State file number. And this would indicate that either the original—that it either originated in the Board of Economic Warfare or from someone who had access to their materials who know their file numbers. Nobody in the Department of State would ordinarily know their file numbers.

Q. Was there any Board of Economic Warfare in 1942, Mr. Service?—A. Certainly, sir.

Q. Did they have any offices in Chungking?—A. Well, I can't state with certainty whether they had established their offices in Chungking by that time. They certainly were represented. They certainly had representatives visiting Chungking by that time and they eventually had a fairly large office there. But, as of '42, I'm not sure.

Mr. ACHILLES [examining document]. This does appear to be a BEW copy, or at least to have been obtained from BEW. I note that it is typed on short paper and the photostat does not show the handwritten signature, so I assume that that is a copy made subsequent to the transmission of the dispatch.

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you Document B-30. It consists of four pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material. The first page is dated 10th of October 1944. In this case it is Report No. 40, and it bears the typewritten words "John S. Service" at the bottom. Attached to this are three pages of typewritten material headed "Memorandum" and bearing at the end the typewritten words "John S. Service." I ask you if you ever showed the material, of which this is a photostatic reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I'm certain I did not.

Q. Did you ever show him your own personal copy of that memorandum?—A. I'm sorry, sir, I didn't understand the last question. You asked whether I had shown the paper, of which this is a photostatic copy, to Mr. Jaffe?

Q. Yes.—A. I did not.

Q. Did you ever show him your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. I'm certain that I did not, sir.

Q. This is the report which has been also known in these proceedings as Document No. 193, is it not?—A. It is a part of 194138, sir; 193 is an Embassy dispatch which transmitted a copy of this memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a report of which you had a personal copy?

A. I believe I did.

Q. Actually, as Document 193 appears in the document book, it consists only of your report, does it not? And is not the transmitting dispatch?—A. Yes, sir; I should have said that this is the same material as appears in Document 193.

Q. Now I show you Document B-31.

Mr. ACHILLES. Before we leave B-30, may I examine it. I see no indication whether B-30 is a photostat of a carbon copy of the report or a copy made subsequently.

A. I might say at that point that my typing, I'm sure, is a lot cleaner than that typing there. I'm positive it is not a photostatic reproduction of my personal carbon copy because the typing is extremely amateurish there and even though I'm not a professional I would be sure that I had done a better job than that.

Q. I show you Document B-31, which consists of 11 pages of a photostatic reproduction of typewritten material. It is dated August 27, 1944, and is Report No. 15. At the bottom of the second page it bears the typewritten words "John S. Service." The remaining pages are headed "Interview with Mao Tse-tung" and are dated August 23, 1944. I ask the Board whether it has information as to precisely what this is?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostatic copy of a carbon copy of typed material.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the material of which this is a photostatic reproduction?—A. No; I did not give him the material, the paper of which this is a photostatic copy.

Q. Do you have your own personal copy of this report?—A. I did at that time, sir; I do not know.

Q. That is, you had it on June 6, 1945?—A. Yes; I think so.

Q. Do you recall whether it was in this form, by which I mean can you ascertain whether this could be a carbon copy of the memorandum you prepared?—A. Well, I have already said, sir, that I did not give the paper, of which this is a copy, a reproduction, a photostatic reproduction; does that not answer your question, sir?

Q. It does not answer the question I'm now asking. I'm asking you whether this material here appears to be an exact copy of the memorandum as you prepared it.—A. Well, I don't have any copy; that is, I don't have my own copy here to compare. It may be a copy, but it is certainly not an exact copy.

Q. I'm trying to find out whether it appears to be an exact copy, in short, a carbon copy or the original of the memorandum you actually prepared.—A. No, sir; it is not.

Q. It is not an exact copy?—A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a personal copy of this report?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. This is now B-31. Do you think you may have shown to Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this report?—A. No; I think I did not. I think I should mention, sir, if I may, that this is one of three, and the State Department received this memorandum of mine, as one of three enclosures to dispatch No. 3018. That dispatch was received in the Department prior to October 27, 1944, since I see the stamp by the Office of Far Eastern Affairs on that date. I also notice that the other two enclosures to that dispatch also appear among the list which has been furnished to me of my reports which were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. And it seems certainly a coincidence that he should have copies of all three enclosures to that single dispatch. This dispatch appears as our Document 177.

Mr. ACHILLES. It's a dispatch to the State Department?

Mr. RHETTS. No, sir. You mean B-31?

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes, B-31.

Mr. RHETTS. B-31 is not a copy of the dispatch to the State Department. It is merely a copy of Report No. 15, which I believe you will find gives no indication as to what its source is.

Mr. ACHILLES. I should like to examine that. Information in possession of the Board indicates that that is a copy of a document on file in MID.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you Document B-32, which consists of eight pages, photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, the first page of which is dated September 28, 1944, which is known to be Report No. 34 and bears at the bottom thereof the typewritten words "John S. Service." The remaining six pages are headed "Policies of the Chinese Communists affecting their attitudes toward the Soviet Union and the United States." There is also a cover sheet attached to this document signed by James M. Horan, major, AGD, stating that "this document comprises an excerpt from a secret report now on file in the intelligence library of Military Intelligence Division, War Department, General Staff." And attached to that is a small sheet of paper indicating distribution: POL, 1 copy; RUSS. SPC. LIB. HQAAF, SPEC. BR. I ask you whether you gave the material, of which this is a photostatic reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. Well, I'm not sure I understand your question.

Q. Before asking that question I'd like to ask the Board if it can identify what the material is which is reproduced here.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a photostat of a typed paper, a carbon copy.

A. I am sorry I am not sure I understood your question exactly.

Q. What I want to know is whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the paper which is photostatically reproduced here?—A. No, sir; I'm sure I did not.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you show him a personal copy of the report?—A. I may have allowed him to see my personal copy of this memorandum. It is a memorandum based entirely on Communist material and Communist sources. It's the same type of material which I had used in background talks, for instance, before the Institute of Pacific Relations here in Washington in November 1944 and on various other occasions. I'm sure it was alluded to in most of my talks and interrogations and questions.

Q. What is the classification of your report?—A. There is no indication at all of classification. The only copy that the Department of State has been able to locate came from the files of DRE, and I assume from the files of Research Analysis Branch of OSS. They have stamped it secret, but it is obviously their own stamp. Yes, I do see a typewritten "secret" at the top here.

Q. Then the report is classified "secret"?—A. Apparently it was.

Mr. RHETTS. But you do not know what classification you may have put on the report yourself?

A. Well, the only copy that we have now is this copy which apparently was made by OSS. It's not my original copy nor a carbon copy of my original copy.

Mr. ACHILLES. As to the material in the report, do you feel that you would have classified it secret?

A. Well, I may have, sir, in September 1944. At that time, of course, I had not been to the States, had not been discussing this material. By April of '45, when I first met Mr. Jaffe, a great deal had been written about the Chinese Communists. At least 10 or 12 correspondents had visited Yen-an and had come out or had written or sent out articles about it. The fact of our mission up there was no longer even restricted and, as I say, by that time this was old stuff, by April 1945.

So, even though it might have been reasonably classified fairly high in September, there was no longer any need for classification of that type of material by the spring of '45. You see, by April '45 Guenther Stein was on the verge of publishing his book, all of these correspondents had extensive articles, for example, Life magazine, the New York Times, and so on, had very much the same material.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you Document B-33, which consist of five pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, dated March 13, 1945, Report No. 10, subject: "The views of Mao Tse-tung: America and China." It contains a short summary following which appears the typewritten words "John S. Service" and thereafter the remainder of the material which is headed "Memorandum, conversation with Mao Tse-tung." At the end are the typewritten initials "JSS."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed copy.

Q. Thank you. Now I ask you whether you think you may have shown the material, of which this is a photostatic reproduction, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Do you think you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. It's quite possible; yes. It's merely an account of conversation in which General Mao discussed the situation in China in terms similar to the way he was discussing it fairly frequently with correspondents and other visitors to Yen-an.

Q. Is this the memorandum of conversation with Mao which you earlier testified that you recalled showing to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir.

Q. It is not?—A. No, sir.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. What is the classification of this document?—A. It does not appear on B-33, but I see the original was classified secret.

Q. I notice that that report is dated March 13, 1945. Could you indicate why you gave the secret classification at that date?—A. No, sir; I don't see any justification for such a high classification.

Q. Does it contain any comment by you on the views expressed or the situation indicated by Mao?—A. It contains a little, a very brief comment, but none which reflects on American policy or criticizes American policy.

Q. Does it contain any information of military value?—A. None whatever. Interestingly enough, this may be part of the reason—this is a quotation of Mao: "American's intentions have been good. We recognize that when Ambassador Hurley came to Yen-an and endorsed our basic five points he could not have endorsed them unless he know that President Roosevelt thought likewise." That is just quoting Mr. Mao. At that time these basic five points in the draft agreement of November 10, 1944, were becoming general knowledge but had not yet been officially admitted. They had not been released by the two parties.

Now, I'm not quite sure when those facts were released. They were well known in Chungking and the Chinese Communists were talking about them fairly freely but I don't think that we had admitted the fact that Ambassador Hurley had endorsed them. When I say "endorsed them," shall we say "counter-signed them." That may have been the reason why I put some classification on it.

Q. Was the existence of those five points public knowledge in April?—A. Well, it was known to every correspondent, sir. I don't think that the American Government had officially admitted the fact that Ambassador Hurley had endorsed them in any way. I can't answer your question specifically, sir.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you document B-34, which consists of three pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material.—A. Excuse me. We have to do some research but you will find, certainly in the books that were written very soon after this period, the five points are mentioned and also Ambassador's Hurley's trip, and so on.

Q. I show you document B-34, which consists of three pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material bearing the date March 20, 1945, No. 20 and bearing the typewritten words "John S. Service." I ask the Board what further identification it has of this document.

Mr. MORELAND. This is a typed copy.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed copy.

Q. Did you give the typed copy, of which this is a photostat, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; this is in a different form from the copy which I had, the personal copy which I had in my possession.

Q. Did you prepare, from the personal copy you had, any further copy and give that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I never gave any of my personal copies to anyone.

Q. Do you think you may show your personal copy of this report to Mr. Jaffe?—A. It's possible, but I doubt it, sir. I don't think I did.

Mr. STEVENS. What is your reason for doubting that, Mr. Service?

A. There is nothing particularly secret about the information in it, but it wasn't the type of material which I understood Mr. Jaffe was interested in seeing. He was interested, as I remember, in mainly what the Communists were saying, what their policies were, what they were doing. And this is a different type of material.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yen Hsi-shan is not a Communist?

A. No, sir.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you Document B-35, which consists of six pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, dated April 1, 1945, No. 26, bearing toward the bottom of the first page the typewritten words "John S. Service," followed by "Memorandum of Conversation with Communist Leaders," and at the end the typewritten words "John S. Service." I ask the Board what further identification it has of this document.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed copy.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typed copy of which this is a photostat?—A. No, sir; I did not. It's not typed in the form in which I prepared my memorandum.

Q. Do you think you may have shown him your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. Yes; I think it was this memorandum which I showed him on my first meeting with him.

Q. This is the one, is it, that he asked to retain to read through?—A. Yes. Yes; I think he did retain it.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he retain that paper at your first meeting or did you afterward include it in the papers you allowed him to retain at the second meeting?—A. Well, I'm not positive on that point, sir. I think that probably I allowed him to keep it along with the others.

Q. Not at the first meeting, but at the second meeting?—A. Well, he just kept it after the first meeting and then retained it with the others after the second meeting. I believe that is what happened, but I can't state for certain.

Q. What is the classification of this document?—A. There is no classification appearing on document B-35.

Q. But that is a typed copy of a paper which bears the classification of what?—A. Of secret, sir.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Which document bears the classification secret?—A. The original, sir, which appears as our document No. 226.

Q. In other words, that was your own classification, Mr. Service?—A. Yes; it was my own classification.

Q. Would you explain why, having it classified as secret, you allowed Mr. Jaffe to keep a copy?—A. I'd say the reason probably was that this is in one sense advance information on issues that were probably going to be discussed and decisions made at the party congress, the imminent party congress of the Communist Party.

Q. When was the congress held?—A. The date of the congress was not definitely announced; but when I had the interview on April 1—actually the interview was on March 31—I say that “Chou En-lai twice made pointed remarks to the effect that it was unfortunate that I could not stay in Yen-an another 10 days, that I would find the stay worth while and interesting. (I took this to be a hint the party congress is to be convened within that time.)”

We had been expecting the congress to be convened ever since about the 1st of March. That was the reason first why I had gone to Yen-an. They would not announce a definite date—the reasons they didn't specify, but I understood they feared there might be Japanese bombings. They feared there might be a Kuomintang fomented disturbance, something of that sort. So the meetings were to be quiet, without any public announcement. I assumed by late April that the meetings probably had already taken place. Actually, we find that they didn't take place until a little bit later than that, about the 1st of May, possibly, although I'm not sure—they may have delayed the release of Mao Tse-tung's speech until the 1st of May, when the meetings were over. But there was every indication that they would be held within the next few days. And I imagine that was the only reason for a classification of secret at the time I wrote the report.

Q. Really, the essence of your answer is that you classified the document secret on April 1 because it related to an event which was expected to occur shortly?—A. That's right.

Q. And that by April 19 you believed the event had taken place?—A. April 20; yes, I thought it probably had. And it may have—I'm not sure. As far as I know, the first publicity was put out about the 1st of May, but because of the Communist tactics the congress may well have been over by that time.

(At this point, 11:30 a. m., the Board recessed and reconvened at 11:38 a. m.)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I show you Document B-36, which consists of seven pages of photostatic material dated October 9, 1944, subject: American Officer and Foreign Correspondents Report Active Popular Support of the Eighth Route Army at Front. Toward the bottom of the first page appears the typewritten words “John S. Service,” followed by certain material prepared by M. A. Casberg, major, Medical Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed copy.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typed copy of which this is a photostat?—A. No, I did not. This is not written in the same form in which I submitted my memoranda.

Q. Do you think you may have shown him your own personal copy of this memorandum and the enclosure?—A. May I hear that question again, sir?

Q. I say, do you think you may have shown to Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this memorandum with the enclosure?—A. I very much doubt it. I think I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You had a personal copy?

A. I had a personal copy; yes, sir.

Q. Would you indicate why you doubt that you would have shown him this?—A. Well, I doubt it mainly because it contains at least an excerpt from Major Casberg's report. The other material, of course, is mainly by newspaper correspondents and their discussions, accounts of their trips. I have no idea of what classification was put on Major Casberg's original report.

Q. What classification did you put on yours?—A. I put secret on mine and I made most of them secret at the time. This report was dated in October, this report of correspondents.

Q. October of what year?—A. Of 1944. And the material in it had been written up and made public by the correspondents by the spring of 1945. This general material had been alluded to by me many times in conversations and interrogations and in the background talks which I had been authorized to give.

Q. But you do not believe you showed your own copy of this memorandum to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I think I did not.

Q. Now I show you Document B-37, which consists of seven pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material. I ask you whether or not Document B-37 appears to be identical with Document B-36?—A. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a carbon copy of B-36.

Q. So that the discussion relating to B-36 is fully applicable to B-37?—A. That is correct.

Q. Now I show you Document B-38, which consists of two pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material dated March 22, 1945, No. 22, and at the bottom of the second page is the typewritten words "John S. Service." Will the Board tell us what identification it has for this document?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed original copy.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typed copy of which this is a photostat?—A. This is not in the form in which I prepared my memorandum.

Q. So that your answer to my question is?—A. No.

Q. Do you think you may have shown to Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this memorandum, Mr. Service?—A. It's quite possible I did; yes. I can't say for sure, though. It simply lists a number of public appointments of officials in China.

Q. Do you know what classification you placed on your own memorandum?—A. Well, the only copy which we have been able to find was the Department of State file.

The CHAIRMAN. This is your Document No. 224?

A. Yes, sir. The Department has found my original copy and I notice it bears the typewritten classification, which was my own classification, of secret.

The CHAIRMAN. You say they found your report. Is this just as you prepared it or is it a copy that you are looking at, this Document 224?

A. Document 224 is the original document of my memorandum.

Q. And you typed that yourself?—A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Why did you classify that secret if it just related to public announced appointments?—A. Well, because it is critical of the generalissimo and of the Central Government, and it was customary to put a classification on those to limit their circulation and to restrict attribution. However, it was the type of material which was discussed for background with the press in China. It was known to the press.

Q. Would the same critical comments be made by you and through the correspondents?—A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. RIETTS:

Q. Now I show you Document B-39, which consists of two pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, dated October 9, 1944, Report No. 39, bearing at the bottom of the second page the typewritten words "John S. Service." Will the Board give us further identification of this?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of the typewritten original.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave Mr. Jaffe the typewritten original, of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not. I say that because this is in a different form from the way I prepared my memoranda.

Q. Do you think you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this report?—A. I may have, yes. This was exactly the same material which I had used repeatedly in background talks. The appraisal of the popular support and strength of the Chinese Communists—it was not American policy. It is purely an attempt to appraise the strength of the Communists in China.

Mr. STEVENS. Does that refer to the populace strength, military strength, or what?

A. The point was made their military strength depends on the popular support. Having the popular support they are able to wage guerrilla warfare and are therefore a military factor. But that was written, of course, in October 1944 and by April 1945 it was old stuff. I myself had probably said that almost verbatim in my background talks to the IPR twice; I said the same thing to numerous groups all over official Washington; the same things had been written by correspondents who had been out in China, and who had traveled through the country and you will find very much the same material written of course in the books and articles by the people up there which already appeared by April 1945.

Q. Do you know what classification you placed on this memorandum in October 1944, when you wrote it?—A. I do not have the original or a carbon copy of the original. I notice the Embassy which transmitted it as an enclosure to Despatch No. 3191 on November 24, 1944, classified it as secret.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that Document No. 192?

A. Yes, it's a part of Document 192.

Q. I show you Document B-40, which consists of three pages of photostatic reproductions of typewritten material, dated August 29, 1944, Report No. 16, and bearing the typewritten words at the end "John S. Service."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typewritten original.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typewritten original, of which this is a photostat?—A. No, sir; I'm sure I did not. This is not exactly in the form in which I prepared my original memorandum.

Q. Do you think you may have shown him your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. No, I'm quite sure I did not.

Q. Do you care to indicate why you're sure that you did not?—A. Well, I discussed the policy considerations and as I went through them and my memoranda and selected the ones which I thought would be appropriate to let Jaffe see, I exercised in each case judgment based on the subject matter. And I selected, to allow him to see, informative, descriptive ones and I eliminated ones which dealt with policy or recommended policy and, therefore, I think that I did not allow him to see this one. This one, of the three enclosures to Despatch No. 3018, which is our Document No. 177—I don't think I let him see that.

Q. Now I show you Document No. B-41, which consists of three pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, dated September 3, 1944, Report No. 26, and bearing at the bottom of the third page the typewritten words "John S. Service."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typewritten original.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typewritten original, of which this is a photostat?—A. No, sir, I'm sure I did not. I did not. It's not in the form in which I prepared my reports.

Q. Do you think you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. No, I think I did not.

Q. Your basis for thinking that is what?—A. Well, this again is a memorandum discussing policy. The subject is a Need for American Policy Toward the Problems Created by the Rise of the Chinese Communist Party.

Q. Now I show you Document B-42, which consists of six pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material dated August 31, 1944, Report No. 19.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typewritten original.

Q. At the bottom of the fourth page appears the typewritten words "John S. Service" and then there follows certain notes relating to a map which accompanies this Report No. 19. I ask you whether you ever showed Mr. Jaffe the typewritten original, of which this is a photostat?—A. No, sir, this is not in the same form in which I prepared my memorandum. I did not, sir.

Q. Do you think you may have shown Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. I doubt very much whether I did. I think I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a copy of your document No. what?—A. Our Document No. 180, sir.

Q. I refer you to Document 180, which is the original of a Despatch No. 3020; the distribution of this despatch to which your Report No. 18 is an enclosure is shown as follows: MID, 2 copies; ONI, 1 copy; Foreign Activity Correlation, 1 copy; OSS, 2 copies; Political Files, 1 copy; and CA, 2 copies. Is that right?—A. That is correct.

Q. Now I show you Document B-43 which consists of six pages—

Mr. ACHILLES. I'm sorry. Could you repeat the answer on B-42, as to who you had shown this, whether you had shown Mr. Jaffe your copy of that?

A. I believe I did not.

Q. Document B-43, which consists of six pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, dated September 4, 1944, Report No. 22, bearing at the bottom of the last page the words "John S. Service" in typewriting.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typewritten original.

Q. I ask you whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typewritten original of which this is a photostat, Mr. Service?—A. No, I did not.

Q. Do you think you showed him your personal copy of this memorandum?—A. It's possible that I might have. The material is entirely of a historical account or description or account of the development of the New Fourth Army. It is a type of material which I was using and had used in these background talks. I'm sure, for instance, that much of the subject matter was mentioned in those talks.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was the information contained in it of military significance at the time?

A. Well, only a sense that any discussion of the strength of Chinese Communist armies was of military significance. However, those were claims which they were advertising to the world as vigorously as they could by every means available.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a copy of your Document 182 and is classified as secret?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. What was the date of this report?

A. My memorandum is dated on September 4, 1944. It was transmitted to the Department by Despatch No. 3058 from Chungking, dated October 13, 1944. The only copy that we have at present is an ozalid and it doesn't show the date stamps of the various divisions in the Department so it's impossible for us to say on what date it was received in the Department. But I assume it would be in late October 1944.

Mr. RHETTS. The ozalid, which is our Document 182, shows distribution, does it not, as follows: MID, 2 copies; OSS, 2 copies; ONI, 2 copies; foreign activity correlation, 1 copy; political file, 1 copy; and CA, 2 copies?

A. That is correct, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. It's unfortunate that Mr. Jaffe did not use a date stamp.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you Document B-44, which consists of four pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material dated October 2, 1944, Report No. 37, and bearing in the middle of the first page the typewritten words "John S. Service," followed by material headed "Memorandum."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typewritten original.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the typewritten original, of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not. This is not the form in which I prepared my memorandum.

Q. Do you think you may have given Mr. Jaffe your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. I quite possibly did. I can't say for certain.

Q. You quite possibly did?—A. Yes, I may have.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is the classification of this document which I take it is your Document No. 190?—A. We do not have my original memorandum, but it was transmitted to the Department by Chungking's dispatch No. 3094, dated October 25,

Q. 1944?—A. Yes, 1944. The dispatch carries the classification of "confidential."

Q. Is that probably the classification you gave the original? Is that what you classified it originally?—A. I assume so, sir; although there is no certainty on that. The Embassy sometimes raised the classification on my memoranda but I imagine that "confidential" was probably my original classification.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I show you Document B-45, which consists of seven pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material dated September 10, 1944, Report No. 26, and bearing at the bottom of the last page the typewritten words "John S. Service."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a carbon copy.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the carbon copy of which this is a photostat?—A. No, I did not. I did not. It is not in the form in which I prepared by memorandum.

Q. Do you think you may have shown him your own personal copy of this memorandum?—A. I may possibly have. I can't say for certain.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In each case where you say you may have shown him, do you mean that you may have let him borrow the copy to take home with him, as you have testified in your statement?—A. That is correct, sir. This is again a descriptive report based entirely on Communist sources, discussing to some extent the success of the Communist Party in getting control in the guerrilla areas, their political methods used, etc. I don't consider it at all complimentary to the Communists. It's a type of material which was really the backbone of the briefing sessions in the background talks which I had given on the Communists.

Q. I take it that this is a copy of your Document No. 183. What is the classification of Document 183?

Mr. RHETTS. Document 183 is in the hands of the reporter, not this one.

Q. Can you tell from recollection what the classification is, or shall we await its return?—A. That, if I remember rightly, sir, may have been given a high classification by the Embassy. I'm only speaking from memory, sir. This was the only form in which we have the memorandum now, of course, which is as an enclosure to a dispatch from the Embassy in Chungking. And, as I remember it, the Embassy made considerable comment on my memorandum. They did not agree with it entirely. And they may have put a classification of "secret" on it. I rather imagine that they did. Of course, I had no knowledge of the Embassy dispatch, and it wasn't until these proceedings when I saw the Embassy dispatch that I learned that they had not agreed in all respects to agree with my memorandum.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I show you Document B-46, which consists of four pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material; the first page is dated Chungking, May 27, 1944, and is addressed to the Secretary of State and bears the typed and handwritten signature of C. E. Gauss. Attached to this dispatch is a one-page memorandum bearing the typewritten words: "John S. Service" at the bottom, followed by two pages of material headed "Summary of new democracy," by Mao Tse-tung.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of an ozalid copy.

Q. Now, I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you gave to Mr. Jaffe the ozalid copy of this document, of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not. In fact, I have never seen the ozalid. This is a dispatch prepared by the Embassy, of which I did not have any knowledge.

Q. Have you ever seen the dispatch or an ozalid copy of it prior to June 6, 1945?—A. I'm sure I never had.

Q. The enclosed material is a copy of a report prepared by you; is it not?—A. That is correct. It's a copy of a memorandum which I prepared on May 14, 1944.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that have a document number?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you think you ever showed to Mr. Jaffe your personal copy of your report, which is attached to this ozalid reproduction of the dispatch?—A. I did not and I could not have since I did not have in my possession a copy of this memorandum.

Q. Is there anything on the face of the dispatch here which suggests in any way what disposition or distribution might have been made of it from the State Department?—A. I see that the ozalid had on the face the writing "For background use only. Please return," followed by the initials "FPL," which I assume are the initials of Frank P. Lockhart, whom I believe at that time was the Office of Far Eastern Affairs liaison officer with OWI. And I might suggest, therefore, that this was a copy sent from the Office of Far Eastern Affairs to OWI, although that is just pure conjecture.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that please. This document indicates that it was lent to someone by Mr. Lockhart and apparently there is no way of ascertaining whether or not it was returned to him.

The CHAIRMAN. It would indicate, would it not, that it was an OWI copy at one time?

Mr. ACHILLES. Owing to the fact that Mr. Lockhart was FE liaison officer with OWI.

The CHAIRMAN. Would that be a fair interpretation of that fact?

A. I suggest it, sir, I think so.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you document B-47, which consists of 4 pages of photostatic reproductions of typewritten material; the first page is dated Chungking, July 26, 1944, and is No. 2790 and is addressed to the Secretary of State and bears the typewritten words at the bottom "C. E. Gauss." Attached is a 1-page memorandum dated July 11, 1944, No. 94, and bears at the bottom the typewritten words "John S. Service." The remaining 2 pages of the document are dated July 3, 1944.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of an ozalid copy, an ozalid copy of the dispatch with enclosures.

Q. I ask you whether you ever gave Mr. Jaffe the ozalid copy, of which this is a photostat, Mr. Service?—A. I did not, and I do not believe that I ever saw the original dispatch or any ozalid of it.

Q. Before now?—A. Before these proceedings, yes.

Q. Do you think you may have ever given Mr. Jaffe your personal copy of Report No. 94, which is an attachment to this dispatch?—A. I did not give him any copy of this and I could not have, since I had none in my possession.

Q. I invite your attention to document 162, which is the original of this dispatch. It shows distribution, does it not, as follows: MID, 2 copies; ONI, 1 copy; CA, 2 copies; Foreign Activity Correlation, 1 copy; Political files, 1 copy; is that correct?—A. That is correct, yes.

Q. It also bears the stamp on the face of it, does it not, of the Division of Territorial Studies?—A. It does.

Q. Indicating that the original was distributed to the Division of Territorial Studies?—A. That is correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. Does it indicate in any way that that particular ozalid was a copy which was furnished to the Division of Territorial Studies? I should like to examine it. I see a notation on here "Not sent to OWI," with the initials "FPL," but I see nothing to indicate whether the particular ozalid copy was in fact sent to the Division of Territorial Studies.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any indication on there as to whose particular paper this was?

Mr. ACHILLES. I see the initials "JWA." Do you know whose initials those were?—JWA initials appear on almost all of these dispatches filed in DC/R and I believe it to be someone in DC/R. You see it here, for instance, on this stamp "Division of Communications and Records."

Mr. ACHILLES. I see nothing that would indicate whose particular copy this was.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it not a fact, Mr. Achilles, that if this was the one in which the handwriting of JPL was on, it may very well have been the copy that CA had? JPL was in CA, was he?

Mr. RHETTS. You mean FPL.

A. FPL was in FE. That is Lockhart.

Mr. STEVENS. Would that be a fair interpretation, Mr. Achilles?

Mr. ACHILLES. It would be hard to say whether it was a FE copy or a CA copy or whether they both used the same copies. Ordinarily it would be the original to FE, would it?—A. As I understand it, sir, the original—and I think we can see that from the stamps on the face of the original dispatch—would be routed to FE, but none of the ozalids. The ozalids were made up according to those instructions: MID, 2 copies; ONI, 1 copy; CA, 2 copies, foreign activity correlation, 1 copy; political files, 1 copy. And those ozalids would go only to those offices and CA then forwarded copies generally to Territorial Studies perhaps, I'm not sure.

Mr. RHETTS. Well, this particular dispatch indicates that the original one went to Territorial Studies at some point, does it not?—A. It does.

Mr. MORELAND. (Off the record.)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I show you document B-48, which consists of three pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material, bearing the date May 23, 1944, No. 2604, addressed to the Secretary of State and bearing on the first page the typewritten words "C. E. Gauss." And attached to—

Mr. ACHILLES. May I interrupt for a moment. Now that we have finished with the ozalid copies I'd be grateful if Counsel could read as briefly as he reasonably can the description of the remainder of these documents.

Q. Beginning at the bottom of the first page is the enclosure to the dispatch dated May 10, 1944, and at the end of the page appears the typewritten words "John S. Service." Will the Board state what this is?

Mr. MORELAND. It is a photostat of typed material.

Q. It is an original typed copy. I ask you if you ever gave Mr. Jaffe the original typed copy, of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not. I did not have any copy of my memorandum, which was included there, in my possession.

Q. Did you ever see the dispatch of which this is a copy before June 6, 1945?—A. To the best of my knowledge, I never did.

Q. Now I show you Document B-49, which is two pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material bearing the date "Chungking, May 23, 1944," and bearing at the end the typed and handwritten signature of "C. E. Gauss," and I ask the Board what this is?

Mr. MORELAND. It is a photostat of an original document.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you ever gave to Mr. Jaffe the original dispatch, of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not, definitely. I never saw the original document, as far as I know.

Q. This document, Document B-49, is a copy of the dispatch which was a part of Document B-48, is it not?—A. That is correct.

Q. Except it does not also have attached a copy of your memorandum.—A. That is right. I think it was interesting to note that it was distributed only to CA and was received in the Department on June 7, 1944.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. You say you did not have with you in 1945 your copy, any copies of that material?—A. I had no copies of that material.

Q. Therefore you could not have given them to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I could not.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I show you Document B-50, which consists of four pages of photostatic reproduction of certain typewritten material. The first page is dated March 23, 1944, and is addressed to the Secretary of State and bears the typewritten words at the bottom "C. E. Gauss." Attached is a three-page memorandum dated March 20 and bearing at the end the typewritten words "John S. Service." Will the Board tell us what this is?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed copy.

Q. I ask you, Mr. Service, whether you ever gave to Mr. Jaffe the typed copy, of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not.

Q. I direct your attention to the handwriting, which appears in the upper right-hand corner of the first page of this material, which says "Amerasia, Criticism on page 2 of Enclosure." Do you recognize that handwriting?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is it yours?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. For the record I'll state that that is the handwriting that has been identified by Mr. Larsen as his own.

Q. Do you think that you may have ever shown or given to Mr. Jaffe your personal copy of the memorandum which is attached to this dispatch?—A. I did not, and I could not have, since I did not have any personal copy of that memorandum.

Q. Now I show you Document B-51, which consists of six pages of photostatic reproduction of typewritten material. The first page is headed "Joint Intelligence Collection Agency," and part way down the page are the words "V. F. Meisling, Major, Infantry, Administrative Officer, JICA/CBI Branch." The second page bears the reproduction of the signature of Maj. James A. Horan, AGD, stating that "This document is an excerpt from a confidential report now on file in the Intelligence Library, Military Intelligence Division, War Department, General Staff." The third page is a reproduction of the first page and the fifth page bears at the bottom the words "John S. Service" in typewriting. The last page is mostly blank, evidently indicating a map was there, and certain notes appear at the bottom.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a carbon copy.

Q. Did you give to Mr. Jaffe the carbon copy of which this is a photostat?—A. I did not. I have never seen this document and had no copy in my possession and no copy of my memorandum which is excerpted here.

Q. So that you could not have given Mr. Jaffe this material in any form?—A. I could not have, and did not.

Q. Now I show you Document B-52, which consists of a large sheaf of papers, the cover sheet of which is dated October 4, 1944, and indicates that Joseph K. Dickey, Colonel, GSC, Forward Echelon, USAF/CBI, is transmitting attached reports obtained by Mr. John S. Service. These reports include notes of interviews furnished to Mr. Service by Guenther Stein, Maurice Votaw, I. Epstein, among other papers.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a photostat of a typed copy.

Q. Mr. Service, I show you now Document B-19, and I ask you whether or not Document B-52 appears to be identical with Document B-19?—A. It does.

Q. Well, the testimony you gave yesterday with respect to B-19 is in all respects applicable to your testimony with respect to Document B-52?—A. That is correct.

Q. Document B-52 appears to contain more pages than Document B-19, does it not?—A. It does.

Q. I suggest the witness be given an opportunity to compare them in some detail since they are very bulky.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Did I understand Mr. Service to say that among his personal properties he had only one copy of each document?—A. That is the best of my recollection, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice that the FBI picked up from your residence at the time of your arrest more than one copy of some of the documents.

Mr. STEVENS. Not residence, his office.

A. I cannot explain that. I was not given any chance to confirm the list of material they had found in my desk, but I cannot recollect any instances and cannot think of any reason why I would have had more than one copy.

The CHAIRMAN. I'll have to give you a chance to reflect on your answer to this question.

Also present: Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Appearances: Charles Edward Rhetts, Esq., for Reilly, Rhetts & Ruckelshaus, appearing on behalf of Mr. Service.

(The meeting reconvened at 2:07 p. m.)

(Emmanuel S. Laren, called as a witness by the Board, being duly sworn, continued testifying as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Larsen, just after the close of the session 2 days ago I asked you if you would be good enough to bring with you today a copy of your manuscript entitled "They Called Me a Spy." Do you have that with you?—A. No; I don't have it with me.

Q. Do you not any longer have a copy?—A. Yes; I have a copy of it. I sent a very brief note to my father and asked him to return it immediately.

Q. I see. Your father has your only copy?—A. My father has it. Yes.

Q. And you have requested your father to return it to you?—A. Yes; I have requested him.

Q. I wonder if you would be good enough to make that available to the Board when you receive it?—A. Yes; I will, definitely.

Q. I will undertake to see that some copy of it is made so that you will still have a personal copy.—A. Thank you.

Q. But may we rely on you to supply a copy of that to the Board when you obtain it?—A. Yes; you may rely on me.

Q. Now, Mr. Larsen, do you know Mr. Frank Bielaski?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of Brooks?—A. Brooks? No.

Q. I should like to introduce into the transcript at this point Document 100-5. (The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT 100-5

"(EXCERPT FROM CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, HOUSE, MAY 22, 1950, P. 7544)

"Mr. BROOKS. I do not know. I think there is a man who can possibly cast some light on that. I think Larson, who was convicted will probably tell all he knows about it. I have never talked to Larson.

"Mr. FEIGLIAN. Is he incarcerated?

"Mr. BROOKS. No. He got fined $500. He stopped in Mr. Dondero's office. He was being blocked from getting another job with the Government. He was all set to be sent out by the Army, he was set to be sent to the Far East. They had hired him. The newspapers got hold of that, and with a little publicity they stopped him.

"I know that he would like to get back in the Government service. Right now he is in the humor to tell anything he knows with some reservations. He is not going to tell what all his own motives were. He can be helpful. He knows the relationship between Jaffe and Service. Service denies that he knew Jaffe. Larson said he knew him well. He said Jaffe had something to do with getting Roth's commission put through. How, I do not know."

Q. I show you, Mr. Larsen, the transcript of certain testimony given by the House committee on May 10, 1946, and direct your attention to this Document 100-5.—A. Apparently this Mr. Brooks is one of the members of the committee that questioned me in 19—no; I will tell you I haven't read—I haven't had time to read all of this here yet.

Q. I will advise you that Mr. Brooks was a witness before the committee?—

A. I see. I don't remember meeting any Mr. Brooks.

Q. Although he testified under that committee by the name of Brooks, it transpired that his name was Frank Bielaski.—A. I see.

Q. Now in this document that I have shown you, Mr. Brooks or Mr. Bielaski indicates that he knows you and has knowledge of your desire to testify before the Hobbs committee and also purports to state that you have particular knowledge of the relationship which existed between Mr. Service and Mr. Jaffe; does he not?—A. I don't know anything of that because I don't know Mr. Brooks, so I can't say what knowledge he had. I had never met him, had nothing to do with him. As far as this testimony of Mr. Brooks is concerned: "He got fined $500"—if that refers to me, that's right. "He stopped in Mr. Dondero's office"—that's right. "He was being blocked from getting another job with the Government"—that's right. Do you remember I told you at the last—

Q. Yes; I am referring now particularly to his statement that you were in a humor to tell anything you know and that you are not going to tell what all your motives were, but that you do know the relationship between Jaffe and Service, and that you knew that Service knew Jaffe well.—A. No; I did not speak to Mr. Brooks and I did not say that to him.

Q. I want to show you a picture which appeared in the Washington Daily News for Monday, May 22.—A. I have that clipping.

Q. A picture showing Mr. Bielaski. Do you recognize the man we are discussing now from that picture?—A. No, sir.

Q. You never saw the man whose picture appears there?—A. Never saw him. As far as I know I have never seen Mr. Bielaski or the man in this picture here.

Q. I ask that this clipping be introduced as an exhibit.

(Received and marked "Document 328, Exhibit 21, clipping from the Washington Daily News of Monday, May 22, 1950, showing picture of Mr. Bielaski.")

Q. You are absolutely certain you never saw Mr. Bielaski or talked to him?—A. To the best of my knowledge I have never seen Mr. Bielaski alias Mr. Brooks.

Q. Did you ever tell anyone that you had personal knowledge that Jaffe knew Service well?—A. I don't have the testimony of the Hobbs committee, and off-hand I don't remember whether they asked me that question, but there is a possibility that I did state the fact that I once saw Mr. Service with Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Now Mr. Brooks testified before the Hobbs committee on May 10, 1946, and you testified before the Hobbs committee on May 13, 1946?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you at any time before your appearance in the Hobbs committee tell anyone that you had personal knowledge that Mr. Jaffe knew Mr. Service well?—A. Not that I remember.

Q. Did you, in fact, have any personal knowledge of how well Mr. Jaffe knew Mr. Service?—A. No; on the contrary, I knew only that I had seen Mr. Service at that brief moment with Mr. Jaffe in the Statler Hotel lobby, and I have very carefully pointed that out to everyone who has questioned me.

Q. And you had not further knowledge of any relationship between Jaffe and Service except your knowledge of seeing them together for that brief moment?—A. That's right.

Q. Do you know what Mr. Brooks or Bielaski would be referring to when he stated you were in a humor to tell anything you know, although not what your motives were for doing so?—A. No.

Q. Now I believe you also testified before the Hobbs committee on May 13, 1946, is that correct?—A. I am not sure, but I believe that was approximately—

Q. I refer you to page 7545 of the Congressional Record for May 22, 1950.—A. I presume they got the date right there?

Q. I ask that there be included in the transcript at this point, Document 100-9a.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be done.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT No. 100-9

"(Excerpt from Congressional Record, House, May 22, 1950)

"(Document 100-9a, p. 7548:)

"Mr. LARSEN. I grew up with those boys, and many of them are now big generals. I went to school with some of them. I know them well, but I can judge them fairly and impartially, because I am not tied in with them in any particular way right now. I earn my money from the United States Government. I do not have to be partial to them, observing them at a distance. So I think I was much more impartial than these people in the State Department who are forcing a pro-Communist policy so as to enhance their own little group at the head of which I consider Dean Acheson stands as a leader. What his ambitions are, I do not know. I heard he wanted to become Secretary of State and President of the United States, and that he hopes to do so with the aid of the liberal element and the CIO and all the people who are making our greatest miseries right now.

"Mr. HANCOCK. Did you ever hear him say anything to indicate his feelings, Dean Acheson?"

"Mr. LARSEN. I never met Dean Acheson, but in discussing official affairs, I was a member of the policy committee for China and Manchuria. We often discussed things which were pool-pooled as impossible. You could not put that over. Dean Acheson will never let that go over. Whatever that was, it was always not in favor of the Communists. He would not allow it to be put over. I will give you a concrete example. They are afraid of you gentlemen up there. We know that. We know that in all our policies. We have to not only consider the public, that is what they say, in America, but we have to consider what Congress would do to us if we went ahead with this.

"In April and May 1945, we had not invaded Japan yet. It was not known by anyone except the high command that we were going to invade Japan and not China. At that time it was all the time speculated upon which part of China we would invade, South China near Formosa and then fight our way up—but the geography is against it, or would we invade North China? If we did, we would come in contact, first, with the Chinese Communists. There was a good share in the State Department that was all in favor of arming the Communists. They were so keen on arming the Communists, when they consider that they were allied with the properly constituted government, I cannot understand; it would be aiding and abetting a regular party, and quite apart from their sympathies. They should have had a better understanding of the international relations and the possibilities. They pursued that policy. I felt day by day I was being pushed outside a little bit. They went to lunch. They had their meetings. I was with them at some lunch meetings where they talked openly about defeating this crowd like Hurley, do everything to get him out. They sabotaged Hurley. You may take my word for that. They sabotaged Hurley. I have given certain little notes and evidence to Hurley that I had committed to memory and helped him with his speech. It was a pity he did not launch it more systematically. He spoiled that for me.

"(Document 100-9b, p. 7552:)"

Mr. HANCOCK. Can it be true that Service has been sent out of the country?"

Mr. LARSEN. Yes, indeed; that is true.

Mr. HANCOCK. Who would designate him? The Secretary of State?

Mr. LARSEN. Dean Acheson, who liked him.

"(Document 100-9c, p. 7553:)"

"Mr. LARSEN. I do not care if I never make money in this life. I have never made any. As a P-6, I got $6,209 a year. I had to entertain Chinese officials. I have a little girl. I had to dress nicely. I managed to pay $25 a month for a little piece of property. If I had not bought that, I never would have had anything. These fellows are selfish. I do not believe these men are truly pro-Communists. I do not think Vincent is really pro-Communist in his heart. He is just an ambitious person meaning to utilize that at some future date just like they say Acheson has schemed to use it.

"They have all ganged together. It is a pyramid where he is at the top."

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I draw your attention particularly to your statement—by the way, your testimony before the Hobbs committee, was that under oath, do you recall?—A. No; I don't think it was. It was a little—a very friendly little party. We sat around a small table all in easy chairs. I think we were six or seven altogether, and just chatter. There was no, as far as I remember—I was not at a committee testifying in the full sense of a committee being in session. It was more that they had invited me in to talk it over with me.

Q. They evidently made a transcript of the testimony, did they not?—A. Now, that, I don't know. I don't remember anyone there taking notes.

Q. Well, the material before you purports to be the questions and answers recorded at that time, does it not?—A. It appears so; yes.

Q. Now, in that you stated to the committee that the committee could take your word for that—you state: "You may take my word for that. They sabotaged Hurley." Now to whom were you referring by "they"?—A. I can't answer that because I am not sure what the conversation was about. I am reading back here: "You may take my word for that. They sabotaged Hurley." It is rather incoherent, some of this stuff here.

Q. Did you intend to refer to Mr. Service as one of the persons, one of the antecedents of this pronoun "they"?—A. I think that would be unwise for me to say now, inasmuch as I don't remember the details of this here.

Q. Well, why don't you read it over with some care and see?—A. Yes; I have read it over.

Q. You have read it over.—A. But there is a possibility that I referred to Mr. John Carter Vincent and Mr. Service, there is a possibility.

Q. Well, now, will you tell the board what evidence you had that Mr. Service, or anyone else for that matter, but Mr. Service in particular, sabotaged Hurley?—A. Well, I believe they asked me about Hurley's testimony before the Senate committee in December 1945, and they asked me whether I had any knowledge of conversations or other intentions to get rid of Hurley.

Q. Well, on that point there is no indication in that testimony that they asked you that, is there?—A. I have a feeling that this is written from memory and I think they should be asked to produce some sort of a statement before they put this down as legal and dependable testimony. I have not been through this, as I said, and I have been advised by an attorney to make no comments on it, and I think I shall follow that advice.

Q. Well, I ask you again what evidence did you have that Service did, in fact—well, I will ask you this: Did you or did you not make the statement that is ascribed to you here, namely: "You may take my word for that. They sabotaged Hurley." A. No; I don't think I will answer that question for the simple reason that I don't know for sure. If I had a copy of my testimony—and I am sure you gentlemen will agree with me—if I had a copy and I was certain that that was what I said I would say so, I would have to say so. But I am not certain and I don't want to incriminate myself and make a statement now about something which does not satisfy me.

Q. All right, let me ask you this: Did you, in fact, all apart from whether this is or is not an accurate transcript of the testimony you gave—did you, in fact, have any evidence that Mr. Service ever sabotaged Hurley?—A. I have no evidence that he did sabotage Mr. Hurley, but I have a slight indication that he didn't like Mr. Hurley.

Q. What indication did you have?—A. Well, for instance, he attended a lunch one time. We went to the Tally-Ho Restaurant. Mr. John Carter Vincent sent me a note and asked me whether I wanted to go to lunch with him, and I am not sure whether I walked over with Mr. Service or just with Mr. John Carter Vincent. But, anyway, we had lunch together and after we had put our trays down Mr. Vincent mentioned something to the effect that Hurley was making a thorough ass of himself, and that it was about time we thought of some way of getting rid of him. I don't remember my exact answer, but I believe I said something to the effect that, well, I was new in the State Department and I was only a country specialist, and that I would start to hire and fire ambassadors when I became Secretary of State.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me see. You went to lunch with Mr. Vincent. Who else was at that lunch?

A. I remember Mr. Service was there. I don't remember whether Mr. Emerson, or who it was—some third person went with us.

Mr. STEVENS. Have you any idea as to the time? Can you fix a time in there?

A. Sometime in April '45.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. What did Mr. Service say on that occasion?—A. I don't think he said anything.

Q. What basis can you have for the conclusion that Mr. Service didn't like Mr. Hurley?—A. Mr. Hurley had told me that he believed they had worked against him in the field.

Q. Well, on that occasion, on the occasion of this luncheon, there was nothing that occurred that led you to believe that Mr. Service didn't like Mr. Hurley?—A. Except the fact that he was present there.

Q. The fact that he was present at the luncheon at which Mr. Vincent made this remark?—A. And that I do not remember him making any statement to the effect that he didn't want to be a party to that.

Q. Did you have any other basis for believing that Mr. Service tried to sabotage Mr. Hurley?—A. No; I don't remember now any other basis.

Q. Now, you state in the next sentence of this document: "I have given certain little notes and evidence to Hurley that I had committed to memory and helped him with his speech." Will you tell us what little notes and evidence you gave to Mr. Hurley and when?—A. I did not help him in his speech because his speech was made while I was in Florida.

Q. What speech are you referring to?—A. Well, I am not referring—they are referring to it, so we might ask them.

Q. "Them", who?—A. The members of the committee who made public this statement here. That would probably be the best manner of unraveling this question.

Q. Well, did you give certain little notes in evidence which you had committed to memory to General Hurley?—A. Well, yes, considerably later.

Q. When was that?—A. Oh, it was in December '45. It may have been a week or two after the testimony.

Q. Now what was that evidence and notes?—A. That I would have a hard time remembering now. Five years is a long time. It is easy to have this pop up, but it is difficult to remember. I wouldn't commit myself on it. It would be futile, I think.

Q. I wonder if you would tell us a little bit more about whatever assistance you rendered to General Hurley at that time?—A. No other assistance to General Hurley. You can be sure of that. You can verify that from General Hurley.

Q. You cannot recall at all now what the notes and evidence was that you gave to General Hurley?—A. No; maybe he can.

Q. In the next sentence you say here: "It was a pity he"—referring to General Hurley—"did not launch it more systematically. He spoiled that for me."—A. Yes; I am glad you asked that because I was just going to mention it. It seems to me that sentence is incomplete as far as I am concerned. It could not just pop out of me like that. It must have been in answer to questions posed to me by members of the committee. I presume that they asked me—well, it has been said to me since exactly those words, so I recall them and I recall them now; namely, recently by Senator Ferguson; it is too bad that Hurley went about his business of preferring charges against certain members of the State Department in a rather headlong manner in 1945. He didn't prepare anything and he simply went before the Senate and made a lot of statements that consisted mostly of generalities and brought no dispatches or no proof or anything with him, and on the spot he could not even mention a single—I believe he said "report" or "dispatch" or "incident" to substantiate his charges. Well, now that same thing I heard before. Mr. Dondero was the first man who was interested in the Hurley testimony of 1945, and when I first got the volcano out of Representative Dondero's mind and he settled down to talk to me in a friendly manner he poured out a long story of what he knew about the case beginning as of the Hurley testimony.

Q. What case is this you are referring to?—A. The Amerasia case, more popularly known as the State Department espionage case, thereby involving the State Department, and at that time we talked back and forth probably rather unguarded. It was more an enumeration of what we thought one way or another. I haven't read this here [indicating] and it is possible there will appear evidence in it when I read it, and it is possible that certain things I have said have been suppressed; namely, that I took quite a strong stand to explain that I knew of no espionage nor of any conspiracy or concerted action or special element in the State Department that was tolerated as such that General Hurley referred to.

Q. Well, when you say: "It was a pity he did not launch it more systematically"—A. It is quite possible I said "it was a pity" for him in the oriental sense of the word—I am sorry for him that he didn't make it in a better organized manner.

Q. Well, do you have any reason to believe that had he organized his case better, that he had a good case to make that he was being sabotaged by Mr. Service and others?—A. That I don't know.

Q. What did you mean when you said: "He spoiled that for me"?—A. I don't understand that sentence. That is supposed to be a quotation of my words, but I don't get that at all.

Q. Well, it suggests it meant that you were very disappointed that General Hurley was not very successful in his efforts.—A. I tell you what I will do—I will go into it very thoroughly. I will take my lawyer and go through this and have him demand the transcript, or whatever there is, and then I will answer you on it. I will ask your permission to do that, and, if you will excuse me then, I will leave today a little early and go into this matter.

Q. No. I would like to go ahead with some other questions, but I point out to you that Congressman Hobbs, of Alabama, who introduced this material into the record has stated that it was a transcript, a verbatim transcript, of the testimony taken before his committee.—A. I don't think there was anyone present at that time taking a transcript, at least I didn't see anyone. He must have sat behind a screen then.

Mr. ACHILLES. There is one sentence on that same page of Congressional Record that catches my eye, a statement attributed to you: "So I think I was much more impartial than these people in the State Department who are forcing a pro-Communist policy so as to enhance their own little group at the head of which I consider Dean Acheson stands as a leader." Do you recall making that statement?

A. I do not recall that. I think those words are pretty well put together without being direct transcript; therefore, I prefer not to comment on them.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. If that is an accurate transcript of what you stated before the Hobbs committee, did you have any actual basis for making such a statement?—A. I don't think it would be wise to answer that question. I will be my own lawyer today for the time being until I bring my own attorney in here.

Q. Now, if you will refer to page 7550 of this Congressional Record that is before you, Mr. Larsen, in column 2 at the top you state that you will supplement your statement "by supplying additional names of persons who were in communication with Jaffe." Did you ever supply that additional information to the Hobbs committee?—A. Which one is that in, column 2, you mean, at the top there—Mr. Chelf?

Q. At the bottom of column 1 Mr. Chelf says: "I wish you would give us the names of these fellows from whom he was obtaining this information" and so forth, and then you state at the top of column 2: "I will supplement my statement with whatever I can remember on that point. I will do it at once today when I get home." Did you ever supply that subcommittee with information?—A. I never went back to the committee. They never sent for me either. I was there only once and that must be on that date here.

Q. Could you supply to this Board the names of additional persons of whom you have personal knowledge that Mr. Jaffe was communicating with and obtaining information from them?—A. Yes; I could do that. I believe I did that the other day in the course of questioning.

Q. Is that a complete list so far as your knowledge, the one that you—A. Well, let me reiterate the names. I knew from Mr. Jaffe himself that he frequently stayed at the home of John and Wilma Fairbank.

Q. No point in going over it again, if that testimony you gave the other day was complete.—A. I see. And another one was Benjamin Franklin Raye, and a third was Michael Lee. I don't think there were any others that I knew of.

Q. Now, I wonder if you would explain to the Board again in some detail, Mr. Larsen, the exact nature of the arrangements that you and Mr. Jaffe made together after you were introduced to Jaffe by Lieutenant Roth. I believe you testified in general that you agreed that you would supply him biographical information on Chinese personalities, is that correct?—A. That is correct; yes.

Q. And he was to supply you with what?—A. Biographical information on Chinese personalities.

Q. The same thing. Now what arrangements were made between you on that? Was Mr. Jaffe to pay you any money for your part of this?—A. No; there was no question of any payment.

Q. Was the arrangement confined exclusively to exchange of this biographical information?—A. That is right, exclusively.

Q. Now I believe in your testimony before the Hobbs committee you indicated that the only kind of information that you did in fact give to Mr. Jaffe was this type of biographical information on Chinese personalities, is that correct?—A. I think that's probably correct.

Mr. RHETTS: I will introduce at this point in the transcript Document 100-7—7a, 7b, and 7c:

(The matter referred to here follows:)

"Doc. No. 100-7

"(Excerpt from Congressional Record—House May 22, 1950)

"(Doc. 100-7a, p. 7546):

"Mr. HANCOCK. Did you remove any of those documents?

"Mr. LARSEN. No. I did take home a number of those that contained lists of personalities, the new Cabinet, and such lists I took home because I would not waste official time sitting doing it. I spent my time at home.

"Mr. SPRINGER. Did you prepare those cards to be left in the State Department?

"Mr. LARSEN. Yes. I prepared cards both for the Navy and State Departments, but I kept my own as a basic file.

"(Doc. 100-7b, p. 7549:)

"Mr. FELLOWS. Where did he get it from?

"Mr. LARSEN. Jaffe got it from all the contacts he had here. He never got anything from little personality material that I gave him, he never got anything else because I have not worked with any other material.

"Mr. FELLOWS. Jaffe had contacts in—

"Mr. LARSEN. In every important agency here. In the Office of Strategic Services, in the War Department, in the Navy Department—remember, I left the Navy Department September 1944, I went to the State Department.

"Roth was always with him. He is the man who introduced me to him, Jaffe, and then tried never to appear with Jaffe when I met him down here.

"(Doc. 100-7c, p. 7550:)

"Mr. HANCOCK. Did you return all of these documents, or did you keep some as a reference?

"Mr. LARSEN. Any list of any personality material or any story of any person, I took home, if I worked on it at all. Sometimes I would not take it, I would just make a note and say that so-and-so is connected with the Communist Party. I found out later he was a member of the Secret Service. Sometimes I went to the extent of typing them off.

"Mr. HANCOCK. And would you take all of those papers back?

"Mr. LARSEN. Of course. I let him see five documents that I listed one time for the Federal Bureau of Investigation. They were fresh in my memory at that time. He had not returned them to me—they concerned only personalities. He was to comment on that particular subject."

A. Thereby meaning I remember that I insisted that I had given him no military and naval information such as is claimed, submarines, position of Japanese ships, and other items not related.

Q. Well, did you give him any information that was not related exclusively to material on personalities?—A. No; I don't think so. It was always related to how exclusively anything relates to or does not relate to personalities, a very debatable subject. I think we could stay until late tonight and still couldn't settle that question.

Q. Now, did you supply Mr. Jaffe with any documents originating in departments other than the State Department?—A. No; I don't think so. To the best of my knowledge, no.

Q. I believe at the time of your arrest a large quantity of documentary material, classified material, was found in your apartment, was it not?—A. Yes. That is quite another question.

Q. Did that all relate to personality information?—A. Now it is quite possible that it did not all relate to personality because I had geographical material there. I had myself written the geography of Hunan, Kweichow, Yunan, and various other provinces.

Q. Now in Document 100-7c you are testifying before the Hobbs committee. I believe you indicate some five documents, which you say you listed for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and which Mr. Jaffe had not returned to you.—A. Yes.

Q. Now, were those documents related to this personality information?—A. Yes.

Q. Now I show you, Mr. Larsen, Document B-2. This is a document which the Board showed you the other day. It is a photostat of a Report No. 13, of an exact copy of Report No. 13 prepared by Mr. Service, and I want to ask you whether there is anything in that document that relates to personality information?—[After reading:] The answer is "Yes."

Q. I wonder if you would call attention to what portion of it relates to personalities?—A. Very important, glad you showed it to me. It was the refusal of the Soviet Union to enter into a treaty with Sheng Shih-tsai when he asked for one in the face of growing central government pressure in the early summer of 1942. He was a warlord.

Q. Now does that cast any light?—A. Yes, yes, very much.

Q. On this general biography or personality?—A. It is the vital point in his biography.

Q. Do you know whether you gave this document, the document of which this is a photostat, to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I don't know; I don't remember, but if I did it would have referred to that Sheng Shih-tsai problem. The history of Sheng

Shih-tsai, if I may say, is roughly as follows: He was a Manchurian warlord and not a native of Sinkiang. He ran away from Manchuria in 1932 after the Japanese had taken over. He fought a rear-guard action in Manchuria from later 1931 to the spring of 1932 together with a general known as Ma Chan-shan.

Q. Just one minute: Now I would like to show you a document—A. Just one second, this is important.

Q. It is not important to the history of this proceeding, the history of this General.—A. Yes: it is. It is important in my answer. Sheng Shih-tsai finally fled into Siberia and with about 4,000 Manchurian troops worked his way, with the knowledge and help of the Russian Communists—worked his way over to Sinkiang, then into Sinkiang with Russian knowledge and agreement, and set himself up as an independent warlord and governor of Sinkiang Province. In that capacity Sheng kept the authority of the Nationalist Government out of Sinkiang as much as he could. He was, therefore, one of the last warlords to openly oppose Sheng and, as such, he was of the greatest interest to all analysts in Far Eastern Affairs inasmuch as Sinkiang is a vast territory, was an integral part of China, and its loss to Russia would mean the beginning of gradual encroachment on China. Therefore, I follow Sheng Shih-tsai's biographical career very closely. I probably have more on him than any other American.

Q. Have you finished?—A. Yes.

Q. Now I would like to show you Document B-1, which is the photostat of an ozalid copy of a report by Mr. Service report No. 13. I believe you were shown this day before yesterday and I would like to ask you if there is any material in that document bearing upon personalities or relative to a biographical file.—A. [After reading.] I remember reading a report on Mao Tse-tung's views and Po-Ku's view in this connection. I presume that if I handled this it certainly had something to do with the personalities mentioned.

Q. Is that the type of document you might have given to Mr. Jaffe as within the category of personality information that you have described?—A. I would not have given it to him.

Q. Are you sure you did not?—A. I am not sure I did not loan it to him or allow him to see it, but I would not give it to him.

Q. Well, if you allowed him to see it, you did so because it was the type of personality information that you were exchanging with him?—A. That is right.

Q. In other words, it would be within the category?—A. Let's see the date on this.

Q. Within the category of information?—A. That's right.

Q. Which you describe as personality information?—A. Correct.

Q. Now I would like to show you Document B-3, which is a photostat of an ozalid copy of a report prepared by Mr. Service which is No. 15 dated March 16, 1945, and I would like to ask you whether that memorandum contains any personality information of the kind that you referred to.—A. [After reading.] Yes; it does. It does not mention any personalities but it gives the opposing views; namely, the views expressed by the Nationalist Government opposed to those of the freedom or autonomy leaders of Sinkiang and other northwestern provinces, but particularly the leader Mahsud who later became Governor of Sinkiang who was at the back—

Mr. STEVENS. Is that name mentioned in there, sir?

A. No; the name is not mentioned.

Questions by RNETTS:

Q. Is that the kind of information you entered on your personality card?—A. Extracts of it, the essence of the information, because one would hear much about a man who stirred up considerable trouble, but it would not always be easily discernible what his actual policy was. That would then come out in a general summary or policy statement.

Q. You knew that this related to some individual, even though his name is not mentioned there?—A. Oh, yes; I would know.

Q. Is that the type of information you exchanged with Mr. Jaffe?—A. An extract from that might have been put in Ma Pu-fang's file, who was the leader of the Mohammedan group in Kan su and Ch'inghai province.

Q. Would this document be the type that you would give to Mr. Jaffe as a personality document?—A. Not as a type of any document that I would give to Mr. Jaffe, or loan to him, but it would be typical of a good summary of what was going on in the northwestern part of China where they had these minority groups.

Q. You say it was not the type of document you would give or loan to Mr. Jaffe?—A. It would be the type of document from which I would extract the salient points whether they were for autonomy, whether they were for continued union with China, and that type of question.

Q. That is the type of information you entered on your own cards?—A. That's right.

Q. But is it the type of document that you would lend to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I would say no document is the type of document I would lend because, theoretically, I would not lend any document if I could possibly avoid it. I believe I explained that very carefully and lengthily last time I was here in my own defense.

Q. Let's get apart from the theoretical—A. And I don't see any particular point in trying to break me down on this question.

Q. Well, I am trying to find out, Mr. Larsen, is what all is—A. Yes, I—

Q. All is comprehended within the category that you use in your mind as—A. Yes; I am very willing—

Q. As personality information.—A. I am very willing to help you and I am not here in any inimical mood, but I have to protect myself and I have been warned of Mindszenty methods, namely, of asking me the same question a great number of times, which eventually would or might involve me in statements that could be held against me, for instance—

Q. Well, I have only a desire to get from you the truth, I don't want to trick you into any statements.—A. That's right. For instance, last time you pointed out that I had made certain statements or certain statements were attributed to me in my article in Plain Talk of October 1946, and you asked me on three occasions, I think—it might have been four—whether I had any authority to mention those occurrences, or those affairs that I had become acquainted with through my association with the State Department. Is that right?

Q. I asked you in relation to one document, which was evidently a dispatch from Ambassador Gauss, relating the conversation with T. V. Soong.—A. Yes, Well, I very willingly agreed, and I will repeat, namely, that I had no authority to mention the State Department affairs in my article. However, you surely must be sufficiently well versed with the law and the routine matter of self-defense, and intelligent enough in general to understand that when a man is accused of being a Communist and being a spy and associating with Communists and spies, then it is his duty to himself to take everything at his disposal and place it before the public, because it was before the public that I was tried principally at that time, to show that he is not a Communist and that he did not agree with anything that had the least bit of a pro-Communist slant, and, therefore, and on those grounds I rather willingly agreed at that time to express some of those views regarding State Department matters which I now say again should not have gone into an article, should not have been brought before the public. Do you agree with that point of view?

Q. I understand, Mr. Larsen.—A. It is very serious for me, but not very much to you. You might be able to build up a legal point on that and my lawyer advised me they probably are building up a legal point, but then you can go before a committee and say: "Yes, I put those in the article, and I realize I should not have put them, but I was fighting for my life there."

Q. Now I would like to show you another document, Mr. Larsen, which is B-5, which is a photostatic copy of an ozalid copy of Service Report No. 16, dated March 17, 1945, and I would like to ask you whether there was any material in that might be called personality data or biographical data.—A. You showed me this document last time.

Q. Yes; you were shown that, I think, by General Snow.—A. Yes. [After reading.] Offhand I don't see any personality material in here, but I do see references to the Kuomintang's policies on the subject material, namely, relief and rehabilitation in Communist areas. I know the men of the organization from the very beginning right up to the end of the story when finally the Chinese established the collateral to UNRRA, namely, CINRRA, Chinese National Relief and Rehabilitation, it starts with a C instead of a U. CINRRA eventually became an organization under Tung Pi-wu, and there was quite a story on that. I don't care to go into that, but if you want me to I will. It is a long story.

Q. No. All I am really interested in is finding out whether this document here appears to have any personality—A. Yes, it does.

Q. Personality information within the meaning of that term as you use it?—A. Yes, it does; it does have some. The answer is yes, although it didn't mention the personalities here. Involved in this were all the men on the Communist side from Tung Pi-wu, who handled UNRRA and CINRRA affairs, and all the men on the Nationalist Chinese side, and all the men in the United States who handled the UNRRA affairs, the chief of that out there being Benjamin Kizer and Benjamin Ray.

Q. Well, now, is the information in that document the kind of information that you supplied to Mr. Jaffe as a part of this exchange of personality data?—A. No, I wouldn't say so.

Q. Do you know whether you have supplied Mr. Jaffe with—A. No, I don't know.

Q. Ozalid copy of that?—A. No, I don't know. I might make a note or two for my own concerning Chou En-lai—it is the only name mentioned here, but it is very fleetingly mentioned—"preliminary discussions in Yenau were conducted by Chou En-lai."

Q. What I am trying to find out, Mr. Larsen, is what is the kind of information which was comprehended within your arrangement with Mr. Jaffe. Now if this is personality information, as you use that term, I suppose that this is the kind of document that you would show or lend to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I think I see what you mean, and I should answer that quite clearly. Personality material in my sense and of value to me in making my cards more than merely a "Who's Who" would comprise data on the career of a person, his political affiliations, and wherever such affiliations cannot be immediately determined certain utterances, certain political steps he has taken, which when pieced together eventually form the complete jigsaw puzzle of his life. Right now no man could sit down and write the biography of General Snow because they do not know everything that has happened and they do not know what will happen in the near future of Mr. Snow. If anyone would have written my biography, let us say, prior to my arrest, I might have been painted as a very fine fellow and a very loyal American, but I doubt whether that picture would be painted of me now, to be quite frank. Therefore, the pieces are put together—I am not the final compiler of the biography of Mao Tse-tung or any other Chinese. That will be done by me if I outlive Mao, and by someone else if I should die before Mao.

Q. Now, is there the name of a single person mentioned in this Document B-5?—A. Oh, yes, yes, a single and very important person, Chou En-lai. I am not quibbling, but that was the first indication—

Q. Where it says the "preliminary"—A. First indication that it says there was top-notch approval of the idea.

Q. Just a minute—A. Yes.

Q. Are you referring to the place where it says: "preliminary discussions were conducted in Yenau under the chairmanship of General Chou En-lai"?—A. That's right.

Q. Now is that the kind of personality information which you exchanged with Mr. Jaffe?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that you would say that this document is the type of document that was comprehended within your arrangements with Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, there was no arrangement with Mr. Jaffe for any document. The answer is "no" to that last question.

Q. Well, you had an arrangement to exchange information with Mr. Jaffe, did you not?—A. That's right, but not documents.

Q. And you carried out that arrangement by, from time to time, lending him documents, did you not?—A. No, that was extracurricular.

Q. Well, what do you mean by extracurricular?—A. That was incidental to the discussion of a certain personality that I made the indiscreet step—I think I mentioned that last time too—and let us not waste too much time or repetition—and allowed him to see it, for which I have taken considerable punishment.

Q. Well, can you tell us is this document, or is it not, one which contains the type of information which you exchanged with Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir, I cannot answer it that way. If you say: Does this document contain information, then I will answer it "yes."

Q. This document represents an example of the type of personality information which you were interested in and, I take it, that is correct?—A. That's right.

Q. And I take it that is the type of personality information that Mr. Jaffe was interested in?—A. Yes, he was.

Q. So that this is the type of document which you might have, as you say, as an extracurricular incident to your exchange of information supplied to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I don't remember that I ever showed him this document, I doubt it very much. I don't know where he got this here. This is a State Department document, isn't it?

Q. Yes.—A. I will tell you I am extremely sorry I cannot answer you exactly on this. I am not trying to dodge an issue, but I am protecting myself against falling into a trap.

Q. Yes.—A. I was warned to curtail this meeting at any moment when I felt that I was about to fall into a trap that might incriminate me, and place me under double jeopardy and for that reason I shall curtail the interview at 3:30.

Q. You feel that you are going to be falling into a trap about 3:30?—A. Yes, I do feel on or about 3:30 I shall be dangerously exposed since you persist in this type of question.

Q. Well, do you feel that the type of questions which I am asking you are unfair to you, sir?—A. Yes, I think, considering that I am here without an attorney. I realize your point is to gather sufficient evidence to protect Mr. Service against very serious charges which I myself—and you may put that in the record and repeat it anywhere and quote me—I do not believe they are true. I will once more summarize what I have said at the past meeting—that I have undoubtedly, through questioning and pressure and promises, and through my personal animosity to Mr. Service, and Mr. John Carter Vincent—that stems from no personal clash with these two gentlemen, but that was fired within me by a lot of very poisonous talk that was poured into my ear and poured into my wife's ear—agreed that these two men were very much against me, and I believe that as a result of all this I have been extremely unfair to them, and have said many careless things that I should not have said, and that I will now clearly explain on the basis of what I believe at that time, and what I believe now of the general case against Mr. Service; namely, that I do not believe that Mr. Service is a Communist and I never believed he was a Communist. I did believe at a time that Mr. Service's reports were slanted very favorably towards the Chinese Communists, but my voluntary admission, and, mind you, gentlemen, I am not giving this for your sole pleasure—I have given it to Mr. Dondoro, Mr. McCarthy, and his assistant, Mr. Ferguson, and the Republican Party's lawyer, I believe his name is Morris, he called on me once, I have his name here—I have stated that I cannot get out against Mr. Service. First, I don't know Mr. Service.

I know nothing about Mr. Service except that his reports seem to me slanted in favor of the Communists and strongly against Chiang Kai-shek, and as an expert, as they very kindly called me, what did I think of that. I pointed out—I was fair enough to point out to all of them, although I didn't have to—that I could very well have been wrong for the simple reason that I sat with my feet under a desk while he was in the field. I could not certify that that was not realistic reporting, and I warned them against building the case against Mr. Service on the Plain Talk magazine because it was not written by me as it is. It is very easy to change a paragraph and give it a different meaning, to add a few points, change the tense of a verb and so on. I have come between two very large wheels, namely, the Republican Party and the Democratic administration; as Mr. Service does not know—but as my friends all know, who know me—I have always been a liberal.

I don't know whether I mentioned to you that when I was in China I wrote in British and Chinese newspapers from time to time against the oppressive, unequal treaties of extraterritoriality. I had the spirit to write that because I went with Chinese boys in Cheng chow, and I grew up with them, slept with them, went and slept with them at their houses. I am not a homosexualist, but when my best friend's father died, then I attended the funeral feast, which lasted several days, and we slept in the same room and talked about what we would do for China when we grew up. I have always been a freedom-loving man, and I have hated many of the things that I came home here to America to see in the political life. I have never been a Communist. I can brag about this: that from the very earliest time I knew something about communism that many others did not know.

Q. I wonder if I might interrupt, Mr. Larsen?—A. Yes.

Q. I don't mean to be discourteous, but do you care to continue with the questioning that I would like to ask you?—A. No; I am not trying to filibuster you out of questioning. If you have an important question to ask, I don't mind stopping and you make your point.

Q. Well, I have a number of questions I would like to ask you.—A. Well, I can finish in one minute. The idea, or the reason for telling you this is that I voluntarily came to the rescue of Mr. Service. I don't want you to think that anyone put any pressure on me. What revolted me was McCarthy's assistant's methods—he, himself, was kind enough—I spoke very little to him, and he spoke so very little to me. But his assistant's methods—he is pulling a raw one on me right now—I will handle that later. I will handle that personally—Don Surine—very personally in time. I volunteered by notifying Mr. Peurifoy that I had been called, and I didn't like the methods used by Mr. McCarthy's assistant, for which I hold Mr. McCarthy responsible, and I promptly told him that I would not testify to the detriment of Mr. Service, and I will tell you again my reasons for this.

Q. I might say, Mr. Larsen, you have already given sufficient testimony by your article and by your testimony before the Hobbs committee to the detriment of Mr. Service that would be rather hard to undo except by getting at the facts, which is what I have been trying to do.—A. I see. You are free to do that legally in any way you like. However, my reasons, to continue, were two: One, that I knew nothing for certain bad against Mr. Service. Second, that Mr. Peurifoy was put on the spot in a very nasty way. I observed the manner in which he was dragged up there, and the administration was embarrassed.

Q. I don't know.—A. And I could not forget that Mr. Peurifoy had been the first one in the United States Government to stand up for me in spite of everything that I had done to embarrass the State Department; namely, when General Wedemeyer wanted me to write a report for him he went to work and investigated me, and Mr. Peurifoy was the first one to give me clearance as far as not being a Communist, a traitor, and a disloyal this, that, and the other. The second one was the old Ma Perkins of the Civil Service who said that there is nothing against my record in the Civil Service.

The CHAIRMAN. What time are you referring to?

A. I am referring to March 19.

The CHAIRMAN. What year?

A. This year, when I immediately went to Mr. Peurifoy. The recommendation he gave me and the little lift he gave me, I might say, helped in my morale more than anything else, but I didn't get any job out of it yet—occurred in 1947, I think it was.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I would like, if possible, to return to this examination, if you would be willing.—A. I would prefer not to.

Q. I would like to ask you to look at this document B-6 which I have before you.—A. All right, let us have a look at it until 3:30. (After reading.) I don't remember this report here.

Q. Now what I want to ask you about it is whether it contains any of this personality information.—A. I only remember in this document a reference to the statement: "Over a hundred Americans crossing the Japanese-held railways have been made safe."

Q. Now what I am interested in is not what you remember about it, but in reading now.—A. That might involve the personality, the rather mysterious history of young Mr. Hummel, young Dr. Hummel, the son of Arthur W. Hummel, in the Library of Congress, for whom I worked, and who frequently contacted me on the matter of where his son was. His son was lost with these Communists for half a year—Mr. Service knows the story much better, I am sure. And I was interested in the subject, but I don't remember the dispatch itself.

Q. Well, would that be the kind of information that Mr. Jaffe was interested in?—A. No; I don't think I—

Q. Interested in as personality information?—A. No; I don't think so; I doubt it very much; don't remember it.

Q. Do you know whether you gave him that document?—A. I am pretty sure I didn't.

Q. Well, now, I would like to show you document B-4, which is a photostatic reproduction of an ozalid of Mr. Service's report No. 18 dated March 3, 1945.—A. Yes; you showed me that the other day.

Q. General Snow questioned you about it, I believe.—A. Yes.

Q. Now I would like to know whether there is any personality information in that document.—A. On the surface of it, you can state that there is practically nothing. I don't see any names. However, the labor problem in Nationalist China versus Communist China was one of great importance. I am not a Socialist, but I was interested in the very haphazard manner in which the labor problem was handled in China. There was no labor party, but there was a Government Office of Labor. In other words, labor was regimented, and I am in sympathy with whatever Mr. Service and others reported on that matter.

Then came this dispatch, namely, the counterpart; remember Communist China was also China. I was as much interested in Communist China as in Nationalist China, and here comes the establishment of unified labor and women's organization in Communist areas—it is a question I was very much interested in. The Nationalists—

Q. It will fall in the category of personality information?—A. Yes; it would. The labor leader Chu is now with the Communists. He was a Nationalist before. He was one of the first to quit.

Q. Is this the type of information that Mr. Jaffe was interested in?—A. I think he might have been interested in certain points in it. I for one knew—and the State Department did not seem to know—that Chu was a Communist. As late as 1940 I knew that Chu was a Communist. I knew a woman who knew him very well and she said he was a Communist.

Q. Do you think you may have given this document to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No; I don't think so. I doubt it very much.

Q. Why not?—A. Oh, because I think I would be able to extract the bit of vital information from that better than he would. I don't think he would know the connection. I wouldn't have any purpose in giving it to him unless I were at the time giving him a card specifically on labor leader Chu.

Q. Now I want to show you Document 193, which contains Mr. Service's Report No. 40, dated October 10, 1940.—A. I think I say that the other day.

Q. I want to ask you whether that type of document contains the personality information which you exchanged with Mr. Jaffe?—A. I don't think I ever had a copy of this here. I remember seeing this in the State Department.

Q. Do you think you ever gave a copy of that to Mr. Jaffe?—A. No, sir, I don't think so. To the best of my knowledge, I don't think I ever had a copy even at home of this here. I wish that could be verified from the material. Of course, it could not be verified. I might have taken it home and taken it back, but I don't think I ever had a copy of it. It is a very long, very interesting—I looked at it the last time. There were many things in here that I would have liked to have known.

Q. Certainly not personality information?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Personality information as you use it?—A. Oh, yes, yes, sure.

Q. That document would be within the classification of personality information as you used it?—A. It could—"our dealings with Chiang Kai-shek"—what do you suppose that means? It means Chiang Kai-shek's dealings with us, too. [Reading:] "In fact, Chiang has lost the confidence and respect of most of the American Democratic"—you mean I should not be interested in that? I certainly was.

Q. Was that the kind of thing Jaffe wanted to exchange with you?—A. I have no doubt that he would be interested if I had given it to him.

Q. Well, do you know, as a matter of fact, whether or not you did give it to him?—A. I don't think I gave it to him. I am fairly positive I did not give that to him. I don't think I ever had a copy of that. I looked at it pretty carefully the last time I was here, and I glanced over it now again; no.

Now, Mr. Rhett's, I am not simply trying to run away, but I will tell you I have been without a job for 5 years—I have my first job right now. I am getting about a hundred dollars a week for an analysis of the Pakistan-Kashmir-India dispute. There is one article out in Pathfinder this May 31, and I have not delivered as I should to them, and they have been extremely kind to me, although I understand they are largely a Republican outfit.

The CHAIRMAN. You would like to be excused at this time?

A. I would like to be excused on the grounds that I have been rather vague, considering that this is confidential—I have been rather vague about where I go at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of your request to the chairman—

A. I have simply said: "I am out to testify—some Government committee has asked me to testify."

The CHAIRMAN. For the record, the witness asked to be excused at 3:30 when he came in this afternoon, and in view of that request the chairman feels obliged to excuse him if he wishes to go at this time.

Questions by Mr. Achilles:

Q. Might I ask you a few questions on a different phase of the matter?—A. Yes.

Q. The security regulations in effect in the Department in 1945 have been considerably criticized—A. That's right.

Q. Quite possibly with some justification, in the Hobbs committee report and elsewhere. I believe you had a gold pass at the time?—A. That is right.

Q. Which entitled you to take out documents without inspection?—A. Yes.

Q. When you had the documents at home what arrangements did you have for their safeguarding?—A. I had them in a steel cabinet that I bought specially. I bought it at an auction. I am sure you could pry it open, but it is a very good steel cabinet. It is just as good as the the one in the State Department that we had in the policy committee room. In fact, it is a little better. The one in the State Department—there were no keys for those three or four cabinets, so with Dr. Blakeslee's permission I personally brought a screwdriver and took out the whole lock mechanism, took it down to Fourteenth Street, and I think it was $10 I paid. I was remunerated later. I had three keys made for each cabinet, and I bought them, and I gave one key to Dr. Blakeslee, one to Dr. Hugh Barton, and kept one myself, and I will tell you how long I had that key. I had that key until well after the time that I had been arrested. After I had been released—in fact, let's not bring us this subject because it isn't good for the State Department. But after I was released on bail, then I thought, uh-uh, I still have my papers, my personal papers in the cabinet in the State Department, and, although I had been arrested, I walked in through the State Department, walked upstairs, told Dr. Blakeslee: "Here I am to take my personal papers" and he said: "All right, go ahead." So I unlocked the cabinet, went into the lower drawer, took out all the papers that were mine—don't worry, I didn't take anything that was the Government's—I had, in the colloquial, a "belly full" of that, so I took strictly my own papers. I had many things there, I even had my own university document and so on. I took them, while Dr. Blakeslee was standing near by and working over something, and I said: "Now, I want to show you." He said: "That's all right." I took it, packed it up, it was a big bundle [indicating] about like that. I took them and walked out of the State Department. I surrendered my pass and got a receipt for that.

The CHAIRMAN. We don't want to hold you here.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. One or two questions on the same point. When you took documents home at night, did you bring them here the next day or did you leave them?—A. Sometimes I brought them the next day back to the State Department, the next morning. There were occasions when I sat up until 1 or 2 o'clock and read most of that material. My wife got a little bit fed up with me and she said: "I see you have a lot of stuff here. Don't read that tonight, let's go to a movie." Well, then one thing and another Saturday and Sunday, and they might have been at my house a week, then I brought them back. And there were copies, I must admit. You haven't asked me that question, I want to volunteer that. There were copies that were marked "retain or destroy" and I had kept copies of them, just simply kept them in my house intending sooner or later to make an entry—but how get around to homework when you have a family and a little daughter. So they were sort of permanently stuck there. I had some probably for a year, but they weren't of national, vital interest.

Mr. RHETTS. You understood that entitled—meant you personally "retain or destroy"?

A. No, I didn't misunderstand it as such, I understood that it meant in my official capacity to retain it in the office or destroy it, but I'm not the only one. All the Reserve officers in the Navy Department retained secret-confidential dispatches. There would be a hell of an exposure if we put all that out—what was done during the war. They took copies of everything, they even had the secretary make copies, if no copies available, and put them in their briefcase and took them home. On June 8 it was a fairly mild day, there was no cause for fires in many stoves, but there were lots of fires in Washington, documents were being destroyed.

Mr. ACHILLES. Well, I see in the Hobbs committee report, the statement:

"When Larsen was arrested at his home in Washington, D. C., the documents found in his possession and seized by the FBI included 93 from the files of or prepared by the State Department, including 14 originals or duplicate originals and 5 copies of a secret classification."

A. I doubt that. I don't think there were any originals. Originals you were never allowed to take out, you were never allowed to get your hands on.

Mr. ACHILLES (reading):

"Thirteen originals or duplicate originals and three copies of a confidential classification. One hundred and forty-four from the files of, or prepared by, ONI, including seven originals or duplicate originals of a secret classification—"

A. Yes; my own work.

Mr. ACHILLES (reading):

"And 24 originals or duplicate originals and 3 copies of a confidential classification; 8 from the files of, or prepared by MID, including 1 secret original or duplicate original and 1 copy of a secret classification and 2 copies of a confidential classification; 9 from the files of, or prepared by the War Department, including 2 copies of a secret classification and 3 originals or duplicate originals of a confidential classification; 8 from the files of, or prepared by, OSS, including 1 original or duplicate original of a confidential classification."

Could you tell me how you happened to have such an accumulation?

A. I believe I wrote more than 93 documents when I was in Naval Intelligence. I wrote a fortnightly review; remember I was 9 years there as naval attaché. By simple arithmetic you would arrive at quite a number of dispatches, hundreds of them, reports; I don't think I kept copies of any of them unless they dealt with personalities. I made some special points on personality a few times, reports, and they encouraged me to do that. I kept copies of them. I intended to keep them forever, not for my personal benefit, but in the hope that one day I could use them in a higher position. My ambition was to be Chief of the Biographical Section of the State Department, and I missed the boat. It was given to two men who knew nothing about it and who after the Amerasia affair approached me and asked me if the State Department could copy my cards. First, whether I would sell them the cards; then, whether they could copy them, and I volunteered the information, and I went to the State Department and I met Mr. Oss, O-s-s, that's his name, Van Oss. I met Mr. Van Oss outside the State Department when I was refused admittance to the State Department and gave him personality material from time to time that was vial to the State Department.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Well, did the security regulations in effect at the time permit people to keep classified documents outside the Department?—A. No, no; not in general. I would say the security regulations were maintained in a rather lax manner and I was myself a contributor to that laxity; there is no doubt about that. They were much better in ONI. For instance, in ONI I had no such thing as a gold badge, I had a green badge, all civilians had a green badge. Therefore, when I wanted to take a document out then I gave it to one of the officers and he carried it out and when we sat down on the streetcar together he said: "Here you are, my boy," and I took it back the next day or whenever I was through with it.

Q. But you still had 144 copies of ONI documents at home?—A. Yes; that is not a very great many considering how many I wrote there. They were not secret from an American security point of view—whether the Yangtze flows 30 miles or 31 miles from the Mekong and the Salween does not matter much to this country, it has been no secret for hundreds of thousands of years. That was the type of material I had; namely, the geographical write-ups, because this country lacked a complete military geography of China. I collaborated with the Army men on this type of work. I was loaned by ONI to the Army cartographers, a red-headed man by the name of Metz, M-e-t-z, or something like that, and we worked together over a period of quite a few years, and I gathered material, sometimes I took all my stuff, took it down, worked on it at the Navy Department, took it over to the War Department, and carried it back with me, with photostats and material he had given me.

Q. I think that's all I have to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. You wish to retire?

A. I wish to retire because I made an appointment with him and guaranteed that I would help him look over the final copy that has to be in before 6 o'clock this afternoon. I dare say I can do it in about an hour, but I don't want him to get desperate.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say again for the record at this point that the witness appeared voluntarily at the request of the Board, not of the counsel for Mr. Service, and the purpose of this appearing was not to defend Mr. Service, but to tell the Board such facts as he knew in the case.

A. That's right.

Mr. RHEITS. I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, if the witness will be able to return. I have not finished with the examination I would like to make of him.

The CHAIRMAN. You are entitled to an answer.

A. Yes; I will return. I have promised you that document and I will return with that, and I will return for other questioning, if you think it is important to your case. I will not deny you anything that is of vital interest. Your business is distinct and separate from the Security Board's or Loyalty Board's, and I will return, but allow me to arrange it by telephone; I don't know what will go on tomorrow.

The CHAIRMAN. I think at this point we can go off the record.

Mr. RHETTS. I would prefer to stay on the record.

The CHAIRMAN. If you like.

A. I have another piece of business. It is no secret. It is a very voluminous job of 495 pages written by General Modelski, who was military attaché for the Polish Embassy, and he came to this country and immediately got in touch with General Eisenhower and told him that he had come here as Communist Polish military attaché source to be able to escape from Poland with his family and work together with the United States Government, and in the course of his story he tells how he collaborated with this Government and eventually helped the FBI steal the files of the Polish—

The CHAIRMAN. I think this material has no business on this record.

A. It does.

Mr. RHETTS. I just would like to know when the witness can come back.

A. It does; it has some bearing. That job is now nearing completion and I have been promised a fee of $4,000 for it. I haven't had a fee for anything for an awful long time, so I want to impress upon you gentlemen that my time is extremely valuable to me. I have done practically nothing during the last few months but answering phone calls and being interviewed by correspondents and Loyalty Boards and so on, and I can't stand much more of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore, your request is we arrange by telephone for the next meeting. We will do that.

A. And I will accommodate you to the best of my ability.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done. Thank you very much.

A. Even if Mr. Rhetts should want a private conference with me, that's all right too.

Mr. RHETTS. No; I would just like to question you further here in connection with the facts of certain of these matters that were testified to.

A. If I should find it necessary to bring an attorney with me, may I do that?

Mr. RHETTS. It is entirely agreeable to me. I don't know what the disposition of the Board is.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, you are not under any attack before this Board.

A. No; I don't like the word "attack." You gentlemen have—

The CHAIRMAN. What I mean by that, Mr —

A. You gentleman have not taken that attitude.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not on trial here.

A. No. I feel as if I have been but I may be wrong on that point. I have been questioned in a much more thoroughgoing way than I have been by the others because they were not qualified; therefore, their testimony and their records are shabby and inaccurate, downright untruthful, and that is the background of my thorough disgust with all questionings.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we thank you for what you have done.

A. Thank you, sir. I hope I haven't offended you gentlemen in any manner whatsoever because it has not been intentional.

The CHAIRMAN. You certainly have not.

A. Thank you, sir. Thank you very much, Mr. Rhetts. I will get that document for you.

(Mr. Emmanuel S. Larsen, having duly testified, left the meeting at this time.)

(After a brief recess the meeting continued as follows:)

The CHAIRMAN. All right, proceed, Counsel.

Mr. RHETTS. Now at this point I should like to introduce into the transcript document 100-12d, which is an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. James McInerney, present Assistant Attorney General of the United States in charge of the Criminal Division, which was given before the Hobbs committee.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 100-12

"(Excerpt from Congressional Record—House, May 22, 1950)

"(Doc. 100-12d, p. 7558:)

"Mr. FEIGHAN. What prompted you to arrest Service?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Jim, I think you ought to answer that. I was out of town on trial when this feature of it broke.

"Mr. HOBBS. You mean on a trial.

"Mr. McINERNEY. The evidence on Service was thin. They said there was in Jaffe's office, as I recall it, copies of his confidential reports. When we arrested, or made the searches, we found copies of his report. We interviewed Larsen, and Larsen admitted he had given Service's copies to Jaffe, and Service had not given them. Service was very much surprised that Jaffe had that report. It was on that thin allegation that we authorized on Service, and the same way with Gayn.

"(Doc. 100-12e, p. 7559.)

"Mr. SPRINGER. From all of the investigations you made, from your grand-jury investigation and everything connected with it, do you feel that all of these secret documents that you came in possession of had come through Larsen?

"Mr. McINERNEY. I do not know whether I could go that far.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. They did not. Take your FCC, Office of Strategic Service, or a few of them, the ONI, the BEW, and perhaps one or two others, they could not have come from Larsen. Larsen was never employed there. He had no access to them. So far as we know, he had never been near the places.

"Mr. HANCOCK. I asked that a moment ago. You said these documents were routed through the State Department.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Some of them, particularly the ONI documents, were routed to the State Department, and, insofar as they pertained to Chinese affairs, Larsen would have had access to them from September 1, 1944, not prior to that.

"Mr. SPRINGER. Have you been able to discover any other person who could have distributed these documents?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. We had two of them before the grand jury. In Gayn's case, he told us they got them through the area director for area 3, authorizing this girl or woman in charge of the office to give them to Gayn. We immediately sent out subpoenas for those two people.

"Mr. FELLOWS. A fine system.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. That completely left us stymied. These people were in position of authority. He said he classified them ad hoc, made no record of it, and after authorized the handing them out to Gayn.

"Mr. SPRINGER. Did you find anyone that had distributed any of these documents?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

"Mr. McINERNEY. I might add, at the time of the arrest, we told the agent who handled these as laboratory documents, to see if we could process a representative number of them for fingerprints and try to establish a chain of custody from the chief of Jaffe. They were all old documents. We came up with no principal. We did get a couple of prints on some documents we found in Gayn's apartment. They were Gayn's fingerprints on the OWI stuff. We did not get any evidence which would assist us in tracing the custody.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. You realize that many of these documents, that they refer to, date to 1936, from there on. That is why I suggested that you may be interested in seeing them. We have boxes full of them. We have all of them, booklets on health in the Japanese Empire in 1938, for example, completely innocuous, and negative as regards any national defense character at all. Although there were some in the later period, referring principally to political matters in China, one man's judgment might say, when a nation is at war, that political matters pertain to national defense; others say it pertains to military operations, or manufacturing for military purposes or things of that character, those are questions of fact for the jury."

Mr. RHETTS. I should also like to offer at this point document No. 324, which is a mimeographed copy of the release of a "Statement of Robert M. Hitchcock before the Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee Investigating the State Department, May 26, 1950," and I should like to read into the transcript a paragraph appearing on page 4 of this release as follows: This is Mr. Hitchcock's testimony (reading):

"When Jaffe was arrested June 6, 1945, his brief case contained eight ozalids [copies similar to photostats] of Service's Yenau reports which were clearly identified as State Department property. Before the grand jury, Service denied any knowledge of Jaffe having these copies and said there was no reason in the world why he [Service] would have given them to Jaffe because he could have given Jaffe his own personal copies.

"Furthermore, Larsen subsequently admitted that he had obtained the ozalids from the State Department and delivered them to Jaffe. The personal copies which Service admitted lending to Jaffe never were part of the State Department files."

(Document 324, in full, is as follows:)

"STATEMENT OF ROBERT M. HITCHCOCK BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING THE STATE DEPARTMENT, MAY 26, 1950

The first I heard of the Amerasia case was June 7, 1945, the day after the FBI arrested the six defendants in New York and Washington. I read of it in the papers. I was assigned to the prosecution of the case about a week later by Mr. McInerney and was assisted by Donald B. Anderson, an attorney in the Criminal Division, a former FBI special agent, and a former district attorney and county judge.

"Victor Woerheide, another attorney in the Criminal Division, also was assigned to assist. The warrants for the arrest charged conspiracy to violate the Espionage Act.

"The FBI, in connection with the arrest of Jaffe and Kate Mitchell at the Amerasia offices, had seized several hundred papers, many of which were clearly the property of one or more Government agencies, most of them of the State Department. Many others of the seized papers later were clearly established to be copies of similar records. The bulk of them were classified, as, for example, restricted, confidential, secret, etc.

"In Gayn's apartment, when he was arrested, the FBI seized 60 items, of which 22 were Federal Communications Commission reports or copies pertaining to interrogation of Japanese prisoners of war. About 20 were typewritten copies of State Department papers, and 18 were correspondence or papers which were wholly personal.

"Copies of some of the items found in Gayn's apartment were found in the Amerasia offices. When Gayn was arrested, he made a statement that he knew some of the material seized was not generally available to the public.

"He said he intended using it for background and no other reason. When he was asked where he got it, he said that in some instance he did not recall, and that in others, as a reputable newspaperman he could not disclose the sources.

"Later, after Gayn had requested permission to appear before the second grand jury, Anderson and I interviewed him in the presence of his attorney. He told us that he received the FCC reports from the New York office of the Office of War Information, that the reports had been lent to him, that many other reports previously had been lent to him and returned by him and that he had intended to return those which were seized.

"We asked him from whom he had obtained the reports.

"He told us from or through George Edward Taylor, deputy director of Area 3, OWI, and from Taylor's subordinate, Elizabeth Downing. While the case was in progress, Miss Downing married and thereafter was referred to as Elizabeth Barker. Taylor and Elizabeth Barker were interviewed and corroborated Gayn's story. They were called before the second grand jury and again corroborated his story.

"Gayn testified before the second grand jury and was no-billed. FBI surveillance showed that Gayn and Jaffe were rather close.

"It further showed that between March 21, 1945, and May 31, 1945, Gayn met with Jaffe, Roth, and Mitchell separately and together on several occasions. On two occasions he was with Service. Service stayed at Gayn's New York apartment one night. At most of these meetings still others were present. Many of the meetings were obviously social. These meetings proved nothing except mere association.

"These reports of associations, together with the seized documents, made up the case against Gayn. There was no evidence that Gayn had ever received any material from any Government employee other than Taylor and Elizabeth Downing (Barker). Taylor testified that he had authority to release such documents as were lent to Gayn.

"Gayn was wholly unacquainted with Larsen. Furthermore, those FCC and OWI reports were somewhat generally available to writers on newspapers and other publications.

"Gayn appeared before the grand jury in the first week of August. He waived immunity, testified, and was examined thoroughly and was no-billed.

"Now as to the case of John Stewart Service.

"Service was a State Department employee who had spent most of his life in China. He was loaned to General Stilwell in August, 1943, and remained with General Wedemeyer, successor to General Stilwell, until he was recalled through General Hurley in April 1945.

When he was arrested, the FBI obtained from him a written statement. In it he stated that, after he was assigned to the Army, he was engaged in general political reporting, consisting mostly of interviews with Chinese leaders. His reports, he stated, went to the Commander in Chief of the United States forces in China and the United States Embassy at Chungking. He stated that he kept a copy for himself with the full knowledge of the Embassy and Army headquarters.

In March 1945, he stated, he was sent to Yen-an, the headquarters of the Chinese Communists who were holding a party congress, and made further reports, largely of conversations with Chinese Communist leaders.

These reports, he stated, were distributed in the same fashion and in addition a copy was brought back to the State Department. When he left China in April 1945, he claimed he had permission from the adjutant general at Chungking to bring back his personal files and copies of his reports, which he kept in his own desk in the State Department.

Service stated that he met Jaffe for the first time on April 19, 1945, and that they were introduced by Roth. He said that he knew Jaffe was the editor of Amerasia and assumed that Jaffe wanted to learn the latest news from China. He took along his personal copy of the report of a conversation with Mao-tse-tung, chairman of the central committee of the Chinese Communists. This conversation took place March 31, 1945, at Yen-an and in it Mao-tse-tung detailed the policies expected to be adopted by the Party Congress.

Jaffe showed deep interest and asked if he had any other reports, Service stated. He explained that as he regarded them as simply "reportorial" and not involving United States policy, or affecting United States security, he supplied Jaffe the next day with more of his personal copies.

Jaffe said he did not have time to read the reports and asked if he could take them to New York. Service consented, saying that he was going to New York the next week and could pick them up then.

Service did go to New York and stayed at the Gayn apartment. He stated that he had first met Gayn April 18, 1945, but that he had previously had some correspondence with Gayn and that he had gone to college with Gayn's brother.

On April 25, Service stated, he called at the Amerasia office and picked up the reports that he had lent to Jaffe on April 19 and 20. He added that Jaffe was in Washington May 3 and that he communicated with Service and said he would like to get a copy of the FCC monitored report of a broadcast of Mao Tse-tung's recent speech at the party congress.

Service said he took Jaffe to the State Department, obtained permission, got a copy of the broadcast and gave it to Jaffe at the State Department. Later in the day, a corrected version came in, several copies were run off and one was given to Service. When he left his office, he said, he went to Jaffe's hotel, gave him the copy and left.

In the filing cabinets in her office—to which Jaffe had the keys—there were many items of Government origin. These were indexed in about 18 separate folders. The captions were in Kate Mitchell's handwriting or printing. Some of these were:

"Chinese Claims in Burma; Japanese Who's Who (Military and Diplomatic); War Prisoners' Comments; Kuomintang-Communist Relations; Chinese Communist Party; Sinkiang (Sino-Soviet Rel.); Interviews With Returned Visitors to China and Japan."

In addition to the presence of Kate Mitchell at places where other subjects were present, as already mentioned in connection with Gayn and Service, she was with Jaffe on many occasions, both at the Amerasia offices and at their respective homes.

One of these was of significance. On May 5, 1945, Kate Mitchell went by automobile with Jaffe to Mrs. Blumenthal's home in the Bronx. Jaffe went in alone. He came out about a quarter hour later with a large envelope. Jaffe let Miss Mitchell out near the Amerasia offices and she went into the building with the envelope. Mrs. Blumenthal testified before the grand jury that she had typed for Jaffe copies of Government documents.

When Miss Mitchell was arrested, she admitted that she had, or could have had, access to the various files and cabinets in the Amerasia offices where Government documents were found. When arrested, she initialed some documents and said that she knew the source of them but refused to divulge it. Later she told us and the grand jury that it was her understanding that Jaffe obtained them from Larsen.

"There was no evidence that she ever received a single document from any Government employee or from Gayn. She was not in Washington during 1945 at any time prior to her arrest.

"She signed a waiver of immunity, testified before the grand jury, was thoroughly examined, and she was no-billed.

"Now as to the case of Roth.

"When the arrests were made in the Amerasia offices on June 6 the FBI agents found a copy made on Roth's typewriter of a letter dated March 3, 1943.

"The letter was from William Phillips on a letterhead which read: 'Office of the Personal Representative of the President of the United States, New Delhi, India.' It was addressed to the Secretary of State and it enclosed a copy of a letter of the same date to President Roosevelt. The subject was the conflicting British and Indian points of view and the possibility of Indian freedom after the war, and it suggested a solution to the then present impasse as a 'step in furthering the ideals of the Atlantic Charter.'

"The agents also found two letters in Roth's handwriting on plain stationery. The date line of one was 'American Mission, New Delhi, January 21, 1944.' This letter was addressed to the Secretary of State and was signed 'Merrell.' It contained a summary of political comment in the Indian press for the week ended January 15, 1944. The other letter had an identical source and addressee. It was dated March 14, 1944, and contained reports on the vote of the Central Legislative Assembly on March 13, 1944, passing a motion, 50-48, calling for a reduction in the budget.

"They also found in Roth's handwriting, on Hotel Statler stationery, a copy of a letter bearing the date line 'American Mission, New Delhi, February 4, 1944.'

"It was addressed to the Secretary of State and was signed 'Merrell.' It referred to a resolution passed by an informal conference of Congress members of the Madras Legislature and made comments on it.

"They also found two sheets of plain stationery in Roth's handwriting with the date line 'Bombay, August 11, 1944, Subject: Congress socialist reaction to Mr. Gandhi's recent political moves.' It was signed 'George D. Lamont, American Consul.'

"In addition to associations and meetings previously mentioned, there were some meetings in Washington between Roth and Jaffe, between Roth and Larsen, and between Roth, Jaffe, and Larsen. Two of these had some significance.

"On March 21, 1945, Jaffe and Roth drove to a parking lot at the Library of Congress in Roth's car. They remained there about 25 minutes, talking and examining papers. They then went into the Library of Congress. After a few minutes, they came out, got back in Roth's car and drove to Roth's home in Arlington, Va.

"In addition, Roth introduced both Service and Larsen to Jaffe.

"The items of documentary evidence, as I have mentioned, were not of recent date, were innocuous in content, and there was no evidence as to who first secured copies from the State Department or where Roth got them. The ones on Hotel Statler stationery indicated that Roth may have obtained them from Jaffe, rather than Jaffe from Roth. Moreover, Roth never worked at the State Department and had no access to the files of the State Department.

"In addition, Roth published a book, Dilemma in Japan, in the summer of 1945 and, when he was arrested, he said it was the manuscript of that book that he and Jaffe had at the Library of Congress.

"In addition, Roth was never observed giving to or receiving from any of the subjects in the case any material of any kind.

"Both Larsen and Roth were at one time employed by the Office of Naval Intelligence. Larsen transferred to the State Department August 31, 1944. Not a single ONI document or copy after that date was recovered from any of the subjects. Approximately 50 ONI-source items were recovered at the Amerasia offices. Larsen had more than 100 such items in his apartment when he was arrested.

"After Jaffe and Larsen entered their pleas, I interviewed them both in the hope of making a case with which we could go to trial against Roth.

"Larsen, who manifested considerable animosity toward Roth and manifested no desire to protect him, could tell us not one thing detrimental to Roth that would assist us in prosecuting. Jaffe completely exonerated Roth. Jaffe was a close friend of Roth and may well have lied to me. However, the point is that we got nothing from either Jaffe or Larsen.

"We nolle prossed the indictment as to Roth on February 15, 1946. We had to do something then because Roth's attorneys had secured an order requiring us to supply a bill of particulars of the case against Roth, and we were ordered to proceed to trial.

"It was my opinion then, and it is my opinion now, that we had no case against Roth with which we could have gone to trial with the slightest likelihood of success.

"On January 23, 1946, I wrote the FBI, reviewing all the evidence against Roth and stating that it was the opinion of all the attorneys who had worked on the case that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a trial and that a nolle prosequi should be entered. I asked their opinion as to the proposed disposition. On January 28, the FBI replied in substance that it had no recommendation and, entirely properly, assigning as the reason that it was entirely within the province of the Department of Justice to make such decisions.

"Roth did not appear before the grand jury. The grand jury voted 13 to 7 to indict him. Twelve votes are necessary to indict.

"The proceeding before the grand jury disclosed that many documents were declassified for the purpose of releasing the information, although the documents on their face did not show that they had been declassified.

"In many instances no record was kept as to what documents had been declassified. One Government officer testified that ad hoc declassifications were made. Many of these documents had wide circulation. By that I mean that many duplicates were made—in one instance I recall 500—and distributed to various agencies.

"In this connection we were unable to determine in many instances from just what agency the seized document had been taken and in some instances it was not possible to determine whether or not any copies were missing from agencies to which copies had been routed.

"Testimony before the grand jury showed that classifications were not standardized. Usually this writer in a foreign country made the classification. In part, this was governed by his desire to have the matter transmitted, for example, by wire or plane, because top classifications had precedence.

"Apart from the records of the ONI and the State Department, where Larsen and Roth were employed, we were at a complete loss to ascribe to any of the subjects arrested the removal of records from the Office of Strategic Services, the Military Intelligence Division or the Bureau of Economic Warfare, for example.

"Several hundred documents were recovered in the Amerasia offices and Larsen's apartment when Jaffe and Larsen were arrested. Part of them showed clearly that they were the property of various Government agencies. Part clearly were established as being copies of documents originating in various Government agencies. Most of them were from the State Department. Some of these seized at the Amerasia offices had notations in Larsen's handwriting. Some bore his fingerprints.

"I never had the slightest doubt that if we could use these documents and copies in evidence at a trial, we had a better than good case against Jaffe and Larsen.

"The New York defendants, Kate Mitchell, Jaffe, and Gayn, after their arrest demanded hearings before a United States commissioner, and by law they were entitled to them.

"We did not want to present our evidence at that time in a public hearing because the tremendous work of tracing those documents back to their sources had by no means been completed, because of our disappointment that incriminating statements had not been made by the defendants when they were arrested, and because we did not want to show how little or how much we had against any defendant.

"To avoid preliminary hearings we decided to present what we had to a grand jury just as quickly as possible. This was done, as I recall, on June 21, 1945.

"About that time the attorneys representing the various defendants communicated with us and asked for a conference.

"The matter was discussed by Mr. Clark, Mr. McInerney and myself, and we mutually agreed that they should have the opportunity of conferring with us.

"I have never known an instance where such a request was made by reputable attorneys in or out of Government service and was denied.

"The conference was arranged for June 27, 1945, as I recall. The attorneys representing the defendants were there. The assistant attorney general in charge of the criminal division (Mr. Clark), Mr. McInerney, Mr. Woerheide and I were present.

"The defense attorneys made the claim that their clients had done nothing more than was the general practice, in that magazines, newspapers, radio commentators and columnists were constantly obtaining information from people in various Government agencies and that, this being so, if any agency was going to put a stop to the practice, there should be some warning short of prosecution.

"In this connection they argued that their clients were being discriminated against, in fact they claimed that their clients were being persecuted because they disagreed with the State Department policy relative to the Far East, particularly China.

"The claim was made that these defendants had done no more than many reputable writers were doing and had been doing in the past. They asserted that a great injustice had been done to their clients by arrest and the Nation-wide publicity attendant on the arrests. They argued that a further great injustice would be done if indictments were returned upon which convictions could not be obtained.

"The defense attorneys insisted that the information in many of the seized documents already had been published in whole or in part in many publications.

"They pleaded with us to look into the matter further and in connection with their claim of the innocence of their clients, they reminded us of our obligation to protect the innocent as well as to punish the guilty.

"The suggestion was made that if the grand jury then considering the case voted to indict any or all of the defendants, a sealed indictment might be reported, which would mean that there would be no immediate publicity on the indictment. Attorneys representing some defendants strenuously objected to this on the ground that even a sealed indictment would have to be opened sometime.

"In addition, one of the attorneys stated that he wanted to request that the grand jury permit his client to waive immunity and testify. Such requests are invariably granted, for it gives the prosecutor an opportunity to thoroughly question a defendant under oath without defense counsel being present and therefore without objections to questions. This procedure has at times resulted in making a strong case of a weak one.

"The grand jury considering the case was due to terminate its work July 2, and Mr. Clark, Mr. McInerney and I discussed the matter in full detail and mutually, without any disagreement, arrived at the conclusion that every defendant, through his attorney, should be advised that if he so desired, he would be permitted to testify before the grand jury on signing a waiver of immunity.

"We further mutually and without any disagreement arrived at the conclusion that we would either wait until the latter part of July, when the next grand jury would be in session, or would obtain an order extending the life of the grand jury then in session another month or 6 weeks, and that we would leave it to the grand jury as to which it preferred. This was done, and the case was withdrawn from that grand jury.

"In connection with this conference on June 27, we obtained the assurance of the defense attorneys that they would not insist on preliminary hearings and would produce their clients, if they decided to have them appear before the grand jury, for examination by us at the Department of Justice before their grand jury appearances.

"Kate Mitchell's attorneys formally requested that she be permitted to go before the grand jury and agreed that she would sign a waiver of immunity. We notified every other attorney that such a request had been made by one of the defendants and that if, under the same conditions, their clients wanted to waive immunity and testify before the grand jury, they would have the same opportunity.

"In addition to Kate Mitchell's request, such a request was made in behalf of Gayn, Service, and Jaffe. As to Larsen and Roth, one of them declined and the other did not reply. Which was which I don't remember.

"Jaffe's attorney later withdrew his request. Later in July, Mr. Anderson and I interviewed, at the Department of Justice, Gayn, Kate Mitchell, and Service. They were interviewed separately and on more than one occasion, always in the presence of their counsel.

"The second grand jury heard testimony for approximately 1 week. As I recall, it started on July 30 or 31 and continued until August 8.

"Every bit of evidence we had, including every document seized, was submitted to that grand jury. We presented all that was presented on the one day to the first grand jury and, in addition, all that had been developed since that day.

"Roth was indicted by a vote of 13 to 7. Jaffe and Larsen were indicted 14 to 6.

"The House Judiciary Subcommittee report in 1946 stated:

"The cases were ably presented before the grand jury, but the net result of months of hard work was indictment of only 3 of the 6 accused, and in no case was the Government able to muster more than 14 of the 20 votes of the grand jurors."

"Between March and June 6, the investigators had made several entries, not during office hours in the offices of Amerasia. These, of course, were without the permission and without the knowledge of Jaffe and Kate Mitchell.

"The investigators had also entered the apartment of Larsen and during the same period, surveillance of office and home telephones was maintained.

"Nothing is clearer under Federal law than that evidence secured as a result of illegal searches will be suppressed upon the application of those whose constitutional right to the privacy of their homes, their persons and their effects has been violated.

"Moreover, evidence obtained as the result of leads secured in this manner will be suppressed.

"We knew that once the story broke, Jaffe's counsel would undoubtedly conclude that similar entry had been made into the Amerasia offices. We had not the slightest doubt that similar motions would be made to suppress everything seized June 6 at the Amerasia offices.

"Mr. McInerney and I realized that the Amerasia case as regards successful prosecution was collapsing. We concluded that the only thing to do to save what could be saved, which was the result of at least 6 months' difficult and careful work by the FBI and more than 3 months' work by attorneys in the Criminal Division, was to see if Mr. Arent would agree that Jaffe plead guilty to the indictment upon the best terms the Government could get. Mr. McInerney called Mr. Arent and asked him to come over to the Department.

"In the meantime, we decided that we were under no obligations to tell Mr. Arent either that the motion papers had been served and filed by Larsen's attorney or that any searches without legal process had been made at the Amerasia offices prior to June 6.

"When Arent arrived we told him we had further considered his previous offers to plead Jaffe and asked if he had anything further in mind.

"He repeated the arguments made on June 27. He further argued that Jaffe's wife was seriously ill and could get no better while this case was pending.

"After considerable discussion, he said that Jaffe would plead guilty if the Department would recommend a fine and no jail sentence.

"We asked him if he had the authority to make a commitment to that effect and he assured us that he had the necessary authority. We told him that we would recommend acceptance of a plea of guilty and would recommend a substantial fine and no jail sentence.

"We asked if this was a firm commitment which under no circumstances would be withdrawn. He said that it was. He also said that he insisted that our recommendation as to the fine would not be perfunctory, but made in good faith to the court, with a genuine effort on our part to have the court follow our recommendation.

"We gave him that assurance, and we then asked him when he could get Jaffe down from New York City to enter the plea. He said he would do it any time we could arrange it. We asked if he could have Jaffe down the following morning for that purpose. He said he could.

"Mr. McInerney then called the district court and ascertained that Judge Proctor would be available the following morning, which was a Saturday.

"We concluded these arrangements in this manner because we did not want Mr. Arent to leave our office unless and until all arrangements had been completed, because he knew that once he left the office he would read in the newspapers that Larsen had filed a motion to suppress the evidence taken from him.

"In other words, we did everything possible within our powers to insure that there would be no withdrawal by Mr. Arent of commitments made with respect to Jaffe.

"The next morning, Jaffe appeared in court. Mr. Arent in substance implied that Mr. McInerney and I had maneuvered him into pleading Jaffe guilty whereas, had he known of the Larsen motion, he never would have done so.

"We asked him if he was going to keep his word. He said that he was and that he certainly expected we were going to keep ours as regards doing everything in our power to have the sentence consist of a fine.

"We secured adjournments of Larsen's motion. We took the position that legally we had enough evidence that had been secured from the Amerasia offices to make a case against Larsen.

"While Larsen might successfully suppress evidence taken from his own apartment on the claim that his constitutional rights had been violated, he had no standing in court to make any complaint as to the method by which the Government secured documents seized at the Amerasia offices. And Jaffe's plea of guilty was assurance that no motion would be made by him.

"By that I mean that it is only the person whose constitutional right to privacy has been violated who has any standing to assert his rights successfully. Consequently, we felt there was enough in the documents seized at the Amerasia offices, some of which had Larsen's handwriting on them and some of which bore his fingerprints, to warrant the belief that we had a fair chance to secure a guilty verdict against Larsen.

"After prolonged negotiation with Larsen's attorney, we agreed to recommend that the court accept a plea of nolo contendere and to recommend a small fine.

"We agreed to do this because our case was not what could be termed a strong case, but primarily because Jaffe was the principal figure in the case and he had corrupted Larsen. We felt that Larsen should not receive as much punishment as Jaffe. Moreover, Larsen had been discharged from the State Department in the meantime, was out of a job, and had few prospects of getting a job.

"I have never believed that Jaffe's sentence was adequate for what he did. I know that had we not disposed of Jaffe's case as we did, there would have been no conviction of Jaffe and, of course, no punishment, even to the extent of a fine.

"That same House Judiciary Report in 1946 stated:

"After a most painstaking study we certify that there is no evidence, nor hint, justifying adverse criticism of either grand jury, any prosecuting attorney, FBI, judicial, or other official."

"There was not the slightest connection between the Amerasia case and my association with my present firm. On the last day of 1946, Lyman M. Bass made an appointment to meet me. My family and I then resided at Dunkirk, some 45 miles from Buffalo. The courts were flooded at that time with portal-to-portal suits, and he asked me if I would be interested in coming with his firm to handle them. I said that I would, and on January 2, 1947, I agreed to come, and on January 24 did come into the firm.

"On January 2, 1947, Mr. Bass introduced me to various members of the firm. I can't remember whether Mr. Mitchell was there that day or not, but if he was, that was the first time I met him. I repeat that there was no connection of any character between me and my present firm or between me or any member of my present firm while the Amerasia cases were being processed, and for a period of fully 1 year and 4 months after the grand jury refused to indict Miss Mitchell."

(Mr. John S. Service, called as a witness in his own behalf, being duly sworn, continued testifying as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, will you take the stand? Now, Mr. Service, you have just testified concerning a series of documents Nos. B-1 through B-52, and you have identified several of those documents as being copies of memoranda of yours which you may have shown to Mr. Jaffe, although you have stated you have no present recollection concerning them. Will you tell the Board whether you ever loaned or gave or otherwise showed Mr. Jaffe any other classified Government documents?—A. Well, I would say, sir, that I never gave or showed Mr. Jaffe any classified Government documents. I never showed him at any time any dispatch, telegram, or memoranda prepared in the Embassy or prepared in the headquarters or prepared by anyone other than myself.

Q. In other words, apart from your personal copies of your memoranda you never showed Mr. Jaffe any document of any kind whatsoever?—A. That's correct.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Well, just a minute, there was one case, one incident that I think you told about in your statement where you assisted him to procure under authority a document, I'm not sure whether it was classified or not. I refer to a document that you assisted him to get from CA.—A. Sir, my recollection of that incident is that he wanted this report of a broadcast.

Q. By Mao Tse-tung?—A. By Mao Tse-tung; and I took Mr. Jaffe to the Division of Chinese Affairs, introduced him to the office and my recollection is that the officer handed the paper to him.

Q. Yes; and then you afterward took a revised copy to him?—A. Yes, sir. I don't believe that was a classified document. It was a report of a news broadcast. I didn't think it came within the bounds of the original question.

Q. Now, have you recognized that paper anywhere among the papers found in Mr. Jaffe's possession?—A. It was not in those papers about which I was questioned this morning, sir. It would not be a Service report in any way.

Q. No.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you say that you had never given him copies of any classified Government documents? My question is prompted by the fact that your own copies of classified documents were in that sense classified Government documents.—A. Well, I was trying to make a distinction between my personal memoranda and a dispatch or an Army report transmitting—commenting upon, agreeing, or disagreeing or evaluating my memoranda, and that's why I went into detail to say that I had never shown him a dispatch coming from the Embassy or any paper originating in the State Department or any paper originating or bearing any official Army classification or term.

The CHAIRMAN. The classified papers that you did give him were all classifications put on those papers by you yourself?

A. That is correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did those include copies of any other of your own memoranda other than those about which you were questioned this morning?

A. If I understand your question correctly, sir, you are asking if I may have shown Mr. Jaffe some of my personal copies of memoranda about which I was not questioned this morning?

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes.

A. Well, it would take some time to review a complete list of my memoranda. I don't even have a complete list of my memoranda. I do not recall that I handed Mr. Jaffe any memoranda other than those about which I was questioned this morning. But so far as I know there is nowhere in existence, except possibly in the list of materials found in my desk, and even that is not absolutely complete. I don't have any list of all my memoranda.

Mr. STEVENS. The list found in your desk, sir, did not include the ones you prepared other than in Yen-an, did it?

A. No; it did not; and I did not show Mr. Jaffe any memoranda other than personal copies which I prepared in Yen-an because I did not have any copies other than Yen-an.

Mr. ACHILLES. Then, so far as you know, you did not show him copies of any other of your memoranda than those about which you were questioned this morning?

A. That's correct, sir, so far as I know. I can't answer the question with absolute definiteness because I can't remember with any certainty exactly what I showed him beyond one single paper. If I did show him anything else he apparently, shall I say, did not consider it of sufficient interest to make a copy. We might assume that.

Mr. ACHILLES. That's all I have now. I may wish to come back to that later because it is naturally relevant; that is, we are interested in ascertaining as nearly as we can exactly which reports you did show him.

A. Quite, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. And those, according to the records you had, would relate to the ones you prepared at Yen-an. You did not have other than those in your personal files?

A. As far as I remember, I had no copies of other memoranda other than the ones I prepared at Yen-an and I think I mentioned this point before: I had copies of the several memoranda I had prepared at Chungking in January or February of 1945 before I went to Yen-an. In other words, I had for 1944 the Yen-an series, and for 1945 the complete or very nearly complete series which included eight or nine which I prepared in Chungking before I went to Yen-an. Is that clear, sir?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

A. We have been speaking generally of all the 1945 memoranda as Yen-an memoranda, and technically there were eight or nine prepared before I went to Yen-an.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

four sheets, and includes various sections of an address by Mao Tse-tung, which that is?—A. Well, it is not labeled as coming from the FCC, but I recognize it as an FCC monitor report of a Yen-an broadcast in English Morse. It goes on for four sheets, and includes various sections of an address of Mao Tse-tung, which was broadcast on May 1.

The CHAIRMAN. What year?

A. 1945, sir. There are several sections.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to offer as an exhibit at this time, Document 34, although it is a document which, like the documents in the 101 to 227 series, has to be returned to the Department for their files.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be received for identification for the moment. What use do you intend to make of it? What is the connection of it?

Mr. RHETTS. This is the copy of the FCC broadcast which Mr. Service—

The CHAIRMAN. Referred to in the statement?

Mr. RHETTS. This is the copy of the FCC broadcast which he delivered to Mr. Jaffe.

The CHAIRMAN. The paper I referred to a moment ago. O. K.; it may be admitted.

A. It bears no classification.

FAR EASTERN SECTION, FREE CHINA, May 1, 1945.

YENAN

CONGRESS OF COMMUNIST PARTY MEETS

Yenan reports the following in English Morse:

"YENAN, MAY 1.—The Seventh National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party was held in Yen-an in the latter part of April. This is one of the most important events in the history of modern China.

"The task of this Congress is to rally people throughout China on the eve of the counteroffensive to save the Nation from the crisis which is the consequence of the erroneous policy of the Kuomintang Government, and so thoroughly to defeat and annihilate the Japanese aggressors and set up an independent, free, democratic, united, strong, and prosperous new China.

"There are 752 delegates representing 1,210,000 members of the Chinese Communist Party. Of these 544 are delegates and 208 are probationary delegates.

"Mao Tse-tung, Chu Teh, Li Shao-Chi, Chou En-lai, Jen Pi-shih, Lin Po-hu, Pen Tai-huai, Kang Sheng, Chen Yun, Chen Yi, Ho Lung, Hsu Hsiang-chien, Kao Kang, Lo Fu, and Peng Chen were elected to the presidium of the Congress. Jen Pi-shih was elected secretary and Li Fu-chen assistant secretary of the Congress.

Agenda Items

"There were four items in the agenda: The political report by Comrade Chu Teh, the report on redrafting of the party statutes by Comrade Li Shao-chi, and the election of members of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party.

"Since its foundation in 1921 the Chinese Communist Party held six national congresses. These congresses were held in July 1921, May 1922, June 1923, January 1925, April 1927, and July 1928. Because of the long period of war and struggle, 17 years have elapsed before the present Seventh Congress could be convened.

"At the convention of the present Congress, the power of the Chinese Communist Party, unity and solidarity within the party, and the party's prestige among the people of China are higher than at any period in the past.

Total Strength

"At present the Chinese Communist Party not only has over 1,200,000 members but also has under its leadership the 8th Route, New 4th, and other anti-Japanese regular armies, numbering 110,000 strong, over 2,200,000 people's volunteer corps, and 19 liberated areas distributed over 19 provinces in Manchuria, North, Central, and South China with a total population of 95,500,000.

"Because the war of resistance in the liberated areas is rapidly developing these figures are steadily increasing. Therefore the Chinese Communist party and liberated areas under its leadership have really become the center of gravity of the Chinese people in the anti-Japanese National Salvation Movement and struggle for liberation. The present Congress will undoubtedly have an extremely important influence on the future development of the war of resistance and internal politics of China." (Yenan, in English Morse to North America, May 1, 1945, 9:30 a. m. EWT.)

COALITION GOVERNMENT NEEDED, SAYS MAO

Yenan reports the following in English Morse: "YENAN, MAY 1.—On the 'Coalition Government' was the title of the political report given by Chairman Moa Tze-tung, leader of the Chinese Communist Party to the Seventh Congress of the Chinese Communist Party.

"Mao Tze-tung pointed out that the 'unification of all parties and groups and nonparty representatives to form a provisional democratic coalition government so as to carry out democratic reform to overcome the present crisis, mobilize and unify the national forces of the war or resistance to effectively collaborate with the Allies in fighting and defeating the Japanese aggressor, and to secure the thorough liberation of the Chinese are the basic demands of the Chinese people at present.'

National Assembly

"China needs a coalition government, said Mao Tze-tung, not only during the war but also after the war. 'After the victory of the war of resistance, the National Assembly based on a broad, democratic foundation should be called to form a regular democratic government of a similar coalition nature, embracing more broadly all parties and groups and nonparty representatives. This Government will lead the liberated people of the entire Nation to build up an independent, free, unified, prosperous and strong new country. 'After China has had a democratic elective system, the Government should be a coalition working on the basis of a commonly recognized new democratic program, no matter whether the Communist Party is the majority or minority party in the National Assembly.'

Immediate Formation

"Mao Tse-tung repeatedly urged the necessity of immediate formation of a coalition government. One party, dictatorship, dictatorship of the anti-population group within the Kuomintang, said Mao Tse-tung, is not only 'a fundamental obstacle to the mobilization and unification or the strength of the Chinese people in the war of resistance, it is also the (colossal) embryo of the civil war.'

MAO REVEALS POSTWAR PLAN FOR CHINA

The following is Yenan's continuation in English Morse of the political report given by Chairman Mao Tze-tung to the Seventh Congress of the Chinese Communist Party held in Yenan, the first part of which was reported under the heading, "Coalition Government Needed, Says Mao," on Page PA 2 of yesterday's, May 2, Daily Report:

"In his report Mao Tze-tung brought forward a program for the defeat of the Japanese aggressors and the establishment of a new China. This program is divided into two sections, namely general and specific, and furnishes the answers to many important wartime and postwar problems. Concerning the thorough annihilation of the Japanese aggressors and forbidding a half-way compromise, Mao Tze-tung called the people's attention to the secret understandings and dealings between the pro-Japanese elements in the Kuomintang Government and the Japanese secret emissaries.

No compromise

"He said: 'The Chinese people should demand that the Kuomintang Government must thoroughly annihilate the Japanese aggressors and forbid any compromise. At the same time the Chinese people should expand the 8th Route and New 4th Armies and other people's armies. Moreover, wherever the enemy has penetrated, the Chinese people should universally and voluntarily develop anti-Japanese armed forces ready to cooperate directly with our allies in the fighting.'

"To reactionary elements who want to steal the sacred right of armed resistance to the Japanese aggressors from them, 'The Chinese people should in self-defense resolutely deal a counterblow after remonstrances have proved futile

People's Freedom

"With regard to the people's freedom, Mao Tze-tung pointed out that in their struggle for freedom at the present the first and main effort of the Chinese people is directed against the Japanese aggressor. But the Kuomintang Government has deprived the people of their freedom and bound them hand and foot, rendering them unable to oppose the Japanese aggressors.

"Mao said that 'The people in China's liberated areas have gained their freedom, and the people in other areas are able to and should gain such freedom. The more the Chinese people have gained, the greater is the organized democratic force, and then there is the possibility of a coalition government.'

Unification of People

"With regard to the unification of the people, Mao pointed out that 'divided China must be changed into unified China.' But what Chinese people want is not 'absolutist unification by dictators' by the 'democratic unification by the people. The movement of the Chinese people striving for freedom, democracy, and a coalition government is actually a movement for unification.'

"With regard to the people's armies, Mao pointed out that without any army which stands on the side of the people a coalition government cannot be formed. The 8th Route and New 4th Armies are wholeheartedly on the side of the people. Mao also pointed out that many Kuomintang troops which frequently suffered (words missing) oppress the people and discriminate against other troops should be reformed. Mao Tze-tung declared: 'As soon as the new democratic coalition government and the united high command is formed in China, troops in the Chinese liberated areas will at once be handed over to them. But all Kuomintang troops must also be handed over to them at the same time.'

Private Capitalism

"Mao Tze-tung declared that the Chinese Communist Party in the entire period (words missing). The new democracy approves the development of private capitalism and ownership of private property, but this must follow the theory propounded by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, namely to carry out the principle of 'tillers own their land' and to guarantee that private capitalism 'cannot control the life of the people in the country'.

"With regard to the land problem, Mao pointed out that in the liberated areas the reduction of rent and interest has been carried out so that the landlords and peasants jointly take part in the war of resistance.

"Mao also declared: 'If there is no particular hindrance, we shall continue to carry out this policy after the war. First of all, the reduction of rent and interest will be carried out throughout the country and then (words missing). Then appropriate means will be found to arrive systematically at the (words missing) "tillers own their land".' (Next paragraph garbled in transmission—Ed.)

"On the one hand 'workers' interest will be protected', while on the other hand 'guarantee's are given to (words missing) profits from proper commercial (enterprise—Ed.)' He declared that in this new democratic state 'facilities will certainly be (words missing) widespread (development—Ed.) of a private capitalistic economy' apart from the economy of state-owned business and cooperatives.

"Mao Tze-tung welcomes foreign investments in China. He said that the industrialization of China 'will (afford—Ed.) a very great amount of foreign investments.'

Culture and Education

"With regard to culture and education, Mao Tze-tung pointed out (words missing) respecting the intelligentsia who serve the people and have made (words missing). He also pointed out the various tasks such as the liquidation of illiteracy, and the popularization of public hygiene. He further pointed out that the ancient Chinese and foreign culture should be 'absorbed critically.'

National Minorities

"Concerning the national minorities problem Mao Tze-tung pointed out that national minorities should be helped (asterisks supplied by Yen-an—Ed.) to attain liberation and development, politically, economically, and culturally. Their language, literature, customs, habits, and religious faith should be respected.

"With regard to the problem of religion, Mao Tze-tung pointed out that 'according to the principle of freedom of belief, China's liberated areas will allow every school of religion to exist. Protestants, Catholics, Mohammedans, Buddhists, and other religious beliefs, provided they obey the Government laws and decrees, will be protected by the Government.'

'Mao Tze-tung in his report dwelt in detail on 'diplomatic problems' (words missing) principle of the Chinese Communist party in diplomatic policy, declared Mao Tze-tung, 'is the establishment and consolidation of the diplomatic relations with other countries, the solution of mutually related wartime and postwar problems, such as the cooperation in fighting, peace conference, commercial intercourse, investments, (words missing) of thorough extermination of the Japanese aggressors, upholding of world peace (words missing) for equal and independent status of the Nation (words missing) interests and friendship of nations and peoples.'

International Conferences

'Also the Atlantic Charter and resolutions was (words missing) Moscow, Cairo, Tehran and Crimea international conferences, Hao Tze-tung said, that the Chinese Communist party (words missing) the Crimea Conference on this question. The Chinese Communist party 'welcomes the San Francisco United Nations Conference and has sent its representative to join the Chinese delegation in order to express the will of the Chinese people.'

'Mao Tze-tung opined that the Crimea line accords (word missing) with the policy held by the Chinese Communist Party in the settlement of the Chinese and Oriental question. He is of the opinion that a policy similar to that of (word missing) be adopted in the Orient and China.'

4-Point Program

'He said that, '(1) The Japanese aggressors must be ultimately defeated and the Japanese fascist military and the causes producing them thoroughly exterminated. There should be no half-way compromise; (2) (words missing) the vestiges of fascism in China must be exterminated without allowing the least trace to remain; (3) domestic peace must be established in China and civil war not allowed to recur; (4) the Kuomintang dictatorship (word missing) must be abolished (words missing) after its abolition it should at first be supplanted by a provisional democratic coalition government fully supported by the whole Nation. (Words missing) territories have been recovered the regular coalition government executing the popular will should be set up through free and unrestricted elections.'

Soviet Union

'Speaking of the Sino-Soviet diplomatic relations, '(We are of the opinion—Ed.) that the Kuomintang Government must stop its attitude of enmity towards the Soviet Union and swiftly improve (Sino-Ed.) Soviet diplomatic relations.' 'On behalf of the Chinese people Mao Tze-tung expressed (words missing) which has always been rendered to China by the Soviet Government and people in China's war (words missing) liberated and expressed welcome of Marshal Stalin's speech (words missing) and recent denouncement of the Soviet-Japanese neutrality pact by the Soviet Union.'

'Mao Tze-tung added: 'We believe that without the participation of the Soviet Union, it is not possible to reach a final and thorough settlement of the Pacific question.'

Diplomatic Relations

'Regarding Sino-Anglo and Sino-American diplomatic relations Mao Tze-tung said: 'The great efforts made by the Great Powers, American and Great Britain, especially the former, in the common cause of fighting the Japanese aggressors and the sympathy and aid rendered by their governments and peoples to China, deserve our thanks. (Words missing) will or Chinese people and thereby injury and lose the friendship of the Chinese people. If any foreign Government helps China's reactionary group to oppose the democratic cause of the Chinese people, a gross mistake will have been committed.'

'Speaking of the abrogation of the unequal treaties with China by (words missing), Mao Tze-tung said that the Chinese people welcome (words missing) Chinese people on a footing of equality. But, he pointed out, China 'definitely cannot rely on an (words missing) equality (words missing) being given by the good will of foreign governments and peoples. (words missing) and actual footing of equality must in the main rely on the efforts of the Chinese people to build up politically, economically and culturally a new democratic country, which is independent, free, democratic, unified, prosperous and strong.'

China assuredly cannot gain real independence and equality according to the policy of the Kuomintang Government at present in force?

Far Eastern Countries

"Mao Tze-tung advocated the following policies to be adopted with regard to the countries in the Far East: After the (words missing) unconditional surrender of the Japanese aggressors all democratic (words missing) of the Japanese people should be aided to establish a democratic regime of the Japanese people. Without such a democratic regime of the Japanese people, thorough extermination of the Japanese (words missing) would not be possible to guarantee peace in the Pacific (asterisks supplied by Yen-an—Ed.). 'The decision of the Cairo Conference to grant independence to Korea is correct, and the Chinese people should so help the Korean people to attain liberation (words missing).' With regard to Thailand she 'should be dealt with according to the measures of dealing with a fascist tourcoat.'" (Yen-an, in English Morse to North America, May 2, 1945, 9:30 a. m. EDT).

Mr. RHETTS. I would like to introduce at this point Document No. 20-3. (The matter referred to is as follows:)

"Document No. 20-3.

"(Remarks of Congressman Judd, Congressional Record, October 19, 1949, p. 15283)

"After Mr. Service was transferred from China at the insistence of our Ambassador, General Hurley, he was involved in the Amerasia case. Suitcases of documents from his office were found by the FBI in the office of a notoriously pro-Communist magazine. The case was hushed up under circumstances never yet disclosed or explained. Since then he has been promoted several times and is now chairman of the committee within the State Department which makes recommendations for all promotions."

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. In this document, Mr. Service, Congressman Judd says that suitcases of documents from your office were found by the FBI in the Amerasia office. Do you care to comment on that statement?—A. I don't know of any documents from my office found in Mr. Jaffe's office. He may mean my "office" there to refer to the Department of State. If we believe the press reports there were a large number of copies.

Q. Did you have suitcases of documents in your office?—A. I certainly did not.

Q. Your personal office?—A. No.

Q. Or in your desk?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board is perfectly well aware of the fact that no documents were found in Mr. Jaffe's office possession which came from Mr. Service's office; you don't need to labor that point.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like at this point to introduce into the transcript Document 100-16a, and Document 100-16b, the course of colloquy between Mr. Gurnea and Mr. Hancock in the testimony before the Hobbs committee.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT 100-16

"(Excerpt from Congressional Record, House, May 22, 1950)

"(Doc. 100-16a, p. 7566:)

"Mr. HANCOCK. Were any of these papers found in the possession of Roth?

"Mr. GURNEA. Roth at the time of his apprehension was preparing to go to Honolulu on transfer. He had already given up his apartment. His wife had gone to New York, where she was staying with her parents, and Roth was waiting orders to proceed.

"He did not know at that time that the orders to proceed were being held up in view of this case. He was practically on the street with his clothing and suitcase.

"Mr. HANCOCK. Did you not say fingerprints were found on some of these documents?

"Mr. GURNEA. In Jaffe's possession. Some were in his handwriting. There were three documents in his own handwriting.

"Mr. CHELF. Of Service?"

"Mr. GURNEA. Yes."

"(Doc. 100-16b, p. 7566:)"

"Mr. GURNEA. I was afraid you might have that impression. However, let me correct it. They were not fingerprints of Roth. They contained latent fingerprints of Gayn, Jaffe, and Larsen. The handwriting examination disclosed numerous specimens of Larsen's handwriting on the documents and three of the reports, three of the documents were in Roth's handwriting, one of them, I recall, was a copy of a document in Roth's handwriting prepared on stationery of the Statler Hotel.

"Mr. HANCOCK. Were those documents copies of official reports?"

"Mr. GURNEA. Found in Amerasia. Many were copies.

"Mr. HANCOCK. I mean the ones written by Roth, were they copies of State Department or Navy Department documents?"

"Mr. GURNEA. That is true.

"Mr. HANCOCK. Apparently so, you do not——"

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. The testimony of Mr. Gurnea and Mr. Hancock before the Hobbs committee appears in document 100-16a and it appears, does it not, that Mr. Gurnea is referring, in general, to documents bearing the fingerprints or handwriting of Lieutenant Roth?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then, Mr. Chelf interjects with the question: "Of Service?" and Mr. Gurnea answers "Yes," does he not?—A. He does.

Q. Will you refer to document 100-16b, and I ask you whether it is not made clear there that Mr. Gurnea is, in fact, talking only about documents in Mr. Roth's handwriting?—A. That is correct.

Mr. RHETTS. I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of making clear that the reference to Service in this testimony is either a typographical or other mistake and that I believe, on the face of the testimony of the representative of the FBI, is evidence that he was not intending to refer to any documents found in Mr. Jaffe's possession bearing the handwriting of Mr. Service.

Mr. ACHILLES. It looks as if he were referring to Service documents, but Roth's handwriting.

Mr. RHETTS. I do not even draw that implication from it necessarily.

In that connection I will also draw the Board's attention to document 100-12d and the testimony of Mr. McInerney who states that the only evidence against Mr. Service was the fact that documents of memoranda prepared by Mr. Service were found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. I take it had any memoranda bearing either the handwriting or fingerprints of Mr. Service been found Mr. McInerney would have regarded that as evidence.

(Doc. 100-12d and doc. 100-12e were submitted for inclusion in the transcript as follows:)

"DOCUMENT No. 100-12

"(Excerpt from Congressional Record, House, May 22, 1950)

"(Doc. 100-12d, p. 7558:)"

"Mr. FEIGHAN. What prompted you to arrest Service?"

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Jim, I think you ought to answer that. I was out of town on trial when this feature of it broke.

"Mr. HOBBS. You mean on a trial.

"Mr. MCINERNEY. The evidence on Service was thin. They said there was in Jaffe's office, as I recall it, copies of his confidential reports. When we arrested or made the searches, we found copies of his report. We interviewed Larsen, and Larsen admitted he had given Service's copies to Jaffe, and Service had not given them. Service was very much surprised that Jaffe had that report. It was on that thin allegation that we authorized on Service, and the same way with Gayn."

"(Doc. 100-12e, p. 7559:)"

"Mr. SPRINGER. From all of the investigations you made, from your grand jury investigation and everything connected with it, do you feel that all of these secret documents that you came in possession of had come through Larsen?"

"Mr. MCINERNEY. I do not know whether I could go that far.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. They did not. Take your FCC, Office of Strategic Service, or a few of them, the ONI, the BEW, and perhaps one or two others, they could not have come from Larsen. Larsen was never employed there. He had no access to them. So far as we knew, he had never been near the places.

"Mr. HANCOCK. I asked that a moment ago. You said these documents were routed through the State Department.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Some of them, particularly the ONI documents, were routed to the State Department, and insofar as they pertained to Chinese affairs, Larsen would have had access to them from September 1, 1944, not prior to that.

"Mr. SPRINGER. Have you been able to discover any other person who could have distributed these documents?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. We had two of them before the grand jury. In Gayn's case, he told us they got them through the area director for area 3, authorizing this girl or woman in charge of the office to give them to Gayn. We immediately sent out subpoenas for those two people.

"Mr. FELLOWS. A fine system.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. That completely left us stymied. These people were in position of authority. He said he classified them ad hoc, made no record of it, and after authorized the handing them out to Gayn.

"Mr. SPRINGER. Did you find anyone that had distributed any of these documents?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

"Mr. MCINERNEY. I might add, at the time of the arrest, we told the agent who handled these as laboratory documents to see if we could process a representative number of them for fingerprints and try to establish a chain of custody from the chief of Jaffe. They were all old documents. We came up with no principal. We did get a couple of prints on some documents we found in Gayn's apartment. They were Gayn's fingerprints on the OWI stuff. We did not get any evidence which would assist us in tracing the custody.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. You realize that many of these documents, that they refer to, date to 1936, from there on. That is why I suggested that you may be interested in seeing them. We have boxes full of them. We have all of them, booklets on health in the Japanese Empire in 1938, for example, completely innocuous, and negative as regards any national-defense character at all. Although there were some in the later period, referring principally to political matters in China, one man's judgment might say, when a nation is at war, that political matters pertain to national defense; others say it pertains to military operations, or manufacturing for military purposes or things of that character, those are questions of fact for the jury."

The CHAIRMAN. If you will refer to document 100-16b you will note that Mr. Gurnea makes clear that he referred to Roth's handwriting, not Service's.

Mr. RHETTS. That is the question I just asked. It is document 100-16b.

I should like at this point to introduce as an exhibit, but not for inclusion in the transcript, document 100-3, which is the testimony of Mr. Brooks describing the circumstances under which he made a raid upon the offices of the Amerasia magazine on the night of, I believe he says, March 11, 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. What are you asking—to have something inserted in the transcript?

Mr. RHETTS. No, sir. I am asking to have it as an exhibit in the transcript.

CHAIRMAN. It may be made an exhibit.

(Received and marked "Document No. 100-3, Exhibit 23," excerpt from Congressional Record—House, May 22, 1950, testimony of Mr. Brooks.)

Mr. RHETTS. I should also like to introduce into the transcript at this point Document No. 83, which is a two-page affidavit signed by Archbold Van Beuren, dated May 1, 1950.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT NO. 83

"AFFIDAVIT OF ARCHBOLD VAN BEUREN

"STATE OF NEW YORK,

County of New York, ss:

"I, Archbold Van Beuren, being first duly sworn, depose and state:

"1. During the year 1945 I was employed in Washington, D. C., by the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) and held the position of Security Officer of that organization. In that capacity I was responsible for maintaining a security system designed to assure that information and documents containing material affecting the national defense should not come into the hands of unauthorized persons.

"2. Some time during the latter part of February 1945 an employee in the Research and Analysis Division of OSS called to my attention that an article dealing with Southeast Asia had appeared in the magazine Amerasia and that this article bore evidence of having been based upon or in part copied from a classified OSS document.

"3. Upon receiving this information and after consultation with my superior officers, I caused an investigation to be made under the direction of Mr. Frank B. Bielaski, an investigator attached to my office, with a view to ascertaining how the information contained in this classified document might have become available for publication in the magazine Amerasia. It was discovered that the OSS document in question had been widely distributed among various government agencies and that many people had properly had access to it in different government agencies.

"4. On the night of March 10, 1945, Mr. Bielaski and others acting under his direction gained access to the offices of Amerasia in New York City and there discovered a large number of classified government documents. Inspection of these documents indicated that most of them were government-prepared copies of documents either originating in the State Department or which had been distributed to the State Department by other government agencies, such as OSS, MID, ONI, and others.

"5. At the time of this inspection on March 10, 1945, Mr. Bielaski removed certain of the documents and reported to me on the following day, March 11, 1945, as to the results of his investigation.

"6. I presented the results of Mr. Bielaski's investigation, together with the classified Government documents which he had removed from the offices of Amerasia, to my superior, Maj. Gen. William Donovan, the head of OSS, in the late afternoon of March 11, 1945, and later that evening, in company with General Donovan and another officer of the OSS, presented the results of Amerasia to Secretary of State Stettinius and Assistant Secretary of State, Julius Holmes.

"7. Thereafter, the Office of Strategic Services had no further connection with the investigation and I had no direct knowledge of any further developments in the case until it was publicly announced on June 6, 1945, that the FBI had arrested Phillip Jaffe, Kate Mitchell, and Mark Gayn in New York City, Lt. (jg) Andrew Roth, Emmanuel Larsen, and John S. Service in Washington, D. C.

"(s) ARCHBOLD VAN BEUREN.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, a notary public in and for the State and county aforesaid, by Archbold Van Beuren, to me personally known, this the 1st day of May 1950.

"My commission expires March 31, 1951.

"(s) VICKI REGAN,

"Notary Public in the State of New York. No. 24-3232725. Qualified in Kings County. Certificate filed with notary public, New York and Kings Counties Clerks and Registers. Commission Expires March 31, 1951."

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, where were you on March 10, 1945?—A. I was in Yen-an, China.

Q. And you had been in China how long?—A. Well, I had been in China since sometime in January. I arrived at Chungking on January 18, 1945.

Q. And you returned to this country when?—A. I returned to this country on April 12, 1945.

Q. Now where were you prior to January 18, 1945?—A. Well, I was en route from Washington between January 7 and January 18. I was in Washington from January 2 to January 7, 1945; prior to that, for about 45 days, I was on leave in California.

Q. And prior to that you had been?—A. On consultation with the Department of State from about October 29, 1944, to November 18, or 19, 1944.

Q. And prior to October 29?—A. I had been in China.

Q. You had been in China?—A. For the year and a half preceding.

Mr. RHETTS. I offer these documents, if it pleases the Board for the purpose of showing that at a time when whatever arrangements Mr. Jaffe may have had for obtaining Government documents Mr. Service was out of the country.

Now I ask that there be introduced into the transcript at this point Documents 39-1, 39-18, and 39-25.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT No. 39-1

"(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950—remarks of Senator McCarthy)

"(P. 4437:) * * * I could not help but remember that at the time of the Service case we also had an apparently able Attorney General. It will be recalled that in that case the FBI, after months of painstaking work by scores, or perhaps hundreds of agents, developed what J. Edgar Hoover, the head of the Department, publicly referred to as 'a 100-percent airtight case' of espionage and treason.

"J. Edgar Hoover, as everyone knows, is not known for overstating his case. I am sure we all agree that he is the ablest law-enforcement officer in this Nation and, I think, in the world. When he stated that after the tremendous amount of labor put into that case, it was a 100-percent airtight case of treason and espionage, I believe most of us would be willing to rely on his judgment on the case.

"Strangely, however, after the arrest of six suspects in that case of treason, there was an unusual sequence of events, resulting in a most fantastic finale. The curtain was rung down when a young Department of Justice attorney disposed of Hoover's six 100-percent airtight cases of treason with a statement to the effect that he could cover all of the facts in that case in less than 5 minutes, and then proceeded to assure the court that there was not the slightest indication of disloyalty.

"Obviously, with that treatment by the administration of the carefully investigated and developed case which the head of the FBI called a 100-percent airtight case of treason, I felt that the Department of Justice was not the correct place to take what I consider an even more dangerous case."

DOCUMENT No. 39-18

"(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950—remarks of Senator McCarthy)

"(P. 4440:) It will be recalled that J. Edgar Hoover at the time said this was a 100-percent airtight case against Service, Roth, and their codefendants."

"DOCUMENT No. 39-25

"(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950—remarks of Senator McCarthy)

"(P. 4454:) Let me state in this connection that, as the Senator will recall, John Service was arrested. That is the case which Hoover says was a 100-percent airtight case. Joseph Grew, who was then Under Secretary of State, was very vigorous in insisting on the prosecution of Service. Grew resigned. Dean Acheson took over. A few days later John Service was reinstated. He is the man who was accused of stealing these documents. Subsequently, he was put in charge, so far as I can determine, of personnel, promotions, and placements in the Far East. The man who stole the documents for Amerasia, an outfit which is clearly Communist controlled, and who was the subject of this espionage case was picked up by Dean Acheson, and was not only reinstated but was placed in the position of controlling placements and promotions of personnel in the Far East. This may explain why men like Lattimore were assigned such important jobs in the East."

Questions by Mr. RIETTS:

Q. Now I ask you, Mr. Service, do you have any knowledge of any public statement made by Mr. J. Edgar Hoover to the effect that there was a 100-percent airtight espionage case against you?—A. I have no knowledge of any such statement by Mr. Hoover.

Q. Have you attempted to obtain any information from Mr. Hoover as to whether he ever made such a statement?—A. I have.

Q. I show you document 53-1, and I ask you if this is a copy of a letter which you sent to Mr. Hoover on this subject?—A. It is a copy of a letter I addressed to him on April 12, 1950.

Mr. RHETTS. I ask that document 53-1 be introduced into the transcript at this point.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 53-1

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12, 1950.

J. EDGAR HOOVER.

Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, Washington 25, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: As a result of a postaudit of the action of the Department of State Loyalty Security Board clearing me of any charges of disloyalty to the United States, the President's Loyalty Review Board recently remanded my case for further consideration and my personal appearance before the Loyalty Security Board.

At the time of this action I was en route to a post in India, and the Department notified me to return to Washington for a hearing before the Loyalty Security Board.

At about the same time, Senator McCarthy of Wisconsin made various charges against me on the floor of the Senate and before the Tydings subcommittee which was set up to consider Senator McCarthy's charges against various individuals.

Since my return to this country I have familiarized myself with the charges against me and I am presently engaged in assembling documentary and other materials so that I may establish before the Loyalty Security Board that these charges are without foundation in fact.

One of the charges made against me by Senator McCarthy occurred in the course of a speech delivered on the floor of the United States Senate on Wednesday, March 29, 1950. At this time Senator McCarthy attributed to you certain statements concerning the so-called Amerasia case. You may recall that I was one of the persons who was arrested in connection with that case and that after presentation of my case before the Grand Jury, that body returned a no true bill in my case.

Senator McCarthy attributed two statements to you. The first, appearing at 96 Daily Congressional Record, p. 4437, is as follows:

"* * * it will be recalled that in that case the FBI, after months of painstaking work by scores, or perhaps hundreds of agents, developed what J. Edgar Hoover, the head of the Department, publicly referred to as a '100-percent airtight case' of espionage and treason."

While I have been unable to locate any statement by you substantially to this effect, it may well be that you did express the view that there was a "100-percent airtight case" against some of the persons who were indicted in the Amerasia case.

The second statement attributed to you by Senator McCarthy is of a different and more specific character. This statement, appearing at p. 4440 of the Congressional Record for the same day, March 30, 1950, is as follows:

"It will be recalled that J. Edgar Hoover at the time said this was a '100-percent airtight case against Service, Roth, and their co-defendants'."

If Senator McCarthy's statement is true and you did in fact make this statement concerning a "100 percent airtight case against Service" it would, of course, be highly relevant to the departmental consideration of my loyalty to the United States.

You will, I am sure, appreciate that because of your official position any statement by you expressing an opinion that there was a "100-percent airtight case" or any other kind of case of espionage or other malfeasance against me would carry great weight, and that an improper attribution to you of any such an expression would necessarily be highly damaging to me.

I assume that you have never made any such statement as the one attributed to you by Senator McCarthy and in view of its great importance to me in the proceedings in which I am now involved, I would be grateful to you if you would advise me whether or not you ever made the statement concerning me which has been attributed to you by Senator McCarthy either in the form attributed to you or substantially to that effect. If this statement is untrue I should appreciate an expression from you which will make this unmistakably clear.

In view of the pendency of these proceedings at the present time, I would appreciate the favor of an early reply addressed to me in care of my attorneys, Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus, Tower Building, 1401 K Street, Washington, D. C.

Sincerely,

JOHN S. SERVICE.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. And I ask you if you received an answer to that letter [Doc. 53-1]?—A. I did.

Q. I show you Document 53-2, and ask you if this is the reply you received from Mr. Hoover?—A. It is.

Mr. RHETTS. I ask that Document 53-2 be included in the transcript at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be admitted.

Mr. RHETTS. In this connection I should like to ask the board to inspect the document of which the original is there [indicating] and ask permission to introduce into this proceeding copies of the original.

CHAIRMAN. It may be admitted.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 53-2

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1950.

Mr. JOHN S. SERVICE,
c/o Reilly, Rhettts, and Ruckelshaus,
Tower Building, 1401 K Street, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your letter of April 12, 1950, I wish to advise that I have made no public statement on the Amerasia case since the period wherein the arrests occurred.

At the time of the arrests a release was issued by the Attorney General's Office wherein certain of the details of the case were attributed to me. The Federal Bureau of Investigation does not pass on the evidence it collects during its investigations, but this evidence is turned over to the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. I presume that they must have been satisfied with the evidence presented to them by the FBI as they authorized the arrests to be made in this case.

Very truly yours,

JOHN EDGAR HOOVER, Director.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to introduce Document 53-3 for inclusion in the transcript at this point, a copy of a release by the Department of Justice, dated June 6, 1945, which I represent to the Board that I obtained from the Department of Justice within the last month.

"DOCUMENT No. 53-3

For immediate release
Wednesday, June 6, 1945

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

"The Department of Justice announces the arrest by Special Agents of the FBI of six persons, including a Naval Reserve Lieutenant, until recently on active duty, and two Department of State employees in Washington, and the editor of Amerasia magazine in New York City, on charges of conspiring to violate the Federal Espionage Statutes through theft of highly confidential documents.

"Director J. Edgar Hoover of the FBI stated that the investigation was undertaken at the request of the Departments of State and the Navy. Since receipt of the original complaint by the FBI, the three departments have fully cooperated in the investigation.

"Those in custody in Washington are Lieutenant Andrew Roth, U. S. N. R., who was formerly assigned to the Office of Naval Intelligence; Emmannel Sigurd Larsen, specialist in the China Division of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, Department of State; and John Stewart Service, Foreign Service Officer of the Department of State who, until recently, was stationed in China.

"Three others under arrest in New York are Philip Jacob Jaffe and Kate Louise Mitchell, coeditors of Amerasia, which printed information from the stolen documents, and Mark Julius Gayn, nationally known writer who used some of the material in his articles.

"The documents recovered by the FBI include originals and copies of papers from the Departments of State, War, and Navy, the Office of Strategic Services, Office of War Information, and the Federal Communications Commission. Their security classification ranged from restricted to top secret.

"The arrests culminated two and one-half months of intensive investigation by the FBI. Investigation disclosed that data removed from the Government's confidential files usually was turned over to Jaffe at meetings in Washington and New York.

"The magazine's office is at 225 Fifth Avenue, New York. Established in 1937, Amerasia's announced purpose was to promote the study of Pacific affairs.

"Those in custody are to be taken before United States Commissioners immediately in Washington and New York on charges of conspiring to violate Section 31, Title 50, U. S. C. A., which covers the unauthorized possession or transmittal of national defense data. The maximum penalty upon conviction is two years' imprisonment and $10,000 fine.

"BACKGROUND

"Lieutenant Andrew Roth was born April 23, 1919, in The Bronx, New York City. He received degrees from the City College of New York and Columbia University, and at the latter school he was an honor student. In the summer of 1939 Roth studied Chinese at the University of Michigan. He worked as a research associate for Amerasia in 1941 and in September of that year joined the United States Navy. Following a course of study in the Japanese language at Harvard University, he was commissioned as an ensign on August 28, 1942, and was transferred to Washington for duty with the Office of Naval Intelligence. Since January of this year he has been a full lieutenant, but is not presently on active duty. His most recent address was 1614 Queen Street, Arlington, Virginia.

"Emanuel Sigurd Larsen was born August 27, 1897, at San Rafael, California. He was educated in China and Denmark and received a Doctorate of Philosophy from the University of Copenhagen in 1916. From then until 1927 he worked for the Chinese Postal Administration at Peiping, after which he served a year as adviser to Teh-Ching-Mu, Chief of the Mongol Clans at Kokeumiao, Inner Mongolia. His next six years were spent as traffic manager for a British-American tobacco company in China. From October 1934 to February 1935 Larsen was with the Chinese Secret Service at Peiping, handling investigations of the illicit arms traffic and intelligence operations in Manchuria. Larsen returned to the United States and was employed until March 1943 by the ONI as a civilian senior analyst on affairs in China, Indo-China, Thailand, and India. On August 31, 1944, he became a specialist in the China Division of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, Department of State. His address is 1650 Harvard Street, Northwest, Washington.

"John Stewart Service was born at Chengtu, Szechwan, China, on August 3, 1909. His father, an American citizen, was engaged in social welfare work in Shanghai. A graduate of Oberlin College in Ohio, Service worked for a while for a bank in Shanghai, but since 1933 he has been with the Department of State in the Foreign Service. His posts have included duty at Yunnanfu, Peiping and Chungking, China, and until recently he had an assignment with the American military forces in that country. He resides in the 700 block of Eighteenth Street, Northwest, Washington.

"Philip Jacob Jaffe was born in 1897 at Mogilev, Ukraine, Russia, and was naturalized as a United States citizen in New York on May 4, 1923. In addition to being editor of Amerasia he is president of a printing firm specializing in stationery and greeting cards. For several years Jaffe had been active in organizations prominent in Far Eastern affairs. Jaffe lives at 49 East Ninth Street, New York.

"Kate Louise Mitchell was born September 1, 1908, at Buffalo, New York. She was graduated from Bryn Mawr College in Pennsylvania in 1932. During the 1930's, Miss Mitchell traveled extensively in Europe and the Far East and she has written several books, among them "Industrialization of the Western Pacific," "Japan's Industrial Strength," and "India Without Fable." Her address in New York is 127 East Fifty-fourth Street.

"Mark Julius Gayn, whose name originally was Mark Julius Ginsbourg, was born April 29, 1908, at Barim, Manchuria. He entered the United States for permanent residence in October 1941, and was naturalized November 8, 1943, at New York. Gayn is a free-lance writer and his articles have appeared in several widely circulated magazines. At the time of his arrest he was planning to go to Russia, India, and China as a newspaper correspondent. His address is 302 West Twelfth Street, New York."

Mr. RHETTS. At this point I should like to introduce into the transcript copies of an exchange of correspondence between Mr. John E. Peurifoy and Mr. Peyton Ford; Mr. Peurifoy's letter being dated May 1, 1950, and Mr. Ford's letter being dated May 8, 1950; this exchange of correspondence having been released to the press by the Department of State as a part of its release No. 529, dated May 20, 1950.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be admitted.
(The matter referred to is as follows:)

MAY 1, 1950.

The Honorable PEYTON FORD,
The Assistant to the Attorney General.

DEAR MR. FORD: In his address on April 20, 1950, to the American Society of Newspaper Editors at the Hotel Statler in Washington, Senator McCarthy said: "One of those arrested was John S. Service. He was never convicted; he was never tried; he was never indicted.

"J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, publicly stated at the time of the arrests that this case was a 100-percent airtight case of espionage. At the time the case broke John S. Service was picked up by the FBI, Mr. Hoover made that statement, and he seldom errs on the side of overstatement, as you well know."

The Department of State is naturally interested in whether or not this statement of Senator McCarthy is an accurate one. As a result, I would appreciate it if you would inform the Department as soon as possible whether the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation made any statement similar to that attributed to him by Senator McCarthy.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN E. PEURIFOY,
Deputy Under Secretary.

MAY 8, 1950.

JOHN E. PEURIFOY, Esq.,
*Deputy Under Secretary, Department of State,
Washington, D. C.*

DEAR MR. PEURIFOY: This is in reply to your letter dated May 1, 1950, inquiring as to the accuracy of a statement alleged to have been made by J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, at the time of the arrest of John S. Service and other suspects involved in the so-called Amerasia case. You are advised that Mr. Hoover did not make the statement which has been attributed to him.

Yours sincerely,

PEYTON FORD,
The Assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. RHETT. I should like at this point to introduce document No. 100-1.

DOCUMENT No. 100-1

"Excerpt from Congressional Record—House, May 22, 1950, p. 7538

"Mr. DONDERO. The Members will remember at the time that matter came up at least the public press indicated that some statement was made by the FBI that their case was airtight. We now discover that it was not airtight.

"Mr. HOBBS. I have no such recollection, and I do not believe that any reputable person would make such a statement.

"In compliance with my promise concerning the FBI I have since looked through my file and found this quotation from a memorandum furnished me by the FBI dated May 29, 1945:

"In addition to the above, there are many contacts and associates of this group who are known to have been instrumental in this conspiracy to extract confidential documents from the Government files in Washington. However, as yet it is not believed there is sufficient admissible evidence to prosecute these individuals at this time. It is anticipated that a considerable amount of additional evidence will, of course, be developed following such time and if prosecutive action is instituted against the above four principals."

"Six arrests were made on June 6, 1945.

"I can find no record of the witnesses from the FBI who appeared and testified before the grand jury. All these records were returned to the court.

"Mr. DONDERO. I only refer to the statement that appeared in the public press at the time; I do not say that it was made by the FBI; I do not know, of course.

"Mr. HOBBS. There are a great many statements appearing in the public press that I would not like to be called upon to vouch for."

Mr. RHETTS. I should like at this point to introduce document 100-12, and I should like to refer also at this point to document 100-12-d, which has already been introduced into the transcript.

(Please see page 63 of this transcript for Doc. 100-12, which includes Doc. 100-12d, p. 7558, and Doc. 100-12e, p. 7559, Excerpt from Congressional Record--House, May 22, 1950.)

Mr. RHETTS. I offer all these documents to show that not only did Mr. J. Edgar Hoover never say that he had a 100-percent airtight espionage or any other kind of a case against Mr. Service, but that the testimony of Mr. Hitchcock, the prosecutor in charge of the trial of the Amerasia case; Mr. McInerney, the then First Assistant and presently Assistant to Attorney General of the United States; and Mr. James McGranery, then Assistant to the Attorney General and presently United States district judge, testified before the House Judiciary Committee that there was no case at all against Mr. Service, and that the only possible evidence against him was the fact that some reports prepared by him were found in Jaffe's possession, and that Larsen admitted giving those to Jaffe.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, you have already testified in your personal statement concerning your acquaintance with the various persons who were arrested in connection with the Amerasia case. I would like to ask you to explain in somewhat further detail something about your association with some of these persons. I should like to ask you, first of all, about your associations with Lieutenant Roth? Will you undertake to explain to the Board in some detail the circumstances under which you first met Lieutenant Roth and of your subsequent association with him?—A. It is rather hard to do that, sir, without a good deal of repetition of what is already in my personal statement. I met Lieutenant Roth, for the first time, at the conclusion of the off-the-record session with the IPR in Washington about the middle of November 1944. There were a number of people that came up to greet me or meet me at the end of the affair, some of them were people whom I had met or known before and hadn't had a chance to speak to me. Several of them were people whom I had never met. Lieutenant Roth was one of those. He was wearing naval uniform, I remember, and simply introduced himself.

Mr. STEVENS. One of those whom you had not met before?

A. That's right. I had never met him before; I had never heard of him before. He introduced himself, said he was working in ONI on the Far East and made some polite remarks about having enjoyed my talk, or something of the sort, and said that he hoped he would meet me again. Actually, I left Washington a few days later and did not meet him during that visit in Washington. The next time that I met him was quite soon after my return to Washington in April 1945. I remember being somewhat surprised. He telephoned me, I think, asked me to come out to his house. He said he was having a group of people for supper. I remember being somewhat surprised he had found out how soon I had arrived, and he gave a quite reasonable explanation that it was through some associate that he was working with in the office at that time, the brother of Davies, who is the brother of the naval officer working in ONI. I accepted the invitation to supper. I had no reason to refuse. I think that the supper was to be on April 19, which would have been just a week after my arrival. It was during the day, I think—the morning of the party that Lieutenant Roth called me at the office and said that Mr. Jaffe was in town and was very anxious to have a chance to meet me and talk to me and was afraid there wouldn't be an opportunity at the party because there were going to be a large number of people there, a considerable number of people there, would I be able to see Jaffe, would I give Jaffe a ring. I gave Jaffe a ring at the hotel as requested.

The only arrangement we could make was for me to stop at the hotel early and we would go on to the party together. I saw Roth the next day.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you went to the party?

A. I went to the party; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That was on the 19th of April?

A. I must say, General, that—

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you so stated in your statement.

A. When I was interrogated by the FBI I told them I wanted to cooperate and assist as far as I could in clearing up the matter, and they, of course, wanted a full detailing of my contacts with Mr. Jaffe particularly, but also with some of the other people in the case, and I couldn't positively remember the dates. But the agents had little black books and I would say: "Well, after a few days I think I had supper at his house." The agent would look at the book and would say: "Would it have been April 19, for instance?" and since he obviously knew the date, and I couldn't disagree with him, I usually accepted his dates so that—

The CHAIRMAN. You went to the Statler Hotel first and saw Jaffe and then accompanied Jaffe to Roth's?

A. That's right.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you carrying a small brown bag at that time?

A. I imagine I was carrying a brief case. I practically always do. I was on consultation. I don't like loading my pockets and any officer recently arrived or on consultation working on travel and various other things—I often carry a newspaper or magazines. It is customary for me to carry a brief case, and I think that's what I had. I don't usually—

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a zipper case?

A. Yes; I usually have a zipper case. It is this type [indicating] of case that I like, sir.

Mr. RHETTS. You are exhibiting to the Board a leather brief case with a zipper, are you?

A. Yes, sir. The one I was carrying was not this identical one, but it was the same general type.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that the occasion on which you stated that you took a copy of one report you showed Mr. Jaffe?—A. That's correct.

Q. I suppose you carried that in your brief case?—A. Probably almost certain.

Q. And you think you may have left that report with Jaffe on that occasion?—A. Yes; I believe I did.

Q. And did he put it in a manila envelope and carry it in his pocket?—A. That, I cannot say, sir; I don't remember. I don't believe I was at the hotel for very long before we went on to supper at Roth's and he didn't want to sit down and read it and study it in detail then and there.

Q. At any rate, you think you may have let him have it on that occasion?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right; go ahead.—A. The next day I had agreed to have lunch with Jaffe, and I remember being rather surprised that Roth was there. I didn't seem to remember that I had known of Roth being invited. Roth was present at the lunch with Jaffe at the Statler Hotel on the following day. Now I saw Roth—

The CHAIRMAN. You say Roth was present at that luncheon?

A. Yes, sir; as far as I can remember.

Mr. RHETTS. Was he in uniform?

A. Yes; he had to be in uniform during the war. I don't ever remember seeing him out of uniform. I remember at some social function—and I'm not sure where this was—he was not wearing a regulation necktie and there was some kidding about the fact that he didn't have a regulation necktie on, but so far as I know he always was in uniform.

The CHAIRMAN. Now this occasion, the next day, you are telling us about now, was it the occasion on which you left the other 8 or 10 memoranda that you told us about with Jaffe?

A. Yes.

Mr. RHETTS. May it please the Board, I have no objection here, but I rather had in mind to try to go through each of these individuals seriatim. We can scramble them up if you prefer.

The CHAIRMAN. We were asking about this occasion.

Mr. RHETTS. I was trying to delineate, if possible, all his associations with Roth and then I proposed to come back and also take you over the same ground so far as Jaffe. It is a matter of indifference to me.

The CHAIRMAN. In this case it would save a good deal of unnecessary duplication, I would think.

Mr. RHETTS: Very well. It seemed to me it might be easier to deal with the associations on a separate basis.

The CHAIRMAN: Since they were associated with these two gentlemen at the same time I don't see any point in doing it twice.

Mr. RHETTS: I am entirely agreeable and at the Board's disposal.

Mr. STEVENS: I had been delaying some questions about Roth expecting that we would get the story that way. If we are going to talk about Mr. Jaffe along with it too, I think maybe as these occurrences come along, General, I had better put in a question.

(Discussion off the record.)

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I would like to know from Mr. Service if Lieutenant Roth related to you, when he telephoned you about having dinner with him, what his position was, whether he had any relationships with the Department of State? Were you aware of the capacity in which he was working in the Navy?—A. I remembered having met him the previous year at the IPR meeting at which he told me that he was working for ONI, and, of course, he was wearing a Navy uniform and the fact of his presence at an IPR meeting meant that he had to be at least a member of the IPR and probably a person working on far eastern matters because that was the type of person that attended. Subsequently, I made some enquiries about Roth, but I am not sure that I had made those previous to his inviting me to dinner.

Q. Was it a practice of yours then when you were back here on consultation to dine with people whom you knew so slightly?—A. Well, I was living downtown in a small apartment; if a person was interested in the Far East and officially connected and so on—I was quite used to having invitations from people that I had just barely met whom I didn't have any background of personal acquaintance with. And if I didn't accept an invitation I would go out and eat dinner by myself in some restaurant downtown and I usually accepted invitations I am afraid. I may have known something about Roth from somebody like Donald Davis, for instance, I did later, and I can't say positively whether I made any particular inquiry about Roth or whether I simply accepted his statements that he was an officer in the ONI interested in the Far East.

(Discussion off the record.)

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF MR. JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: Monday, June 5, 1950, 10:05 a. m.—12:35 p. m.

Reporter: Violet R. Voce, Department of State, court stenographer, reporting.

Members of Board: Mr. Conrad E. Snow, Chairman; Mr. Theodore C. Achilles; Mr. Arthur G. Stevens; Mr. Allen B. Mordland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhettts, Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus.

The Board reconvened at 10:05 a. m.

CHAIRMAN (Mr. Conrad E. Snow): The Board will be in session. At the close of the last session I believe Mr. Stevens was asking Mr. Service some questions. He would like to ask some further questions.

Thereupon Mr. JOHN STEWART SERVICE, a witness previously produced and sworn in his own behalf, resumed the stand and testified further as follows:

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I believe you mentioned that Roth called you soon after you returned and suggested dinner. I believe you stated further that you're not sure whether you knew precisely the job that he had at that time but that you thought you had heard through John Davies' brother.—A. Well, I know that John Davies' brother was a mutual friend and that I saw John Davies' brother a good deal.

Q. Did you have any idea of who was going to be at dinner that night?—A. As I recollect he simply said that he was having a bunch of far-eastern people, and that sort of social activity was quite general. I mean far-eastern people run around in the same circles.

Q. I believe in answer also to a question from counsel you mentioned that Lieutenant Roth called you and said that Mr. Jaffe was going to be there and asked that you call prior to going out that night. Did you know who Mr. Jaffe was at that time?—A. Certainly I knew who he was. I never met him, but his name was quite well known.

Q. Can you recall the substance of that conversation with Roth, what led you to call this man on such short notice, and to go by?—A. Well, it's not a conversation which, of course, made any impression or meant anything to me at the time. As I stated the other day, my recollection is that Lieutenant Roth called me and said something about "Phil Jaffe is in town and is going to be at my house this evening. You know who Jaffe is, don't you?" And I said: "Yes; I heard of him." He said: "Jaffe would very much like to meet you and talk to you, but I'm afraid there won't be much time or opportunity tonight at my house, and he would very much like to see you sometime during the day." My recollection is that Roth suggested that I call Jaffe and that is my recollection of what happened. That's the way it happened.

Q. When he mentioned Jaffe's name, could you let us know something about what you knew about Mr. Jaffe at that time? Did you need an explanation from him as to what Jaffe's connections were?—A. No, I didn't need any explanation of Jaffe. He, of course, had been out in Peiping in 1936 or 1937. I didn't meet him at that time.

Q. How did you know he had been there, Mr. Service?—A. Because I met some of the other people who were in that—I'm not sure how I did. Peiping is just a small place and you see Owen Lattimore went up to the Communist territory with Jaffe and Bisson, as I remember, and I'm not sure whether I talked to Owen when he came out or whether I got a second-hand report of their trip. Also, of course, I was a subscriber to Amerasia for a while in those early days and I undoubtedly had read of Jaffe's trip. I think anybody working or specializing in the far-eastern field would know Jaffe's name quite well.

Q. Did you have any idea of Mr. Jaffe's political ideologies at that time?—A. No, I hadn't been reading Amerasia during the war really. At the time I got to Chungking in 1941 we would see occasional references to Amerasia, the sort of material that State Department sent out, summary of editorials and summary of material written about China. Well, a couple or three issues of Amerasia, maybe when I was here in 1944. I had been particularly, shall we say, pleased because Amerasia gave by far the fullest treatment to the whole Stilwell recall in a way which was very favorable to Stilwell and later gave very favorable comment on Ambassador Gauss. And I must admit that when Jaffe sought an introduction or when Roth put me in touch with Jaffe that was the idea that was perhaps paramount in my mind at the time that this was the guy that had done a very fine job on reporting the Stilwell recall.

Q. Did you know anything about his affiliations?—A. None whatever. I meant to answer that question more specifically. I didn't know the history of the Amerasia magazine at that time. I didn't know that this boiled down to just Mr. Jaffe, in fact. In fact, I was rather surprised to find that out from Lieutenant Roth. I think I was walking back from lunch the next day, on the 20th, and it was when I found out that Amerasia magazine had become Jaffe, with Kate Mitchell as his assistant.

Q. At the dinner, did you know many of the people who were there? Had you met them before?—A. I can't honestly tell you who was there, now. Most of the people—

The CHAIRMAN. What are you referring to now, the lunch?

Q. No, the dinner at Roth's home.—A. I believe that most of the people were juniors in the research field, working in the Navy and MID. MID had a huge research shop. I met an awful lot of these people casually. I had already met them in these sort of briefing sessions in 1944 and perhaps there in 1945 too.

Q. The people you had dinner with?—A. That is my recollection of the type of people. I can pull some names out of my head, but I couldn't say positively whether they were at Roth's that evening or whether they were at some other party I went to during that same period.

Q. One other question with respect to the telephone call that you made to Mr. Jaffe at Lieutenant Roth's suggestion. Can you recall the substance of that conversation, Mr. Service?—A. The telephone call with Jaffe?

Q. Yes, your call to Jaffe.—A. As I remember it, it was extremely brief and I was given a room number and he said that he thought that Jaffe was there right then. So I just called immediately. I said, "This is Jack Service. Andy Roth has just said that you were very anxious to get together with me and meet me before this evening. What time do you have free?" or something of that sort. And I didn't have any time or he didn't have any time. There wasn't any arrangement that we could make except, well, to stop by the hotel and then we would go on together.

Q. Did he ask you during that conversation about any particular matters relating to China?—A. My recollection is that he did not. It was just a conversation to try and find some mutually convenient time to meet. It's very hard to be absolutely positive about any of these things because at the time they were just incidents that didn't mean anything. I'm quite positive there was no conversation except in an effort to find a mutual satisfactory place to meet.

Q. I'd like for us to be as clear as we can in citing these particular points, Mr. Service, because I would like to get from you whatever you can recall about these early associations.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you make any inquiries at all as to Roth's reputability in the Department?

A. Well, we will have to skip ahead a little bit in the chronological sequence here. It was some time, well, I don't remember the date, and I don't think it is specified here. I don't think I even tried to guess at it here [indicating the chronology]. It must have been fairly soon after this April 19 supper at Roth's. He called me one morning in the office and wanted to know if I could meet him. He suggested the park between the two Interior buildings. He seemed to be quite excited. I said, "Sure, Andy," and walked over there and he told me that he wanted to know if I knew of a telegram from Moscow warning the Department against accepting at face value everything that Hurley had reported that Stalin had said to him.

It's a telegram that I think is in the white paper here. I had not seen the telegram and knew nothing about it. And this struck me as so strange that as soon as I got back to the Department—I walked right back to the Department—I spoke to Mr. Stanton about it and he knew about Roth and he knew Roth was working over in ONI. And I told him what Roth had asked me and he said that it seemed very strange that a lieutenant over in ONI should know the telegram which I myself had not seen and which I think had a pretty high classification probably. And Mr. Stanton thought for a while and then he said that Harriman had just returned and had brought with him a young naval officer as an aide and that undoubtedly this young Navy officer, who was the assistant naval attaché, had, therefore, some sort of relation with ONI. He had discussed the matter with Roth and he dismissed it as far as I could see.

He certainly didn't give any appearance of being concerned about Roth or about Roth's having it. I knew that some of the other officers in China Affairs were acquainted with Roth. I'm not sure at what point I found that out. I knew that Friedman, for instance, was a good friend of his because they mentioned him.

Q. Did you make that telegram available to Roth?—A. I certainly did not, sir. I never saw it myself.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Stanton indicated no doubts as to Roth's reliability?—A. Absolutely none.

Q. Did you make any inquiries of anybody in the Department about Jaffe's reputability?—A. Not at that time, no. Somewhat later on I did.

Q. Do you remember about when?—A. It would be about the end of April, I think.

Q. What led you to make the inquiries then?—A. Well, it's hard to find the exact words that can express it. I wouldn't say that I was suspicious of Jaffe but I just didn't like Jaffe very much. I was perplexed by his rather aggressive, nosy manner, and I asked somebody, I'm not sure who it was, about Jaffe. And they said he was not a good guy to be around too much, or something of that sort. No, that isn't quite right.

Q. You don't remember who the person was that you asked?—A. No, sir; I don't.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know when it was?

A. Well, I was saying a minute ago, sir, I think it was probably about the end of April or early May.

Q. Or whether it was one of the far eastern people or one of our press people?—A. No, it wasn't.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was this after you let him see the copies of your report?—A. Yes, sir; yes, it was. At the same time I gained the impression that people knew Jaffe and there wasn't anything very definite or positive. The person who I spoke to had pretty much the impression that I had at the time of Jaffe, that he was a nosy guy and overaggressive—and that was the impression I got.

Q. You regarded Jaffe as a member of the press, did you?—A. Certainly, entirely. And you might say a little bit more than that, a member of the research student expert branch of the press.

Mr. STEVENS. You can recall this conversation but you cannot recall with whom you had it?

A. No, sir; it's very, very hazy.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I take it, from something you said, that you treated the members of the Newspaper Guild, that is the press, and writers on China as people in the same general category?—A. Yes.

Q. People who were entitled to background information?—A. That is right; sir, yes.

Q. Did you in your treatment of such people, or were you accustomed to give them as background information, information which they were not supposed to use which was classified in a sense but to which you thought they were entitled to as background information but were not supposed to publish?—A. Certainly. That is what background information very often is, sir; just exactly that, material which will give them an understanding and enable them to write intelligently without going off in a wrong tangent—which they cannot use directly or which they cannot quote.

Q. That is the definition of background information, is it?—A. Well, it's —

Q. Let's put it this way, how would you define this material?—A. It's a very important part of background information. I would say a good deal of background information is of that character.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would you ordinarily give background information to a newspaperman without getting some indication as to whether he could be trusted to observe the confidences?

A. Well, that of course is a matter of judgment in each case of reputation. I think if you inquired among people in the far eastern field and could have them put themselves mentally back to that period they would most of them say that Amerasia at that time had a pretty good reputation. I talked to Dr. Blakeslee recently and we were discussing the affair—because of course Mr. Larson was working for Dr. Blakeslee—and Dr. Blakeslee said, "You know, I used to read Amerasia and it had pretty good dope. It was a pretty authoritative magazine." And I think that most of us at time thought that it was a good magazine.

Q. In other words, his relationship with Amerasia was the key to his credibility with you?—A. Yes, sir; that is right. I knew nothing else about him except his connections with Amerasia.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Service, from what we have heard during this hearing and the documents Jaffe had, Amerasia should have been an authoritative magazine, should it not?

A. The answer is "Yes, sir."

Questions by Mr. RUETIS:

Q. I think, although the session on Friday started with this matter of Roth, it may be better to go back and deal really first with Jaffe, since he is the central character here. I wonder if you could, going back to your first meeting with Jaffe—you have testified that at Lieutenant Roth's suggestion you telephoned Jaffe and you made this arrangement to call at his hotel and proceed to Roth's for the dinner.—A. That is right.

Q. I wonder if you can tell the Board whether you can recall what the nature of your conversation with Jaffe was on that first occasion. Did you drive to Lieutenant Roth's name?—A. As I recall, we went by taxi.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you're referring to the dinner?—A. That is right.

Q. Can you recall anything of the nature of the conversation you had with Jaffe at that time?—A. When you say "at that time," are you referring to the conversation at the hotel before we went out, sir, or are you referring to the conversation at the dinner?

Q. From the time you went and picked him up, met him first at the hotel.—A. I hate to have to keep referring to the fact that this is 5 years ago and it's very hard to divide conversations or separate the different conversations. As I recall, Jaffe started out by asking me about some of the Communist leaders—just personal information. He had been there and he knew them or had known them years before and he asked me about them—and I'm just, for instance,

I think he asked me about Mao Tse-tung, Chou En-lai, and the other people, how they were. Then he went on to inquire about what their current program or policies were, what their attitude was in the recent negotiations.

Q. Do you think this started right off at your very first meeting with him?—
A. Yes; my recollection is that.

Q. You do have a recollection on the point?—A. I have a general recollection that the first thing he wanted to know is how are things in Yenan and he asked details referring back to his previous visit there, and how was so-and-so and he asked, for instance, about this American doctor who was up there, an American of Syrian extraction named Ma Hai-Teh. And after that sort of initial catching up on the personal news then he started asking for information on their current attitudes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the last syllable of that name?

A. Teh.

Q. Now, did this conversation take place at the hotel before you started to Roth's home, or was this something that was the running content of your conversation that night?—A. No; I think this was all at the hotel. I don't remember anything about any discussion with Jaffe during the evening at Roth's.

Q. Did you return from that dinner with Jaffe, or did you proceed alone at the end of the evening?—A. No; I think that a group of us came in a taxi together.

Q. Came back?—A. Yes; came back from Roth's.

Q. To downtown?—A. Yes; I think we probably took a taxi. We may have dropped off somebody, but we separated at the Statler Hotel, as I recollect it. I walked a few blocks over to where I was staying.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Did you get no tip during the course of his questioning of you with regard to the more current events that the man might have been a little bit better informed than a normal correspondent might be who was sent in that area to work? In other words, were there no suspicions raised in your mind by any of his questions that indicated that he was very well informed indeed?—A. Well, that was April 1945, sir, and there was a fairly extensive amount of published material already available in articles and by conversations with newspaper people who had returned. No; I would say I didn't have any suspicion that he had unusual or illicit sources of information. He was obviously well informed. But that was one of his main interests.

Q. Will you reflect again on your return from the Roth's home. Did Mr. Jaffe go directly to the Statler Hotel and then you went your separate way, or were there any stops in between, do you know, can you recall?—A. I would say that if there were any stops it was only to drop off people who had joined the taxi, had come in the taxi party for a ride.

Mr. RHETTS. Do you have any recollection on the point?

A. No, sir; I don't have any positive recollection.

Q. Were you alone with him at all after you left Roth's house, just the two of you in a taxi, or can you recall?—A. I can't recall definitely, no. My belief is that I was not, but I just don't have any positive recollection and, after all, it was wartime and taxis were hard to get and on a number of similar occasions everybody who was going downtown in the direction would get the taxi together. And there was certainly no conversation with Jaffe that I had any recollection of.

Q. You had made arrangements with him during the earlier part of the evening to see him the next day, is that right?—A. I think it was in the early part of the evening, yes. As a matter of fact, I think it was probably while we were still at the Statler Hotel before we went to Roth's house.

Q. Did he make any specific requests for types of information or anything during that meeting which caused you to go through your records the next day for material?—A. Well, you see I had this memoranda, my personal copy of this memoranda, in which Mao had given a sort of preview of what the Congress was supposed to decide and Jaffe was a very enthusiastic sort of person who said "Don't you have anything more of this sort, any more material that it would be all right for me to see?" I didn't specify in very great detail. I wasn't in a position to specify in a very great detail.

Q. Did he say "it would be all right for me to see"?—A. "If you could show me" I think probably was the way he put it.

Mr. RHETTS. Are you now talking about a conversation you had on the night of the dinner?

A. That is right, sir.

Q. Why did you take this particular single document along with you? Remember I asked you earlier whether he made any specific requests. Why did you select this one?—A. He made no specific requests. And my recollection of it was it was just accidental. If I had not had the papers out on my desk, if I had not had to put them away, if I had not happened to alight on that thing I never would have. It's just a sort of a spur-of-the-moment idea—well, this is something that Jaffe is certainly going to be interested in and if he wants to know about the present Communist attitude I'll just take this along. That is the dope there. In fact when I put it in my pocket or put it in my briefcase—I don't know which—to take it with me I had no plan or thought-out intention of showing it to him or letting him read it. It was more simple to have it along for my own reference and guidance if he wanted detailed information on what the Communists were thinking as of that time.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Well, now, then, on this occasion, on the evening of the 19th you made a date to have lunch with him the next day at the Statler Hotel, is that correct?—A. That is right.

Q. Now, will you try to recall and describe to the Board and as completely as you can everything that went on at this luncheon, to the extent that you can recall what you said and what Jaffe said, try to tell the Board.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe Roth was there, too, is that right?

A. My recollection is that I was there, I arrived there first and then sometime later, maybe 10 minutes later or something, Aoth arrived there.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. What time did you arrive at the Statler Hotel?—A. I have no idea, except it was a luncheon engagement, sir.

Q. Did you arrive there just at lunch time, or did you arrive somewhat earlier?—A. Well, I arrived at whatever was the agreed time, but I'm sorry I can't remember what it was. It was not, as I remember it, particularly early.

Q. It was not a fairly early hour in the morning?—A. My recollection is that it was not; no. It was just a luncheon engagement. But the FBI undoubtedly knows, if they had Jaffe under surveillance they know all the facts of it. If you have some specific details that you would like me to confirm or to refute that may be easier for me because I have no positive recollection on the matter.

Q. Do you remember roughly what time you came down to the Department that morning?—A. I believe—

Q. You did come to the Department first, didn't you, before going over there?—A. No; I don't have any recollection of what time except I kept normal office hours, fairly normal office hours. I didn't have to get to a desk at a certain hour because I didn't have any regular duties. If I didn't have an appointment or an engagement until later in the morning I might do something else before I came into the office, but I don't have any positive recollection of what time I got to the office on April 20. I may have gone to some other place, I may have had a meeting in some other agency or some other place in the early morning. I may have gone direct to that before I came to the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean you may have gone to the hotel?

A. No; I may have gone to another meeting; for instance, if I had a meeting at OSS in the early part of the morning I may have gone directly there before coming to the State Department.

Mr. RHETTS. Do you have any recollection that you did such a thing, or are you just speculating here?

A. Yes; I don't have any recollection. Mr. Achilles asked me if I can remember what time I came to the office that day. The answer really is I don't remember what time I got to the office.

Mr. ACHILLES. I believe you said in your statement that the following day you went through your personal copies of other memoranda and selected several which you thought appropriate to allow Jaffe to see. I'm wondering about how long that took.

Mr. RHETTS. Might I ask, are you referring now to the morning of April 20?

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes; the morning of April 20.

A. Well, I was very familiar with the material. I didn't read each one over as I went through them. I remember very clearly going through them. I imagine I did it rather hurriedly. It wasn't a very involved or lengthy process. I was fairly familiar with the material.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you do anything else that you recall that morning, other than go through your papers and talk to Mr. Jaffe?—A. I'm sorry, sir, I can't remember what I did on the morning of April 20, 1945.

Q. How long would you say you had spent with Mr. Jaffe that morning before Roth arrived?—A. Well, I was thinking it was 10 or 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a guess on your part?

A. That is purely a guess, sir. I don't remember.

Q. Did you have lunch in Jaffe's room, or downstairs in the hotel?—A. My recollection is that the lunch was in his room. He ordered it in the room.

Q. How long would you say it was after Roth arrived before you had lunch?—A. I think it was quite a while because the service was rather slow. But there again—

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you go over these reports individually with Jaffe after you arrived at this place?—A. Yes; I think we went over some of them anyway.

Q. That would take quite a while, wouldn't it?—A. Well, going over them—I mean I showed Jaffe the report and told him roughly what it was about. I don't think we went over it by reading them or anything like that.

Q. Have you told us how many of these reports roughly you think you brought with you?—A. My recollection has been that it was, as I stated in here [indicating statement], 8 or 10, but I have no positive recollection. As I remember it, they were in one envelope and not a very bulky one.

Q. You brought them in your brief case?—A. Oh, I'm sure I did, since I always carried a brief case. But I wouldn't—I'm not in any position to—how should I say—argue the figure of 8 or 10.

Q. Did Roth bring any papers to that meeting?—A. I can't remember, sir. I don't remember whether he did or not.

Q. Did he leave with you at the time you left after the luncheon?—A. Roth? Yes; my recollection is that we left together and walked down toward the State Department building together.

Q. Was he carrying any packages at that time?—A. I don't know.

Q. Nothing that you noticed?—A. No. I just don't remember, sir. I don't remember whether he had a brief case or whether he had anything in his hands.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, then, if you left together, was Roth aware of the fact that you had left your copies with Mr. Jaffe for him to take to New York?

A. I believe he was, yes.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. There wasn't any interchange of papers either way, between Roth and Jaffe?—A. I don't remember any.

Q. Would you recount your conversation with Mr. Jaffe, leading up to your leaving the copies with him, Mr. Service?—A. My recollection was that at that time there was no statement, no understanding on my part that Jaffe was going to keep them or take them to New York.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When you left this material with Mr. Jaffe on that occasion, did you give him any instructions as to whether or not he could use the material?—A. In what sense do you mean, use it, sir?

Q. I mean in the sense of instructions as to what to do with background material, whether he could use them in his publications, or whether you were giving them to him as background material, as to which you already testified.—A. I don't remember that that point was specifically discussed. I think it was just understood and taken for granted that I was allowing him to have the material for background information. I think he did ask me if I could write for the magazine and I told him of course I couldn't write any articles for him. And that itself was in effect saying the same thing that he couldn't use my writings directly.

Questions by Mr. RIETTS:

Q. Do you have any independent recollection about the conversation that took place at lunch that day?—A. I have little bits and pieces of recollections of conversations with Roth, with Jaffe, with other people, but it's very difficult to separate these out and to say "Now this was this conversation on this date and this was the conversation on that date." I cannot recall anything about that particular conversation. I have a general recollection of bits and pieces of numerous conversations.

Q. This was all you can remember about that?—A. I remember only little bits and pieces of conversations I had.

Q. This is as good a time as any, if your recollection is of that character, to try to get what recollection of these bits and pieces of all your conversations with Jaffe you had. Will you try to tell the Board what you do recall, just the nature of the various types of conversations that you had with Jaffe, the Board bearing in mind that you cannot relate any particular item of conversation to any particular date?—A. Well, I believe, for instance, that one time Jaffe asked what was going on in China, what the news was, and I mentioned the very obvious fact, which is well known in China, that the Communists were spreading out, moving aggressively toward the southeast part of China—that was partly itself in self-defense and partly excused in their minds by the argument that they were helping the war effort by being ready to cooperate with our forces if we should ever land. That was a fact that was well known at the time. Certainly we discussed, or he asked me about their plans for setting up a more or less independent government. That is a subject that was mentioned in one of my late memoranda.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Do you recall the circumstances under which he asked you to leave the copies with him?—A. How do you mean, sir, the circumstances?

Q. What led up to that request on his part? What conversations were there?—A. Well, about all I can remember is that he was very interested and very appreciative of my allowing him to see this material and, as I say, I thought I was just allowing him to read it and he would return it to me and later in the conversation apparently he said, "Well, I have got to go back to New York today and I really want to have a chance to look this over and I'm not going to be able to sit down right now and read them. I have got to do something else, see somebody"—I have forgotten what the excuse was—"so can't I take them back to New York with me?" And I had a great deal of hesitation. I did not like the idea of him taking them to New York with him. And there was some discussion about that and finally I agreed in view of the content and nature of the things, to allow him to take them up to New York and read them. I don't remember much more about that than what I have stated in my statement to the FBI and in my personal statement here.

Q. Do you recall at all how many of them he read in the hotel?—A. Well, as I say, I don't think he read any of them completely, because he looked them over and we looked them over together, discussed the contents of them very briefly there, but that was it. He didn't sit down and try to read or study any of them right then and there. I had supposed he was going to do that in the afternoon.

Q. When you were going over them with him, was Lieutenant Roth there, or was that before Roth arrived?—A. I believe it was before Roth arrived, sir, but I can't be positive because I think we did that as soon as I arrived there. Roth came in later.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you put together the bits and pieces of recollection you have? The counsel asked you that question. Can you do that?

A. I started out and I can't remember any more.

Questions by Mr. RNETTS:

Q. You mentioned a moment ago that he asked you if you would write something for the magazine Amerasia. What was that conversation?—A. Well, I have just a very hazy recollection that he asked me if I would write for the magazine and I said, "No, of course I can't write for the magazine." For instance, he told me that the magazine was getting to be too much of a job for him and it would take up too much of his time and he would like to turn the magazine over to somebody. He asked me if I wouldn't be interested in taking over the magazine. I forget what the proposition was that he suggested. It was a sort of a partnership, or he would allow me to run it and he would be the financial angel, or something of that sort, some sort of a deal like that. And I said to him right away that I thought he was joking and when he returned to it I told him I wasn't interested in leaving the Foreign Service. I thought that he had jumped to the conclusion—apparently as a lot of other people had—that I was thinking of leaving or would be willing to leave the Foreign Service.

There was a general assumption that I had, shall we say, gotten a sort of a bad deal from Ambassador Hurley. The fact was well known that I had been jerked out of China very suddenly and quickly. I told him that I had no intention at that time of resigning, of leaving the Foreign Service, and as long as I was in the Service I couldn't do anything for his magazine, or take over his magazine.

Q. Now, what other items, if any—

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. May I interrupt. I think you testified that when you were in China there were times when you used to make it possible for newspaper people occasionally to sit at your desk and read a document, but never to take one out. Now, if that was the general custom, will you express for the Board these discussions and the hesitations that arose in your mind in times of leaving these things with a person whom you did not know as well, for him to take them to New York or to keep in the afternoon for that matter?—A. Well, I believe when I testified before, sir, that I indicated that we would not insist on being physically present if a man was reading something. We didn't generally turn a paper over to him to keep or retain or keep overnight, but that we would say "You can look at this" and we might go off and do some other job or go down the hall or something like that.

Q. Yes. I gathered the inference from that, Mr. Service, that that was in your quarters, that that was either in your office or in some place like that, that you did not give to a correspondent a document to take out for his own personal use or perusal, to take out of your office or quarters.—A. Well, if I had said that it was always in my quarters I gave a mistaken impression. I didn't mean to say that. There were times when, for instance, I would go over to the press hostel—that is where the correspondents lived in Chungking—and there were occasions when I have let them see a paper in their room, when I was discussing a matter with them, hoping to get additional information from them on the same point.

I might say, "Well, here is what I have been able to get on this business. What have you got?" or "What can you get?" And those interviews were sometimes in Chungking because transportation would be extremely difficult and the correspondents generally had no means of getting around except by foot, really. And I would be over to the press hostel almost daily. And there have been occasions when I allowed a man to see a paper in his own quarters, his living quarters, for instance, in the press hostel.

Q. To come back to the point about this. Here you were not getting from Mr. Jaffe the same sort of information that you were seeking in Chungking or in Yenan. I take it, leaving documents in a hotel or allowing him to take them to New York. Will you just recall for us what—A. I can only say this, Mr. Stevens, that I hesitated a great deal at the time. I did not like doing it, and I have regretted for 5 years that I was talked into it.

Mr. ACHILLES. You realized, did you not, that allowing him to take the copies to New York would give him ample time to have other copies made?

A. I realized that later, sir. I didn't think of it at the time. I had been used to trusting people, I'm afraid, before that time. I had no idea that he was accumulating material in this form in which he was making copies.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That is as I understand, you did not leave the copies with him for the express purpose of having copies made of them?—A. Absolutely and certainly not; I did not.

Q. That wasn't suggested?—A. No, sir, most definitely not. And I never would have agreed to it at all. I can't think of anything more foolish for a man to do than to make copies of things.

Q. Have you covered with your recollection the inclusive question that counsel asked? Will you put together all the bits and pieces you now recall?—A. I covered most of the specific things that I can remember.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board would like to have a short recess now.

(At this point, 11:65 a. m., the Board recessed and reconvened at 11:15 a. m.)

Mr. RHETTS. I wonder if I might just refer to one thing here, which relates to a line of questioning which Mr. Achilles was pursuing a short time ago. Referring to document 100-15B—and I'm referring particularly to page 7533 of the Congressional Record, the second column, about a quarter of the way down, I'm referring, Mr. Service, to the testimony of Mr. Gurnes, of the FBI, before the House committee, in which Mr. Gurnes states, "On April 20, 1945, Service was observed to enter the Statler Hotel carrying a brown brief case. On that occasion he remained in Jaffe's room all morning. At the time of his departure he was accompanied by Andrew Roth."

Now you recall Mr. Achilles was asking you a short time ago how early in the morning you thought you went to the Statler Hotel to meet Mr. Jaffe. Does this statement by Mr. Gurnes accord with your recollection of the occasion, Mr. Service?

A. No; it certainly does not. I do not recall any lengthy conversation with Mr. Jaffe on that occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. May I say to counsel the information of the Board is that Mr. Service arrived at 9:30 in the morning. I'd like to have his comments on that information.

Mr. RHETTS. Is it the Board's information that he arrived there at 9:30 and remained there throughout the morning?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. The information of the Board also is that Mr. Roth arrived slightly after noon, after 12.

A. I have not been trying to misstate the facts. I have been trying to recall them as to the best of my recollection, and that was my effort in 1945. And inevitably in going over those events again I have been guided a great deal by my statement which I made in 1945 when my memory was much fresher.

Now one thing that has perplexed me has been that I have had in my mind that my giving the documents, my loaning the personal copy of my memoranda, to Jaffe; and his talking me into allowing him to take them to New York were on two separate occasions and that has perplexed me. And I think that the answer may be that I went to the office early, sorted out—which I have indicated before I did rather hurriedly—the papers which I thought would be all right for Jaffe to see, took them over to the hotel, expecting to pick them up at lunch time. And that is why I was surprised and annoyed that at lunch time Jaffe had not gone over them and wanted to keep them for a further period of time. But I'm positive that I did not spend all the time from 9:30 until noon in the hotel with Jaffe.

Mr. ACHILLES. Are you positive of that?

A. I am. I'm really very sure, sir. I can't prove it except that I didn't spend any extended length of time with him.

Mr. RHETTS. When you say you're positive, on what do you base the determination that you have a present positive recollection?

A. Well, I'm only trying to reconstruct very hazily events of 5 years ago and I'm trying to arrive at the best reconstruction I can give, but I do not recall any extended conversation, as there would have been if I had spent the whole morning there.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Mr. Service, you mentioned earlier that you did talk over some of your reports with him. Pick any of those which you say you may possibly have shown him and give us an idea as to how you might have talked over a document like that with him. What, in time, would it take to do that sort of thing? If you had as many as 8 to 10 documents, have you any recollection as to the degree of conversation you may have had, whether any of those reports that you showed him gave reason for questions being raised in his mind, which did not relate specifically to the report and that you had to discuss out?—A. No; I don't think there was any extended conversation of that type because you cannot have that kind of a conversation until after the other man has read it, has read the report, and I recollect I said "Here are series of articles, series of memoranda on their policies on different problems," such as Mongolia and Sinkiang.

Q. Did you take these off specifically with the purpose of letting him read them or talk from them as a matter of briefing Mr. Jaffe?—A. I took them over with the purpose of letting him read them.

Q. Could you take any report—take the one that you took over the night before, could you give us an idea as to how you would have discussed such a document with him?—A. That would be just pure speculation, sir.

Mr. RHETTS. Excuse me, are you referring to the document he took over the night before?

Mr. STEVENS. That is correct.

Mr. RHETTS. I wasn't aware there was any testimony that he took any document the night before.

Mr. STEVENS. My understanding is that the Mao document was taken the night before and was left overnight.

A. I think that is correct.

Mr. RHETTS. You mean you took the Mao interview on the very first occasion?

A. That is right. We mentioned that before.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. As the record states here, you would have gone earlier in the day and your recollection would be that you had. You do not know or remember whether you had any discussions with him about the contents of these papers before leaving them?—A. I recollect, sir, that we didn't discuss any of the papers in detail, that I more or less showed him what they were, gave him a brief idea of the contents, but there was no detailed discussion of any of them. But I can't remember any certain time.

Q. Mr. Service, I would like for you to reflect upon this point and maybe we can come back to it a little bit later in our questioning here. I would like, if you could recall, a little bit more detail about the discussions that you had with Mr. Jaffe either before leaving him, if you did in fact leave before Mr. Roth's arrival—how you may have spent your time that morning, if after you left—

A. I certainly would like to be able to remember, sir. I'll do my best. I have no specific memories right now.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Counsel may proceed with the next question.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. So far as the general question that I put to you a while ago and which has been recurrently before you as to whether you can recount for the board any other topics or subjects which you think you may have discussed with Mr. Jaffe on one or more of these occasions, have you now covered everything that you can presently recall?—A. Well, there are several points that are mentioned in my statement to the FBI and in my personal statement that I haven't mentioned.

Q. But apart from those?—A. Apart from those I don't remember any; no.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything in your statement to the FBI that is not in your present statement? If so, I think you ought to mention it for the record here.

A. I see nothing in the statement of the FBI which is not in my personal statement.

Q. Coming back to April 20, after you finished lunch, I believe you testified that you and Lieutenant Roth left the Statler Hotel together. Will you describe what then occurred from the time you left the Statler?—A. We walked back toward the State Department Building, the old State Department Building, and I remember expressing some surprise to Roth that Jaffe was so friendly and that he was so quick to try to interest me in taking over or managing or editing the magazine Amerasia. And he told me something about Jaffe's interest in the magazine as a sort of a hobby, and that he had gone out to China years before and had become very much interested in China and made a sort of a hobby out of the whole subject of China.

He mentioned that he himself had worked for Jaffe and Amerasia for a short while. He told me something about Jaffe. I asked him how Jaffe could afford it, and so on, and he said that Jaffe had a fairly prosperous business and that it didn't require a great deal of his time and attention. He had fun out of running the magazine. I asked him about Jaffe's political sympathies. Roth said he was a left winger but that he was not a member of the Communist Party. As I remember it, he said that he believed we should—I forget how he put it, but Russia was deserving of sympathy and, therefore, he was a member of some of these organizations like—what is it?—the Russian-American Institute of Friendship or some similar thing. He mentioned his connection with that. But he made a definite statement that Jaffe was not a Communist. I remember that very clearly.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. When Mr. Jaffe talked with you about possibly taking over the operation of the magazine, did Jaffe make you any financial offer?—A. I don't recall that any specific figure was mentioned at all. I didn't let him get that far. I wasn't seriously contemplating that. I seem to recall his saying that he would be sure that I would be better taken care of than I was at that time in the State Department. But I think it was entirely on those rather vague terms.

Q. To go back for a moment, with regard to the time when you indicated to Mr. Jaffe after hesitation that you were willing to leave the documents with him and pick them up in New York, did you have any specific date that you were going to pick those up in New York?—A. Yes, I think I did at that time. I think I had already been invited to go up to the IPR. I'm not sure.

Q. What lapse of time, do you recall, would that be from the time you agreed to let him have them until you were going to pick them up? How long was he going to be able to retain possession of those documents?—A. I think I went up to New York on the 24th.

Q. Five days?—A. Four days. There was simply no other way of returning them conveniently before that.

Q. Did you mention to anyone in the Department, when you got back, the fact that you had taken this particular step in leaving those documents with him for 4 days?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. RHETTS. Have you completed your account of this conversation with Lieutenant Roth after your luncheon on the 20th of April?

A. Well, he said something about expecting to go back working for the magazine again, as I recall it. He intended to go back.

Mr. ACHILLES. Whose intention was that?

A. Roth's intention. I don't remember anything else. It wasn't a very long conversation. We were just walking down from the Statler to the old State Department Building.

Questions by Mr. RUETT:

Q. When you left Jaffe, did you then make any arrangements to see him again; that is, at that time did you make any engagement for any future meeting with him?—A. Not at that time. As I remember it, it was mentioned that I would be going up to talk to the L. R. and that I would get in touch with him then.

Q. To pick up these memoranda?—A. That is right.

Q. All right. When was the next time that you saw Jaffe or you had communication with him?—A. Well, actually the next time I saw him was the evening when I attended a party and spent the night at Gayn's house.

Q. When was that?—A. Let me refresh my memory, sir. That was the evening of the 24th.

Q. You had no communication with him in between times? That is, in between the 20th and the 24th, or do you recall?—A. Not as far as I can recall, I didn't. I hadn't known that he was going to be at that party, actually.

Q. You did not have any communication then?—A. I don't think so. But again, let's see, Gayn had telephoned me and said that he wanted me to come up early enough that evening to attend a small party which he was having at his apartment.

Q. And Jaffe was present at this party?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you have any recollection of having any particular conversations with Jaffe on that occasion that you can describe to the Board?—A. No, sir. We didn't have any. He made an arrangement for me to stop by at his office a certain time the next day, but I don't remember any separate conversation with him. There were about 10 or 12 people in a very small room all sitting around in a very small group.

Q. Can you tell us a little bit more about this party, since we are at that stage, this evening at the Gayn's on the 24th? Who was there, if you can recall?—A. I have listed the people attending as well as I could remember them.

Q. In other words, you have indicated the full extent of your knowledge in your statement?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The next day when you went—you did go to Jaffe's office to pick up your memoranda the next day, didn't you?—A. Yes.

Q. Can you recall anything that occurred at that meeting? Tell us what occurred, to the best of your recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the 25th?

Q. Yes,—A. Well, he showed me around their offices. They had a fairly large library workroom. I remember meeting a woman who happened to be there reading or working named Ralf Suess, I think, who had a year or two previously written a book called Sharks Fins and Millet. I had never met her before. We had a little conversation. I remember meeting and saying hello to Kate Mitchell, who was there.

Q. Is this the first time you had met her?—A. No, she had been at the party at the Gayn's the night before. Jaffe on this occasion was preparing an article on the Chinese delegation to the San Francisco Conference and he wanted to know if I could tell him offhand the biographic information on several of the people. I didn't have much to contribute. I told him a few details from memory about their public records. But I didn't stay there very long. He said he had finished reading my papers and handed them back to me.

Q. Did he indicate that he made copies of them?—A. He certainly did not.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Did you see any photographic equipment?—A. No, sir, I did not. I can't remember Jaffe's office. I have quite a clear recollection of coming down a narrow corridor and on the right-hand side there was this library workroom and at the end of the corridor was Miss Mitchell's office. But I didn't see any photographic equipment of any sort. I saw none at all.

Q. Do you recall, as of that occasion, any more fully the number of documents which he gave you back?—A. I asked him if they were all there and he said they were and I don't even recall opening the envelope.

Q. Reverting to your meeting with Jaffe on April 20, do you recall whether you let him take all of the copies which you had brought with you that day, or did you let him take only some of them?—A. No. I let him take all that I had taken over, sir. I had taken over only the ones that I thought it permissible for him to read and after we had the discussion and he had not read them that morning and wanted to retain them I let him retain them, all the copies.

Q. Coming back to the April 25 meeting, you presumably did at some point look in the envelope to ascertain whether they were all there or not, didn't you, Mr. Service?—A. Frankly, sir, I didn't even have a list of the ones I had given him.

Q. In other words, you did not check at any time to make sure that you had gotten them all back?—A. No, sir. But since I was using these and referring to them fairly frequently in the subsequent month and a half before the arrest, I think I would have noticed if they were missing. I think I would have noticed if any of them had been missing, and I didn't notice that any were missing.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you keep your records in your office in any particular order, or did you just keep all of your reports in a batch?—A. In a batch, sir. I originally had them all arranged in numerical order, I'm sure, but I usually was in a hurry to dig something out and put it back and I didn't keep them in any orderly way.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. At this point I'd like to recall to your recollection the fact that the FBI appear not to have found a copy of your Report No. 40 in your possession. Have you any comment to make on that?—A. I can't understand it, sir. I'm perplexed. But I have no explanation.

Q. That was one of the reports, I believe, you testified you did not give to Jaffe.—A. That is correct. I don't like to speculate—there was discussion about that report with several people in the Department. I can't remember who they were. One officer, for instance, had a discussion with me one time as to whether or not this recommended discontinuance of aid to the Central Government, and I said to that officer "No, it did not." And we dug up the report to look at it. Now, I'm not positive if we went to my copy or whether he had the Department's copy. But I remember on at least one occasion discussing this report, Report No. 40, with officers in the Department.

Q. Is it possible at that time that you let your copy go?—A. It's possible, sir. I can't say positively that I did. But I do remember discussing that report during that period.

Mr. ACHILLES. Having had some hesitation about allowing Jaffe to take the copies to New York, you must have had considerable confidence in him not to check through them when he gave them back to you to see that they were all there. Would you care to comment on that?

A. I would say I simply had confidence. I usually trust the people I'm dealing with. I had no list of the reports I let him see. I didn't prepare a list.

Mr. RHETTS. You prepared no list?

A. No.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you observe anything in the offices of Amerasia which would have flagged your mind as to the fact that they gave you any idea of the source of material they had for any articles? Did they discuss any of their methods of getting information with you? Was there any discussion of that sort with either Miss Mitchell or with Mr. Jaffe?

A. No, sir; there wasn't on that occasion. The only discussion I ever remember along that line was an inference I derived from Gayn one time that he was having some documents declassified for him.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. For whom?—A. For Gayn, by OWI.

Q. Who was having them declassified?—A. Gayn.

Q. For himself?—A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Was there any discussion about exchanges of information between Gayn and Jaffe?

A. On this occasion when I stayed with Gayn he told me the first time that he and Jaffe were very close and were in effect pooling their information, that anything that one of them got in the way of information they gave to the other, and so on. That's what Gayn told me the first time.

Q. Was Gayn supposed to be connected with Amerasia?—A. No, sir.

Q. Only in this way you just testified?—A. Gayn indicated that he had read these reports which I had loaned to Jaffe and I was rather surprised. He said, "Oh, well, we are very close friends and we work together." That was the first knowledge I had of that.

Q. What was Gayn supposed to be doing?—A. Gayn was a free-lance writer; had written articles for various magazines. Fairly recently he published a series of articles in Collier's magazine; and had one article published in Collier's shortly after the arrest, as a matter of fact.

Q. On China?—A. It was on the effects of the bombing in Japan. He made a study of the psychological and morale effects of the bombings, as I remember.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Would you recount at this point the extent of your association with Gayn up to that time?—A. I left Washington about November 19, 1944, and went out to California for leave and I think I was with my mother in Claremont when I received a note from Gayn saying that he had come down to Washington and hoped to meet me and was sorry that he just missed me and hoped he would have a chance again, or something of that sort.

Although I had never met Gayn personally, we shared a sort of common China background and he had been at Pomona College with my brother, which college my brother also attended. We had mutual friends. I don't recall whether I ever wrote back in reply to that note or not. I may have in a casual way, acknowledging it. I think on April 18, 1945, I received a telephone call from Gayn. He was here in Washington. It was the late forenoon and he wanted to know if I was busy and if I could have lunch with him. I said "Yes, I'm free."

He came over to the State Department and met me and we went up to one of the small eating places, the Tally-Ho or the Trianon, one of those eating places on Seventeenth Street, near the State Department building. And he was friendly. We talked about various people we knew. Recent news from China—and then he invited me to come up and stay with him in New York if I were ever going up there. He said he had this extra bed in his apartment. There is not much more I remember about that first meeting. When I accepted the invitation to attend this off-the-record session with the IPR research staff, I believe I sent a message up to Gayn inquiring whether or not it would be convenient—I probably telephoned—to spend the night there with him. My recollection is that a day or two later, perhaps the next day, he came back and asked me to come up early enough because he wanted to have a few China people in for a small party.

Q. But you had not seen him, as far as you can recall, between the time you had lunch with him and the time you spent the night with him?—A. No; I had not.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Was that party for you, Mr. Service?—A. Well, I suppose presumably it was; I don't know.

Q. Did you know what people were going to be there?—A. No, I didn't, sir. I didn't know who was going to be there except I think he may have mentioned Pepper Martin. He was a correspondent whom I knew down in China when I was there. I can't say positively whether he told me. I'm sure he didn't tell me about Jaffe because I was surprised that Jaffe was there.

Q. When Mr. Gayn informed you that he had had an opportunity to see your documents that you had loaned to Mr. Jaffe, what was your reaction to that, Mr. Service? Can you recall?—A. Surprise. It surprised me.

Q. Did that cause you to have any further feelings one way or another about Mr. Jaffe, and the fact that you had loaned him the documents at all, as to his trustworthiness?—A. Well, I was a little annoyed. I would say that it did. I didn't show him any documents after that either, sir. It was not the kind of thing I would expect.

Q. Did Jaffe ever indicate to you that he had done that, that he had let Mr. Gayn see your documents?—A. I'm not sure that it was ever mentioned.

Mr. RUMFERTS. After this occasion on the 25th of April, when you picked up your memoranda, can you recall what was your next communication with Jaffe?

A. My recollection is that it was this occasion early in May when he wished to get a copy of the broadcast of Mao Tse-tung's speech to the Communist Congress. My recollection was that that was about May 3. I think that I had a phone call from Jaffe. I'm not sure. I seem to recollect that that was the occasion when I had breakfast with him. I'm not positive though. And Jaffe said, could I get him this. I said that I didn't know whether it was classified or not and in any case I didn't handle that sort of material and I thought he ought to come over to the State Department with me and I would introduce him to the man who handled it. And that man, if he could release it, probably would. And that was what happened. I took him over and introduced him to Mr. Chase. Mr. Chase said "certainly," and gave him a copy.

Q. You say you had breakfast with him? How was that arranged, Mr. Service?—A. By telephone.

Q. From New York or in Washington?—A. Oh, no; I'm sure it was here in Washington. I don't remember whether he called me up in the afternoon or evening or just when he called me.

Q. He requested no other report except this one at that breakfast?—A. As I recall, on this occasion that was the only thing that he wanted. I don't remember any other. On a later occasion he wanted something on this Confucius Society.

Q. Take them in order, please. That is all you can recall on this one; is that right?—A. That is right, sir. He was very anxious I think at this particular time to publish in Amerasia contrasting statements or policy statements which had recently been made by Chiang Kai-shek for the Central Government and Mao Tse-tung's statements for the Communists.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. This is on May 3?—A. Yes. Now, as I mentioned the other day, my memory of the date, identification of the date, was really based on the little black book that the FBI agent had, as I recall.

Q. You have stated in your statement, as I recollect, that Jaffe was in Washington on May 3 and again on May 8. Have you got the two occasions separated in your mind, or are they mixed? What occurred on each of those two occasions to identify them in your mind?—A. I cannot separate them. They may be the same occasion. I think that Mr. Gurnea's testimony here indicates that it may have been the eighth.

Q. How do you happen to remember the date May 3?—A. Because the broadcast was about May 1.

Mr. RHETTS. The broadcast of Mao's speech?—A. Yes.

Q. Let's examine in some detail what you did on that occasion, whether it would be May 3 or May 8. Do you remember what time you went to the Statler Hotel that day—

Q. Was it in the morning?—A. In time for breakfast.

Q. Did you have breakfast with Jaffe?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. On this occasion?—A. Well, I remember having breakfast with Jaffe once.

Q. After breakfast what did you do?—A. As I remember it, he walked down with me to the State Department. He came down so that I could take him up to the Division of Chinese Affairs so that he could obtain a copy of this broadcast if it were available.

Q. At this time do you remember whether you were carrying an envelope or something of that sort?—A. I almost certainly was carrying a brief case, sir, but I have no positive recollection. It is my habit to carry a brief case.

Q. You went to the State Department, and then after that what did you do?—A. My recollection is that we had a very brief conversation in the hall. I don't remember any lengthy conversation. I don't even remember taking him to my office.

Q. What was the purpose of that?—A. Well; I think that it was on this occasion that he said that Mr. Bisson, who was a friend of his, hoped I would be able to come up to his place on Long Island some Sunday.

Q. Well, I mean that wasn't the purpose of you going with him to the State Department, was it?—A. No. The purpose of going to the State Department with him was just to introduce him to the Division of Chinese Affairs so he would be able to inquire about obtaining a copy of this broadcast.

Q. He made that inquiry on his own?—A. Well, I took him in and introduced him to the officer in the Division of Chinese Affairs.

Q. Did you then leave him?—A. No, I stayed by and we walked out into the hall afterward and my recollection is that we parted there in the hall, just outside of the Division of Chinese Affairs.

Q. Then he left the building?—A. I don't know where he went after that. He left me. Whether he called on anybody else in the Department I have no way of knowing.

Q. It is the information of the Board that these events you just described occurred on May 8?—A. That may very well be, sir; I have no positive way of identifying the date.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. You mentioned a few minutes ago that he expressed a great interest at this time—whether it was on May 3 or May 8—in the conflicting statements between Chiang Kai-shek and Mao Tse-tung.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he ask for any other information, other than this FCC broadcast? Did he ask you to provide him more background information for him at that time?—A. I don't think he did. I don't recall that he did. He was just getting material for one article which he had in mind, which he wanted to put out in the next issue. The deadline was very close and he was in a hurry.

Q. Did you ever call his attention to the fact that you disliked this business of him showing your papers to Mr. Gayn?—A. Well, as I mentioned a while ago, I don't think we ever discussed it. That was water over the dam and I wasn't going to give him or show him anything more. I don't remember that I discussed it with him.

Q. You had made that determination at that time, Mr. Service?—A. I had.

Q. That you were not going to give him anything else?—A. Certainly I had.

Q. Mr. Service, I take it you mean that you were not going to let him see any additional reports, is that the substance of what you meant when you said you weren't going to give him anything else? You were not going to let him read any more of your reports? I'm trying to fix somehow in this chronology of events the suspicions that may have been in your mind as to his reliability as a person to whom you would provide background information. I would appreciate any help you may give me on that point.—A. Well, it's very hard for me to name a specific date or describe specific phases that my attitude toward him went through, but I was annoyed that he had apparently been so free as to show them to someone else. I was annoyed at his eagerness, shall we say. He was over-aggressive, overpressing. I was annoyed at the way he had handled the affair before, when I had thought to just let him read them and return them in a short while and when he had done this business of saying he hadn't had time to read them, so maybe borrow them and take them away.

Q. Did you have a conversation with Mr. Jaffe at any time about the report that was prepared for Mr. Wallace on his visit to China, Mr. Henry Wallace?—A. Well, it may well have been referred to in some connection. I don't remember it specifically. I don't remember specifically ever mentioning that. Also, it is a little incorrect to say it was actually prepared for Wallace. That is Document No. 157, which was prepared shortly before Wallace arrived. I have forgotten whether that was a purely voluntary effort or whether someone suggested it might be well to have available, for when Mr. Wallace arrived there, for the information of himself and his party, a rather complete up-to-date summary of the situation. Now, incidentally, I might tell the Board that when we discussed this Document 157 before, the Department of State could not locate its original copy.

Mr. RHETTS. When you say "We discussed this document" you mean when it was testified about here in this proceeding?

A. Yes, sir, that is correct. The original which was transmitted to the Department under cover of dispatch No. 2733 from the Embassy at Chungking on July 1, 1944, has now been located. It was located the other day in the Division of Chinese Affairs, I think. And the Board might be interested in seeing the original for several reasons. The peculiar mistakes that we noticed in the OSS copy and in Jaffe's copy do not occur in the original. That word which occurred in both the other copies as "newsreels" is clearly "reversal" in the original. Also it was rated excellent, this dispatch, and in its present form the dispatch has attached to it a memorandum signed by Mr. Grew to the Secretary calling it to the Secretary's attention.

Q. Was that report signed by you?—A. The original memorandum was, yes, Mr. RHETTS. But not the copy attached to the dispatch?

A. No, no. The original memorandum was signed by me.

Q. Do you remember Jaffe's telling you that he had obtained a copy of that report?—A. No, sir; I don't remember that. I do remember that in January 1945 the article was published in Collier's by Gayn, which seemed to indicate that at that time, in January or perhaps December, whenever he wrote the article, Gayn had seen that memorandum. And I asked Gayn about this once, whether he had ever seen the copy, and I received a very evasive reply from him. But I don't have any positive recollection of discussing it with Jaffe. Can you give me any more details, sir?

Q. Well, there is evidence before the Board that Jaffe did discuss that report with you and told you that he had given a copy to Gayn.—A. I honestly must say that if he ever said that it has slipped my mind. I don't recall it. I have no recollection of ever having found out how Gayn had seen it, if Gayn had.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Knowing the type of report that it was, would that not have flagged in your mind that something was wrong somewhere?—A. Well, no.

Q. Would you have thought that that sort of document would have been one that would have been discussed with Mr. Gayn by someone in the Department or in any department?—A. It would not have caused very great concern, particularly if it had been only my memorandum which was shown him and not the dispatch representing the views of the Embassy or the memoranda which were also written and attached giving the Department's views.

Q. You didn't know about that dispatch and so forth, I take it?—A. I had never seen the dispatch and I had never seen the memorandum. But the memorandum itself is a personal one and it's not really an official expression of the Embassy's views or the Army's views or anyone else's views.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the document number in that case? Do you know?

A. No, 157.

Q. Do you recall whether the memorandum found in Jaffe's possession was the memorandum or the dispatch?—A. It was just the memorandum.

Mr. RHETTS. That was the the one which was a hectograph reproduction, evidently prepared by the Research Analysis Branch of OSS.

A. To continue with your question, there was a very definite attitude on the part of some officials in Washington during the war that, because of Chinese censorship, because of the difficulties of getting very many correspondents to China, because of the success of Chinese propaganda in this country, and particularly visits like Mme. Chiang Kai-shek's, that information had to be given to the press, that background information, so they could give a complete picture of the situation in China which was bad and deteriorating.

Hanson Baldwin's article which was a famous one, for instance, well, Hanson Baldwin never went to China. This had to be based entirely on information which was given to Hanson Baldwin here. And there were numerous other articles written during the same period. There were other articles written then by people who didn't get to China but there were people in responsible positions who gave them the background information.

Now, I was fairly sure that Gayn and—judging by what the chairman has just told me—Jaffe also had some knowledge of the contents of that memorandum, but since I knew what was the policy in some very high quarters to give background information and since they didn't want to tell me where they got it, I assumed they were using their journalistic prerogative in not disclosing their sources, so I did not pursue the matter nor was I particularly alarmed about it.

Q. You say you knew of this policy, you knew it by seeing Baldwin's article, or had someone specifically expressed this policy to you when you returned, Mr. Service? How did you gain your knowledge?—A. I would say, first, that it was plain from the circumstances but also that I had direct knowledge from officials, some of them outside the State Department, that there was such a policy.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean "officials outside the State Department"? Do you mean United States officials?

A. Yes, sir.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. You mentioned that this practice was followed within high quarters. Would you care to elaborate in what particular quarters? Do you mean in the State Department or outside the State Department?—A. I was thinking particularly outside the State Department.

Q. Could you give any further indication of what those quarters were?—A. I'd very much prefer not to, sir, if I may be excused.

Mr. RHETTS. To continue, after this occasion, either May 3 or May 8, whichever it was, when Jaffe came to the State Department and obtained the release on the Mao broadcast and you then left him somewhere out in the corridor and went on about your business, can you tell us about the next time you saw Jaffe?

A. Well, as I recall it, sir, at the time of our parting there we were standing at the top of the stairs and the conversation was to the effect that Mr. Bisson hoped very much I would be able to spend Sunday out at his home in Long Island and I tried to put Jaffe off by saying I would much rather have the invitation direct from Mr. Bisson rather than second hand. I don't remember how soon afterward it was, but my recollection is that Jaffe called by telephone and gave some excuse for Bisson's not calling me direct and said that Bisson would like to know if I could come up and have Sunday dinner with him, Sunday lunch, picnic, on May 19 I think it was.

Mr. ACHILLES. Could I interrupt at this point to ask if you would recount the extent of your association with T. A. Bisson up to this date?

Mr. RHETTS. I wonder if you would mind, before coming to that, just let us develop this one point.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes, go ahead.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Actually didn't you see Jaffe that same day, whether it was May 3 or May 8?

Mr. STEVENS. You mean after the FCC broadcast thing was turned over?

Q. Yes.—A. Yes, sir, just before closing time that afternoon Mr. Chase, who was the officer from whom Jaffe had obtained a copy of the Mao broadcast that morning, telephoned me. I was at my desk in the State Department. And he said that a revised addition had come through. The first one was very badly garbled. The radio was very weak and it didn't come through good. A revised and much clearer text had come from the FCC and he recalled that Mr. Jaffe had been very much interested and had gotten a copy that morning. As I recall, he asked me if I knew how he could get in touch with Jaffe so he could let Jaffe know in case he wanted a copy of this revised text of it. I recollected that I said to him "I'm going to leave the office pretty soon. I know where Jaffe is staying and I'll pick it up and take it over to him," which I did. I went by Chase's office and picked up a copy and walked over to the Statler.

My recollection is that I called Jaffe on the phone from the lobby. He came down and I met him in front of the elevators and handed him the clean text and left him immediately. Jaffe had someone with him. I'm not sure who it was. Mr. Larsen mentioned he may have been there. I have no positive recollection that he was there with Jaffe. But it was just a momentary meeting handing him the text of Mao's speech.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you remember Rose Yardoumian being in that party?—A. Yes, I know her. It's possible, if she were there, she probably would have been there with Lieutenant Roth. But I don't have any positive recollection of who was there.

Q. Who was she?—A. Rose Yardoumian was the office secretary of the Washington branch of the Institute of Pacific Relations. She was the office manager or whatever you want to call it.

Q. Why would she have been there with Roth?—A. She was quite a good friend of Roth's. I just don't imagine she would have been there alone. I think almost every time I saw her Roth was around or at the same function.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Would you describe your association with Mr. Bisson?—A. Well, I testified earlier, you may remember, that in the fall or winter of 1937 in Peiping I had met Bisson. Mr. Haldore Hansen was staying temporarily with me and he particularly—I also for that matter—was anxious to talk to Bisson or hear from Bisson of his experiences and impressions of Manchuria, which I think he had just been visiting.

The next time I saw Bisson was at this background session with the research staff of the IPR on April 25, 1945. Bisson had attended that meeting and had taken a very prominent part in the discussion.

Q. You had not seen him between the time in Peiping and the meeting there, the IPR meeting?—A. I have no recollection of seeing him in between.

Q. Have you maintained any kind of correspondence with him?—A. None at all, sir. During the meeting of the IPR, as I said, he took quite a prominent part in the discussion. And he was particularly interested in the draft constitution which the Kuomintang was planning to promulgate, I think in November 1945 to go into effect, and he had obviously made a very thorough study of it. I had not. He held forth at some length on the features of the constitution and the features of it which he thought were not in line with American ideas of democracy. Later he subsequently wrote an article incorporating many of the things he said, the things he said in that discussion.

Q. What was his occupation?—A. Well, he was a research man employed as a member of the staff of the—I think the IPR. He had been for years with the Foreign Policy Association. He received various grants and scholarships for his assistance in writing his various books. For instance, when he came to China his trip was financed by the Guggenheim Fellowship. He was originally, in his early days in China, a member of the faculty in the University of Nanking, a missionary institution. He met and married a missionary woman out there.

Q. And did you see him between that meeting of the IPR and the time you spent the week end with him?—A. No. As I say, the invitation was received in a rather annoying second-hand manner through Jaffe. I seem to remember being called by Jaffe several times preliminary to this May 19 luncheon at Bission's. The final arrangement was that—well, the final plans were made sort of by stages in different conversations. The final arrangement was that I would spend the previous night at Gayn's because he wanted to start out fairly early and it would be too late if I took a train.

Then the final arrangement was that there was going to be some sort of a party at Mitchell's place. The Gayn's would be at Kate Mitchell's and they hoped I would come up and go directly to Mitchell's to meet the Gayn's there, since they would not be at home. The party at Mitchell's was most definitely not for me. I arrived there late in the evening and, as I remember it, didn't stay very long. There were a number of people there I didn't know. I didn't pay much attention to them.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. On this occasion, on May 3 or May 8, which you mentioned as May 8 as I have stated, do you recall a conversation which you may have had with Jaffe on the subject of American cooperation with the Communists in the event of a landing by the Americans in China?—A. Well, the subject of course was one of very great interest. It was one that everyone was discussing. It was one of the primary problems. I stated awhile ago that I have a general recollection of talking to Mr. Jaffe at some time regarding the Communists' efforts to expand toward the Southeast, to be in control of the coast there, the areas there, in the event that we did make a landing. But the whole question of policy was still under debate at this time and I don't recall that I knew what it was myself. For instance, it was just about May sometime that one of the officers who was working in this same unit that Larsen worked in came to me and said that he was preparing a paper on whether or not we would cooperate with the forces we found on the ground if we went into Manchuria. Now, I never knew what decision was taken on that paper. I never saw it in final form. Is it suggested, sir, that I divulged to Mr. Jaffe what policy was?

Q. I'm trying to get your recollection, what discussion you had, if any, with Jaffe on the subject.—A. I'm sure we discussed it in general terms because everyone who was interested in China was discussing it in general terms. But I don't recall that I had any ideas myself of what American policy decisions were, so that I'm positive I didn't discuss it with him in any specific or definite terms.

Q. You were not advised as to what the American decision had been in that respect?—A. That is right. Does that answer your question?

Q. Yes; that answers my question.

(The Board adjourned at 12:35 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE MATTER OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: June 5, 1950—2:10 p. m. to 5 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building.

Reporter: Goodwin Shapiro, court stenographer, reporting.

Members of the board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, Arthur G. Stevens, Mr. Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Counsel for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhettts, Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 2:10 p. m., June 5, 1950.)

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Service, I was asking you before lunch about some plans for United States cooperation with the Communists in China in the event of a United States landing. While you were with General Wedemeyer's staff there were some plans drawn up for cooperation with the Chinese Communists made up by the staff?—A. Well, there weren't any of which I had any knowledge. There was that proposal which I think was drawn up by General McClure, but that was in December 1944 and January 1945, before I was in Chungking. We made reference to that before this proceeding.

Q. Well, those were plans drawn up for the staff as to what to do if the United States made a landing in the territory of the Chinese Communists?—A. Not exactly. That was planned, as I remember it, but I have never seen the original text. That was a plan for a joint Chinese-American guerrilla operation in north China, I think. I don't know of any plans drawn up for joint action in landing. It was generally assumed as a matter of practicality that if there were to be any landing, which was frequently talked about—I mentioned a public press-release statement of Admiral Nimitz in the spring of 1945—it was assumed we would be forced to cooperate with whoever we found on the spot because of necessity.

Q. Do you recall discussing any such plan with this Mr. Jaffe?—A. I have no specific recollection of discussing it with Mr. Jaffe. The question, as I mentioned this morning, was one which was continually being talked about.

Q. Do you remember any proposition, any pressure that the Chungking Government had been putting on the United States to agree to take in Kuomintang officials wherever the United States landed in China?—A. Yes, I have a vague recollection. I think that may be mentioned in one of my reports. I am not sure. It may have been mentioned in that telegram of February 26 which we drafted. I would have to refresh my memory, but I have a general recollection that the Kuomintang was trying to get us to make that commitment that we would take in their officials if we landed at any point on the coast of China.

Q. Do you remember any discussion of that subject with Mr. Jaffe?—A. Of this particular desire of the Kuomintang Government to have us agree?

Q. Yes.—A. No, I don't have any specific recollection. I think that I should point out, if you don't mind, that I was discussing China all the time during this period. I was living and breathing China, and I was in contact with a great many different people, and it is extremely hard for me to pick out from one conversation to another—even my conversations with Jaffe or Gayn were not particularly unusual or different. I was having conversations along the same line with a great many people, and I have done my best to forget Amerasia. I would like to remember all these details, but I can't recall any conversation with Mr. Jaffe on this point.

MR. RHETTS. On this point, I believe you indicated this morning that in terms of trying to recall general subjects that were discussed—I believe you indicated that you did recall discussing in general the problems of Chinese Communists' forces' movements toward the southeast.

A. Yes.

MR. RHETTS. You recall that much?

A. Yes.

MR. RHETTS. I take it that your last response to General Snow's question was simply that you have no specific recollection of this discussion of this proposal to have Kuomintang officials accompany any American landing forces.

A. I have no specific recollection of that point—discussing that with anyone. It is entirely possible, sir, that I might have. I have forgotten all about that whole business until you mentioned it—about the issue of that particular facet of the whole problem.

MR. STEVENS. One question. When you talked in the IPR, in your off-the-record discussion, can you recall anything like this having come up there? Did you discuss this point about the rumor that the Chinese in the southeast—

A. I am sure that I gave a general summary of the situation in China, in which I certainly would have mentioned—I'm speculating, sir, but I would not have given a summary of China without mentioning the fact of the Communist push in that direction.

MR. STEVENS. Well, would the fact that the Nationalist Government people desired to have representatives in the Communists' area—would that have been a part of the briefing? I think you have testified earlier that in some of your reports about Chiang Kai-shek wishing to have puppet forces in these areas for purposes of after the war—

A. That was the Communist argument, with which I didn't agree entirely. It might have been mentioned, sir. This question of pressure from Chiang Kai-shek to get us to agree to take in Kuomintang civil government representatives—it might have been mentioned as a part of the problem which we were facing—the policy issues which we had to confront. It would not have been unusual to mention it as background information that we were facing pressure on this point and we had to decide whether we were going to accede or whether we were going to cooperate with the forces we found in occupation. If the forces we found in occupation were anti-Kuomintang, we would certainly have gotten off on a very bad foot for cooperation with the local forces if we had arrived there carrying Kuomintang officials to take over. It was the same sort of argument that Mr. Larsen mentions and describes completely erroneously in his Plain Talk article in relation to Manchuria; and, as I mentioned this morning, that paper was being drafted in Mr. Larsen's unit in May, as to whether or not we would cooperate with whoever we found on the ground or whether we would take in the Kuomintang, and, as I said, somebody came to me in the early stages of the preparation of that paper, but I never saw it in final form and didn't know what the final decision was. I feel sure that if something like this subject of the KMT pressure on us—Kuomintang pressure on us—had been mentioned, it would have been mentioned purely as background information, and with specification.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean "specification"?

A. Well, specification that it wasn't something that could be attributed or written, but simply as a background to the policy problems that had to be decided. I have no recollection of mentioning it, however, but, as I say, it is quite possible that I might have.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Now I think this morning, in our attempt to go through chronologically here, we had got up to the occasion of your going to New York for the purpose of having Sunday lunch with Bisson. I believe you mentioned you arrived in New York on the night of —A. The 18th of May, I believe.

Q. The 18th of May, and that you went to Miss Mitchell's apartment to pick up the Gayns, or rather stayed a short time and then went home with the Gayns, where you stayed at their apartment.—A. That's right.

Q. Now was Jaffe at the party at Miss Mitchell's?—A. He was.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him on that occasion?—A. I don't remember any conversation at all. My only recollection of the party was that it was very dull and they were playing a game of dice on the floor and I stood on the outskirts and had a couple of drinks and said hello to people. I don't remember any real discussion going on at the party at the time I arrived or during the party.

Q. Then the next day, I believe you testified in your statement, Jaffe and Miteheil came and picked you up in a car and took you and the Gayns and drove out to Long Island.—A. That is correct.

Q. Now will you describe the—first of all, was there any significant conversation or discussion on the trip out? By "significant conversation" what I mean is was there any discussion of Chinese affairs or far eastern affairs or policy matters, or any general subject matter with which we have been dealing?—A. No, I don't remember. There were six people in the car, rather crowded, and I had never seen that part of New York, and we went across one of the bridges and I was interested in looking around, and I asked a number of questions about the part of the city we were driving through—the buildings, and so on. Sometime during that day—it was either going out or perhaps coming back—Gayn was talking about the book he was writing, based on the experiences of a fellow in OWI named John Caldwell, but that isn't particularly relevant to our proceeding here.

Q. Well, tell us about the luncheon party at Mr. Bisson's—who was there, what was the nature of the discussion on that occasion.—A. Mr. and Mrs. Bisson, as I remember it, Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe, Miss Mitchell, the two Gayns, and myself. We sat out in the garden, I think we had several beers, discussed—I am not sure now just what we did discuss, except I am sure that this discussion dealt with China and the Far East. About the only thing I can remember about the conversation at Bisson's was that we got into an argument on the question of freedom of the press which turned into a rather violent, acrimonious discussion between Gayn and Jaffe, which I have mentioned in my statement. Jaffe surprised me by taking the straight party line—in other words, that they had real freedom of the press in Russia, but they did not have real freedom of the press here. Gayn disagreed with him.

Q. Did you participate in that argument?—A. No. Well, I expressed my opinion that we had freedom of the press here as contrasted with Russia, but the two main participants got so heated that the rest of us became mere spectators. After lunch we took a short walk down to the beach.

Mr. STEVENS. Who do you mean by "we" now?

A. I think it was Miss Mitchell, Mr. Bisson, myself. I am not sure whether the Gayns went along or not. I'm quite sure that Mrs. Bisson and Mrs. Jaffe did not. The beach, as I remember it, was 2 or 3 blocks from the house. I never had visited it before, and haven't been back there since, but it is my recollection it was a short walk down to the beach to a couple of rowboats. We walked along the beach a while and Miss Mitchell told me about the book that she was working on—the philosophical development, trend of Kuomintang thinking, and particularly its increasing emphasis on the Chinese classical philosophy—a rejection of western social science thought—and she was discussing materials—possible sources of material on that general subject.

Q. Can you recall anything about the occasion? What did you do after you took this walk to the beach?—A. I am not sure that we stayed and had tea there or not. We went back to the house and left some time in the afternoon.

Q. Then what did you do? Drove back to the city?—A. Drove back to the city. It is my recollection they took me right to the railway station and I came back to Washington that evening, which would indicate that we probably got into town by 4 or 5 at the latest, if I came back by train that evening.

Q. Now what was the next occasion that you had any dealings with Jaffe?

Mr. STEVENS. Did Mr. Jaffe ask you for any reports or did he ask you for any additional information during these meetings?

A. No, sir; it is my recollection the only time he asked me for anything was at a later date—on or about the 29th. I don't remember him asking me for anything during this meeting.

Mr. STEVENS. You mentioned this morning how long you had known Mr. Bisson. Would you know anything about his political leanings? Do you have any idea about his affiliations?

A. None at all. I wouldn't have had any particular reason to be suspicious. He had a missionary-university background, he had worked for years with the Foreign Policy Association, his books, like American Policy in the Far East, had been textbooks.

Mr. STEVENS. But you had no reaction as to whether he was liberal conservative, or where he might fit?

A. Well, I would say he was liberal, but I thought you were particularly inquiring whether I had any indication of extreme left wing or Communist. I had no indication of that. I think that his writings clearly indicate that he took a liberal point of view, or at least that was my impression.

Mr. STEVENS. But not extreme liberal?

A. No.

Mr. STEVENS. You made no additional arrangement with Mr. Jaffe at that time? He did not make a future appointment with you?

A. No, sir, I do not think so.

Q. Now when did you next hear from Jaffe, if you recall?—A. Well, I think it was again in the evening—it was late in the afternoon on May 29.

Q. Incidentally, these dates—are they your present independent recollection or are they based on your reference to the statement that you gave the FBI 5 years ago?—A. This particular data is based on my statement to the FBI, but it has been confirmed, of course, by published accounts in the Hobbs committee transcript and so on. This party was being given by Miss Rose Yardomian and her housemate—I am not sure who the housemate was—as a farewell party for the Roths. Roth was being transferred to Pearl Harbor, and Miss Yardomian or someone suggested that there would be a combination of forces, because they lived way out in Fairlington, out beyond Park Fairfax, a place where I had never been at that time, and as I remember the suggestion was that a number of people who were going from downtown meet Jaffe or get in touch with Jaffe and ride out in the car with Jaffe. At any rate, I did that and we went out with the car full, as I remember it, and went out and came back with Jaffe.

Q. Do you remember any of the people who were in the car?—A. I can remember various people who were at the party, but I can't be sure of which ones were in the car. It may well be that the Roths might have been in the car. I am not sure.

Q. All right.—A. There were some people that went to that party, I think, named Burns, husband and wife, both of whom worked in MID. There was a man named Johnson, and his wife, who also worked in MID. There was quite a large group of 20 people or more in the party.

Mr. STEVENS. This lady who invited you to this farewell party—did Mr. Jaffe call you about going out with him?

A. Well, I have been trying here to remember whether Jaffe called me or whether Miss Yardoumian or someone else made the suggestion. I think—I am not sure whether it is mentioned here in my statement—at any rate, the suggestion was made. I couldn't say positively whether Jaffe called me and said, "Let's go out together," or whether the suggestion came from somebody who had been arranging the party.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that party in Fairlington Village?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would you tell us the extent of your acquaintance with Miss Yardoumian up to that point?

A. Well, I had met her at a number of these functions. I met her first, I think, in 1944, when I had a meeting with the IPR here in Washington. I am reasonably sure that she must have been at Roth's party on the 19th of April. She was a close friend of Roth's and quite a part of the same group, more or less. I am sure that I saw her one or two other times, but I cannot recall the exact circumstances.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you ever have occasion to confer with her individually, or did you meet her only in groups?

A. I don't remember ever talking to her individually except once, after the arrests, when I stopped by the office of the IPR to simply inquire for news of Mr. Roth—whether he had gotten bail, whether he was out of jail, what had happened to him—and we had a very brief conversation there. She had been in contact with him, and his wife, I think, had succeeded in arranging bail, and it was just a very, very brief passing by. That is the only time I remember ever having seen her alone. I think on one occasion I may have seen her in the IPR. There was some visitor here in Washington down from New York. I think it was Miss Ida Pruitt, whom I had known in Peking, and who was connected with Chinese industrial cooperatives, and I think Miss Pruitt wanted to see me and she was over in the office of the IPR, and I went over, met her there and we went out to lunch, and we saw Miss Yardoumian on that occasion. I'm trying to give all the details I can. A lot of these seem to be rather irrelevant.

Q. What went on at the party at Miss Yardoumian's?—A. Nothing. It was just a great big bunch of people, and I helped out in the kitchen pouring drinks.

Q. Did you have any discussion on that occasion with Jaffe?—A. No, sir; I don't think so. I spent most of the evening over at one end of the room, and, as I remember it, Jaffe was at the other end of the room.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the relationship of this party and the conversation that I think you told us you had with Jaffe about Confucianism? Is that the next day?

A. I am not sure whether that was in the hotel before we started out, whether it may have been in the taxi or during the evening. I remember that it was some time during that evening when he brought this up. I think we had some discussion in the hotel before we started out, in which he asked specifically if I wouldn't give him some reports that had been written on the Confucian Society, and I told him of course not, that they were Embassy dispatches, and I had quite a discussion with him and explained to him the impossibility from my point of view or any point of view of taking material from the files and allowing him to see it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you dig up some?

A. No, sir; I never did.

The CHAIRMAN. Didn't you say something about some slogans that you—

A. Oh, well, out of my memory there. He went on to the subject of this trend of the Kuomintang on their propaganda, and it is true it is quite noticeable. They had a number of special slogans they used to paint upon the walls in big characters, and out of my memory at that time I recalled several of these slogans.

Q. These were slogans that were painted on the walls of buildings in China?—

A. Yes, they used to have them on the walls of the compounds. Chinese houses, of course, are all built facing in, with a wall all around them. It is built around a courtyard.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any discussion with Mr. Jaffe on that occasion about the whereabouts of Stilwell at that time?

A. The whereabouts of Stilwell?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, whether he was in the Pacific or not?

A. This would be in May?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

A. I had called on him on at least one occasion here that spring. He was commanding general of the Ground Forces.

The CHAIRMAN. He was in the District?

A. His headquarters were down at Fort McNair. He went out to the Pacific for some time, but I am not sure it was that early. Of course, he was out in the Pacific at the end of the war. He took over the Tenth Army on Okinawa.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any conversation with Jaffe on that subject?

A. I can't recall any. I don't understand what connection it would have had.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Stilwell known publicly to be here at that time?

A. Well, he had been commanding general of the Ground Forces.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you remember when he was appointed to that position?

A. As commanding general of the Ground Forces?

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes.

A. Well, I'm only talking from memory now, but he came back from China in late October and then went out and took quite an extended vacation in California, his home, and it must have been fairly early in 1945 that he took over. I called on him at his office very soon after I came back from China, in April. Now Stilwell was very anxious to get a fighting job. He was unsatisfied and restless in the staff job and desk job, and he was determined to get a final crack at the Japanese, and I think that some time during the spring he did go out to the Pacific, and as a result of that he was more or less on the ground when General Buckner was killed, the commander of the Tenth Army, and General Stilwell was put in command. I don't remember whether he ever came back to Washington.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you did see him in Washington?

A. Yes, I saw him in April.

The CHAIRMAN. This is now May 29 which I am talking about.

A. Well, I don't recall whether General Stilwell was here or not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Wasn't he, as a matter of fact, on the Pacific at the time and due to have a meeting with MacArthur in Japan?

A. I would have to refresh my memory on the time. As I was just saying, he did go out there. When was the Okinawa campaign? I could remember if I could get some key dates here. I can't even remember now what his purpose was except to attempt to get himself a fighting command out in the Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN. That was before the Japanese surrender?

A. Oh, yes; it was before the Japanese surrender. He was in command in Okinawa during the last stage of the Okinawa campaign. Since General Buckner was killed there in action, Stilwell was put in command.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recollect any conversation with Jaffe about Stilwell's whereabouts now?

A. I can't recall in what connection the subject would have come into the conversation.

The CHAIRMAN. At any rate, let me ask you this question: You were not informed particularly as to what Stilwell was doing at that time, or were you?

A. Well, I have been dredging my memory here, and I do remember that he was going out to the Far East to get himself a command, and I think that that probably came to me in the personal conversation with Stilwell; if not with Stilwell, then with one of Stilwell's close associates. Stilwell was a very frank, outspoken person. I remember him talking about his dissatisfaction with his job and how he wanted to get a fighting job to do.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have any knowledge of General Stilwell's personal plans that was not public knowledge?—A. Well, I am not sure just what was public knowledge then. I am sure that whatever knowledge I had of his plans was on personal or through personal friendly contact with him. But as to what may have been, during wartime I assume that a four-star general's movements are usually not public knowledge. I don't remember.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you know precisely what he was going out to do?

A. My recollection is that he was going out to try to get a job. General Stilwell's hope always was—personal hope—that if there were to be any landing on China that he would be the man leading it, in north China or elsewhere. He never made any secret about that. That was sort of "Uncle Joe's" dream, and I think he would have liked nothing better than to have been at the head of the troops marching back to Peking. But I don't remember discussing that point with Jaffe. It was pretty general knowledge—Stilwell's hopes of being in on the finish in China. After all, he had been there from the start. He made no secret of it himself.

Q. Well, now, coming back to the party of Miss Yardounian's, did you return from that party to Washington with Jaffe?—A. Yes, with a full taxi, as I remember it.

Q. Jaffe and others?—A. Jaffe and others.

Q. And what did you do when you got back to town? Did you disperse at that point or did you see anything further of Jaffe on that evening?—A. As I remember it, we dispersed in front of the hotel. I have a sort of vague recollection of Jaffe walking down toward my place with me. He wanted to get some night air or something. There was some discussion about getting a little exercise, and he walked down toward my rooming place with me.

Q. Any discussion take place on that occasion that you can recall—I mean what the nature of your conversation was?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then you left him that night, and when did you next see him?—A. I don't think I've ever seen Jaffe since then.

Q. You don't think you have ever seen him since this night of May 29?—A. No, sir. I didn't see him at the time of the arrest, I didn't see him between May 29 and the arrest, I have never seen him or had any contacts during the arrest, or any correspondence or any other communications with him.

Q. Now referring to Document 17-17, which has already been put in evidence here, you will recall that Mr. Larsen or Mr. Levine, as it now appears, stated in this Plain Talk article that it was discovered by the FBI that you were in communication from China with Mr. Jaffe. This charge has been repeated by Senator McCarthy. In that connection, I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point Document 39-26, which is an excerpt of certain remarks by Senator McCarthy on the floor of the Senate on March 30, 1950.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

“(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950, remarks of Senator McCarthy, p. 4454)

“Another document stolen from Military Intelligence consisted of 22 pages; and 1 of the documents, of considerable interest, which was found in his possession and that apparently reached Jaffe before it reached the State Department, was John Service's Report No. 58, a report highly critical of Chiang Kai-shek. Does the Senator follow me? Before that document reached the State Department from Service, he had first mailed it to Philip Jaffe.”

This charge has been further repeated by one Joseph Kamp in a pamphlet entitled “America Betrayed,” and in that connection I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point Document 58-1.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 58-1

“KAMP—AMERICA BETRAYED

“The FBI evidence showed that Service had been in improper correspondence with Jaffe from China, and that Max Granich, a Russia agent, working under Vassili M. Zubelin, General Secretary of the Russian Embassy at Washington, had been assigned to act as go-between for Jaffe and Service.”

Q. Now you already testified, Mr. Service, that you first met Jaffe on April 19, 1945, is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Did you ever have any communication of any kind with Mr. Jaffe prior to April 19, 1945?—A. I had no communication of any kind with Mr. Jaffe.

Q. Directly or indirectly?—A. Directly or indirectly, unless it could be called subscribing to his magazine for 2 years, but no direct personal contact of any sort prior to April 19, 1945.

Q. At the time you were interrogated by the FBI on June 6, 1945, were you questioned as to whether you had ever been in communication with Jaffe from China?—A. I don't remember any specific questioning on that point. I do remember that they seemed quite surprised when I insisted repeatedly to them that I had never met Jaffe before April 19, 1945. By “they” I mean the agents who interrogated me.

Q. Now with reference to Document 39-26 and Document 17-17, both of which have already been introduced, in which it is asserted that among the papers found among Jaffe's possessions was a Report No. 58 entitled "Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek—Decline of His Prestige and Criticism of, and Opposition to, His Leadership." Did you ever write a report bearing that title?—A. I have no recollection of ever having written such a report.

Q. Have you during the course of preparations for this proceeding discovered in the files of the State Department such a report?—A. No, sir, because we have requested the State Department to locate only the reports which I wrote, and they found no such report among the reports which I wrote.

Q. In the course of the list of documents which was inspected here the other day there did appear such a document so captioned, indicating that it was a despatch prepared by the consul in Kunming on August 1, 1944, did there not?—A. That is correct.

Q. And that is the document which Mr. Sprouse testified was probably a report prepared by him, is it not?—A. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask you about a visit you had to the home of Owen Lattimore in Baltimore? Could you tell us about that?

A. I was asked the other day, sir, about early contacts with Owen Lattimore, but I am not sure that we pursued the subject up to the point of the week end with him. We will have to check the testimony. However, I think that the week end is mentioned on page 42 of my personal statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; in June some time.

A. It was the first week end in June. I do not know the exact date.

The CHAIRMAN. At that meeting Roth was also present?

A. Roth was also present.

The CHAIRMAN. And Miss Yardoumian?

A. And Miss Yardoumian.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. ACHILLES. Had you seen Owen Lattimore after your return to April until this week end?

A. I'm under the impression that I had a very brief casual meeting at some time or other, but I do not know the exact circumstances. He was coming fairly frequently to Washington in those days. One of my very good friends was John Fairbank, and I have a vague recollection of going to a cocktail party or something that Fairbank may have given, that I may have seen Lattimore, but I'm under the impression that I did see Mr. Lattimore in some group in some very brief way during that period.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have any private discussions with him?

A. I don't recall any. If you recall my statement, at the bottom of page 42, I mentioned that on some previous meeting—I don't recall the exact circumstances—Mr. Lattimore had mentioned one of the projects his research students were working on—a historical study of the Chinese Communist Party and Chinese communism—and he wanted to know if I had any recently published materials that might be useful, and for that reason I took with me on this week end a collection of recently published—a collection of Mao Tse-tung's speeches in the papers that was published in Yen-an, and I took that with me to Baltimore and left it with Mr. Lattimore.

Q. That was a book?—A. Yes, a very large, fat book.

Mr. STEVENS. But you did have no personal reports of your own at that time?

A. No, sir; none. If I could just say a word there, Mr. Lattimore has never been curious or never requested access to papers or documents. He has never asked me to show him anything. The only request I have ever had from him was this one—whether I had any recently published materials on Chinese Communists.

Q. Now referring to Document 58-1 and the statement in that booklet by Mr. Kamp that the FBI evidence showed that you had been in improper correspondence with Jaffe from China, and that Max Granich, a Russian agent working under Vassili M. Zubelin, had been assigned to act as a go-between for you and Jaffe, do you know who Max Granich is?—A. I did not know at the time I read this, a few weeks ago; I had to inquire. To my knowledge, I never met him and never heard of him before, nor do I know or have I heard of Mr. Zubelin.

Q. Now referring to document 92, which has already been discussed, and I refer particularly to the statement in this newspaper article attributed to Mr. Budenz to the effect that one Robert W. Weiner, alias Welwel Warzover, supplied money for the defense of the six persons arrested in the Amerasia case. Did you ever have any connection at all with Mr. Weiner or Mr. Warzover?—

A. No, sir; I never heard of him until Mr. Budenz publicized this—mentioned this.

Q. So far as any contribution to your defense, that statement is incorrect?—

A. Entirely incorrect. I received no funds whatever of which I did not know the origin in detail, except the $500 which was raised anonymously, I was told by intimate friends, and was paid over to my sister-in-law to reimburse her for advancing the cost of my bond. I received no other assistance but only from close personal friends. I can elaborate if the Board wishes.

Q. Now you testified that you never saw Jaffe again after this evening of May 29, 1945. Your testimony, I believe, has been that the last time you had seen Gayn was on the occasion of your visit to the Bissons on—A. 19th of May.

Q. On May 19. Will you tell the Board—have you seen Gayn since that time.—A. Yes, I have seen him several times since then.

Q. Well, would you describe those occasions, if you can?—A. Well, I saw him once. The next time after May 19 that I saw him was probably in late July 1945. His attorney was extremely anxious to have a brief consultation. He had understood that I was planning to request an appearance before the grand jury. I went up to New York and had that meeting. It was a brief one. They were chiefly concerned with finding out whether I had known any incriminating evidence against Gayn or had tended to incriminate him in my statement to the FBI. I told them that I had given the FBI a factual statement, as far as I was able to do so, without any effort to fasten the blame, whatever there was, on anyone. I did not see Gayn during the grand jury hearings, and the next time that I saw him was, I believe, toward the end of 1945, when he arrived in Tokyo as correspondent. He looked me up in the office, I had a very brief conversation with him. We had one or two other very casual contacts. He was living at the press club, and I was at the press club with friends on one or two occasions. So we had no extended conversations. In fact, I did my best to avoid any further contacts with him. He was rather anxious to establish himself on a basis of friendship and invited me to a meal. I eschewed any further contact with Mr. Gayn and I haven't seen him since about the end of 1945, as far as I can remember. It may have been early 1946. I can't state with absolute certainty the dates.

Q. Now Roth was present at the May 29 party at Miss Yardoumian's, of course.—A. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. I think we started to trace Roth, but we left it somewhere before that.

Q. We can go back.

Mr. ACHILLES. Could we go back and review your contacts with Roth?

Mr. STEVENS. I think we took Roth through the luncheon in the room at the Statler and the conversation on that day. Now, any contact after that date?

A. I think the next contact I mentioned, there was that occasion when he wanted to meet me in the park between the two Interior buildings, and on that occasion I reported as being surprising that he should have knowledge of this telegram from Moscow about the interview between Stalin and Hurley. I recollect seeing Roth at a party which I believe was given by Donald Davies, who was then a lieutenant, and I may have seen Roth on at least one other social occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. You have already placed him at the party at Owen Lattimore's.

A. I was working up to that.

The CHAIRMAN. This was before that?

A. Yes. I don't recall any other, you might say, significant or important contacts. He, of course, was at the party on the 29th of May at Miss Yardoumian's, and it was fairly soon after that—the first week end in June—when I found that he had also been invited to the Lattimores; and as I recall, Mrs. Lattimore suggested and got in touch with me, saying that Roth and Miss Yardoumian were coming down and it would be very much easier for their meeting us and taking us out to their house if we came together. The Lattimores lived in the far suburbs, a couple of miles or so from the end of the street-car line, as I remember it, and usually when people are coming out, the Lattimores meet them at the end of the line and drive them out to their house. So we got together and made arrangements, and I think we met at the railway station, at Union Station, trying to catch a certain train, and rode down together. I have discussed the week end in the personal statement. We came back early Monday morning, as I remember. The next time—I'm sure it was the next time—I saw Roth was the night of the arrest, when he was brought into the United States Commissioner's office some time after I had arrived there. I saw him briefly, but I don't recall speaking to him, at a hearing before the Commissioner on the 14th of June 1945, and I don't believe I have ever seen Roth since that date. Roth wrote me a brief letter, or, perhaps 2 years ago, when I was in New Zealand. He had been in Indonesia for quite a while and had gotten very well acquainted with a New Zealand correspondent who worked with the Chicago Tribune, a fellow named Pope, and it may be that Pope was returning to New Zealand and brought this letter with him. It was a note saying how much he had enjoyed working with Pope and hearing the news about us—I should say "me" instead of "us"—he didn't know my wife—and it was probably the first time in history that the Nation and the Chicago Tribune had worked so closely together. He mentioned his wife—that his wife had divorced him. I don't think I replied to that note. That is the only subsequent contact I have had with Roth.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you ever exchange any information? Did he ever ask you to exchange any additional information after you met in the park?

A. Roth was interested in Japan; he wasn't interested in China. He tried to discuss Japan and particularly tried to discuss the Communists in Yenan—the Japanese People's Emancipation League—and I told Roth I didn't know much about the subject, and he had finally got in touch with other people, I think, and got some information which was used in the book from other sources. But I gave him no information at all. And I knew too little about Japan and wasn't particularly interested in Japan. I had no idea at that time I would ever serve in Japan.

Q. Now about Miss Mitchell. You testified, I believe, that you met her for the first time on the occasion when you visited Jaffe's office on April 25 or thereabouts.—A. Well, I think I met her the first time, actually, at Gayn's party the night before.

Q. And then you mentioned seeing her this next day at the office. You mentioned going to her apartment the night of approximately May 18.—A. Yes.

Q. And then she was with you the next day at Bisson's, on May 19.—A. Yes. And the only conversation with her of which I have any recollection at all was on that walk down to the beach, when she was talking about the new book she was writing.

Q. And have you seen her since May 19?—A. No, sir. I have no recollection of any meeting after that.

Q. Have you had any communications with her?—A. None whatever.

Q. Now about Mr. Larsen. Will you describe to the Board your contacts with him?—A. Well, I may say that I have no recollection of the childhood meeting that Mr. Larsen described, when I was an infant. My recollection of our first meeting here in Washington, which was the first meeting since my childhood, is roughly similar to Mr. Larsen's description the other day, except that as I remember it he had just come out of the office of the Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, a Mr. Ballantine, and I was waiting to go in, and they walked to the door together. Mr. Ballantine introduced us and we said "How do you do," and Larsen said something about "You probably don't remember me when we were in Chungking when you were a small boy." Now I must say that my recollection of this one luncheon with Larsen differs radically. I do not believe that Mr. John Carter Vincent was there. I don't know who I went out to lunch with, but, as I remember it, the eating place was one of those small places on Seventeenth Street that was quite crowded. Larsen was there with someone else and we joined forces and sat together at the same table. Mr. Vincent didn't usually go to that place. I have had lunch with Mr. Vincent, but usually at the Cosmos Club or some place like that. And there are several details which Mr. Larsen gave the other day that don't fit my recollection of the occasion at all. But that was, as I recollect, the only contact that we had between April and June—on this occasion when we at least sat at the same table in a group of four or six people at this eating place on Seventeenth Street. About May 8, when I took over in later afternoon a copy of the FCC report of Mao Tse-tung's broadcast, I have a vague recollection that Larsen was there with Jaffe, but that's something I would not be positive about.

Mr. ACHILLES. Either at that luncheon or at any other time did Larsen ever question you about your reports to Yenan?

A. No. I believe that this luncheon meeting—the occasion when we happened to meet—was some days after I had seen Jaffe with Larsen in the Statler Hotel, in the lobby, and I have a vague recollection of mentioning the fact that I had seen him with Jaffe and his dropping the subject and not pursuing it. I said something about "I didn't realize you were a friend of Jaffe's," or something of that sort, and getting a very negative response from him.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did he indicate any particular knowledge of your reports—the substance of them?

A. No; we never had any discussion of them that I recall.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have occasion in the Department to discuss your reports with Larsen?

A. Never, sir. And, incidentally, the statement which he makes in the Hobbs committee testimony, that I attended several meetings of his group, is completely untrue; I never attended any meetings of any group, and I think that he verified that point here the other day. He said the only meetings he knew I attended were meetings of the whole staff of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs.

Mr. ACHILLES. Julian Friedman had been mentioned once or twice. Was he in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs at that time?

A. Specifically, he was in the Division of Chinese Affairs.

Mr. ACHILLES. Could you tell us how well you knew him or how much you saw of him?

A. I knew him very slightly. I don't remember having any contact with him outside of the office, although I may have gone out to lunch with him. We often did go out with associates.

Mr. ACHILLES. You did not, therefore, know him personally other than casual contact in the office?

A. That's right. I don't remember his being present at any of these parties or social functions that I have attended.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did he indicate any particular knowledge of the substance of your reports?

A. Yes; a great deal. He was working with them and he was very much interested in discussing a number of them. He wrote a great many of these memoranda summarizing them.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did he indicate any particular political views of his own?

A. Well, in this sort of context, sir, one doesn't discuss very much except China. I don't have any idea of what his political views were with relation to the United States or Europe. Certainly, with regard to China, he took the same general view that I did. He was a person of a great deal of enthusiasm and perhaps likely to go to extremes. He used to follow the practice, for instance, of putting the word "Communist" in quotes, something which I never did. I don't think that is significant, but I think it is perhaps typical. Referring to the Chinese Communists.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did he have any Communist sympathies himself?

A. I don't remember any discussions that would disclose that. He was a friend of Andy Roth's.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was he also a friend of Jaffe's?

A. I am not positive of this point, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. I believe that earlier in your statement in connection with your consultation in the fall of 1944 you mentioned being asked to talk to various other Government officials outside the Department, one of whom was Dr. Currie. Was that Dr. Lauchlin Currie?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Could you tell us what you discussed with Dr. Currie then?

A. No; I can't recall any specific content of the conversation at that time.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall whether you saw him again in 1945 or not?

A. Yes, I did.

Mr. ACHILLES. Once or more than once?

A. I believe more than once, sir. I knew him officially. I had known him since the beginning of 1943.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have any particular discussions with him or was your contact with him purely social?

A. My guess is that I probably saw him more than once—perhaps twice or three times—in the office. I remember going out to his home on one occasion. I took a cab. I remember it was a terrible place to get to. I don't think I had as much contact with Dr. Currie in 1945 as I did earlier, because he wasn't primarily concerned with Chinese affairs in the late period in the war. In fact, he was just leaving or coming back from a trip to Switzerland in 1945.

Mr. ACHILLES. As far as you can recall, he wasn't particularly interested in China when you saw him in 1945?

A. That is correct, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. You also mentioned talking to Harry Hopkins in 1944. Could you tell us the circumstances of your conversation or conversations with him?

A. Hopkins' office called up and asked if I could come over. I, of course, did so, had about a 45-minute conversation with him almost entirely about my trip to the Communist areas. This, of course, was in 1944, when I had just returned. I went into complete details for him. He was interested in our impressions and views as to their program, probable strength.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you see him again in the spring of 1945?

A. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. ACHILLES. And in your statement you also mentioned talking to Harry White in 1944. Can you tell us about your conversation or conversations with him?

A. Yes. He asked me to come over. I was somewhat surprised. I never met him before. It was the time, as I recall, when we were having very, very serious difficulties with the Chinese Government with making any arrangements on exchange rates for financing our expenditures over there. In the early part of the war they had insisted on a very artificial exchange rate of 20 Chinese dollars to one United States dollar, which was absolutely impossible. They had no reverse lend-lease arrangements and it was becoming so expensive that it was very hard for us to justify. Later we made an agreement to renegotiate every 3 months, but there were a good many continuing frictions. Dean Acheson's brother, Edward Acheson, had been out there for a while as a sort of financial adviser to headquarters. We had a Treasury attaché out there, and there was, as I say, a continuing difficulty in negotiations over this financial problem. On this occasion when Mr. White asked me to come over, he was apparently at the end of his patience and he expressed himself very strongly on the Chinese attitude of lack of cooperativeness, wanting my opinion of why we shouldn't discontinue financial aid. I went into considerable detail. You can't drop an ally during the middle of a war. As uncooperative as they may have been, we must continue. He seemed to expect a more forceful answer from me. I think he was disappointed because I disagreed with him. I don't know.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did he suggest discontinuing lend-lease aid or just financial aid?

A. Just financial aid. We were paying the Chinese Government at that time something like $25,000,000 a month to reimburse them for expenditures which they were making for us for feeding troops and things like that—building airfields and building barracks—and I think his idea was that the Chinese should do that and pay for it themselves and we should stop paying them for it. I don't recall that he had any suggestions of drastically stopping aid.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you see him in the spring of 1945?

A. No, sir; I only recall seeing him that once, which must have been 1944.

Q. Returning to Mr. Larsen, you may recall that Mr. Larsen testified here the other day that Isaac Dow Levine had told him what purported to be an account of your testimony before the grand jury, and in particular told him that you testified before the grand jury from some list, indicating that a document which you had shown to Jaffe had been declassified by a person by the name of Taylor.—A. Just a minute, sir. He didn't say that I had testified that.

Q. You were out of the room. Well, I'll tell you that Mr. Larsen so testified. I will also tell you that he testified further that Mr. Levine advised him that before the grand jury you testified that Mr. Larsen is the probable source of the documents found in Mr. Jaffe's possession. I will now ask you whether you did give such testimony before the grand jury?—A. I gave no testimony, sir, regarding declassification of documents by George Taylor, because I had no knowledge of them. With regard to the second part, I was asked by the FBI, by the Department of Justice, and, if I recollect correctly, by the grand jury or the prosecutor at the time of the grand jury hearing if I knew how Mr. Jaffe had received these documents, and I said I did not know—I mean for my sake, but I was unable to say that Mr. Larsen or anyone else had. Now they did ask me, I believe—of course, I have not seen my testimony there—I believe they asked me whether some of these documents particularly the ones that were shown to me—whether they would have been available or accessible to Mr. Larsen. I believe I answered that I assumed that in connection with his work he would have had some accessibility to them. I said that I could not say that he or any other particular person had given. That is the best of my recollection, sir.

Q. Now, turning to Mr. Bisson, you testified that in your earlier meetings with Mr. Bisson—your first meeting with him in Peking in 1937, and your next meeting with him at the luncheon on May 19—A. No, sir; the next meeting was the IPR.

Q. Yes.—A. On April 25, 1945. The next meeting after that was the luncheon on May 19.

Q. Yes. Will you describe to the Board what subsequent contacts you had with Mr. Bisson?—A. Late in 1945 I was in Tokyo as a member of the staff of the United States political adviser when the United States Strategic Bomb Survey Group arrived in Japan. This was a large group of experts, civilian and military, covering a great many fields, to make a detailed analysis of the effects of our bombing campaign against Japan, not only the physical effects, but the effects on the whole economy, morale, health, and so on. Bisson was a member of that group—the Strategic Bombing Survey—and I recall meeting him only once during that stay there. There were a number of, you might say, far-eastern experts assembled in Tokyo at that time. There was the Pauley Reparations Mission, of which Lattimore was a member, and several other people whom I had known previously. There was also the predecessor to the Far Eastern Commission—at that time it was called the Far Eastern Advisory Commission—which also contained a number of research people—old-time research people in the far-eastern field. And at somebody's suggestion we had a sort of get-together evening, at which I would say there were a dozen or fifteen of these people, all of whom had known each other earlier. Many of them had been connected with the IPR. There was an international group. There were several New Zealanders, several Americans, and Bisson was present at that evening. I don't recall any other meeting with him until perhaps March or April of 1946. He left Tokyo. As a matter of fact, he was billeted in an entirely different building and his officers were in an entirely different building. We had no physical chance for contact, really, during that first visit.

In April 1946, he returned to Tokyo as a civilian employee of the Government section of SCAP, and I believe that I happened to meet him just at the time of his arrival when he was checking in at headquarters. It was a purely accidental meeting. He was being assigned to a new billet, he didn't know where it was, and I volunteered to take him around to it. I took him there and saw him to his quarters and left him. To my recollection, that's the last contact I had with Bisson. We never corresponded with each other and never had any real friendship or intimacy at all.

Q. Now I would like to introduce document 39-6 into the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

“DOCUMENT No. 39-6

“(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950—Remarks of Senator McCarthy, p. 4438)

“He [Service] was a friend and associate of Frederick Vanderbilt Field, the Communist chairman of the editorial board of the infamous Amerasia.”

The CHAIRMAN. We might have a short recess.

(Whereupon, a short recess was taken.)

Q. Now, with reference to this statement by Senator McCarthy that you were a friend and associate of Frederick Vanderbilt Field, do you care to make any comment on that statement, Mr. Service?—A. I believe I have already testified that I have never met Mr. Field; never had any contact or association with him in any way.

Mr. ACHILLES. Never corresponded with him?

A. Never corresponded with him or, as far as I know, attended a meeting where he was present.

Q. Do you know Mr. E. C. Carter?—A. Slightly.

Q. Will you tell the Board who he is and what the extent of your association with him has been.—A. I am not sure of what his actual title was. I believe that it was probably something like executive secretary of the International Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, or it may have been executive secretary of the American Council. At any rate, he was an influential administrative connection with the IPR. Well, I have known him so vaguely and so little that it is hard to detail the few times I have seen him actually. My first clear recollection of meeting him was sometime in Chungking, possibly in the summer of 1941 or 1942. We made a trip to China, I believe, in company with a Mr. William Holland, who was also working with the IPR, and as I remember the circumstances, Mr. Carter made a call on the American Embassy. At that time I think the Embassy was on the south bank of the Yangtze River, across the city from Chungking. And after lunch—at any rate, after his call—Mr. Carter was returning to the city to call on some Chinese officials, and I was also going to the city, so I took him along—I provided transportation for him, which was a very difficult problem in Chungking. I wasn't with him on his calls. I simply provided transportation to whichever government office he was going. The next time I saw him was in late 1944, probably November. I visited New York and called on a very old friend of mine, a former Foreign Service officer named Lawrence Salisbury, who was at that time working part time with the IPR and editing their biweekly magazine called Far Eastern Survey.

During that call on Mr. Salisbury, I have a vague recollection of being shown around the office, stopping for a moment in Mr. Carter's office just to shake his hand and say "How do you do." We had no conversation beyond the social amenities. In April 1945, after I returned to Washington—quite soon after my return—I received a brief note from the IPR, signed by Mr. Carter, asking whether I would be able to give one of these off-the-record background talks to their research staff in New York. I discussed the matter, as I have testified here before, with the acting head of the Office of Far-Eastern Affairs, he approved my acceptance, I made a very brief reply to Mr. Carter accepting his invitation, and eventually saw him when I visited New York to give the talk—to have the meeting, rather. I don't believe that he attended this meeting of the research staff, but that I saw him either before or just afterward for a few minutes. He had some discussion with me about paying my expenses. I think he said that they did not usually pay any fee, which I understood and did not expect, but they would be willing to pay my actual out-of-pocket expenses. As I remember it, I told him I was staying with a friend—I had a bed with Gayn—I was having most of my meals with friends, and the only expense that I had incurred was the railway fare, and I think that he gave me a check to cover the railway fare. All that is rather indistinct memory, but I do seem to recall such a transaction. I have never seen Mr. Carter since that day in April 1945, as far as I know, nor have I had any other contact with him.

Q. Now turning to the subject of inquiry this morning, with particular reference to the morning of April 20, 1945, I believe you testified that to the best of your recollection you did not, as the report of the FBI surveillance indicates, according to the testimony of Mr. Gurnea before the Hobbs committee—that you did not spend the entire morning with Mr. Jaffe. That was your testimony.—A. That is correct.

Q. I should like to ask the Board whether it has any information available to it as to what may have occurred at that time which might be used to refresh the recollection of this witness, who has testified that he simply has no recollection that will substantiate this assertion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board has no information as to what went on.

Mr. ACHILLES. There is clearly such a difference between spending 10 or 15 minutes with Jaffe before Roth's arrival for lunch, and spending the time from 9:30 until 12 o'clock or slightly thereafter, that I should think you would be able to recall in somewhat vague detail how that time was spent if you were there.

A. Well, I'm positive, sir, that I wasn't there, but I can't prove that I wasn't there by showing what else I was doing on that particular morning.

Q. I believe you testified that it may be that you did go by there at some earlier point in the morning.—A. I believe that that is correct.

Q. I believe you indicated that that possibility might well be the fact because of your recollection that you had supplied these memoranda to Mr. Jaffe on one occasion and expected to pick them up on the occasion of the luncheon.—A. The next immediate occasion, yes.

Q. So that I take it from your testimony this morning that you think it quite possible that you did in fact go there earlier in the morning—that is, well before the time you were there for lunch; is that correct?—A. Yes, I think it very likely that that is what actually happened.

Mr. ACHILLES. And yet neither in your statement to the FBI in 1945 nor in your statement for these hearings did you mention seeing Jaffe on that day except going to lunch with him.

A. There was, shall we say, nothing in my mind at the time unusual or exceptional about these contacts which would have impressed them firmly on my mind. It would be very hard for me to say now what I was doing 6 or 7 weeks ago. Now, frankly, as I have said here, I was very dependent on the notes that the FBI had as to dates, and I have no recollection of the FBI agent who was interrogating me saying, "Well, did you go there early in the morning?" If he had, I might have refreshed my memory and I could have confirmed the exact fact. But I do recollect strongly my disappointment and annoyance when Jaffe said well, he hadn't had a chance to read them and couldn't he keep them and take them with him; he had to go back that afternoon. Now in trying to reconstruct the events during the past few weeks, my basis for recollection has been chiefly the statements I gave to the FBI when my recollection was relatively fresh, in 1945.

Q. You do not recall the FBI questioning you about any discussion with Jaffe during that morning?—A. No, sir. And if the FBI had the dates and times down there, I don't remember any argument at all. They actually supplied all of these dates, I think.

Q. By "all of these dates" you mean the dates used in your statement?—A. Yes. I'm positive that I never spent any such length of time. I have no recollection of any such lengthy conversation with Mr. Jaffe, and I do have some memory of my disappointment at the lunch that he had not read them and that he wasn't willing to return them then.

Mr. ACHILLES. Even after this questioning may have refreshed your memory, you are still positive that you had no such protracted conversation with him on that day?

A. That is correct; to the best of my recollection, I had no protracted conversation with him on that day.

Mr. ACHILLES. Again on the basis of refreshed recollection, can you recall going there at 9:30 in the morning briefly and leaving the hotel and returning for lunch?

A. No, I can't say that I have a definite recollection. My memory is that the conversation regarding the papers was very brief and more or less explanatory; that there wasn't and sitting down and reading them over and discussing them in detail.

Mr. ACHILLES. And still to the best of your recollection, it took only about 10 or 15 minutes going over the reports before Roth arrived?

A. Well, we didn't really go over them, sir, because he said well, he hadn't read them, he had been doing something else. I don't recall the details of the discussion, of course.

Mr. ACHILLES. He did say that he had not had time to read them?

A. That is my recollection, yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. Wouldn't that indicate that you probably had given them to him at an earlier time?

A. Yes, absolutely.

Mr. ACHILLES. And you testified that you had not given them to him the night before, except the one?

A. That is correct. I think it very likely, with the impression in my memory here, that what actually occurred was that I went to the office, selected the papers which I thought he would like to see, went to the hotel, left them with him, expecting that he would spend that morning perusing them and that I would pick them up at lunch. I arrived at lunch—he's a very bland and pleasant fellow; he was very sorry, he had done something or other, he hadn't had a chance to read them, he had read one or two, and couldn't he keep them a little while longer.

Mr. STEVENS. Are you rationalizing this, or do you remember?

A. As I said this morning, I have been puzzled ever since I saw my statement, which was only within the last few weeks.

Q. Are you referring to the statement you gave the FBI?—A. Yes. I have been puzzled because I have a memory that I had expected Jaffe to have returned those and to have returned those to me at the lunch, and I was disappointed that he had not read them and was unwilling to return them. Therefore, I must have given them to him at an earlier time, but my statement to the FBI does not mention any earlier time, and that is one point that has bothered me.

Q. Is it a fair statement, therefore, that you presently accept the hypothesis that you may have called on him earlier because it squares with your recollection that you expected to get them back at lunch time?—A. That is correct.

Q. But that that is not your present recollection of that event in the past?—A. That is correct. I did not give these papers, did not intend to loan them to him for him to take away; it was my expectation that he would look them over hurriedly while he was there—while he was at the hotel here in Washington. I had no expectation when I agreed to let him see them that he would take them away to New York.

Mr. ACHILLES. I am not trying to plant anything in your testimony, but merely trying to refresh your recollection on this point. Do you recall, if you saw Jaffe earlier in the morning, his saying anything to the effect that he would not then have time to read them, would you leave them with him in the morning and he would give them back at lunch time, or anything to that effect?

A. Well, that is the general impression that I have had—that he wished to read them for a short while; he wasn't able to read them and return them to me on the spot, because, after all, eight or ten reports would be quite a bit of reading. It was my expectation that they would be returned to me later in the day when I saw him again.

Q. If I may say so, sir, in terms of the precise question you have just asked, I understand it that is what his testimony has been; that that is why the hypothesis that he was there before the luncheon meeting makes sense to him. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. ACHILLES. But regardless of what time you actually gave the copies to Jaffe, you were anticipating that because of the length of the material it would be necessary to leave them with him rather than just to go over them with him?

A. Yes, I expected to leave them with him for a short while. I didn't expect to sit there beside him, and I think it highly unlikely that I had had the whole morning free, because I was fairly busy; I was meeting a good many engagements.

Mr. ACHILLES. You have no recollection whatever of anything else that you might have done that morning?

A. Nothing that I can pin to April 20, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. It was a fairly significant date—the day after you met Jaffe and the date that you did make available these reports to him.

A. If I had known at the time what the after effects would be, why the date might have been marked; but by the time it was marked in my memory, it was too late for me to remember the details.

Q. Can you recall, Mr. Service, what you did on the morning of April 20, 1950?—A. I don't have the slightest idea, sir.

Q. April 20, 1950, is almost exactly as many days ago as April 20, 1945, was prior to your arrest, is it not, this being June 5, 1950?—A. Yes.

Q. I'm serious in my question. I wish you would try to recall what you did on April 20, 1950.—A. No, sir, I don't remember. I wouldn't have any way of checking to find out what I was doing on that day.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the memory of events, as to a specific date, has to be tied to some specific event in order to be remembered. If you had done anything on May 20 last, you would remember it if there had been anything special—any special event like, for instance, occurred at this particular time you testified on.

Q. I suggest to you, as a matter of outlook, that the witness' testimony has been that at the time the event occurred it wasn't an event of special significance; it only assumed significance after June 6, 1945.—A. I might say that I talked to the FBI agents there. Well, the arrest took place about 6 p. m., I think, and we must have talked until about 2 a. m. I don't recall any issues or discussion over this particular point as to whether I had spent the whole morning or a long period with Mr. Jaffe; and I submit that if we had gone over the reports together and had read them all and discussed each one, I would have a much better recollection of what reports I gave him; because if I were allowing a man to see something for background information, I wouldn't normally sit down and go over it with him line by line and point by point; I assume that he can read it and digest it; let him do it.

Q. I should like at this point to introduce into the transcript Document 39-14. (The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT 39-14

"(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950, remarks of Senator McCarthy, p. 4439)

* * * * This committee report indicates that a number of the members of the grand jury voted for the indictment of Service and Mitchell on the espionage charges, but that the required number of 12 did not so vote."

Q. And I should like to read to the Board a short excerpt from the Hobbs committee report, which is set forth in document 100. It appears particularly on page 7534, column one, of the Congressional Record for the date involved in Document 100:

"After the second grand jury had heard all of the oral evidence for or against all six of the defendants and considered all of the documentary evidence, fewer than half of the required 12 voted for the indictment of any one of the three, Mitchell, Gayn, and Service. * * *"

At this point I should like to refer to Document 324, which has already been introduced into the record. This is the testimony of Mr. Hitchcock, who was

The prosecuting attorney in charge of the Amerasia case, and this is the testimony Mr. Hitchcock gave before the Tydings subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on May 26, 1950. I quote from page 4 of Document 324:

"Service signed a waiver of immunity and testified before the second grand jury early in August, and he was no billed unanimously."

The Board will readily perceive I offer this as refutation of the charge by Senator McCarthy that some of the grand jurors at least voted for the indictment of Mr. Service. Now after your voluntary appearance before the grand jury and the grand jury's unanimous return of a no true bill against you, Mr. Service, you returned to active duty in the Foreign Service? A. That is correct, Sir.

Q. Now did you at that time receive a letter from Secretary Byrnes?—A. Yes, I was returned to active duty on August 12, 1945, and I believe that Secretary Byrnes' letter was dated August 14, 1945.

Q. I should like at this point to introduce into the transcript as Document 36-A a copy of the letter, dated August 14, 1945, addressed to John S. Service, Esq., and signed by James F. Byrnes. I do not have the original of this letter—Mr. Service has it among his personal effects somewhere—but this copy appeared in the hearings before the Subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations in the Eighty-first Congress, on pages 297-298.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be admitted.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT NO. 36-A SECRETARY OF STATE JAMES F. BYRNES' LETTER TO SERVICE, DATED AUGUST 14, 1945

(Excerpts from hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, 81st Cong., State Department appropriation bill, 1950, pp. 297-298)

"AUGUST 14, 1945.

"JOHN S. SERVICE, Esq.,

*American Foreign Service Officer,
Department of State, Washington 25, D. C.*

"MY DEAR MR. SERVICE: I am advised that the grand jury, after hearing the testimony of witnesses, has found nothing to warrant an indictment against you.

"One of the fundamentals of our democratic system is the investigation by a grand jury of criminal charges. By that process you have been cleared.

"I am advised that at the time of your arrest you were placed on leave of absence with pay. I am happy to approve the recommendation of the personnel board that you be returned to active duty. You have now been reassigned to duty in the Department for important work in connection with far eastern affairs.

"I congratulate you on this happy termination of your ordeal and predict for you a continuance of the splendid record I am advised you have maintained since first you entered the Foreign Service.

"With all good wishes,

"Sincerely yours,

"JAMES F. BYRNES."

Q. Did you also at that time, Mr. Service, receive a letter from Under Secretary Joseph C. Grew?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. I should like to introduce into the transcript at this point a copy of a letter, dated August 14, addressed to John S. Service, Esq., and signed by Joseph C. Grew. This letter also appears in the same hearings of the House Appropriations Subcommittee.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT NO. 36 B JOSEPH C. GREW LETTER TO SERVICE DATED AUGUST 14, 1945

"(Excerpt from hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives—81st Cong., State Department appropriation bill, 1950, p. 298)

"AUGUST 14, 1945.

"JOHN S. SERVICE, Esq.,

*American Foreign Service Officer,
Department of State, Washington 25, D. C.*

"DEAR SERVICE: The Secretary has just told me of the letter he has written you expressing his pleasure at your complete vindication. I just want to add a personal word of my own.

"When I learned, only a few days before your arrest, that your name had been coupled with thefts of official documents I was inexpressibly shocked. Having known you for some time and of the high caliber of your work I could not believe that you could be implicated in such an affair. As the Secretary has stated, you have been completely cleared of any such imputation by operation of our democratic machinery of investigation and law enforcement.

"I am particularly pleased that you are returning to duty in the field of your specialization, far eastern affairs, where you have established an enviable record for integrity and ability.

"With all good wishes,

"Sincerely yours,

"JOSEPH C. GREW."

A. No, we never had any discussion of them that I recall.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have occasion in the Department to discuss your reports with Larsen?

A. Never, sir. And, incidentally, the statement which he makes in the Hobbs committee testimony, that I attended several meetings of his group, is completely untrue: I never attended any meetings of any group, and I think that he verified that point here the other day. He said the only meetings he knew I attended were meetings of the whole staff of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs.

Mr. ACHILLES. Julian Friedman had been mentioned once or twice. Was he in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs at that time?

A. Specifically, he was in the Division of Chinese Affairs.

Mr. ACHILLES. Could you tell us how well you knew him or how much you saw of him?

A. I knew him very slightly. I don't remember having any contact with him outside of the office, although I may have gone out to lunch with him. We often did go out with associates.

Mr. ACHILLES. You did not, therefore, know him personally other than casual contact in the office?

Q. Now I would like at this point to introduce Document 39-12 and to refer also to Document 39-17, which has already been introduced into the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 39-12

"(Congressional Record, Thursday, March 30, 1950, remarks of Senator McCarthy, p. 4439)

"Under Secretary Joseph C. Grew very urgently insisted upon a prosecution of the six individuals who were picked up by the FBI on charges of conspiracy to commit espionage. He thereupon immediately became a target in a campaign of vilification as the culprit in the case rather than the six who had been picked up by the FBI."

Q. I should like to, in connection with these two documents—39-12 and 39-17—I should like to ask you, Mr. Service, whether you have made any further inquiries from Mr. Grew concerning these charges by Senator McCarthy.—A. I have.

Q. In what form did you make those inquiries?—A. I made them by letter. He was out of the country at the time—in May, I think, of 1950.

Q. I show you Document 52-A and ask you if this is a copy of the letter which you sent to Mr. Grew.—A. This is. I notice it is dated April 13. My recollection was incorrect when I said it was in May.

Q. I ask that there be included in the transcript Document 52-A, which is a two-page letter dated April 13, 1950, addressed to the Honorable Joseph C. Grew, signed "John S. Service."

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so included.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 52-A

5700 BROAD BRANCH ROAD NW.,
Washington 15, D. C., April 13, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. GREW: After the Grand Jury in August 1945 cleared me of implication in the Amerasia case, I was deeply appreciative of a letter which you wrote me in which, as you will recall, you stated in part:

"When I learned, only a few days before your arrest, that your name had been coupled with thefts of official documents I was inexpressibly shocked. Having known you for some time and of the high caliber of your work, I could not believe that you could be implicated in such an affair. As the Secretary has stated, you have been completely cleared of any such imputation by operation of our democratic machinery of investigation and law enforcement."

There is nothing I dislike more than having to refer to this whole unhappy episode. However, Senator McCarthy, in his charges against me on the floor of the Senate and before the Special Subcommittee investigating his charges, has repeatedly linked your name with the case in a manner which I know is wholly incorrect. For instance, on the floor of the Senate on February 20, 1950, Senator McCarthy said:

"Later this man, John Service, was picked up by the Federal Bureau of Investigation for turning over to the Communists secret State Department information. Strangely, however, he was never prosecuted. However, Joseph Grew, the Under Secretary of State, who insisted on his prosecution, was forced to resign. Two days after Grew's successor, Dean Acheson, took over as Under Secretary of State, this man, John Service, who had been picked up by the FBI and who had previously urged that communism was the best hope of China, was not only reinstated in the State Department but promoted."

Variations of this statement, all to the effect that you insisted on my prosecution, have been repeated by Senator McCarthy on several occasions.

In view of what has been brought to light concerning the case, it is obvious that the duties of your position required you to approve having the fullest investigation and prosecution of those guilty. I cannot believe however, that prior to the completion of the investigation and Grand Jury action you could have insisted specifically on my prosecution. Certainly you could not have insisted on such prosecution after the Grand Jury action in returning a no true bill.

I realize that you have already, in a general way, refuted these false statements by your letter to me of August 14, 1945, which I have referred to above. However, in view of the continuing and irresponsible statements of such persons as Senator McCarthy, it would be of very great help to me and, I believe, also to the Department of State if you would be good enough to inform me that there is no basis for the statement that you at any time insisted on my prosecution.

If you feel in a position to give me any statement, I would like to use it in presenting my case to the Department's Loyalty Security Board, which has called me for a hearing on charges largely arising out of those made by Senator McCarthy. I would also like to use it in a possible hearing before the Senate Subcommittee, but, of course, will not do so unless you approve.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN S. SERVICE.

Q. And did you receive an answer to this letter, Mr. Service?—A. I did.

Q. I show you Document 52-B and ask you whether this is the letter which you received in answer to document 52-A.—A. It is.

Q. I show to the Board the original of this letter, signed by Mr. Grew, as well as a copy thereof, and ask permission to introduce into the transcript at this point Document 52-B, which is a copy of the letter signed by Mr. Grew.

Mr. STEVENS. We have made a comparison with the original.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 52-B

BEAU RIVAGE, PALACE,
Ouchy-Lausanne, Switzerland, April 17, 1950.

Mr. JOHN S. SERVICE,

5700 Broad Branch Road NW.,
Washington 15, D. C.

DEAR Mr. SERVICE: Your letter of April 13 has this moment reached me and I hasten to reply without delay.

My letter to you in August 1945, and that of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, after the Grand Jury had cleared you in the Amerasia case, should be sufficient to clarify your position at that time and to substantiate the fact that you had been completely cleared, by due process of law, of the charges against you. My recollection is that I further stated that you would be reinstated in the Foreign Service without any implication of an adverse nature against your fine record, although I have not now the text of that letter before me other than the part you have quote. That is the way democracy works.

There are inaccuracies in the public statements quoted in your letter.

I did not "insist on your prosecution" apart from that of the other five persons involved. Having been informed as Acting Secretary of State by supposedly reliable authority that an agency of our Government had what it considered complete evidence of guilt, I quite properly ordered the arrests, which of course presumed prosecution. I did not at that time know the names of the persons involved, including yours, and I did not wish to know them until the order had been carried out, for justice must not discriminate. When I learned that you, who stood so well in the Foreign Service, were one of those charged with the theft of official documents, I was, as I later wrote you, inexpressibly shocked. It was a great relief to me when you were cleared by the Grand Jury, and a great satisfaction to see you reinstated in the Foreign Service with no stigma whatever on your record.

I was not "formed to resign" as Under Secretary of State. Myths about this have arisen. For some time I had wished to retire. The war was then over; I had completed 41 years of service; I had passed the usual age limit; and I was at that time in ill health and was facing a possible major operation. It was therefore entirely on my own initiative that I insisted on retiring, even though Secretary Byrnes strongly urged me to continue in service.

Those are the facts, and you may use this letter in any way you wish.

With the best of wishes to you,

Very sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. GREW.

Q. I may say to the Board that I introduced this exchange of correspondence between Mr. Service and Mr. Grew to indicate that Senator McCarthy's charges in this respect are wholly without foundation. Have you recently been interrogated by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Mr. Service?—A. Yes; two agents called on me several weeks ago.

Q. And in the course of that interview did they—

Mr. ACHILLES. Could you describe more specifically the approximate times?

A. On which they called on me?

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes.

A. I would say the latter part of April, sir, but that's just a guess. Mr. Rhett informs me that it was just after his baby was born, which means that it was after May 8—perhaps about May 10 or 12.

Q. In the course of that interview were you questioned about your possible membership in or affiliation with an organization known as the International Workers Order?—A. Yes; I was.

Q. Will you describe the interview that you had on this point?—A. Well, the agent who mentioned it the first time used only the initials IWO and wanted to know whether I had at any time been affiliated with the organization. I had to ask him what IWO meant. I had never heard of it before. When he told me it was the International Workers Order, I still said I had never heard of it before, had no knowledge of it, and to my knowledge had never signed any subscription list or had in any way been affiliated with it at all.

Q. Did these agents indicate to you that they had information indicating that someone by the name of John Service had been a member of the IWO?—A. They did. I said, "Well, it must be some other John Service; it could not be me."

Q. I have no further questions relating to the Amerasia phase of this case.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. I believe you referred this morning to a doctor who was with the Communist forces in China, possibly of American origin, named Ma Hai-teh.—A. Yes.

Q. When you returned to the United States in April, did you bring anyone in the United States any communication of any kind from him? April of 1945.—

A. I have a vague recollection of Dr. Ma, and I think that this would have been in 1944, asking me to drop a note to his parents, with whom he had not communicated for years—they lived in some small town in South Carolina or North Carolina—just to say that he was well and we had seen him, and so on. I don't have any recollection of bringing any mail or communication, although I am sure that if I did it would have been censored.

Q. Do you know if Dr. Ma had a brother in the United States at that time?—A. Yes; I think he did.

Q. Do you remember his name?—A. Well, Ma's name originally was Hatim, perhaps.

Mr. RHETT: Do you know how to spell it?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever meet his brother?—A. Yes; I think I did. His brother must have been going through Washington and looked me up. I do have a vague recollection of his brother looking me up to talk about his brother out in China.

Q. Was his brother in the Armed Forces; do you recall?—A. I think so. I think he was. I can't remember where this meeting took place. It must have been here in Washington, I think.

Q. But you, to the best of your knowledge, did not bring any packages or communications of any kind from Dr. Ma to his brother?—A. All I can say is that if I did it would have been censored. I seem to remember bringing back a letter with photographs of Ma and his Chinese wife and little Chinese child. Now, the only way I would know the letter contained photographs would have been through censoring and inspection. But I do think that I did have his request to do something like that.

Q. When he gave you the letter, if there was such a letter, was it sealed or unsealed?—A. No; it would have been unsealed, I am quite sure. You see, there was no mail service out of Yen-an, and the Army planes were the only channel or the only facilities for contact with the outside world, really, and the Army permitted us—permitted the plane to go back and forth, and we carried with us for the Communist people in Yen-an, but it was all done on the basis of their delivering an open communication to us. It was Colonel Barrett in the early days who would have been the final censoring and approving authority.

Q. You say that any letters you may have had to Dr. Ma's brother were censored. Was that in Chungking or in the United States?—A. Well, I would say they were censored at the source there in Yen-an.

Q. Who would that have been done by?—A. Generally by the commanding officer. In 1944 it was Barrett. I think in 1945 it was Lieutenant Jones, who happened to be the senior officer when I was there in 1945.

Q. You stated that you may have brought such a letter. Can you recall in fact whether you did or did not?—A. Well, with this refreshing of my memory, I do remember meeting the brother, and I have a vague recollection of his showing me, and he was looking at these pictures, but I have no very clear recollection of the whole episode or of the details.

Q. Do you recall ever having seen the brother subsequent to that one occasion?—A. No; I don't believe I ever have. Wasn't his brother a doctor?

Q. I don't know.—A. He was a doctor or a medical corpsman or something like that.

Q. The information in the possession of the Board indicates that there was a person named Corp. Joseph M. Hatem. Is that the person?—A. That's probably it.

Q. If you did bring him a letter, have you any recollection as to whether it was a correspondence-size envelope or a package or larger envelope of any kind?—A. No; I don't.

Q. That is all.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Service, in the course of your testimony I think you stated that these personal copies of your reports were limited to one of each report. I note that the FBI appear to have seized and returned to you two copies of some of the reports. I refer to Report No. 13, dated March 16, 1945; No. 15, dated March 16, 1945; No. 16, dated March 17, 1945, No. 17 also dated March 17, 1945; No. 20, dated March 20, 1945; No. 21, dated March 21, 1945; No. 22, dated March 22, 1945; and No. 26, dated April 1, 1945. With the sole exception of Report No. 17, which I have just referred to, in which case there were three copies, I also note that there appear to have been two copies of report No. 26, dated September 10, 1944. I wonder if you would like to comment on that fact.—A. I believe, sir, that the explanation is that, whereas I had previously been in the practice of sending a copy of all these reports to Mr. Davies, that practice was discontinued after I left Chungking, in early March 1945, and went to Yen-an. I have a record of having transmitted to Mr. Davies his copy of my reports through March 6, 1945. I have no record of sending to him the later copies which I had intended for him at the time of writing.

Q. Then that would account for your having not only your own copy but the copy you made for him.—A. That's right. It does not account for there being three copies of that Report No. 17. That's inexplicable. I don't know why that might have been.

Q. No further questions on this subject.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. The one that was prepared in 1944, I take it you have no recollection as to why that may be either.—A. No, sir, I don't. I don't know why I just happened to have an extra copy of that one.

Q. I would like to ask one additional question. This morning, when you told us about Mr. Jaffe's suggestion that you might be interested in taking over the magazine editing, did he ever in any subsequent discussion with you raise that matter again?—A. No, I don't recall that he did, because I gave him a very definite reply—negative reply. I was asked by a number of people during that period if I would be interested in a job of one sort or another. There were two newspapers who indicated an interest in having me work for them. I had at least two publishing firms approach me to see if I wouldn't write a book, and my answers were negative in all cases.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be all on that subject. You may proceed. We will adjourn promptly at 5 tonight.

Mr. ACHILLES. Is my understanding correct that we have not finished this stage in the hearings on the Amerasia case? We are still on that.

Mr. RHETTS. I'm finished, as far as I'm concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board has two witnesses that we would like to have on this phase of the question, but they won't be available until tomorrow; but otherwise, I understand this phase is finished.

Mr. STEVENS. I have one last question for this afternoon. When you were giving your briefing sessions here in Washington to various Government agencies and some correspondents you may have referred to, were you ever informed, directly or indirectly, from what we now know as SA-M here as to the type of information that was given to newspaper people in the United States or were you following the practice as you knew it to exist at the time you were abroad?

A. I never had any instructions on briefing from SA-M or any other office in the Department of State on that question. I was following the practice which I had followed in the field, which I was acquainted with while working for the Army.

Mr. RHETTS. In view of the fact that it is 10 until 5 now, Mr. Chairman, I would just as soon suggest that we recess 10 minutes early, since, so far as I am concerned, we should turn next to the Japanese phase of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. ACHILLES. I still have a few more questions on this phase of the case, but I would be glad to let them go.

Mr. RHETTS. It is entirely all right.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, tomorrow at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 5 p. m., the hearing was adjourned, to resume at 10 a. m., June 6, 1950.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: June 6, 1950, 10:10 a. m. to 12:40 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building.

Reporter: Edna C. Moyer.

Members of the Board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Charles Edward Rhettts, Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 10 a. m. to hear continuation of testimony by Mr. John S. Service.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Board will come to order. I think the first thing on the docket this morning is some questions you had in mind.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes, but I would prefer to have them at a later point.

The CHAIRMAN. Then we will proceed by the introduction of photostats of certain documents that were found by the FBI in 1945 in Mr. Service's possession, as to which the Board would like some elucidation. I will say that for the record Mr. Service has had copies of these documents overnight, so that I would like now at this time to ask for the explanation, such explanation as he desires to give. I will take these documents in chronological order.

Mr. RHETTS. I wonder, General, should we number them so that we can talk about them?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; would you like to introduce them into your numbering system?

Mr. MORELAND. Our numbering system. The first one will be B-53.

The CHAIRMAN. B-53 will be the document dated March 7, 1945; B-54 the document dated March 31, 1945; B-55 the document dated April 2, 1945; B-56 the document dated April 16, 1945; B-57, the document dated April 19, 1945—

Mr. RHETTS. Just 1 second—56 is two things here.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it? Two papers in B-56; B-57 is the document dated April 19, 1945; B-58 is the document dated May 14, 1945.

Referring then to B-53, it appears to be a photostat of a letter dated March 7, 1945, signed "Max" with a typed signature, "Max Knight." This letter refers to a chance to see Mr. Service's reports in some office.

Will you—

Mr. RHETTS. Might the letter, General, be introduced into the transcript?

The CHAIRMAN. If you desire—well, all of these, if you desire. I see no objection to it. Yes; they may be introduced into the transcript inasmuch as there is to be testimony regarding it, it might be the more realistic way.

Mr. RHETTS. I thought since the whole paper is more revealing than references to it, it might be useful.

The CHAIRMAN. Since the questions are regarding the paper, I think it would be appropriate for it to go into the transcript.

March 7, 1945.

Mr. JACK SERVICE,

Care of Neil Brown, O. W. J.,

APO 627, Care of PM, New York, N. Y.

DEAR JACK SERVICE: I do hope you don't resent that I now trouble you long distance. But my conscience bothers me: I know how I would feel if I were in Dr. Schwartz's shoes (and I would be in his shoes save for some fortunate circumstances, including J. S.).

I had hoped to have a chance to see you again before you left—you sure move fast, and it seems you get across the sea sooner than we get across the bay.

Actually I have little to add to Kurt's story; I just may add his address: 173 Route Mayen (Hwa Ting Lu)—that's the place where the kindergarten is. Perhaps you may want to add his address to your other addresses, in case there is a chance to use it. Kurt's name is also known to Carlson who used to work in Opintell, and to Fit h; and Lyman Hoover actually knows Kurt. I had a letter from Lyman a few weeks ago.

If you think it possible to write to Kurt, even just greetings so he sees he is not forgotten, I know it would be a great lift for him and Martha. He knows your name. I feel lousy to suggest this to you, and I would feel guilty if I didn't. So here you have my dilemma.

Next month I will celebrate the fourth anniversary of my arrival—and last week my folks (father and mother) arrived in the U. S. from England on the quota; it took me all these four years to get them here, but now I am the happiest guy between the two coasts.

From time to time in the office we have a chance to see reports which include your name, so we are currently reminded of you. What an interesting job you have!

Well, once again, I hope you won't mind all this too much—but I feel if anyone can appreciate the circumstances it's you.

Very sincerely yours,

(S) Max
MAX KNIGHT.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Would you explain who this Max Knight is and give us such comment as you desire to make on the letter?—A. I think it might be better if I try and tell the whole story rather than just limit it. Max Knight was originally a Czech. I had met him in probably the very early months of 1941 in Shanghai when I was working in the visa section of the consulate general in Shanghai. He had, as I remember it, he had excellent credentials and papers indicating that he was an anti-Nazi refugee who had escaped from Prague just ahead of the German occupation. He had got to Shanghai and was applying for a visa and was very much afraid that if he did not get out of Shanghai he would suffer when the war started and Japan came into the war against us. Meeting all the qualifications, he'd receive a visa in Shanghai.

I had forgotten all about him and he meant nothing to me at the time except a rather interesting visa case, and late in 1941 when I was out in California, I was asked by the OWI to consult with their office out there, and to talk to their office in San Francisco, and at a meeting in one of these interrogation sessions really, this man Knight appeared. I had forgotten him, I did not recognize him, but he introduced himself to me after the meeting and reminded me where we had met and said that, he told me that he work working there in the OWI office in San Francisco. He was very anxious to know whether it would be possible for me after my return to China to send just a message of greeting to some people who were fellow Czechs still in Shanghai. Those are the people referred to here. It was, of course, at that time perfectly possible to send letters from Chungking to Shanghai, although there was no way to send letters from the United States to Shanghai. He didn't give me any letter.

Mr. RHETTS. Will you explain why?

A. Well, the American post offices would not accept any letters for occupied territory.

Mr. RHETTS. Shanghai was in occupied territory?

A. That is right. He didn't ask me to send any letter. He didn't send any letter except in the hope that I might myself be able to write a little note—these things had to be addressed in Chinese usually to these people—saying that I had seen Mr. Knight and he was well, and so on. I have no recollection whether I ever did that or not. This letter is simply to remind me really of his request and to see—he apologizes for having bothered me.

Now the reference at the bottom, "From time to time in the office"—the office refers to the OWI in charge of Pacific operations out in San Francisco—"we have a chance to see reports which include your name." I am not sure whether he means that some of the reports which I had drafted were circulated to OWI; I know some of them were. I suppose all he is referring to—

Q. Was he working for OWI?—A. He was a staff member in the office in San Francisco; yes, sir. I do not know what has become of him. I have never seen him since that time. I have never heard from him. He was at that time in process of being naturalized.

I notice in the first paragraph, "I know how I would feel if I were in Dr. Schwarz's shoes, and I would be in his shoes save for some fortunate circumstances, including J. S." Dr. Schwarz is apparently his friend who is still stranded in Shanghai, and Mr. Knight is simply saying that the forces of circumstances—he refers to simply the success in receiving a visa in the consulate general in Shanghai, and I happened to be the visa officer.

Q. Thank you. The next paper—

Mr. RHETTS. I wonder if I might just ask one. You stated that it was possible—although it was impossible to send mail from the United States to Shanghai, it was possible to send it from Chungking to Shanghai?

A. That is right.

Mr. RHETTS. You mean that, although Shanghai was occupied by the Japanese, the Chinese mail system went right on working right across the enemy line; is that correct?

A. Well, it was—the administration was separate in the two areas, but they exchanged mail continuously. It was always possible to communicate from Shanghai to Chungking and even send telegrams.

Mr. RHETTS. In the regular course of events?

A. Yes. It was usually done through Macao or some place like that.

The CHAIRMAN. Macao being a Portuguese possession?

A. That is right.

Q. The next paper is B-54, dated March 31. Did you have anything further on that one? The earlier one?

Mr. RHETTS. No.

MARCH 31, 1945.

Mr. JOHN S. SERVICE,

U. S. Office of War Information,APO No. 879, c/o Postmaster.

DEAR JACK: Many thanks for yours of March 8th together with the power for Mr. Brooks which I have passed on together with the new manuscript, of which he also has the first version as well as the first copy of the new or supplemental version. The letters which you sent and which were most interesting have been delivered. Many thanks. Many people have come back, like John Davies, Ludd, and Emmerson, and we have had various discussions on a sad but not pessimistic note. Everything that you can send will, of course, be much appreciated. I suggest that you might cooperate with my colleague Bill, who is now in charge of the office.

With best regards,

Yours,

s/ JOHN.

2 enclosures.

Q. This appears to be a photostat of a letter to Mr. Service signed "John" and bearing the typed words "2 enclosures" at the bottom, which do not appear with the document. The paper refers to a "new manuscript." Can you explain what this letter is and from whom received?—A. Yes, sir. This letter is from Prof. John K. Fairbank, now professor of far eastern history at Harvard University, and at that time Deputy Director of the Far Eastern Branch of OWI. I am not sure of the exact title, but that was the substance of his position at that time.

I must say that this letter perhaps meant nothing to me when I saw it and I had to get in touch with Dr. Fairbank, and we have tried to piece out our memories and reconstruct it. The Mr. Brooks referred to is Brooks Atkinson, of the New York Times, who had been in China as foreign correspondent for the New York Times throughout most of the war.

The manuscript was a manuscript of a book which Atkinson and Fairbank were considering assisting in having published. It was a manuscript, a story of the life, you might say, of a woman in Chungking, Kung Peng. She was the daughter of a well-to-do family—in fact, as I remember it, an official family—who had gone to Yenching University, American missionary university in Peking, of which Ambassador Leighton Stuart was the president for many years. While there she became interested in communism and had broken with her family and during the war herself was attached to the office of the official Communist representative in Chungking and served largely as their contact or liaison with the foreign press. She was an intelligent, thoughtful person with a good command of English, and Atkinson particularly, I think, thought that there might be some interest in her story as to how she became a Communist, how a person with her background became attracted to this movement in China and really forsook, gave up her family, made for a Chinese girl a very serious break. I don't know how the other first sections of the manuscript reached the United States.

Q. It was written by Brooks Atkinson?—A. No; the manuscript was written by her. I think it was during the period when I was home in the United States from October 1944 to January 1945.

Q. What happened then?—A. The first section of the manuscript—I was in the United States then, but when it was turned over to a publisher who thought he might be interested, it developed that it was necessary for her to have an attorney or agent in the United States who could make agreements and sign contracts, and Brooks Atkinson agreed to act as her agent, but he would have to have a signed power of attorney from her, and this is the power that is referred to in the second line: "together with the power for Mr. Brooks." As I remember it, the unsigned power of attorney was sent out to me; I took it to her; and she signed it; and then I returned it to Mr. Fairbank through OWI channels.

The letter goes on here to say, "The letters which you sent and which were most interesting have been delivered."

Mr. ACHILLES. Could I interrupt to ask, Did you bring the manuscript, or was that already in this country?

A. I have no recollection of bringing the manuscript. I think that it was brought here, as I say, before I returned to China. It was after the manuscript had been read or looked over that this problem arose of her needing an attorney here in the United States. Now the sentence which I just read, neither John Fairbank nor I had any recollection of what specific letters may have been referred to. Dr. Fairbank was particularly concerned with while he was in China—he had been in China from I think 1942 and 1943 in the OWI there, and he was particularly concerned with assistance to academic figures, university professors, intellectuals who as a result of the long war were getting very much out of touch with the rest of the world, very discouraged, losing morale. They were perhaps suffering the most as members of the white-collar class with the inflation in China. They were practically on dole and very dependent on whatever largesse they might receive from the Kuomintang government. He helped a great many of these people through official grants from the OWI funds in cultural relations funds to come to the United States, and he has a continued interest in that and has maintained probably the most extensive contacts with non-Communist Chinese liberals.

Now one problem in relation to these people was that their families and associates and friends in China were really unable to write to them through Chinese postal channels. Chinese censorship was extremely rigid and severe. Most of these people were in some degree critics or accused of being critics of the Central Government, and as grantees of the United States Government we used to sometimes transmit mail for them, opened, and send it in unsealed envelopes; and that was usually done through OWI channels. We had some reference here the other day, I think, when Mr. Sprouse was testifying, to a Miss Yang Kang, who was one of these people whom Fairbanks had helped to come to the United States. She was in Radcliffe at that time, and I am sure that from time to time I forwarded to OWI, through OWI channels, some letters for her. These letters, I might say, being forwarded open, were a source of information to us as views of these people, their comments on what was happening in China, and even today the Division of Chinese Affairs finds the correspondence between the people like Fairbank and Yang Kang as liberals in China a very important source of information on what is going on in China. Fairbank has continued to cooperate in that way, and I myself have seen several letters over the past year which he has received from professors in Peiping, and so on. This refers to that type of letter, but we have no idea what specific letters may have been involved.

Mr. ACHILLES. Were those letters which you had brought with you or which you had sent from Chungking?

A. No; I am sure these are letters which I had sent from Chungking.

Mr. ACHILLES. Were any of them to Mr. Jaffe?

A. No, sir; no, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Or Mr. Gayn?

A. No, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Or anyone else connected with the Amerasia case?

A. No, no. Do you wish me to continue with this letter?

Mr. ACHILLES. Who is this "colleague, Bill"?

A. Bill Holland, who at that time was Chief of the OWI office in Chungking.

Mr. RHETTS. Before you go on to another letter, General, I would like at this time to have included in the transcript a telegram, which was just handed to me, which is from Professor Fairbank; and it deals with this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be admitted. Do you want it in the transcript?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall I read it so the Board can hear it?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. (reading):

"Western Union, Cambridge, Mass., Reilly, Rhetts, and Ruckelshaus, Rm. 1120 Tower Bldg., Wash., D. C.:

STAFF, CINEPAC, Adv. HQTNS. Box No. 5,
Fleet Postoffice, San Francisco, April 2, 1945.

DEAR JACK: Your returning boss gives me a chance to get this line off to you—I've been luxuriating here on Guam for almost 2 months. I'm in the Future Plans Section technically but mostly am getting an education in what goes on in the Pacific and trying to keep up in China—the former is fascinating, the latter difficult. If you could find a safe way to send me an occasional copy of your memos I'd be grateful—maybe you'll find it practical, maybe not. So far as I can find out this is the only opportunity I'll have to communicate with you—until and unless Lud and Emmerson come through.

What goes on these days in the old country? I got a chuckle out of the news this morning that old Tung Pi-wu is going to be a delegate to the S. F. conference.

Best to the boys—specially Sol, if he's about.

JIM.

Q. The letter refers to the possibility of a "safe way" to send him a copy of your memos. Will you explain this letter, please?—A. This letter is from James K. Penfield, a fellow Foreign Service officer. He is class 2 and has been counselor of Embassy at Prague for the last 2 years.

Mr. STEVENS. He is class 1.

A. Our list is out of date. At that time Mr. Penfield had been assigned for a brief period to the headquarters of Admiral Nimitz. The original motive for assigning him was that it might be useful to have on Admiral Nimitz's staff a Foreign Service officer familiar with China. Mr. Penfield is a China service officer who had previously been serving in Chungking and in the Division of Chinese Affairs here in the Department. Mr. Penfield of course didn't know on April 2 that I was on the verge of leaving China. In fact, it is rather interesting that he didn't know it from General Wedemeyer because his first words, "Your returning boss" I believe referred to General Wedemeyer who went back to China in April 1945 via the Pacific. Now in reference to—

Mr. ACHILLES. General Wedemeyer actually carried the letter? Is that what he means, "returning boss"?

A. I believe so, yes. I did not receive the letter in China, however. It must have been forwarded to me here, since I left China before General Wedemeyer arrived.

Mr. ACHILLES. Penfield was assigned as what? Political adviser?

A. I am not sure he had any title. He was just a Foreign Service officer attached to the staff of Admiral Nimitz. He didn't stay there very long. They didn't know just how to use him apparently, and there was not the opportunity for him as there had been for us in China to do much political reporting, as he was far removed from China. His headquarters were in Guam and I am not sure but sometime in the summer of 1945, it must have been June or July, Mr. Penfield was returned to the Department.

Q. He had opportunity to see your reports through official sources?—A. Oh, certainly, while serving here in the Department. I think he had been Assistant Chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs. He was intimately familiar with what I had been doing in China and he is simply indicating the very obvious utility of his being supplied those reports in Guam since he was interested in China and he was there to assist the Navy in any way he could in regard to China, giving advice on conditions in China, and so on.

Q. What did he mean by "safe way"?—A. I think he simply means by a convenient, suitable way of forwarding these things—from Chungking. If they had simply gone Army channels they would have gone all the way back to the United States and then there would be a problem of transferring them to the Navy channels, and then getting them to him in Guam without perhaps getting stuck on the way by going through other hands. Normally the only distribution that I had done in Chungking had been to give them to the Embassy, which I did directly, or when I was in Yenan through G-2, but there it was a matter of physical transmission, somebody taking it over, and to John Davies, who was in the theater. When John Davies moved out of the theater in early 1945 we again had a problem of transmission, and they were sent to the Department, and then, as I showed Mr. Achilles or Mr. Moreland the other day, Mr. Bohlen forwarded them through the Department pouch, but it simply was a physical problem of forwarding anything from me in China to Penfield with the Navy in Guam.

Q. Did you ever forward anything?—A. No, sir; I didn't receive this letter until after I had returned from China. I wasn't writing any more reports and I never sent anything to him.

Q. Did you ever send any copies of your memoranda to anybody except as you have described through official channels?—A. No, sir.

Mr. RHETTS. Might I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute.

Mr. ACHILLES. This "safe means" that he refers to, does that refer to official channels, that is, some safe official way of communicating from Chungking to Guam?

A. That is right. I am sure that is what it means. It not only means safe in that sense but also something which is not going to get tangled up and stopped en route by having to go through some uninformed low echelon G-2 or something like that that doesn't know what these things are, doesn't know where they are to go.

Mr. ACHILLES. He says, at the end of his letter, "I got a chuckle out of the news this morning that old Tung Pi-wu is going to be a delegate to the S. F. Conference." Is that the same person who I think has been referred to as a Communist member of the Chinese delegation?

A. That is correct, yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was that Pi-wu a friend of yours or Penfield, or what caused that reference?

A. Everybody who had been in China through the war knew him, since he had been the Chinese Communist representative in Chungking through most of the war. I think that the chuckle over that is because Mr. Tung was an old Chinese scholar type with a very scraggly moustache in Chinese style, rather slow, ponderous, not at all the quick, alert, intellectual type of somebody like Chou En-lai was. Of course, that is the reason why the Central Government nominated Tung Pi-wu, I assume, but he was not the person who was going to make the best impression or be the most forceful in debate.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you see him in the United States in 1945?

A. Yes, I saw him on one occasion.

Mr. ACHILLES. When was that and what were the circumstances?

A. I am not sure what the exact date is. It was some time in early August 1945.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Was that here in Washington?—A. Yes, here in Washington.

Q. How did you happen to see him?—A. His secretary called me up and asked if they could see me and they also had received an invitation from a Captain Linebarger, who had been in the Army in G-2 in Chungking and knew them, and as I remember it the final arrangement was that I would pick them up. I was also going to Captain Linebarger's dinner. I would go to their hotel, pick them up and escort them to Linebarger's dinner.

Q. It seems to have been almost a habit of yours in those days.

The CHAIRMAN. Which, go to dinner?

Q. Picking up people in hotels, taking them, going to dinner with them.

That was the only time that you saw him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any particular conversation with him that evening or was it merely a sort of social function?—A. I had some conversation in the hotel. As a matter of fact, I discussed the whole question of whether I should see these people at all with the Chief of the Division of Chinese Affairs at this time, and he agreed that I should see them. There is quite a background to that. I of course had had a long and fairly close contact with Mr. Tung in China and with the secretary who was accompanying him. I had known them in Chungking when he was official representative. I of course had known him also in Yen-an, because he was in Yen-an all of the time that I was there and I had actually commenced the trip from Yen-an back to the States in April with these two men when they were coming to the United States to attend the San Francisco Conference as members of the Chinese Government delegation.

Q. Who was the other one?—A. The other man was Chen.

Q. Was he Tung Pi-wu's secretary?—A. Yes. Now having known these people for a long time and having made the start of the trip to the United States with them, they would have thought it very strange if I had avoided them or had not seen them. It was a matter of very elemental courtesy, you might say, involved. Also, my arrest and the whole case had been treated in China, particularly, as one having a political background.

The CHAIRMAN. Your arrest? Not at this time?

A. In June 1945; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. This occurred in—

A. In August.

The CHAIRMAN. You are telling about an August occurrence?

A. Yes. And we felt that for me to pointedly avoid any contact with them would confirm those beliefs, particularly on the part of the Chinese Communists, so that we concluded that the thing to do was to simply see them in a normal way, not conspicuously, not go out of my way, but if they sought me, yes, I would see them.

Q. But you attended no other meeting at which—A. No, sir.

Q. In San Francisco or—A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Finish your sentence?

Q. At which they were present.—A. No, sir.

Q. You said you started your trip to the United States with them. You did not arrive together?—A. No: we had a great deal of trouble with flying conditions. We came from Yen-an down to a place called Sian. This was in early April, and there was very heavy icing on the planes. We made several attempts. That is, we were flying in a C-47 headquarters plane. We made several attempts to get off the ground or really to get out, and at a certain elevation we got so much ice we couldn't get higher and couldn't get above it, so we finally had to go back to Sian. I managed during the day to get out alone on an empty troop carrier plane which was able to get above the icing conditions by flying at 21,000 feet, and we flew that for 2 or 3 hours, sharing an oxygen mask with the radio operator, but the rest of the party had to stay behind and they never did catch up to me. I came on through.

Q. Did you bring any documents for them?—A. No, sir; no, sir.

Q. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. I refer now to No. B-56, which appears to be a photostat of a draft of a typed letter dated April 16, 1945, addressed to "Dear Annalee and Teddy." unsigned.

6/6/45

WASHINGTON, April 16, 1945.

DEAR ANNALÉE AND TEDDY: The optimistically pleasant speculations we allowed ourselves to indulge in on that last evening of mine~~aaa~~ at 879 Chungking were 180 degrees off.

The paper tiger roared loudly enough around here to drown out the very general opposition—but appreciably timid—opposition. And, based on nothing but the Tiger's modest account of his achievements, the big boss said: "Keep it up". After that, the table pounding in regard to yours truly was only a matter of course.

Especially disappointing was the "political sense" in the narrow meaning, by the man I had hoped would fight.

I am now assigned to a safe job here but have been urged to bide my time. The Tiger's support ended on the 12th, the day of my arrival. And there is now some a feeling that Republican office holders good jobs should go to good party members.

[Second sheet of B-56]

DEAR ANNALEE AND TEDDY: The optimistically pleasant speculations we allowed ourselves that last evening of mine at 879 were 180 degrees off.

The CHAIRMAN. It refers to a "paper tiger," to a "safe job," and to "good party members." Would you explain what this is all about?

A. This was a draft of a letter which I believe was never sent to Annalee Jacoby and Teddy White, who were correspondents for the Luce publications in China.

The CHAIRMAN. Who made the draft?

A. I did, sir. When I was ordered out of China we received at headquarters in Chungking very cryptic orders signed "Marshall" and saying that I was to be in the United States by a certain date. Nobody had any explanation, nobody knew what it meant. The fact that I was not simply detached from the Army—I might have been, you see, simply detached from headquarters and assigned to the Embassy, and the fact that I was to be in the United States by a certain date gave some basis for thinking that the Army had another job in mind for me, and we didn't know. Some people thought that I was being removed at Hurley's request, or demand, and other people thought, well this type of order from people in headquarters, this type of orders seems to indicate you are being taken home in a hurry for some other important rush job or could it be maybe something in the Pacific. It had been considered at one time that I would go out to Nimitz's headquarters, as Penfield later did.

Now the first paragraph refers to those conjectures, that perhaps I was being brought home for another job, possibly at Nimitz's. "The optimistically pleasant speculations we allowed ourselves to indulge in on that last evening of mine at 879"—that is Chungking, APO 879. We never could put names of places, we always had to use APO numbers. "* * * were 180 degrees off"—in other words, were completely wrong about this business. Now the next paragraph—

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the "paper tiger"?

A. "The paper tiger"—

The CHAIRMAN. That is the next paragraph.

A. Yes, sir. General Hurley was given a great many nicknames by the Chinese and this "paper tiger" and the phrase "small whiskers" which is used some place in this or one of these other letters were both Chinese nicknames for General Hurley.

Now what I am really saying in this paragraph is that when General Hurley returned in February of 1945 for consultations and decisions as to whether we would take a new tack in China or continue his attempts to negotiate on the same basis of acceding and following the wishes of Generalissimo Chiang, that Ambassador Hurley won the argument and that having won the argument it was only a matter of course for him to bring about the removal of myself or anyone else who he felt was not sympathetic with his approach to the problem.

Mr. ACHILLES. In other words, the argument between Hurley and yourself, or between Hurley and—

A. Well, it wasn't really an argument. It was differences, as Secretary Byrnes said, on tactics, not on policy, on ways of trying to achieve our objective.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was it a conflict again between General Hurley and yourself or General Hurley and the Department on tactics or whom?

A. Well, I am thinking here primarily of myself, sir, but I think that if the State Department on the working level, the Division of Chinese Affairs level or

Office of Far Eastern Affairs level was included probably—although I am not intimately informed on this—to rather accept the view which was expressed in the Acheson telegram of February 26, but that the decision was made at much higher level. As I say, the big boss said, "Keep it up," and the President accepted General Hurley's accounts of the great progress which I think General Hurley quite sincerely thought he was making, and which we in our telegram of February 26 did not think was being made.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; what is the "safe job" you refer to?

A. The safe job simply refers to a job which would keep me out of arguments and debate. It was a job in the Office of Foreign Service doing this preliminary work for the revision of the Foreign Service Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were the "good party members"?

Mr. ACHILLES. Just a second. This letter is dated April 18. You had not then completed your consultation, had you?

A. No, sir, but I think that I had already been told that I would go into OFS when the consultation was over.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were the "good party members"?

A. I should finish the other sentence. I had been urged to bide my time. Of course, I had been living and breathing China, as I said yesterday. I was all wrapped up in China—felt very strongly about the whole issues involved. I yielded nothing to Mr. Judd of Mr. Bullitt or anyone else in my concern at that time over what I foresaw would be the loss of China, and frankly I was somewhat disappointed (a) that I could not have an active job in China or have a job connected with far-eastern affairs, but it was obvious that with General Hurley in China I could not go there and it would have been unwise for the Department if I had been put in any work here connected with the Far East.

Now I go on to say that "the Tiger's support ended on the 12th"—that refers of course to the death of the President who had appointed General Hurley, and the letter goes on to say, "And there is now some feeling that"—and you will see if you hold it up to the light that what I had typed and had crossed out there was that "Republican office holders," but I thought it unwise to say "Republicans" are going to lose their jobs, so I said a far worse thing and said, "good jobs should go to good party members," but what I mean was the feeling at that time, soon after President Truman came in, that the new administration would be a little more politically minded in making appointments and that some of the Republicans who were then holding very high jobs would probably be moved out in favor of Democrats.

Mr. ACHILLES. In other words, you were referring to the Republican Party and not the Communist Party?

A. Absolutely. Or Democratic Party. "Good jobs should go to good party members."

Mr. ACHILLES. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. I refer now to—

A. I think that if we could review the press and some of the columnists and political chit-chat of that period, I think we could confirm that that was common feeling when President Truman took over.

The CHAIRMAN. Referring now to B-57, which is a photostat of a typed letter from Arthur R. Ringwalt and signed "Arthur," to Mr. Service, dated April 19, this letter refers to a check for $225.

THE FOREIGN SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

AMERICAN EMBASSY,
Chungking, April 19, 1945.

J. S. SERVICE, Esq.,

Department of State, Washington.

DEAR JACK: Enclosed is a Treasury check for $225. I sold your stuff for U. S. $425, the balance being the $200 I advanced you just before you left Chungking. I hope this is satisfactory.

GA left today. Was sorry to miss him. Maybe he can get us home soon. I hope so as "Small Whiskers" is due in at any moment.

Wrote to Dick today complimenting him on some good work he has just completed in connection with keeping some missionary out of jail.

If the Dept. contemplates setting up some sort of organization dealing with world affairs which might grow out of the San Francisco Conference, I might be interested. If you think advisable, you might mention my name to the proper people.

Otherwise nothing much new.

Yours,

s/ Arthur,
ARTHUR R. RINGWALT.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you explain this letter?

A. Yes, sir. It was the invariable rule that no one took anything out of Chungking that was not absolutely essential and usually officers came out of Chungking with very little more than the clothes they wore. It was so hard to get any supplies of any kind in Chungking that it was in the first place an unfriendly act to deprive people there by taking out any clothes or toilet articles or supplies of any sort. In the second place, you could sell anything in Chungking at that time for a fantastic price. You could sell a used suit of clothes for $100 equivalent, or a fountain pen for about $90, a $25 wrist watch for about 10 times its price.

Now in the Embassy we separated the sheep from the goats, shall we say, by whether or not they gave first chance at their things to their fellow officers. In other words, a man was transferred, and if he played ball he called in everybody in the Embassy and said, "Now, what do you need?" and he didn't charge them more than a replacement cost. What he did not sell or dispose of to his fellow officers, then he was by the rules of the game free to dispose of them to the Chinese second-hand man, and it was a very thriving business.

Now I came to Chungking very hurriedly, and the last night I was there we had one of these quite common affairs, everything was put out in my room and everybody in the Embassy came in and picked what they thought they could use, and everything that I had left I turned over to Arthur Ringwalt and asked him to call in the Chinese and dispose of it. Arthur advanced me $200 and this letter was to forward me an additional $225, since he had received $425 from the Chinese second-hand man for whatever I had left with him.

Mr. ACHILLES. The things you disposed of were solely personal effects?

A. Oh, yes; clothing and anything—shoelaces, shoe polish, toilet articles. We took out everything of that sort we could with us because it was extremely hard to obtain them there and the things you could get were usually very poor quality.

Now the next paragraph, if you wish me to continue, says, "GA left today." That is George Atcheson, George Atcheson had been transferred from Chungking very hurriedly because of Ambassador Hurley's resentment of the February 26 telegram and it was essential to get him out of Chungking before General Hurley arrived. The letter goes on to say, "Maybe he can get us home soon." That is a reflection of the morale of the Embassy at that time. They all wanted to get out and get home. He goes on to say, "I hope so as 'Small Whiskers' is due in at any moment." "Small Whiskers," I have already mentioned, was a Chinese nickname for General Hurley and this simply refers to the strong desire of practically all Foreign Service officers who had any contact with General Hurley during that period to avoid if possible working under him.

"Wrote to Dick today complimenting him on some good work he has just completed in connection with keeping some missionary out of jail." Dick is my younger brother who was a Foreign Service officer and I think at that time was in Cheng-tu.

The last paragraph simply mentions Mr. Ringwalt's interest in getting some job outside of the China field. He hoped that there might be some new branch set up which would be a broader one than simply a country division as a result of the San Francisco Conference, and he is inquiring whether I can help him on it. Mr. Ringwalt—I am not sure whether I identified him or not, he is a Foreign Service officer, class 3, and now first secretary in London.

Mr. STEVENS. "If you think advisable, you might mention my name to the proper people." What does he mean by that, Mr. Service?

A. Well, he doesn't know whether or not there is going to be this sort of organization that he is thinking of, and he doesn't know of course who the people would be who would be heading it up. He is in Chungking and he is assuming that there will be something like the Bureau of UN Affairs; I imagine that is what he is thinking of.

Mr. STEVENS. He means then, mention my name to whoever will be in charge.

A. Of setting up what he anticipates will be a new branch to deal with the United Nations affairs.

Mr. RHEETS. New branch of what?

A. Of the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. We refer finally to B-58, which is a photostat of a type-written letter addressed to Mr. Service and signed "Julian."

DOCUMENT No. B-58

FBI LABORATORY—100-367360 0404

THE UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

MAY 14, 1945.

DEAR JACK: I met your wife the other evening, and your delightful children as well. Phil had arranged with Carolyn to bring Messrs. Tung and Chen to Berkeley, and we had dinner together along with Martin Wilbur. During the course of conversation, Carolyn mentioned her need of a washing machine in Washington. I told her that if worse comes to worse you might be able to have my family's machine which is now up on Long Island. Carolyn got all excited about this suggestion, and she said that she would write you about it. If you have been looking for one in Washington, I suggest that you continue to do so. You should also inquire about the possibility of new machines coming on the market in the near future. If your efforts in Washington all lead up a blind alley, then it would be practical to consider shipping my family's machine—if you want it—from Long Island to Washington. I just thought that I should explain this to you in case Carolyn's letter discourages you from continuing your search for a machine.

The Conference is rather dull, and I find it very depressing. I imagine that this conference may go down as one of the most reactionary international gatherings in history. The only consolation I can find is that the fantastic views on international organization—views which are in essence quite contrary to real and sound international organization—may contribute to breaking down such outmoded concepts as sovereign equality and nation-state system of international relations. But they offer nothing in place of these traditional elements of world affairs.

Phil is keeping the most disgraceful company these days. It is practically certain now that he'll return to Chungking as Minister Counselor and Hurley's house boy. He's taking his job seriously and even shows some compassion over the inconveniences which members of the Chinese delegation occasionally have to endure. He is first-rate on seeing that T. V.'s car turns up at the right place at the right time.

John Carter has been introducing me around as the labor attaché for Chungking. The local liberal and labor groups have had me out for a party to meet the right-minded people. Saturday I was introduced to Taranov, Soviet trade-union representative on the World Trade Union Council. He told me that he didn't know that north China was called "Communist" China. He asked whether they were "Communnists" or not. He stated that the Soviet Government favored unity in China and that United States and Soviet Union should cooperate in bringing about such unity. I am planning to bring John Carter together with Taranov and another Soviet trade-union leader, Kuznetsov (who is the head of the Soviet trade-union movement and an important figure in Soviet high policy). We may not learn much, but we might get some better line on Soviet psychology on the Pacific, specifically, the China question.

Not much else to say. I won't go into detail about the Conference. It isn't too difficult to read between the lines in the press to see what is happening here.

Best regards,

s/ Julian.

The CHAIRMAN. This letter refers to the United Nations Conference at San Francisco, speaks of it as "the most reactionary international gathering in history" and refers to what it calls an "outmoded concept," "sovereign equality and nation-state system of international relations," refers to somebody by the name of "Phil" "keeping the most disgraceful company" and also to "right-minded people." Will you explain those references, please?

A. I think that the Julian is Julian Friedman, but I had had no recollection of this letter until after I saw this photostat. If I had been asked whether or not I had ever received or written a letter to Friedman, I would have said no. The apparent purpose of this letter really is to tell me of this offer of his family's washing machine. Everybody in the Division of Chinese Affairs knew that I was trying to find a house for my family here in Washington, which was quite a problem here in Washington, which was quite a problem in 1945. My family was still out in California, and that I was trying to buy various things which we needed or expected to need for the house, like a washing machine. And then he goes on—or rather, I don't have any idea of what he means in the second paragraph. I don't recall ever discussing the matter with him. When he came back here after the conference was over I had already been arrested, I was not in the Department, and if I saw him during that period it was very, very briefly and probably just discussing my case, and so on. So that I can't offer any explanation of what he means here by this "most reactionary international gathering in history," or his views on "outmoded concepts as sovereign equality and nation-state system of international relations."

The third paragraph, the "Phil" I believe must be Phil Sprouse—it is just conjecture.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not Phil Jaffe?

A. Oh, no, sir. Phil Jaffe was not at San Francisco. Phil Jaffe was, as we know, in New York and Washington. Phil Sprouse was one of the liaison officers assigned to the Chinese delegation. I am not sure what Friedman's job out there was. He may have also been some sort of a liaison officer. I think that he is just poking some fun at Sprouse here because of the necessity of his spending most of his time looking after the physical needs and desires of the Chinese delegation, and some of them were rather demanding. T. V. Soong had a reputation of being a rather demanding and insistent person, and you see a reference to Phil Sprouse's being first-rate at making sure that T. V. Soong's car turns up at the right place at the right time.

The next paragraph, "John Carter" is John Carter Vincent, who was out there with the delegation. He says, "John Carter has been introducing me around as the labor attaché for Chungking." It was already the plan that Friedman would go out to China as labor attaché to the Embassy, which he subsequently did in September 1945, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were the "right-minded people" referred to?

A. CIO—I don't know. Certainly knowing Friedman I would assume that it is the liberal or left-wing group of labor people, but that is—

Mr. STEVENS. You don't know whether that is CIO or someone else?

A. No; that is purely a conjecture.

The CHAIRMAN. It did not, as you see it, refer to communism?

A. I am sorry; I don't, sir. I have no knowledge that Friedman was a Communist himself.

Mr. ACHILLES. Later in the same paragraph he refers to various members of the Soviet Delegation. Do you think those might have been the ones he was referring to as "right-minded people"?

A. Well, I doubt it, because the "right-minded people" is tied up with the local liberal and labor groups. I am sorry, I am just speculating here. I am not in a position to know.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever reply to this letter as far as you remember?

A. As far as I remember, I did not; no.

Mr. STEVENS. Did you not state a few minutes ago you do not remember receiving it?

A. Yes; as far as I recall I did not. I am a very poor correspondent.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you have no recollection of any kind of a reply to this?

A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a witness outside. That concludes this phase of the examination.

Mr. STEVENS. We have a witness outside, Mr. Chase.

(The witness was produced and, having been duly sworn, Mr. Augustus Sabin Chase testified as follows:)

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Chase will be asked to testify for the Board at this point. Now, would you give your full name and address, please?—A. Augustus Sabin Chase. My temporary address, you mean, in Washington?

Q. Yes.—A. University Club. I expect to be leaving today or tomorrow to go back to my home for a week and then return.

Q. Now, you would like to make some preliminary statement about your recollection as to the facts in this case. Would you make that for the record at this moment?—A. Well, yes, since my statements are under oath, I would like to have the following prefatory statement made part of my testimony, namely, that in 1945 in connection with this same case I testified twice before juries—

The CHAIRMAN. Grand juries?

A. That was my understanding, that they were grand juries, formally, and also informally before the FBI agents at a time when my recollection was much clearer than it is now of any details connected with the case, and that in order to protect myself against possible basis for charges of perjury, I would like to say that everything I say from now on is to the best of my recollection only and that in any case where it substantially differs from my previous testimony it is not due to any fault or intention but purely to lapse of memory. I think that is all I want to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Now I will ask Mr. Achilles to conduct the examination since he is more acquainted with the knowledge of this witness.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. I realize that you have been questioned about the case, as you say, twice before. The case has been examined several times, but it is again under examination and the purpose of these hearings is to develop every possible fact we can regardless of previous investigations. That is why we have asked you to come in since you were, I believe, in the Division of Chinese Affairs in the spring of 1945.—A. That is right.

Q. Would you tell us when you took up duty in the Division of Chinese Affairs?—A. I came back from internment on the exchange vessel in the autumn of 1943, took some leave, and then I think technically was assigned immediately to the Division of Chinese Affairs but actually physically I was loaned to the Pentagon. I was over at the Pentagon to work with the Army Intelligence for about 6 months, and as I recall I physically took up duties in CA about May 1943.

Q. What was your capacity in that Division in the beginning of April 1945?—

A. I think at just about that time I had been made a Deputy Chief of the Division. I forget the exact date. Up to about that time I had some title that I forget, which was just one of the desk officers in the Division, largely handling incoming political material from the field. And when I was appointed Assistant Chief of the Division, it really involved no change in my duties, as I recall it. There were, I think, two other Assistant Chiefs, Mr. Paul Meyer and Mr. Everett Drumright.

Q. Who was Chief of the Division at that time?—A. John Carter Vincent.

Q. And could you briefly describe what your duties were?—A. Well, I should say that the duties to which I gave at least 80 percent of my time were handling incoming communications from the field and other places, including both classified and unclassified material, a large amount of it was dispatches and reports from our Foreign Servicers in China, and my duties consisted of reading the material and figuring out what sections of the Department and other departments of the Government should receive copies, and then indicating the distribution of the number of copies thereon. There was also a mass of other material, unclassified, such as newspapers and clippings and various things. I was handling a very large quantity of documents at that time.

Q. To what units of the Department or other agencies of the Government did you normally distribute the incoming documents?—A. There my memory is a little vague. As far as I can recall the Division of Chinese Affairs of course saw practically everything. The officers in the Division concerned saw it and then among the outside agencies I think we had a general rule that both MID and ONI received copies of everything, but if there was some reason for exception, such as something connected with the relations or the attitude of the Department toward the War Department, or some reason why we might not want to send a copy to MID, that might be considered separately, but as a general rule I think everything went to those two agencies. We sent a great deal of material to OSS but not everything, a lesser amount to OWI, and I think those were the principal offices. Of course matters that concerned finance or political, economic matters, we would send to the Departments or agencies, FEA.

Q. Would you also describe briefly the mechanics of that distribution? For example, when an original dispatch came into the Department from Chungking, would it come first to CA or where in the Department would it go?—A. My recollection was that it would go first normally to an office which I think was DC/R or C/R—I was always confusing the two.

Q. DC/R.—A. I know there was a lady there named Miss Bradshaw that I worked a great deal with, and she would send down the originals, as I recall it, to CA, where they would be stamped, and then most of them I think would come immediately to my desk.

Q. You would indicate the distribution to be given to each dispatch?—A. I would.

Q. You would?—A. Yes. I am not sure but at some point we changed the procedure occasionally. I am not sure but at some point DC/R would automatically route copies because we had a standing rule, because I think at this time in question the originals came and I would put on all the distribution and the number of copies—

Q. You would classify both the units to receive copies and the number of copies to be made?—A. Yes.

Q. And then where in the Department would the copies actually be made?—A. I don't recall the name of the office. I remember going down, I think, to the basement in the Old State Department where they would reproduce ozalids. I don't remember the name of the office in which they were accepted.

Q. Was reproduction of these dispatches made only by the ozalid process or by any other process?—A. There were two processes that I remember, namely the ozalid and hectograph. As I recall the most of the dispatches from China at that time were the ozalid process.

Q. And then who was responsible for distributing the ozalid copies? Was that the unit which reproduced them or CA?—A. For distributing them?

Q. Yes.—A. As I recall it, we had nothing to do with the mechanics of distributing them. We merely indicated and DC/R would then distribute them, except that we got back to CA, I think, we normally had two copies made for our own Division purposes. Those would come to me, I guess, as I recall it, and I think I would send one copy then to the interested officer and the other, as far as I recall, but I am very vague on it, was put in a chronological file in the Division's files.

Q. How did other units of this Department who were concerned get copies? Would they be sent one of the CA copies or the original or some other copy?—A. As I recall it we would—let me see, I think we tried both methods. I think where it was essential that the fact that another Division, interested Division, had seen the original, where it was advisable to have that noted on the original, we would have the original routed, but we also as I recall it occasionally provided copies to other Divisions for working purposes, so that they could pass on the original quickly.

Q. When Mr. Service reported to the Department in April 1945, did he report to you?—A. There my memory is very vague. I recall being much interested to hear that he would be back, I had been interested in reading his dispatches. I have a feeling that I was absent for a week, perhaps for a few days about the time he came back. I also know that a bunch of his dispatches brought back by himself were given to me, and my guess is that Mr. Service handed them to me directly. I wouldn't swear to that—either handed them to me directly or some other officer in the Division, or gave them to me. I remember talking briefly with him and saying that I was interested in his reporting but not having any very extended conversation with him.

Q. Do you recall what was done with the copies of his reports that were given to you, whether those were put into the mill?—A. These are the originals you are speaking of?

Q. The originals of his reports.—A. I don't recall that point. It could have been. I was pretty well swamped with work at that time, as I recall it, and having these dispatches given to me directly was an exceptional procedure. I should say at first that my normal procedure when originals came in was to glance at them hastily to see if they were about any immediate matter of urgency requiring immediate action. If they were, if it was very urgent, I didn't even wait for copies but I would route it immediately to the officers who should take the action. If it was urgent but not quite that urgent, we would rush them to DC/R to have copies made. We had a priority basis whereby they would be made very rapidly. If they were not so urgent, more background interest, they would sometimes lie in my desk for a couple of weeks, possibly longer.

As I recall it, the CA stamp, the Divisional stamp was not put on by myself, presumably by one of the secretaries, perhaps Mr. Vincent's secretary or one of the clerks. In the case of these dispatches in question, the fact that they didn't have the stamp on them might not have occurred to me and I could have—I looked at them and as I recall it none of them were of the type demanding action. They were all interesting. I had a habit of when there were several dispatches, all on related subjects, of trying to read them together. And I might add, one of my duties in the Division was to attach a tag commenting on the dispatches and suggesting, inviting attention to certain sections, sometimes summarizing them, and where there were several dispatches on a related subject, why, I would route them around together. For that reason, a large group of dispatches I might well have, having once seen there was nothing demanding urgent action in them, let them wait with the idea that I wanted to read them together and wanted to put together the different related dispatches. Whether I actually did that I don't know, but it would have been a very likely procedure.

Q. I would like to show you a photostat copy of an ozalid reproduction of some of the reports which Mr. Service brought back from China. The first document is B-1. Do you recall [showing the copy to Mr. Chase] seeing that report among Mr. Service's reports at the time?—A. I couldn't possibly say whether that was among those or not. I mean, just from the subject—you mean that—I have no clear—the separate topics of the dispatches are no longer clear in my mind.

Q. Could you recognize from the distribution indication?—A. That looks to me like my handwriting there. I would recognize the—

The CHAIRMAN. What does the handwriting say?

A. Copies to MID, 2; I think ONI; OSS; CA.

Q. And do you recall whether that is your handwriting, where it says, "Return to CA"?—A. I think it is.

Q. Do you recall who that was routed to and who was to return it to CA?—A. I can't possibly recall that. I might repeat that at that time I was swamped under an avalanche of documents and I didn't recall individual documents. Absolutely impossible.

Q. I know that it is difficult for you to recall after this lapse of time, but these particular documents are of considerable importance, because these are photostats of the ozalid copies of Mr. Service's reports actually found in Jaffe's possession, and we are anxious to ascertain who in the Department actually had possession of those ozalid copies.

I should like to show you Document B-2 and ask whether you recall or whether you saw that document, and if so, to whom it might have been distributed?—A. Well, I don't recall the document other than the fact that this writing looks like my writing, "Return to CA". Then it is the type of document which Mr. Service had turned in. I think it is his style of dispatch. Other than that, I couldn't say I specifically recall it.

Q. I should like to show you document B-3 and see if you have any recollection of the persons or units in the Department to whom that ozalid copy might have been sent.—A. Well, national minorities would include, I assume, Tibetans and Mongolians. I think it very likely would have gone to TS, or Territorial Studies.

Q. Division of Territorial Studies.—A. Division of Territorial Studies, and there were so many divisions and sections that I don't recall—there might have been others that I would have thought were interested in that. It is conceivable since it is Tibet bordering on India, it is conceivable that it might have gone to the office under which India was at that time.

Q. I show you Document B-4 and ask whether you have any recollection of whom that might have been distributed to.—A. Does it give the classification? It seems to be unclassified. I think it would have depended somewhat on the classification. If it had been secret, I don't know whether we would have sent it to the Department of Labor automatically or not. I can't recall what our policy was. I remember there was some Labor section in the Department. I don't remember the name of the office. I think we would have sent it there.

Q. If it had been sent to the Department of Labor, would there be any indication on that?—A. Yes. The fact that there is not one there makes me think that it was not sent there, unless it was sent after I left. This evidently was the routing that I had indicated at the time.

Q. Would that have gone to the Division of Territorial Studies?—A. Could that have gone?

Q. Do you think it would have?—A. Well, may I expand on that a little?

Q. Please.—A. I think it perhaps is a point of some importance. I recall that when the Division of Territorial Studies was formed, for a time we didn't send them much as far as I can recall. I also recall that there was some feeling among some of the offices in FE and CA that the officers of this new Territorial Studies section had just gone in from outside and they were not as cognizant of the need for security, not security conscious.

Q. When was that established?—A. I don't know. I have forgotten. I think it was established, say, not longer than a year before April 1945. I also think that it changed its name once or twice, and I remember that our feeling was that some of the men were entirely trustworthy in the division, and that is the Division—from the point of view of intention but that they had not been schooled in security, and we had to be careful about routing stuff to them. I also remember that they approached someone, probably Mr. Vincent, about getting more material, and I have a vague recollection that we reached a new policy in regard to that, and under which we provided them with much more than we had been giving them.

Q. Was Dr. Blakeslee the head of that Division?—A. As I recall, he was.

Q. Do you recall approximately the time when it was decided to send more material than they had been receiving?—A. I don't—if you want me to try to guess?

Q. Approximately as to whether it was before or after the middle of April 1945?—A. I would say it was before that, probably February or March 1945.

Q. But you are not able to recall whether this particular document was sent to them?—A. No; I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that?

Q. That was B-4.

I show you Document B-5 and ask whether you have any recollection of the agencies or the units or persons in the Department to whom you might have routed that document?—A. I am afraid I am even vaguer on that, but on the other side, I do recall what—I assume that there must have been some division in the Department interested in that relief and rehabilitation, but I don't recall what it was.

(Off-record discussion.)

Q. I show you Document B-6 and ask whether you have any recollection of whom in the Department that might have been distributed to.—A. It is marked "secret." I think at the time I would have certain qualms about sending it to TS, but on the other hand I think very likely having reached the agreement that we perhaps did let them see it.

Q. That was the type of material which might be sent to TS?—A. Yes; I think so. Possibly other divisions. I haven't read the dispatches now so I don't know whether it concerned territories bordering on other areas, so that I might have sent it to other political area divisions.

Q. I believe that refers to territorial claims by the Communists as to the areas under their control.—A. Internal, in other words. Well, then, I would not have.

Q. You don't think that you would have sent it to other geographical divisions?—A. Not under those circumstances.

Q. I show you document B-7 and ask whether you have any recollection or can tell to whom in the Department that might have been distributed?

The CHAIRMAN. B-7 is not an ozalid, or B-8. The next one is B-9.

Q. I am sorry, I meant to show you B-9, and ask you whether you have any recollection of the people or units to whom that might have been distributed.—A. Well, on the face of it, I can see no specific reason for routing it outside of FE and CA but I don't recall the type of material that TS requested from us, and it might have been sent to TS, but it would not logically to me now seem the type that they were specifically as interested in as they would have been in the others that we have discussed.

Q. That concludes this particular series of ozalid documents.

The CHAIRMAN. That was B-9.

Q. I am sorry, I have one more, B-11, which I show you and ask whether you have any recollection of persons or units to whom that might have been distributed.—A. I should think this was somewhat between the last one mentioned and the others, with slightly greater possibilities that it might have been sent to TS, seeing that it is regional and involves a regional aspect.

Q. Would that have gone to any other units of the Department?—A. I can't say. I definitely would not want to say that it could not have gone but my recollection is too hazy as to what divisions there were in the Department then and what they were interested in.

Q. Several of these documents which I have shown you were marked "Return to CA." Was any sort of a check list kept as to whether copies sent to other units in the Department were actually returned by them?—A. As I recall it, we had an informal method of putting in the files when CA copies were loaned out a slip of paper, such and such dispatches copies loaned to such and such a division, and those would be torn up when they were returned. We were pretty well swamped with work, and I would admit that I for one probably did not watch those things closely enough, as closely as I should have had I had more time to keep up with the procedure. It is not clear in my mind whether one of the girls working in the Division was assigned that duty or not. I am not certain.

Q. Do you recall any operation in the spring of 1945 that came to your attention that there were any substantial numbers of CA copies of documents which had not been returned to the files?—A. All I recall was that when the case first broke and an FBI inspector started talking to me about it, we looked in the files and there were a number missing, as I recall it, at that time. I had a great number of talks with the FBI inspectors who came to see me on many days.

Q. Was that subsequent to the arrest on June 6 or prior to that?—A. It was all subsequent.

Q. You spoke of several of those documents having been distributed to TS?—A. Well, just a minute. To the best of my recollection.

Q. Yes.—A. I would like to add that very definitely, because it is not clear in my mind what arrangement we did finally decide on for TS, but to the best of my recollection the ones which I indicated very likely did go to TS.

Q. Do you know who in TS those would have gone to?—A. I don't know, I wouldn't want to say. I didn't know enough about the TS organization.

Q. Was Mr. E. S. Larsen in TS at that time?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you any idea whether they would have gone to him or whether he would have had access to them?—A. I can't answer that definitely. My belief is that he did have access to some of them and I have what I think is a recollection of talking with him at one time about some of them, but I wouldn't swear to that.

Q. I show you document B-25, which is a photostatic copy of a dispatch from the Embassy in Chungking, China, the ozalid copy of which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession, but of which it has been established that Mr. Service did not have the copy. Do you recall or can you recall from examining this document whom in the Department or in other agencies that might have been distributed to?—A. Well, it would have naturally gone to MID and ONI, probably to OSS, and I see here in my own handwriting OSS. I see no other indication in the Department other than CA, and from the title I can see no reason why it should have gone outside CA, outside FE and CA.

Q. You can see no indication on the document itself as to anyone else that it might have been sent to?—A. It is MID two copies, ONI, I really can't make this out. FC—I don't know what that could have been. And OSS it was sent to, and CA. There is something else written here, just above, very faint, and I don't think that is the name of another office.

Q. Were original dispatches ordinarily sent to TS? Or only reproduced copies?—A. I don't recall that. If they were, if originals were sent to TS, I think it was rather late in the day, probably not before about the time we are speaking of.

Q. I show you document B-24, another photostatic reproduction of an ozalid copy of a dispatch from the Embassy in Chungking and ask whether you can indicate who in the Department might have received copies of that?—A. Well, I think we would obviously have sent it to the Division of Japanese Affairs and to presumably some economic section. I am not certain of that because it, as the context indicates, is partly economic in character, and I notice here that it was sent to JA, and that is Japanese Affairs Division. I am not quite clear what these other—this is not my writing here.

Q. Then you are unable to ascertain whether it was—A. Whether it was sent to an economic?

Q. To Japanese Affairs and Chinese Affairs?—A. I don't know now, I can't recall. Is that FE or FC? If it was FC, I don't know what it means. This first, to War and to Navy, FE, CA, and JA. The indications are that it was not sent to any other divisions within the Department other than those listed here.

Q. Thank you.

Mr. Chase, you have stated that the FBI inquired as to the distribution of a number of these and some of the documents shortly after the time of the arrests. As a result of the investigation which you presumably made at the time, did you develop any information as to how the documents in question might have gotten into Mr. Jaffe's possession?—A. No, nothing that was definite.

Q. Were any steps taken at the time to increase the effectiveness of the security regulations?—A. Yes, as I recall it, at this particular period—it rather coincided with the movement in the Department to check up on security. I think there were two moves in that direction. One was perhaps a month or two before April, another one after April which was more rigid, involving the distribution of a pamphlet to everyone giving instructions on security, certain rules we were to follow, and as I recall it, it also involved a change in it where the keys to the cabinets were to be kept. I think after this move, which I am not sure was before April or after, the keys were then kept in Mr. Vincent's safe, if I recall correctly.

Q. Turning to another phase of the proceedings, can you tell the Board what the practice was in CA at the time concerning dealings with newspapermen. Did members of the Division ordinarily—were they expected as far as their duties to answer inquiries from the press?—A. My recollection is that we were pretty cautious in that respect and that we had instructions to clear with a certain division before—I think the press man was supposed to clear with some other division before he contacted us. I personally saw very few members of the press and I think usually they talked with other officers, Mr. Vincent.

Q. What was the policy with respect to officers returning from the field, their dealings with the press?—A. I don't recall any specific instructions with regard to that. There may have been, but that was not a matter that I was directly concerned with, that my desk particularly would have been—if there was such an instruction I don't know what it was.

Q. I was not so much interested in specific instructions as in the general policy.—A. I think as a matter of general policy that the division would have advised returning officers to be very circumspect in their talks with newspapermen.

Q. Did Mr. Service at any time in the spring of 1945 consult you as to any particular dealings with the press?—A. Not that I recall.

Q. Did he ever consult you as to the reliability of Mr. Jaffe?—A. Not that I recall. I think I can answer that question definitely "No."

Q. Were officers called in from the Far East on consultation expected to discuss the fields with which they were familiar with other Government agencies at this time?—A. I think our policy was to encourage them to talk with other Government agencies who had a legitimate specific interest in the matter.

Q. What was the policy with respect to their speaking on the subjects with which they were familiar with outside agencies, such as the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. I don't recall. I think you are getting rather out of my field in these questions because my job there was more or almost all research. I was not one of the officers who primarily was concerned with handling personnel who came back.

Q. Would that normally have been the responsibility of someone higher up in FE?—A. I don't know. I should think it would be either Mr. Vincent or Mr. Paul Meyer. I remember Mr. Paul Meyer was also one of the Assistant Chiefs of CA, and as I recall it he had more to do with personnel than I did, but I can't say.

Mr. STEVENS. Territorial Studies, as you mentioned a number of times as special to you, Mr. Chase, did Territorial Studies get broken down and sections of it incorporated into the geographic divisions?

A. As far as I can recall it didn't; that is, up to the time that I left the Department. I left about July 1945, I think, to take leave at my home; and then I came back for a few days in September, as I recall it; and then went out to the field; and, as far as I can recall, up to the time of my departure for leave in July that had not happened.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Blakeslee was concerned with matters relating to the Far East and research and statistical matters?

A. That is my understanding.

Mr. STEVENS. Was he during this entire time associated with Territorial Studies or Office of Far Eastern Affairs?

A. There again my memory may be wrong. As far as I can recall, he was organizationally with the Territorial Studies, but his relations were very close with FE and CA. We had—I remember there were a number of committees to discuss the formulation of policy to be advised on postwar problems, and many of those committees were attended by both Mr. Blakeslee and by members of FE and CA.

Could I add one thing there? I said that I am thinking primarily of the physical set-up because I can't recall in the rooms which FE and CA occupied any desks which were taken over by Mr. Blakeslee or other members of TS. Possibly they were made a part of FE and CA but remained physically where they had been. Of that I am not certain.

Mr. STEVENS. During the time when Mr. Service was in the Department on consultation, was it the practice to refer to him, or to others on consultation, as a matter of normal course materials coming from the field?

A. I don't think so. I remember personally finding Mr. Service's dispatches of great interest and thinking I would like to discuss them with him more at length. I also have, I think, a fairly good recollection that I saw very little of him; and I kind of wished he had come around more than he did. I don't recall having seen him very frequently. He dropped in—for a guess I can only imagine recalling his coming in perhaps a couple of times after he first came. That is, into the large room where I was working.

Mr. STEVENS. Can you remember on the documents on which you wrote "Return to CA"; would it have been the practice to have sent them to other units in the Department or were they confined pretty strictly to FE?

A. The copies marked "CA"?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes; the copies marked "CA."

A. I think we would usually do that only where there was a special call from some other division or an afterthought that some other division might be interested in it and it was not on the original routing, or possibly it may have been a method whereby we would want to insure that copies that were sent to Territorial Studies came back quickly. I don't recall.

Mr. STEVENS. That would have been principally when you were sending the document outside the FE channel, in other words?

A. Yes. I think that we usually would have been where some other division expressed a wish to see it; we might say, "We have an extra copy; you can take that for a while."

Q. That could have been because they had had the original routed to them or any other way to call their attention to the document?—A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel would like to ask some questions.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. What was the administrative set-up of FE, Mr. Chase? It contained the Division of Chinese Affairs. Were there other divisions in the Office of—A. Yes; as I recall it there were four Divisions; Chinese Affairs; Japanese Affairs; Southeast Asia—or some such name—Affairs; and Philippine Affairs. And there were also some specialists, research, partly economic people who were attached to FE as FE, I think, rather than to the specific divisions.

Q. Was Territorial Studies not a division within FE?—A. I can't answer that point. I don't know. I always thought of it as a separate division, but I am not sure whether organizationally it was brought within the framework of FE or not.

Q. I may say to the Board that it would have been my impression that Territorial Studies was a part of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. Does the Board have any exact information on the administrative situation at that time?

Mr. ACHILLES. I am also not clear. I was the Chief of the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs; and I know that there was a similar British Division of Territorial Studies; but, as far as I can recall, it had nothing to do with the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs or the Office of European Affairs. I think they were separate research divisions which dealt with the geographic offices but which were not a part of them.

Q. And were administratively—

Mr. ACHILLES. Separate.

Q. Separate and under some other office rather than the geographical.

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes; that is my understanding.

Q. Do you recall, Mr. Chase, whether Territorial Studies developed out of or was formerly a part of Special Political Affairs Division?—A. I don't recall. It would be just pure surmise and guessing.

Q. Now in the early part of your testimony you referred to Mr. Service's dispatches. Am I correct that that is not technically correct. A dispatch, as I understand it, is a paper sent by an Ambassador?—A. Yes, you are right.

Q. And the papers to which you referred were simply memoranda, were they not?—A. Yes; a form of report.

Q. Yes. They were not technically dispatches, the group of papers which Mr. Service turned in in the spring of 1945?—A. I think that is right.

Q. Now, Mr. Achilles showed you certain documents and asked you whether— he showed you certain documents in the B series which are photostats of ozalid reproductions of Service's memoranda and asked you whether by examining the documents you could determine what distribution other than that indicated by copies to ONI, MID, and so forth, and I should like to refer now to Document B-1, and I show you Document 217, which is the original memorandum of which Document B-1 is a copy, and I direct your attention to the stamp which appears on the left-hand side of this document and ask if you can tell us what that is.—
A. Well, it seems to be the receipt stamp which I suppose would have been put on by—it says "Department of State"—by DC/R or the mail room.

Q. Can you make out the letters here on the bottom of this stamp?—A. I need glasses for that. It looks to me like "II," two "I's" or two "L's"—there are two vertical lines.

Q. Let me show you also Document 216, which is the original of Document B-2, and I ask you if that bears a similar stamp on the left-hand side?—
A. Yes; that is evidently the same liaison office.

Q. It is what?—A. Department of State, April 27, 1945, FC; it looks like FC/L, Liaison Office, it looks like.

Q. Now, is the stamp on 217—A. It is obviously the same.

Q. The same?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know what the Liaison office was?—A. Well, if it is the Liaison Office that I think, I recall it was the office which was passing on material from State to War and Navy and back again, but I am not certain.

Q. I show you Document 218, which is the original of which Document B-3 is a copy, and that bears the same stamp, does it not?—A. Yes. Might I put in a statement here?

Q. Yes.—A. Which is extraneous to what you are speaking of but I would like to mention it. Seeing the original refreshes my memory in regard to distribution. I remember that on the right column here we also indicated individuals and sometimes other divisions that might see the original, I think might wish to see the original, but for whom there was no reason to supply copies, and as I recall it, not only myself but other people to whom this—other officials to whom this dispatch came in the process of its routing might think of some other office which was entitled to and interested in seeing it and they might add the name of an office.

Q. I show you Document 219, which is the original of which Document B-5 is a copy, and I ask you whether that also bears on the left-hand corner the stamp, "Department of State, Liaison Office"?—A. Yes; it does.

Q. Thus indicating that this document went there?—A. Yes; it does.

Q. Now I show you Document 220, which is the original of which Document B-6 is a copy, and I ask you if the same stamp appears on this document?—
A. Yes; it does.

Q. Thus indicating that the original of this document also went to the Liaison Office?—A. Yes.

Q. I show you Document 223 which is the original of which Document B-9 is the copy and ask you if the same stamp appears on the left-hand side of this?—
A. There seem to be two stamps here. Let's see—yes, that is the same stamp, April 27, and there seems to be an additional stamp there.

Q. An additional stamp which is—A. Which is the same stamp apparently but at a later date, May 12.

Q. This would indicate that the document had gone to the Liaison Office on two separate occasions?—A. Yes, I should think so.

Q. Now, I show you Document 221, which is the original of which Document B-11 is a copy, and ask you if the same stamp appears on this document?—
A. Yes; it does.

Q. Showing that it also was in some way distributed to the Liaison Office.

Now, Mr. Achilles questioned you about Document B-25, which was an ozalid reproduction of a dispatch, No. 2986. I now show you Document 174, which is the original of dispatch No. 2986, and I ask you whether or not the distribution symbols appearing on the face of this original indicate that it was distributed to the Special Political Affairs—whether it is a division or office, I don't know.—
A. Yes, I also notice that the writing "SPA-1" is not my writing. It looks to me as if it was probably put in by DC/R, Miss Bradshaw—that is a guess—for the reason that sometimes I would forget to put an office on or she would phone me as to whether I might want to have included on the distribution some other office.

Q. Yes, and I direct your attention to the stamp in the upper left-hand corner and ask you whether that does not indicate that this original was in fact in the Office of Special Political Affairs?—A. The stamp would certainly indicate that.

Q. Can you make out the date?—A. I think it is November 2, 1944.

The CHAIRMAN. We will have to adjourn at this point. Have you further questions you would like to ask?

Mr. RHETTS. If you would bear with me for just two questions—

The CHAIRMAN. O. K.

Q. Can you tell us, Mr. Chase, whether when an official had returned to the Department from the field and was on consultation, whether it was normal practice to route to such officers the incoming flow of materials that were distributed to the regular officers in the Division?—A. If he was detailed to the Division. Sometimes when they came back they were detailed for a time to the Division.

Q. I am asking about when you are on this so-called consultation?—A. Consultation? We would not have automatically have routed everything. I think any dispatch which concerned matters in which he had been reporting extensively or matters in which he would throw light, we might very well have called him and asked him to look over the dispatch and give his comment.

Q. But he was not on any regular distribution?—A. There was no regular distribution.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. No further questions.

A. I said, no regular distribution as far as he was concerned in any distribution.

Q. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Adjourned until 2:30.

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN S. SERVICE

Date: Tuesday, June 6, 1950—2:30 to 5:30 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State.

Reported by: E. Wake, CS/reporting.

Board members present: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles, member; Arthur G. Stevens, member; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhetts, firm of Reilly, Rhetts & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 2:30 p. m.)

(Continuation of testimony by Mr. Augustus Sabin Chase.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chase, during the time Mr. Service was in the Department on consultation, at the end of 1945, did he have access to the files of the Division of Chinese Affairs?

A. I would not say that he or any other officer had carte blanche access. I know that if he had come to me and asked to see certain papers that were in his field of duties, I certainly would have seen no reason to refuse him.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would he have had to come to you to obtain documents?

A. No; I don't think we had it systematized to such an extent. I think any officer of the Division that he would go to I think would have authorized him—

Mr. ACHILLES. But he would have had to go to some officer of the Division?

A. Normally it would have come through me or possibly Mr. Drumright, sitting next to me.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall whether Mr. Service ever asked for ozalid copies of his reports?

A. No; I do not. He could have, because as I have said, there were such a large number of documents and so many people coming in, that I could not recall it but I certainly don't recall it.

Mr. ACHILLES. When the reports that Mr. Service brought back with him were turned over to you, either by Mr. Service or some other officer in the Division, do you recall how many copies there were of those reports.

A. As far as I know there was only one of each. I don't recall their being more than one copy. Certainly there were no ozalids made at that time.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you don't recall as to whether the reports which he actually brought with him were in more than one copy?

A. I don't recall.

Mr. STEVENS. If Mr. Service had wished to take a number of documents out of the files it certainly would have been observed, would it not, by the persons who were in the places where the files were? I mean there couldn't have been a large number removed without—

A. He would have had to ask the aid of one of us because there is a large number of filing cabinets and he would have had to come to one of us.

Mr. STEVENS. You don't recall which one?

A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the date on which you received the originals of the reports that Mr. Service brought back with him?

A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it be in April?

A. I don't even recall that. I assume it would have been in April—when he returned.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe your examination of the originals this morning showed that the ozalids were prepared about April 27.

A. Well, the only stamp, marked April 27, that I recall seeing is that of the Liaison Office. It could not have been later than that date. It might have been before.

The CHAIRMAN. The ozalids had been prepared by that day?

A. The stamp would indicate that. They reached the Liaison Officer on the 27th.

Mr. ACHILLES. That was the office that actually transmitted the reproduced copies to other agencies?

A. At least to War and Navy. I don't know about the other offices.

Mr. ACHILLES. Let me understand this—the fact that the original shows a stamp of the Liaison Office as of April 27—if that is the date—would not necessarily indicate the ozalid had been prepared by that time, would it?

A. That is correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. That is an original. I just ask you whether that is indicative of the fact to you?

A. Yes; it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you look at one of those ozalids shown you this morning, if counsel will produce one, it doesn't make any difference which one—No. B-1 for instance—and see if you can tell from it the date on which the ozalids were prepared as near as you can.

Mr. RHETTS. You want to show him B-1, the photostat?

The CHAIRMAN. The original too of the same date. Taking those two papers together, can you tell (a) when your office received the original, and (b) when the ozalids were prepared?

A. I don't think I can tell you offhand.

The CHAIRMAN. Doesn't it appear there what date the office received the original?

A. It is the date of the Division of Chinese Affairs, May 10.

The CHAIRMAN. That is when the original came to CA?

A. That is when it was recorded coming to CA.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it stamped by the Department?

A. It has the Department of State "Liaison" April 27. Now, as I think I said this morning, I guess this is one which was handed to me by another officer or Mr. Service. It was abnormal—it wasn't the usual way of doing things and I wasn't the one that usually put on the Chinese Affairs stamp. It might not have occurred to me that should be done immediately and this Chinese stamp could have been put on later I think. It is a matter of routine to show—

Mr. STEVENS. Was it customary for you to place that stamp on before it was sent to be reproduced, if these things were handed to you? I think you testified this morning you might have kept the copies together to read.

A. Yes; I might. As far as I know, I did not put the stamp, "Division of Chinese Affairs," on them. I am pretty certain I never did. I think they appeared in my box usually with the stamp, the stamp having been put on by one of the girls in CA.

Mr. STEVENS. But you had to take a look at them and put a stamp on before being sent to Reproduction?

A. Yes; but in this case, if delivered to me personally, I could have put the distribution on first without seeing that they had not been entered and recorded "Chinese Affairs Division."

The CHAIRMAN. What is your testimony as to the date of the preparation of the ozalids?

A. I don't think I could give any answer except by pretty careful study of the stamps and thinking back.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give two offside dates?

A. Well, I should judge that the copies were probably made sometime prior to April 27, because I don't think that we would have sent the original on to the liaison office to go to the Army and Navy without having copies made. I see up here the Division of Administration, Management, Reproduction stamped 2 days, April 27 and April 30. It could have been made on the 27th perhaps and the original immediately sent to the Liaison Section.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that document.

A. Also it is not quite clear in my mind—the ozalid process—whether ozalids came in just the original or whether there was another copy that came in from the field of some sort from which other copies could have been made.

Mr. ACHILLES. From the fact that Document No. 217 is stamped by the Reproduction Section, Department of State, April 27, 1945, and by the Liaison Office also on April 27, 1945, I would assume that the ozalid copies were made on April 27 and sent to the Liaison Office for distribution the same day.

A. I should think so.

Mr. STEVENS. Could we possibly examine one or two of the others that were given at the same time to see if that same set of circumstances prevails.

Mr. RHETTS. At the risk of including argumentation in the record here, Mr. Achilles, I wonder if the fact that the original shows the stamp of the Liaison Section on that date, whether that is any indication ozalids were delivered to the Liaison Section on that date. I suggest perhaps only the original went to the Liaison Section on that date.

Mr. ACHILLES. My impression would be that the original and the ozalid copies were sent from the Reproduction Section to the Liaison Office, the original indicating the agencies and the number of copies to which the ozalids would be sent.

A. This communication has just the same stamps as the previous one.

Mr. ACHILLES. Are they both dated April 27?

A. They are both dated April 27.

Mr. RHETTS. What document is this?

The CHAIRMAN. B-2.

Mr. ACHILLES. Document 218 is the original document.

Mr. RHETTS. It is the original of which B-3 is a copy.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. Does Document No. 219 bear the same stamps?

A. Yes; just the same.

Mr. ACHILLES. The same dates?

A. Yes; both April 27th.

Mr. RHETTS. I might say that 219 is the original of which B-5 is a copy.

Mr. ACHILLES. And document 220?

A. Also the same two stamps—the same dates—April 27.

Mr. RHETTS. This is the original of which B-6 is a copy.

Mr. ACHILLES. And document 223?

A. Also the same.

Mr. RHETTS. This is the original of which B-29 is the copy.

A. I notice one of those is specifically marked "DC/R," Miss Bradshaw. I don't know if I am speaking out of turn but as far as record procedure is concerned, if she has not already been interviewed, she probably would have a pretty good idea of procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. Now then, your conclusion as to the date of the preparation of the ozalid copies, as shown you, is that they were made on the 27th of April?

A. I should think that was probable; yes, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Chase, did you ever meet Mr. Philip Jaffe?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Service has testified that early in May he brought Mr. Jaffe to the Department to inquire concerning a copy of a report broadcast from Yenan, and that he at that time introduced Mr. Jaffe to an officer of the Division of Chinese Affairs, which he believed was yourself. Do you recall any incident like that?

A. I don't think so but it was 5 years ago, to begin with, and in the second place, I have a poor memory, and in the third place, such things were fairly common occurrences so the mere fact that I don't recollect it would not prove that is not the case. I just don't remember.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you mean it was a common occurrence for FCC broadcasts to be made available to press people?

A. I didn't mean that but I meant people coming in to see me of the type—I mean—Foreign Service officers bringing in journalists wasn't uncommon. As I said before, I didn't see newspapermen but there would probably be a large number of people who came in to see me during that period and about whom, if you asked me now if they came in, I wouldn't have any recollection.

Mr. ACHILLES. Were you familiar with Mr. Jaffe's case at that time?

A. I believe I was. I think I had already heard of him.

Mr. ACHILLES. Were you familiar with the magazine Amerasia?

A. I think I had seen it and read a few copies, yes. I didn't follow it closely.

Mr. ACHILLES. Were you aware that Mr. Jaffe was the editor at that time?

A. I don't think I can recall that clearly enough to say. The chances are I would have known he was connected with the paper. I am not sure.

Mr. ACHILLES. In other words, the name at that time did not mean anything in particular to you?

A. Not very much.

Mr. RIETTS. I might say to the Board that Document No. 34, which Mr. Moreland is now trying to reach, does not purport to be the form in which the monitor broadcast came from the FCC to the State Department. This document here is a State Department press summary.

Mr. SERVICE. This is taken from a weekly report put out by the FCC which contains all the reports—the significant material received during the week, whereas the actual paper which was requested by Jaffe was material that kept coming in, something similar to that where the physical form is different.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Chase, I show you document 34 which is an excerpt of the transcript of a broadcast from Yenan dated May 1, and ask if you recall seeing that or a similar transcript of that broadcast.

A. No I do not and as far as I can recall, I wasn't aware any such thing was broadcast.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did the Division of Chinese Affairs at that time receive from the FCC transcripts of foreign broadcasts?

A. I don't recall this type of paper.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to ask in particular about the type of paper. Did you receive FCC monitor broadcasts at that time?

A. May I ask a little bit more about the monitor broadcasts. What did that mean—stuff taken off the air by FCC? I do recall some type of monitoring material. I don't recall what type it was or what the agency was that put it out.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall if such material was classified or unclassified?

A. I do not.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was such monitoring material from the FCC, do you recall, generally available to officers in the Division?

A. Well, if what I am thinking of was this FCC monitoring material, I think the probability there was that it was available to all officers of FE and CA.

Mr. ACHILLES. I recall, the classification on such material during the war was "Restricted." Do you have a recollection as to whether such material was made available to correspondents?

A. It certainly never was through my desk. Whether any of the other officers called for it and made it available, I do not know. I should qualify that by my original remark that everything I say is to the best of my recollection.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you don't recall dealing ordinarily with this type of material?

A. No; I do not. The only thing I do think I recall is that type of material—I would have given less attention to and less time to it than reports coming in from our officers in the field.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would such a broadcast as this by Mao Tse-tung have been considered of any particular significance by the Division of Chinese Affairs?—

A. I should think it would have, particularly if this was the first text of what he had said—that they had seen.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you don't have any recollection of seeing a recording of that particular broadcast?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. O. K.—A. I wonder if I could make one correction of a statement I made this morning?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

A. It has no particular bearing but I thought for the sake of accuracy in the record that I would like to make it; that is, when you asked me about my duties in CA, I think I said that 80 percent of my time about was given to these duties of handling incoming material. It is true that was the largest—took up the most time of any single type of work I had but I think 80 percent is too much and it is probably nearer 40 or 50 percent and my other duties included preparing memoranda for Mr. Vincent and other officers and also I generally had the job of protocol statements when there were anniversaries and such things, and several other jobs.

I mention that for the sake of accuracy and also to indicate that I have been considering the mass of documents I have coming over my desk and I didn't have quite the time to handle them that my first statement would have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. Chase, with reference to some questions that were put to you a short time ago concerning Mr. Service's access to the files of CA, the divisional files were physically located in a room which you occupied, weren't they?—A. They were in front of my desk.

Q. So had Mr. Service, for example, been a frequent visitor to those files, you likely would have noticed it?—A. I would certainly have noticed it and remembered it.

Q. Referring now to document No. 34, it was suggested by Mr. Achilles, according to his best recollection, that this type of material during the war was usually classified "Restricted." Does this Document No. 34 bear any indication that it bore any classification at all?—A. No; it does not.

Mr. ACHILLES. So that it appears to be an unclassified document?—A. Yes.

Q. Now with reference to the testimony of Mr. Service, as I believe was indicated to you, he has testified, according to his recollection, he brought Mr. Jaffe to the office of the Division of Chinese Affairs and there obtained from you a copy of this material, it appearing not to be restricted and material suitable for giving members of the press. I believe you testified that you have no recollection of that?—A. No.

Q. You haven't. By that, do you mean to testify that you have any recollection that the event did not occur, or do you merely mean to testify that you have no recollection that it did occur?—A. I have no recollection it did occur.

Q. If Mr. Service has so testified, would you think it likely the event may have occurred?—A. Certainly. I mean I have always had respect for Mr. Service's integrity and if he remembers it clearly I would think it must have occurred. That would be my honest opinion.

Q. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for coming in.

(Joseph W. Ballantine, being duly sworn testified as follows:)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Achilles will ask the questions.

Q. Mr. Ballantine, would you tell us what your official position was from the beginning of April 1945 until July of that year?—A. I was Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs.

Q. Of which the Division of Chinese Affairs was a unit, is that right?—A. Yes.

Q. During that period, as I recall, you were assigned to the delegation at the San Francisco conference?—A. That is correct.

Q. Do you remember when you left Washington for San Francisco?—A. I would have to refresh my memory. I went on the train with all that large group of people that went by train.

Q. Do you recall whether Mr. Service had returned to Washington before your departure?—A. Yes; I think he had, yes. I am not positive. I would have to refresh my memory.

Q. Do you recall whether he reported to you when he arrived in Washington?—A. No; I do not recall that he reported to me in particular. I had in my mind his reports in the field.

Q. But you don't recall whether he personally came in to see you on his return from China?—A. I don't recall but I will presume he did, but I have no definite recollection.

Q. Mr. Service testified he brought back from China with him certain copies of his report. Do you remember whether you actually saw the reports which he brought back?—A. I think I saw some reports that he brought back but whether they were reports he brought back or whether—my memory is confused as to whether I have in my mind reports he had written from the field previously or whether he had brought them back at that time.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the disposition by the Department of the reports which he brought back with him?—A. No; I have no knowledge other than that they were disposed of in the usual way and through the usual channels.

Q. When officers from the Far East were called to the Department for consultation, what were they generally expected to do while they were in Washington?—A. Well, they usually had them sit in on our weekly conferences of the staff or they would meet with the different people in the office and give their impressions and then we would try to bring them up to date on the different points of view.

Q. Were they normally expected to confer with far-eastern specialists in the other branches of Government while here on consultations?—A. I don't think so. I don't know. You see, there was such a tremendous amount of multiplicity of agencies at that time that had relations with the Far East and it had always been traditional for them to see people such as John Mosher in the Department of Commerce when opportunity permitted, and of course various offices in the Department not only in relation to political matters but in relation to their administrative concerns.

I don't recall to what extent individual officers called on OSS people. I don't think there was a practice of calling on ONI and MIS to any extent unless they were asked for by MIS or ONI.

Q. What was the FE policy at the time with respect to officers home on consultation addressing staffs of organizations such as the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. I think the general policy of FE was that officers were expected to confine themselves to factual observations and to matters that were entirely consistent with official policy; that is to say, it was one thing for an officer to report his views to the Department—his own views on what should be done—but certainly it was never a part of the policy of FE or any part of the Department for officers to express, outside or to their superior officers or within departmental circles, policies that were inconsistent with policies that had been established by the Department of State.

Q. But was it the practice at the time for officers home on consultation to meet with the staffs of organizations such as the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. No.

Q. Do you recall whether Mr. Service, during that period of consultation, did attend a meeting with the research staff of the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you recall what the policy was for relations between officers home on consultation and members of the press?—A. The practice certainly wasn't—well, I will put it this way: Certainly there was no practice of officers here on consultation discussing matters of policy with the press.

Q. How about matters of a nonpolicy nature connected with the area in which they were stationed?—A. Well, insofar as I know, the same policy governed all officers of the Department at that time. At that time my recollection is that if the press representative wanted to see an official of the Department of State, he had to arrange for an interview through an officer of Current Information and the nature of the questions which the press correspondent wanted to ask would be cleared with the Office of Current Information before any action was taken with respect to such a request.

The CHAIRMAN. Were any specific instructions issued by your office on that subject to returning servicemen?

A. I don't know that any specific instructions were issued other than that the instructions that were based on arrangements made for Current Information were circulated all through the Office of Far Eastern Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. But not regularly, I take it, Mr. Ballantine. I think it is common practice, isn't it, for any new regulations to be circulated and once circulated, it becomes a part of the regular file of the office that received it. Now my question is: Was any effort made to instruct the people coming home from the field for brief periods here as to their course of action with respect to press representatives? Was any positive step taken?

A. I do not know of any positive step that was taken. Of course there was a provision in the Foreign Service regulations about discretion in talking with the press and I think it was assumed from the very inception of people entering the Service that they were supposed to be discreet at all times in talking with representatives of the press. That was so fundamental. I don't think there was any occasion for this as far as I know—for any specific injunctions to Foreign Service officers home on consultation.

Q. Did you ever meet Mr. Philip Jaffe?—A. No.

Q. Did you, in 1945, know his name or who he was?—A. Yes; I think I did know that he was editor of Amerasia.

Q. Do you recall Mr. Service ever consulting you as to Mr. Jaffe's reliability?—A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall what the provision of the Foreign Service regulations, that you refer to, was? Could you refer us to it?

A. I think that the reference is a little bit narrower perhaps, now that I recall it, than what I suggested. The provision related to making public utterances rather than interviews with the press—with correspondents—referring to speeches being cleared I think with the Department other than that of a purely ceremonial nature and of course there was always the sort of thing, the instructions that we could not write anything for publication without clearance from the Department. I would understand that to imply that we were not to talk.

Mr. STEVENS. That would have been your interpretation?

A. My own interpretation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what is meant by "background information" so called?

A. Yes; I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?

A. Background information is information that a person could get through publicly ascertainable sources if he had the time and the facilities and the know-how to get, and that background information was such that we frequently gave a fill-in to the press. If a correspondent would come up and see me, for example, and a Foreign Service officer, based on his knowledge of the country, acquired in the field, gave information on the career of some person who had just been made Prime Minister, that would be background information.

The CHAIRMAN. Background information given to the press sometimes included material which the press would agree not to publish?

A. I don't think so. I think whatever you told the press was material they could publish but the only restriction was that they would not father it on to you; that is, they would not quote and have it ascribed to an officer of the Department of State.

The CHAIRMAN. What about classified information? Does the press ever receive classified information with the instructions they can publish it as background information?

A. No, not that I know of, and I don't know of any case where classified information would be given to the press without specific authorization from the superior officer.

The CHAIRMAN. A superior officer would have the power to authorize it?

A. I would not consider myself superior enough to authorize it. I would want to take it to the Secretary of State. There might be some particular reason for giving it out.

The CHAIRMAN. At what echelon do you think it could be authorized?

A. I would say that an Assistant Secretary of State—he might himself—he would have to get clearance from the Secretary but if an Assistant Secretary of State would authorize it, I would feel that was his responsibility.

Mr. STEVENS. Was it general practice or your own general practice? Was that common in the Department?

A. I think it was general practice.

Mr. STEVENS. You mentioned a few moments ago that the officers who came in from the field were not to seek discussion with OSS, ONI, or somebody else. I believe that was your remark. Suppose OSS or MID or ONI were to request an officer to come over and discuss the situation he found in the field and the persons requesting were persons who were in a position to utilize—

A. I think you misunderstood me. I did not mean to imply that an officer from the field was not to seek discussion with the various agencies. I said the agencies had become so multiplied that it was difficult for a person in the field to have gone around. I don't think it is general practice for officers coming in from the field to go and see those various agencies but I certainly think that if one of those agencies had requested the presence of an officer that it would be only courtesy to comply.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Ballantine, what was the organization that Mr. Blakeslee had and what was its relationship to the Office of Far Eastern Affairs?

A. That relationship was different. It differed in two separate periods. In the earlier period that organization was headed under Mr. Pasvolski, Postwar Planning Committee. Later on that organization consisted of a large number of specialists from the educational fields that had been taken into the State Department in connection with postwar planning. Later on that organization was broken up and the specialists in the various fields were assigned to the respective regional divisions to which they belonged.

As a result, that group, under Mr. Blakeslee, came into the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. Prior to their coming over there had been set up, however, a Far Eastern Interdivisional Area Committee which consisted of these specialists plus regular officers of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs plus other specialists for some ad hoc discussions of some particular problems about which they were concerned.

We often had officers from the Office of European Affairs come over in connection with matters relating to southeast Asia because they were colonial problems involved and there were sometimes economic experts that came in for a particular discussion.

Dr. Blakeslee was a special assistant to the Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. After that reorganization took place, he served as chairman of that—

Mr. STEVENS. Can you tell us when that second phase was reached, when the group was picked out and a part of it came to the Office of Far Eastern Affairs?

A. I do not recall exactly when that—

Mr. STEVENS. You don't know whether it was in 1944 or 1945?

A. No, it would be rather difficult for me—I don't recall.

Mr. STEVENS. Did Dr. Blakeslee and his people have access to any usable information that came from the field that had a bearing on their problems?

A. They had access to most documentary material that had a bearing on their problems.

Mr. STEVENS. Would Mr. Service's reports have been made available to them as a matter of course?

A. I should think so, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel?

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Do you recall when the San Francisco Conference commenced—what time?—A. No, but I think it was the latter part of April that we left for San Francisco. It was in the last week of April.

Q. Would April 25 sound right to you?—A. Yes.

Q. So you presumably left Washington prior to April 25 for the opening?—A. About 5 days.

Q. About 5 days. So you would probably have left about April 20?—A. Yes.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. No further questions. Thank you very much, Mr. Ballantine. (Ten-minute recess.)

(Michael J. McDermott, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name, Mr. McDermott?

A. Michael James McDermott.

The CHAIRMAN. And your residence?

A. Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Your position in the State Department is?

A. Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for Press Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you explain to the board what is meant by "background information" that is made available to the press as such?

A. There are really two categories of background information. There is a category that applies when you send a correspondent to an official of the Department. The official gives him information which is really of public knowledge and in the encyclopedia, and that sort of thing, which the expert is supposed to have at his fingertips and it saves the correspondent getting it out of the books.

Excluded from that is any indication of what action the Department will take on a particular matter. That is not cricket. Sometimes correspondents try to get that in a background category.

The other category—we very often have conferences with American correspondents whom you can depend on, and we want to give them information which they can use in their stories.

The CHAIRMAN. Which they cannot?

A. Which they can use in their stories but cannot divulge the source. It may be very desirable for the public to have the knowledge conveyed, but it would be bad in our relations with the foreign governments if it were known that a high official of the Department had actually said these things.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this latter category classified information from the technical sense?

A. No, it is not classified because there is no way of controlling it. The information is given with the expectation that it will be used and, therefore, it cannot be classified.

Mr. STEVENS. Let us see if we understand what that means. You mean by that the classified information—

A. My conception is information which falls in the category of "top secret," "secret," "confidential," and "restricted."

Mr. ACHILLES. But gives information in documents that have been so classified. Is that properly given to correspondents for background but not for publication?

A. I think it is apparent that when one is discussing a situation on the basis of his knowledge that he discusses it frankly and reading it off his mind and not off documents. The person doing the talking must of course have an awareness of what should or should not be said.

Mr. ACHILLES. I understand from that last information that at times information, although it may also be contained in documents that are classified "top secret," "secret," "confidential," or "restricted," may nevertheless be given to the press as background information not to be used.

A. Most certainly because in many documents classified as "secret" there is a great deal of information that is not secret.

Mr. ACHILLES. In other words, the mere fact that a document is classified as a whole does not mean that nothing in it can be told to the press. Is that right?

A. The document itself—the content of it cannot be divulged. If the information is available elsewhere it can certainly be discussed. Should a document pertaining to secret information also have a report of what appeared in the press, I would not be precluded from using the press information.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. McDermott, how long have you held your present position?

A. Since 1928.

Mr. ACHILLES. And the information you have just given us is applicable over that whole period?

A. Yes, I would say so. I would say that since the outbreak of the war everybody has been much more careful in not revealing information as he receives it.

The CHAIRMAN. And that decision you make on the basis of the information itself rather than on the basis of whether it happens to appear in a classified document?

A. If it is in a classified document, I don't use the document.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't use the document?

A. If it is within my general knowledge, I use my discretion whether it is secret or unclassified.

The CHAIRMAN. That information—

A. General information I have in my head. I don't deal with documents when dealing with the press unless a document has been declassified.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with the rules of declassification?

A. No.

Mr. STEVENS. Your interpretation of what background information means, sir, as just given, has that ever become a part of the regulations for the guidance of people who either are in the Department or who come from the field to the Department on consultation?

A. It is for the possession of everybody who has had any dealings with the press.

Mr. STEVENS. Has it ever been written?

A. No, I don't recall that it has been written.

Mr. STEVENS. Have you ever served as a Foreign Service officer?

A. Not as a Foreign Service officer. I have served on special assignments for the Department.

Mr. STEVENS. People working for you, or you quite often, I believe sir, send correspondents to see particular people in the Department about subjects?

A. That is right.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you ever stipulate to those people precisely the type of questions that should be answered or do you leave that to the judgment of the officer?

A. It varies depending on how well I know the officer and if the officer has had similar contacts before.

The CHAIRMAN. But if you have confidence in the officer and he is a discreet officer, you do that?

A. I do that.

Mr. STEVENS. This particular judgment is exercised by you, and by the other persons that deal with the press under you?

A. That's right.

Mr. ACHILLES. In the course of your duties, do you ever have occasion to send correspondents to Foreign Service officers temporarily in the Department on consultation?

A. I don't recall that I have. When ambassadors and ministers return from abroad it is our present practice to contact them and arrange for a press conference.

Mr. STEVENS. If an individual newspaperman knew an ambassador was here, is there a stipulation that the newspaperman must come through your organization before contacting an ambassador or Foreign Service officer?

A. The ambassadors, having been through the mill a number of times, usually tell the correspondents they better contact me. Then the ambassador contacts me and we arrange, to save the ambassador's time, to get the correspondents in a group. There is nothing to prevent a correspondent from approaching a Foreign Service officer or approaching an ambassador and talking with them.

Mr. STEVENS. Is there anything to prevent correspondents from approaching an officer in the Department?

A. No.

M. STEVENS. They do it?

A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Is there anything in writing that the officer is supposed to inform your office if he is contacted by a press man?

A. No, there is nothing.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it, therefore, in your judgment, left to the discretion of the office to which this person is to be assigned for consultation to give appropriate guidance in handling such matters?

A. I don't know. I have never gone into it.

The CHAIRMAN. In the last analysis it is a question of the discretion of the officer concerned, isn't it?

A. I would say in the first and last analysis that we have to put absolute dependence on the good judgment of our officers.

Mr. ACHILLES. You say you don't ordinarily arrange appointments between Foreign Service officers in the Department on consultation and press correspondents?

A. No, not ordinarily, no. Referring to the category of Foreign Service officer coming home for consultation, usually the press does not even know he is here. Unless there is something newsworthy in connection with an officer coming back to the United States, I am not interested either.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do officers in the Department or officers home for consultation generally or some times inquire of you as to the reliability of newspaper people?

A. Yes, they do very often.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did Mr. Service ever inquire of you as to the reliability of Philip Jaffe?

A. Not to my recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. RHETTS. May I ask a few questions please?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course. Go ahead.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. McDermott, I wonder if you can tell us—you have given us a description of what is called background information. Isn't it a fact that it is a regular common practice for officials of the Department of State to give to correspondents information of a character which is definitely classified, subject to the restriction that they shall not print it but it is available to them so that they may interpret more properly known events? A. Do I understand your suggestion is that officers of the Department of State deliberately put classified information in the hands of correspondents?

Q. Yes.—A. No; it isn't done to my knowledge.

Q. It isn't done to your knowledge?—A. That's right.

Q. As I understand it, by classified information, you mean information that is embodied in a document that bears the stamp "top secret," "secret," "confidential," or "restricted."—A. You are asking if this is not a general practice?

Q. Yes.—A. It isn't a general practice. It may be an exception.

Q. Is it occasional?—A. It isn't a general practice and if there are violations I don't know of them.

Q. Can you tell us what is the term or origin, in the journalistic field, for information supplied to a correspondent which he may not use at all except for his own information and assistance to enable him to interpret other available information?—A. The Secretary of State may talk to correspondents off the record if there is any indication what his course will be, what his thinking is, and ask them not to publish that.

Q. That is not an uncommon practice?—A. It is done—

Q. That is called, technically, off the record?—A. That is off the record.

Q. Is it a frequent practice for officials of the Department to give the press off-the-record information, which information may very well be classified information?—A. The Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of State occasionally discuss matters off the record with correspondents. It isn't a matter of divulging information that has been classified but a frank exposition of how they view a situation, and perhaps an indication of how they intend to handle it. If it were classified information they are the people who are competent to declassify the information. It isn't off-the-record background.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not from time to time?

A. The Secretary may do it and the Under Secretary may. The other officials in the Department don't.

Q. No other officials in the Department ever do that?—A. No.

Q. Do you not have occasion from time to time to arrange for officers in the Department to brief members of the press with off-the-record information so as to enable them to properly interpret events which may not yet have occurred?—A. No sir.

Q. You have never had any request to do that?—A. The Secretary has had off-the-record conferences and the Under Secretary—

Q. But nobody else?—A. The Secretary and the Under Secretary hold off-the-record conferences. The conferences I arrange with other officials of the Department are background conferences at which correspondents are given a picture of the situation as the official sees it and there is no divulging without authorization of classified information. We are not so rash as to tell a lot of people a lot of secret stuff for any purpose.

Q. Now you testified that normally you had no requests to refer correspondents to Foreign Service officers who were here on consultation and you later indicated that normally there was no news attached to it and a correspondent would not be interested. What about the situation of a Foreign Service officer who has recently returned from an area which is newsworthy? Is it not a common practice, under those circumstances, when the correspondents know that such an officer has returned from an area that is newsworthy—is it not common practice to refer correspondents to such officers for information?—A. I don't object to the wording but I want to set you right. It is common practice if a Foreign Service officer returns from a part of the world where he has newsworthy information, like Paxton, who left his post and traveled overland through the mountain passes into India. We arranged for him to see the correspondents. That was newsworthy.

Then there was the case of Angus Ward returning from Mukden. We arranged for him to see the correspondents. That was newsworthy.

Q. So when they come from an area that is newsworthy, you do arrange for them to see the correspondents?—A. Yes; and I usually run over with the officer what he will talk to them about.

Q. Is that an invariable practice?—A. It is normal practice.

Q. Do you recall, Mr. McDermott, during the war, during the years 1944 and 1945, when there was considerable public interest in the Chinese Communists and their activities and plans and programs?—A. I recall there was.

Q. Do you recall that certain Foreign Service officers had been assigned to be up in the Communist areas, and to learn what the Communists were doing?—A. I have some vague recollection. I had some knowledge of it.

Q. I wonder if you recall arranging a press conference for Mr. Ludden, some time in 1945, who had returned from observing some of the guerrilla warfare activities of the Chinese Communists?—A. No; I don't recall it.

Q. When you say you are quite sure you did not, you are referring to yourself personally, or are you referring to your office?—A. I have no recollection of such a press conference. I have no recollection of any press conference having been held at which the subject was activities of the Communists in China.

Q. Are records kept of press conferences that are arranged through your office?—A. They are now but they were not then. We did not have the stenographic assistance to do it. Also I might say that I am not a good witness for that period. I was too occupied in other things.

Q. Do you think, Mr. McDermott, that if it were a common practice for officials of the Department to brief members of the press, off-the-record discussions of material that is classified would come to your attention?—A. Yes; I think it would. I usually know what the officers tell the press even though the officers don't tell me.

Q. Are you familiar with the practice, in this respect, that is pursued in the field; that is, in the various Embassies and missions abroad?—A. No; I am not familiar with what they do abroad.

I would like to amend my previous statement about the background information. That is information I have given to the press for publication. It may be that if the Secretary or a qualified officer of the Department is holding such a background conference, that there might be in his remarks some information that has come out of classified documents. There is no indication to the press that the information had been so classified.

Q. Do you make any distinction here between press conferences and interviews with particular correspondents or does your testimony apply equally to large groups or single individual correspondents?—A. My testimony applies to things I arrange, and know about. What people do on the Q. T.—I don't pretend to know or keep tabs on what individual officers tell their friends.

Q. As I understand it, notwithstanding this suggestion or amendment to your earlier testimony, it is still your belief, is it, that the practice of disclosing to correspondents genuinely classified material; that is, material, the substantive content of which is classified for their use, not to be published, not alone to be attributed, is not ordinary common practice?—A. That is not an ordinary practice. I think the officer who would do that without authorization would run the very considerable risk of getting into difficulties.

Q. When you say "without authorization" that perhaps begs the question. What I am trying to get at, isn't it a common practice for officers to do it with authorization?—A. I doubt if any officers would do that.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. McDermott. You have been very helpful.

Can we clear up this issue with a few questions from the Board?

Mr. RHETTS. Which issue, the one we are on now?

The CHAIRMAN. Amerasia.

Mr. RHETTS. The issue now before the Board will take a long time to clear up as far as I can see. I feel we will have to get some witnesses here, General, to deal with the line of testimony that has been opened up by the last two witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN. You probably want to bring in Mr. Emerson then. Where is he from?

Mr. RHETTS. He is a Foreign Service officer now at the National War College.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to introduce your statement?

Mr. RHETTS. I should like at this point to introduce into the transcript document No. 93-3, which is part 3 of Mr. Service's personal statement.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be introduced into the transcript.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"PERSONAL STATEMENT OF JOHN S. SERVICE—PART 3

"When I was returned to active duty in the Department on August 12, 1945, I was informed that I would probably be assigned to the staff of the United States Political Adviser in Tokyo. In the meantime I was detailed for temporary duty in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. Here my job was to act as liaison between FE and various administrative offices of the Department in connection with the physical preparations for the imminent reopening of our Far Eastern offices in enemy and occupied territories. It was in no sense a policy job and I was not even reading telegrams and reports from China. My time was taken up with such problems as arranging for immediate shipment of supplies, copies of circular instructions and Foreign Service Regulations, consulting with the Division of Cryptography so that the offices would be equipped to receive and send telegrams, and discussing with the Division of Foreign Service Personnel the requirements and suggestions of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs in regard to staffing problems.

"On September 7, 1945, I received my orders for Tokyo. I left Washington on September 14 with Mr. George Acheson, who had been appointed the United States Political Adviser, and arrived in Tokyo with him on September 22, 1945.

"There were already a number of Japanese specialists assigned to Mr. Acheson's staff and several arrived on the spot almost simultaneously with us. As the only officer without Japanese background I was assigned as administrative and executive officer. My first duties were to obtain office space and to procure equipment and supplies, to train new and inexperienced clerical staff, to set up a filing system, and to perform all the other chores of organizing and running a new office under unusual and difficult conditions. After the office was set up and running I continued in this capacity of executive officer. I did no independent political reporting, which was left entirely to the Japan specialists on the staff, and I never at any time took part in policy discussions in Headquarters or between our office and Headquarters. The only reporting work I did, and this for only a short period, was to prepare a weekly summary of events in Japan compiled from press and other public sources. As soon as additional staff arrived, this was turned over to them.

"One of the duties assigned to our office by SCAP, and carried for a long time almost single-handedly by Mr. John K. Emmerson, was the preparation of a weekly report on the rapidly emerging new political parties of Japan. In connection with this work it was customary for the leaders of these parties to keep in touch with Mr. Emmerson and to call periodically on him at the Office of the Political Adviser. The Communist political prisoners had of course been released from prison in accordance with the SCAP directive soon after the occupation. One of the leaders of the Japanese Communist Party, Nosaka, had spent most of the war at Yen-an with the Chinese Communists. Emmerson and I had become acquainted with him there in the course of our reporting work. Nosaka applied for and received permission to return to Japan. Neither Emmerson nor I had anything to do with this. Soon after his arrival, which was probably early in January, Nosaka called with one or two of the other Japanese Communist leaders at our office to see Emmerson. Having known me in Yen-an, Nosaka, while talking to Emmerson, inquired about me and Emmerson sent word to me. I came down to the office where Nosaka and Emmerson were and had a brief conversation devoted, as far as I can remember, to his experiences on his trip from Yen-an to Tokyo. There was nothing about this conversation to cause any comment nor was there anything noteworthy in Nosaka's calling at our office. Such calls and contacts between the Communists and our political reporting officers were occurring regularly as part of their political reporting work. I do not remember any occasion where I made statements which could be interpreted as expressing an extremely favorable view of the Japanese Communist Party, as being enamored of Communist theory, or as advocating support of the Japanese Communists. Indeed, I could not have made such statements because I did not hold these views.

"I continued as executive officer until I became ill in April 1946. After four months' hospitalization, I was transferred to Wellington, New Zealand, as First Secretary, where I arrived in October 1946.

"There is very little of pertinent interest concerning my tour in New Zealand. I appeared to gain the full confidence of the Minister, Avra M. Warren, and he came to leave most of the routine operation of the mission in my hands. For eight months after his transfer I served as Chargé d'Affaires ad interim until the arrival of his successor, Robert M. Scotten. In May 1948 I was promoted to Class II, an event of considerable satisfaction to me since I felt that in a sense it put a seal on the events of 1945.

"In December 1948 I was transferred to Washington and informed that I had been appointed to serve as a member of the Foreign Service Selection Board convening in Washington January 10, 1949. Following the completion of the Selection Board work, I was assigned to the Division of Foreign Service Personnel as Special Assistant to the Chief. Here my duties were chiefly to counsel Foreign Service Officers either by mail or personal interview concerning their personnel records. In November 1949 I was assigned as officer in charge of the Consulate General at Calcutta. Since I was engaged in assisting with the preparations for the convening of the 1550 Selection Boards I was not able to leave Washington until early February. I spent a month in California on leave and sailed from Seattle on March 11. On March 17, I received orders to return to Washington by air for this hearing."

Mr. RHETTS. While I had planned to have Mr. Service testify first, if Mr. Emmerson is here we will take him out of order.

(Mr. John K. Emmerson, being duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Question by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address for the record, Mr. Emmerson?—A. John K. Emmerson, 4124 Jenifer Street NW.

Q. And what is your present position, sir?—A. Well, I am a Foreign Service officer on detail to the National War College.

Q. What was your position from the middle of 1945 until, say, September 1946?—A. Well, in the middle of 1945 I was here in the Department. On September 1 I was assigned as a political adviser to Admiral Nimitz on Guam but on my arrival there, the first part of September, I was immediately detailed to Tokyo on the staff of the political adviser to General MacArthur, and remained until February 1946, when I was transferred back to the Department as Assistant Chief of the Division of Japanese Affairs.

Q. Will you state in some additional detail the nature of your duties in Tokyo?—A. Yes. In Tokyo George Atcheson was the acting political adviser at that time and I was attached to his staff since I was a Japanese-language officer and had been in Japan for 6 years before the war. I performed the general duties of a political reporting officer. My principal work during that 5 months' period in Japan was political reporting on the beginnings of political party movements in Japan after the war and the personalities involved in various political parties, and by special order of General MacArthur our office prepared a weekly political party report which I wrote during the time I was in Tokyo.

Q. And in connection with that work, I take it you had occasion to maintain the contacts with the representatives of the various political parties in Japan?—A. That's right. Since I speak Japanese it was easy to make such contacts, and it seemed to be important at the time, so I made special efforts to get personally acquainted with the political leaders in all the parties which were active and operating at that time during the occupation.

Q. You are acquainted with Mr. Service, are you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Service, and describe, if you will, something of the nature of your relationship.—A. Well, I think—I don't know when we first met. It was one time in Tokyo when he was going through to China. But the time I actually served with him was in China when I was detailed to General Stilwell's staff at the end of 1943. I first met Mr. Service I believe in July of 1944 on that assignment when I was in Chungking and I went up to Chungking from New Delhi and then we saw each other intermittently over that period until I went to Yen-an, I believe, October of 1944 where he had been for several months. He, however, left Yen-an, I believe, the day after I arrived so we were not in Yen-an at the same time.

Then he returned to Chungking I believe just a few days before I left to come back to the States in February of 1945, and then we were together again in Japan when I was assigned to Tokyo and he came out with George Atcheson the week or so after I had arrived.

Q. What was the name of the State Department office there or whatever your group was? What was it called?—A. At that time it was called Office of Political Adviser and then became known as Diplomatic Section, SCAP.

Q. What were Mr. Service's duties in the Office of Political Adviser?—A. His duties were those of executive officer. He became the executive officer of the Political Adviser's office and had all the duties that went with that, running the office and general administration.

Q. His duties were related to administration and not to direction of the substantive operations of the office?—A. That's right; in Tokyo, yes.

Q. Were those his duties throughout his stay in Tokyo?—A. As far as I know they were, until I left. He remained on in Tokyo after I left in February 1946.

Q. Mr. Emmerson, the Board has supplied information to Mr. Service that a confidential informant has stated that he knew Mr. Service while Mr. Service was serving in Tokyo and that Mr. Service and others had conversations in the Office of the Political Adviser with various leaders of the Japanese Communist Party and that these conversations aroused considerable comment. Can you give the Board any information on what the alleged conversations might have been?—A. Well, the only one that I know of was when Sanzo Nosaka arrived at the office. He, as you know, was the leader of the Japanese Communist group in Yen-an and had come to north China sometime in 1942—in 1942 or 1943—any way he was the leader of the group which organized the Japanese propaganda school in Yen-an.

When he arrived in Japan, either the end of December or the first part of January of 1946—1945 or 1946—I am not sure of the exact date, but there was a good deal of publicity in the Japanese press when he arrived.

Mr. Service and I had met him in Yen-an when he was running the propaganda school for Japanese prisoners. One of our projects was to get as much information as possible not only on the propaganda which that group was doing but also intelligence out of Japan. They were getting periodicals and magazines and other information right out of Japan at that time, so that both of us had personally met Mr. Nosaka in China.

The morning after his arrival in Tokyo he called on the Office of the Supreme Headquarters and then came to the Office of the Political Adviser and, as I recall it, asked to see me by name and I went out to the reception room and spoke to him. Then I believe Mr. Service came in and we chatted for a very few minutes and he departed.

I believe with him at that time there were one or two other Japanese. I believe one of the other Japanese Communists was with him at the time.

Q. Do you recall how Mr. Service happened to be present?—A. As I recall it, since he had met both of us in Yenan, he asked whether Mr. Service was there and I said he was and if I am not mistaken, I went to his office and said Mr. Nosaka wanted to say "Hello" and he came into the room and they exchanged a few words and that was it. There was certainly no discussion of any consequence at all. It was purely an exchange of greetings.

Q. Was Mr. Nosaka a frequent visitor to your office?—A. No; he wasn't a frequent visitor. I saw him several times and during that period I saw him at headquarters, in the office of the Government section, and also I would see him in our office once or twice. He came in company with Mr. Tokuda, one of the three other leaders of the Japanese party, and considerable information was obtained, which formed the basis for these various reports.

Mr. ACHILLES. Information was obtained by you?

A. By me, yes. They discussed their party programs and plans and policies. These were all duly reported in the political party reports which I was sending in.

The CHAIRMAN. Plans—you mean the Japanese Communist Party?

A. Yes, the Japanese Communist Party.

Q. And the intelligence you obtained from them was what you embodied in these weekly reports to General MacArthur?—A. That's right, because I had a section on each one of the parties, beginning with the Democratic Liberals, the Socialist Party, and the Communist Party, and so on. That was a continuing report that went in every week and treated each of the political parties on the basis of the information obtained.

Q. So I take it that Mr. Nosaka's visits to the Office of the Political Adviser were strictly a matter of business and provided the source of intelligence which it was your function to supply to General MacArthur?—A. Yes, and they were known to Mr. Acheson and to headquarters. There was no secret about it.

Q. Do you have any recollection that this meeting between Mr. Service and Mr. Nosaka caused any comment amongst your colleagues in the Office of the Political Adviser?—A. Not that I know of. Nosaka had received a great deal of publicity in the Japanese press, on his return from China at that time, and everybody knew who he was.

Q. Have you ever heard it suggested that this visit, this occasion on which Mr. Service met Mr. Nosaka, aroused any unfavorable comment in any quarter?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Did you ever hear there was any comment about it in military circles as distinguished from your office?—A. He called, at the same time, on the office of the Supreme Headquarters.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you know whether Mr. Service ever had any other meetings with Mr. Nosaka?

A. Not that I know of. He may have been present at one other occasion when I saw Nosaka.

Mr. ACHILLES. Have you ever heard anything to the effect that Mr. Service and Mr. Nosaka held other meetings?

A. No.

Q. Now apparently the same informant who supplied the information, which I have just indicated to you, has also stated that Mr. Service took an extremely favorable view toward the Japanese Communists. Do you have any information on that subject?—A. I have no information on that subject at all.

Q. Did you ever hear Mr. Service express any extremely favorable views toward the Japanese Communists?—A. No.

Q. You were the political reporting officer of the office?—A. That's right, since Mr. Service was a Chinese-language officer and had specialized in Chinese affairs before, he did not, as far as I know, do any political reporting during that period.

Q. You think it likely, had he been seeking to in any way to influence official policy in a manner favorable to the Japanese Communists, he would have made his views known to you?—A. I should think so because I was writing reports and they all of course went out under Mr. Acheson. He went over and approved all political reports from the office, but Mr. Service never at any time came to me or tried to influence the reports in the office.

Q. During this period in Tokyo, did you see a great deal of Mr. Service?—A. Yes, we were in the office together. I mean we saw each other every day.

Q. Would you think that you saw enough of him so that you would be likely to be privy to his mind in terms of his views on such matters as this?—A. I should think so.

Q. It is my understanding this same informant indicated that Mr. Service seemed to be completely enamored of Communist theories while in Tokyo. Did you have any occasion to see any evidence that would support that assertion?—A. No; I saw no evidences of that.

Mr. ACHILLES. Have you ever been stationed in Moscow?—A. Yes; I have.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was that before or after this period in Tokyo?

A. That was after—from 1947 to 1949.

Mr. ACHILLES. As a result of your assignment in Moscow—I am assuming that you are familiar with Soviet Communist ideology and propagaunda, the frequent expressions and use of words, etc.—A. Yes.

Mr. ACHILLES. On the basis of your present knowledge of Communist ideology and propagaunda, would you say that Mr. Service at that time had indicated or given any evidences of thinking along those terms or shown sympathy for Communist control of China or Japan?

A. I don't know. Sympathy for Communist control of China or Japan—I don't think so.

Mr. ACHILLES. Or Soviet control?

A. Certainly not.

Mr. ACHILLES. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state the date on which you left Japan?

A. It was in February 1946. I have forgotten the date but I came with the Far Eastern Commission on the steamship Mt. McKinley in February 1946.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know, during the period while in Japan, of any other contacts Mr. Service had with the Japanese Communists than the one you have spoken of?

A. No, I do not. As I say, he may have been present at other interviews which I had with Nosaka.

The CHAIRMAN. Aside from these?

A. Aside from those in which I was present myself I know of no other contacts which he had.

The CHAIRMAN. And do you know of other cases other than these two instances in which he showed any interest in the Japanese Communists?

A. None except an academic interest which we all had in what was happening and what they were doing and the progress of their movement.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say "academic interest" you mean factual interest?

A. Yes; from the point of view of a Foreign Service officer who is supposed to be extremely interested in all these political developments but he was no more interested in the Communist Party than in the Socialist Party or the Liberal Party or the others.

The CHAIRMAN. In the pursuit of the factual interest of which you spoke, he relied on your reports rather than seeking out his own information?

A. As far as I know, except the reports that came into our office from the Government and various other sources. It was, insofar as I know, an intellectual interest because he wasn't personally concerned with writing reports himself.

(At this point the Board went into executive session.)

Mr. RHETTS. I have no further questions.

Mr. ACHILLES. I would like to ask just one question. Did you ever meet a person by the name of Thomas A. Bisson?

A. Yes; I think I met him purely in a casual way when he talked about renting a house which I had at one time.

Mr. ACHILLES. Where was this?

A. In Washington in 1942. I may have met him at one time in Tokyo, but I certainly did not talk with him, and I don't know him except two casual meetings.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you remember how long he was in Tokyo during the period Mr. Service was assigned there?

A. I do not, because I don't know when he went to Tokyo. I believe he was in Tokyo for quite some time.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall whether Mr. Service knew him?

A. I don't know.

Mr. ACHILLES. Not to your knowledge?

A. That's right.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Emmerson. Mr. Achilles, can you finish up your questions on the preceding issue?

(Testimony by Mr. Service as follows:)

Questions by Mr. Achilles:

Q. Mr. Service, you have testified, I believe, that you did not have in your possession at any time an ozalid copy of your reports. Is that correct?—A. That is correct. When you say "in my possession," you mean "to retain"?

Q. That is correct.—A. I may have had one or two in my hand at some time, but I never had any in my possession to retain.

Q. Did you ever give any one any ozalid copies of your reports?—A. I never gave any one ozalid copies of my reports at any time. I mentioned one instance, which I recall, when I was asked by Mr. Vincent to have a brief talk with Mr. Robertson, who was going out to China as Minister Counselor at Chungking, and I think at that time, according to my recollection, I had someone dig out, in the Division of Chinese Affairs, several of my earlier memoranda which I used in my conversation with Mr. Robertson and left with him, but I never gave any ozalid copies to people outside the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say "left with him"—

A. It took place in Mr. Vincent's office, and the long report I left with him to read.

Q. But you never gave Mr. Jaffe ozalid copies of your reports?—A. I did not.

Q. Or Mr. Larsen?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or Mr. Gayn?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or Lieutenant Roth?—A. No, sir.

Q. You have also testified, I believe, on Miss Mitchell?—A. I did not.

Q. You have also testified, I believe, that you did give a carbon copy of one of your reports to Mr. Jaffe on the evening of April 19, 1945, and that the following day you allowed him to keep perhaps 8 or 10 copies of other of your reports?—A. That is correct. Those are my personal carbon copies.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. Your testimony wasn't that you gave him copies or allowed him to keep copies but that you allowed him to take them for a limited period.

A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you allow him to take that first report with him, to retain it?

A. Not to retain it.

The CHAIRMAN. To retain it overnight.

A. I believe I did. I wasn't positive on that point, but to the best of my recollection I did, there being no opportunity for him to read it at the time that I met him.

Q. Prior to your meeting with Mr. Jaffe on April 19th, you had no knowledge of whether or not he was editor of Amerasia?—A. That is correct.

Q. And you did not or did you make any inquiries of anyone in the Department, either in Mr. McDermott's office or the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, as to his reliability as a journalist?—A. I did not prior to that meeting on the 19th.

Q. Did you subsequently?—A. Yes; subsequently I made some inquiries. I am not sure exactly from whom.

Q. Someone in the Department?—A. Yes; and some people outside the Department.

Q. And do you recall what in general was the nature of their replies to your inquiries?—A. I think I testified regarding one inquiry I made to Lieutenant Roth, who assured me Mr. Jaffe was not a Communist. He called him, I believe, a left-winger. I remember specifically an inquiry of a newspaper correspondent, who I knew quite well out in China, who had at one time been a Trotskyite. As I remember, he did not believe that Jaffe was a Communist, but he did not like him. That inquiry was not made until sometime after these events took place.

Q. But you made no inquiry about him prior to April 20?—A. No, sir; I had not.

Q. Could you explain why you gave a journalist, about whose reliability you had no information, copies of your reports to read?—A. Part of the reason was the substantive nature of the reports. The material was of general knowledge and had been used repeatedly in talks and was already largely duplicated in writings by correspondents on visits to China and by other writers who visited China.

The second reason was, I believe, that I had been accustomed for at least 2 years previously, or very nearly 2 years previously, to dealing on the basis of mutual confidence with a large number of correspondents and members of the press, and I had never had any reason to believe the confidences had been violated; and I think it should be borne in mind for 2 years previously, or very nearly 2 years previously, I had been in a very unusually independent position for a young Foreign Service officer.

Q. What criteria, if I might ask again, did you use in deciding which of your reports you felt it appropriate to show Mr. Jaffe?—A. The general criteria was that they were informative, factual, descriptive, and containing material describing the Chinese Communists, what they were doing, what their program and policy was, whether it was the type of material which had been used in such talks as the background talks to the research staff of the Institute of Pacific Relations, whether it was the type of information which was available to correspondents in Yenan.

Q. Have you ever, subsequent to June 6, 1945, shown any classified material to a correspondent whose reliability you had not inquired about?—A. I have never, since April 20, shown any classified information of any kind to any correspondent. I have never at any time shown any correspondent a copy of a dispatch or a telegram or an official memorandum of the State Department, or similar official papers of the United States Army or any other Government agency. The only papers I have ever shown a correspondent are these personal copies of my personal memoranda which did not purport to be other than my personal views or observations.

Q. And since that time you have not shown any unofficial person any copies of your own memoranda or similar memoranda?—A. I never have. I might say I have never followed the practice of keeping personal copies of dispatches which I wrote for anyone else's signature, and since these events I have had several occasions to warn junior officers and to dissuade them from keeping copies of dispatches which they have drafted.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I believe you have testified, have you not, Mr. Service, that your instructions in the field with respect to your relationships with press representatives were oral?—A. That is correct.

Q. Were you ever informed by any person in the Department as to any oral rules or regulations with respect to your contacts with the press when you were in Washington on consultation?—A. I never received such instructions from anyone in any form.

Q. You did not seek them either?—A. No, sir; I did not. I might say also, if I may, that I have never, either during my period with the Army nor during my duty with the Department of State prior to my arrest, prior to June 1945, been criticized or reprimanded in any way concerning any relations with the press.

Q. When you were given authorization—I believe you stated you were given authorization to appear before the Institute of Pacific Relations?—A. Yes, sir; I did so testify.

Q. Were you instructed by the person who gave you authorization as to the substance of your talk?—A. I do not recall any instructions whatsoever concerning what I should say.

Q. Do you interpret that as meaning to use your discretion as to materials you may utilize; that is, the subject matter which you might utilize?—A. Yes. That is why there was no prepared text in any sense, and I was never asked for any.

The CHAIRMAN. For a moment that closes that phase of the case as far as the Board is concerned. Do you have anything more you wish to offer at this time, or do you wish to go ahead with the Chinese affairs?

Mr. RHETTS. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to know how to proceed here because of new materials that have come into the proceeding and into lines of testimony that have been given by Mr. Ballantine and Mr. McDermott. I feel now we must develop this subject matter at some length, so that I am not prepared to leave the present phase of this as it stands. I mean, we can go ahead with this Japanese material now.

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel is at liberty to produce evidence at any time. I am inquiring as to the present disposition of this case, whether you wish to go ahead.

Mr. RHETTS. I will go ahead now with the further material on this. Will you take the stand, Mr. Service, please.

Mr. SERVICE. Yes.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I should like to introduce into the transcript Document 10-3.
(The matter referred is as follows:)

"DOCUMENT No. 10-3

"(Remarks of Congressman Dondero, Congressional Record, October 10, 1945, p. 9553)

"From these known facts, the case bears all the earmarks of a whitewash. Congress should inquire into this case. Who is responsible for its liquidation? What is behind it? This is the same crowd who opposed our national defense program in 1940 and 1941. This means that from now on Soviet agents can carry on espionage with impunity. This is an open invitation to subversive elements in our Government to continue, expand, and increase their activities and defy all consideration of national security. This is the same crowd which is now vilifying General MacArthur. This is not the cause for which enormous sacrifices in blood and treasure were made unstintingly by our country. Congress must inquire into this matter. The people look to us for action."

Q. I should like to ask you, Mr. Service, whether you have ever had any occasion to vilify the work of General MacArthur, as is indicated in this statement by Congressman Dondero?—A. I certainly have not, and I think anyone who is acquainted with the status of the Office of the Political Adviser in Tokyo, during this period I was there, would realize that we were in no position whatever to vilify the activities of General MacArthur, who was the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers, in any way. General MacArthur received his orders and instructions, as I recall it, from the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Mr. ACHILLES. I believe the allegation made in this particular document is not that you were supervising General MacArthur but that you were vilifying him.

Q. I should like to refer further to Document 10-3 and ask you, Mr. Service, whether you ever at any time opposed the national defense program in 1940 and 1941?—A. I certainly did not. I wasn't in a position to write dispatches or other papers on the subject. I was a junior officer assigned to the consular general in Shanghai, and I believe all my friends who knew me at the time would be able to testify that my sympathies were entirely interventionist, you might say, during that period. I was extremely happy over the destroyer deal; I was privately critical, among my friends, because of the Neutrality Act which hampered our aid to Europe; I was an enthusiastic supporter of lend-lease; and I would have been willing for our Government to go much further if public opinion had supported it, since I believed we would have to be in the war eventually and that it was really in a sense our war. I did not, of course, make any public statements during that period nor write for publication.

Mr. ACHILLES. What was the Communist attitude toward the war during that period?

A. The Communist attitude at that time was that it was an imperialistic war, and the Communists attacked every step we progressively took to ready ourselves and bring ourselves into a position to enter the war.

Q. Have you ever at any time been engaged in any program vilifying General MacArthur?—A. I have never been engaged in any such program. I never have vilified him.

The CHAIRMAN. General MacArthur?

A. Yes.

Q. I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point Documents 58-3 and 84-3.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"KAMP—AMERICA BETRAYED

"Acheson and Service were sent to backstop General MacArthur in Japan, although MacArthur rejected Service."

"(Taylor, Henry J.—J/S Record—Congressional Record, May 1, 1950, pp. A3322—A3323)

"After all this, Service was assigned to Japan to tell General MacArthur, of all people, how to negotiate with Russia. General MacArthur reportedly rejected Service."

A. I might say I have been asked many times about General MacArthur by many people who know I have been in Japan, and I have always expressed my honest opinion that he did a splendid job in Japan. The occupation was handled magnificently.

Q. Referring to Documents 58-3 and 84-3, Mr. Service, I believe you indicated you were transferred by the Department of State from Tokyo to a post in New Zealand largely because you had been in extremely ill health during the last 4 months of your stay in Tokyo?—A. That's right. I was hospitalized the last 4 months in Tokyo.

Q. Do you have any knowledge that General MacArthur either rejected you, when it was proposed to send you to Tokyo, or that he ever had any connection with your transfer from Tokyo to New Zealand?—A. No, sir; he could not have rejected me, because the Department of State would not have sent me if he had made any objection; and on the first day I was there he received me extremely cordially. I might say, when I was returning to Washington for these hearings, his headquarters was extremely kind in making available for myself and my family living quarters at the Imperial Hotel, which is a billet reserved for people of considerable rank, rooms in which are made available only by specific authorization of General MacArthur's own office.

Q. In connection with these charges that have been made by Mr. Kamp and Mr. Henry J. Taylor, did you make any effort to obtain an expression of facts from General MacArthur?—A. I did not personally, sir, but I understand the Department of State has made such an inquiry.

Q. And has a paraphrase of the reply, which the Department of State received, been made available to you?—A. It has.

Q. Is that document 322?—A. That is correct.

Q. I should like to ask at this time that Document 322 be included in the transcript at this point.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

“PARAPHRASE OF PART OF A COMMUNICATION FROM TOKYO

“With reference to the recall of Mr. John Service from Tokyo, General MacArthur has indicated that he was not connected in any way with that action which he understands was made on the Department of State's own initiative because of Mr. Service's prolonged illness. The General has stated also that he did not reject the proposal of the State Department that Mr. Service be assigned to Japan. He further indicated that he has not had personally any connection with this incident.”

Q. Now, Mr. Service, in your personal statement, which has already been included in the transcript, you have described the circumstances of your meeting Mr. Nosaka in Tokyo. This, I take it, was an attempt to describe the incident of your meeting Mr. Nosaka in the office of the political adviser, as has been charged in one of the papers furnished to you by the Board. Is that correct?—A. That is correct.

Q. Did you ever, after this occasion which you have described, see Mr. Nosaka again?—A. Yes, very briefly, on two occasions. I might say here that I have no recollection of being present at any meetings with Mr. Nosaka at which Mr. Emmerson was present other than the initial one, which Mr. Emmerson described. I did not usually sit in or take part in these conversations which the political reporting officers were continually having with Japanese leaders. My own duties were extremely heavy and it wasn't part of my work to engage in political reporting, so the only time I remember seeing Mr. Nosaka in the office of the political adviser was this occasion when he made the initial or courtesy call and asked to see me since he had met me in Yenan. That is the occasion I describe here.

I remember some time after that passing him on the street. I remember exactly where it was and which street it was. I don't remember the name but it was one of the places where the main street goes under the elevated railways. I was walking very hurriedly toward the office and somebody said “Hello, Mr. Service.” Mr. Nosaka spoke English quite well, and it was Mr. Nosaka, and we stepped on the sidewalk and shook hands, and the conversation was only a minute or two. I think he described the difficulties in locating office quarters. He was out trying to find an office or something of the sort.

Then when I was in the United States Army hospital in Tokyo—I have no idea of the date except it must have been the latter period of my stay there when I was convalescing—I had a call. One of the Japanese hospital orderlies came up from the reception room and said that there was a Japanese to see me and I went downstairs to the reception room lobby and to my surprise it was Mr. Nosaka, who said he heard I had been sick for a long time and in the Japanese way said he was very sorry and that he hoped it was nothing about Japan or anything like that that caused my illness and he wanted to present to me a Japanese book which he had just written about his experiences in China during the war. I, of course, don't read Japanese so it was only a courtesy gift.

The conversation lasted a few minutes. He left and I have never seen him since but at none of the three meetings—they could not be designated as talks—did he discuss the political affairs of Japan or the activities of the Communist Party.

I might say that I had a number of calls in the hospital from Japanese whom I have met even though I have known them only slightly.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean Japanese who had been in China?

A. No; Japanese whom I had met in Tokyo.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you meet any Japanese Communists in Japan outside of Mr. Nosaka?

A. You may recall that Mr. Emmerson's recollection was that another Japanese Communist accompanied Mr. Nosaka at that initial call at the office of the political adviser. I have no recollection of meeting that other person or at any time meeting any other Japanese Communists. I think it quite likely that somebody may have brought Mr. Nosaka to our office and maybe accompanied him. He was the leader of the party and it would be quite normal for somebody to be accompanying him but in any case my own interest in the conversation was simply that he had asked to say "How do you do," and I greeted him and left after a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. But you made no connections with the official Japanese Communist Party of any sort?

A. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak Japanese?

A. No. I, of course, learned a few words while there but I did not study the language.

Q. I would like to introduce into the transcript at this point Document No. 48 which is a 2-page affidavit, dated April 20, 1950, signed by W. J. Sebald.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

"JAPAN,

City of Tokyo ss: American Consular Service.

"Before me, Lora C. Bryning, Vice Consul of the United States of America in and for Tokyo, Japan, duly commissioned and qualified, personally appeared William J. Sebald, Acting United States Political Adviser for Japan, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"1. I arrived in Tokyo, Japan, on January 8, 1946, for the purpose of taking up my assignment as an Auxiliary Foreign Service Officer attached to the staff of the Acting United States Political Adviser for Japan. Among other Foreign Service Officers assigned to the United States Foreign Service establishment in Japan was John S. Service, whose duties in the Mission, to the best of my recollection, were primarily concerned with the general administration of the office with part time devoted to the duties of political liaison officer. Foreign Service Office John K. Emmerson served in the capacity of political reporting officer.

"2. Sometime during January 1946 I recall Mr. Emmerson asking me, in view of the probability that I would succeed Mr. Emmerson as political reporting officer, whether I would be interested in meeting Sanzo NOSAKA alias Sanji OKANO, a Japanese communist leader who had recently returned to Japan from Yanan, China, via Korea. It appeared that Mr. Emmerson had previously met Nosaka at Yanan. While I was being introduced to Nosaka, Mr. Service entered the room for the purpose of discussing another matter with Mr. Emmerson, with the result that his meeting with Nosaka, whom I understand Mr. Service had also met at Yanan during the war years, was unexpected and casual. The conversation, as well as I can remember, was of a casual nature and did not go beyond the usual greetings which would normally be exchanged with an acquaintance whom one has not seen for a long period of time.

"3. I have no knowledge of any subsequent meeting between Mr. Service and Nosaka. I would most probably have learned of such meeting had one taken place.

"4. I did not consider the presence of Nosaka in Mr. Emmerson's office a circumstance of an unusual nature, as Mr. Emmerson was charged with preparing a weekly report for the Department of State with respect to the development of Japanese political parties, copies of which were invariably forwarded to General Headquarters for information. Interviews of a similar nature were arranged by officers of General Headquarters and Mr. Emmerson with numerous party leaders of all shades of political opinion, a procedure which I would consider normal for any Foreign Service Officer engaged in political reporting.

"5. For approximately the first five months of 1946 (during the remainder of his stay in Japan Mr. Service was a patient at the 49th General Hospital) I was in almost daily contact with Mr. Service in the Office of the United States Political Adviser for Japan, and also was with him upon many social occasions. Furthermore, I saw many reports, telegrams, memoranda, and other documents drafted by Mr. Service during the course of discharge of his official duties, and had numerous official and unofficial conversations with him upon matters pertaining to the Japanese situation. In consequence, I have no reason whatsoever to believe that Mr. Service was other than a loyal officer of the United States Government. Nor was there any reason to consider that Mr. Service was not fully indoctrinated in and carried out the highest security requirements of the Foreign Service of the United States.

"Further deponent saith not.

"/S/ W. J. SEBALD.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this twentieth day of April A. D. 1950.

"/S/ LORA C. BRYNING,

"Vice Consul of the United States of America."

Q. Now, after you became ill, I believe you were transferred from Tokyo to New Zealand?—A. That is correct. The original plan was to transfer me to Manila but when my illness continued, the Department apparently decided to move me entirely out of the Orient and try to put me in a healthier climate for a while so that I could recover my health.

Mr. ACHILLES. Before we leave Japan, you have stated, I believe, that Mr. Bisson came to Japan as a member of the bombing survey.

A. That is my recollection. I believe that is correct.

Q. Would you tell us the extent of your contacts with Mr. Bisson in Japan?—A. My recollection of his first stay in Japan is that I saw him only on one occasion and I believe that it was the evening of a reunion of quite a large number of people who had been interested in the Far East. The next time he was in Japan, and I think it was probably early April, I saw him once.

Mr. ACHILLES. You said "people interested in the Far East." Wasn't practically everybody in Japan at that point interested in the Far East? Could you specify further as to the nature of the gathering?

A. They were mostly academic—people of some academic background—research background in connection with the various organizations such as the Institute of Pacific Relations or foreign policy organizations. The group, for instance, included Americans. Owen Lattimore was there that evening. There was a Japanese who had been in IPR in New York before the war. There was a man from New Zealand. I am not sure whether a man named Boxer was there, an English former army officer. They were people mostly attached to the Far Eastern Advisory Commission or Pauley mission.

Mr. ACHILLES. Will you continue as to any other contacts you had with Mr. Bisson?

A. Those two are the only ones of which I have any recollection.

Mr. ACHILLES. Which was the second one? I think you were interrupted.

A. The first was the end of 1945 or the beginning of 1946.

Mr. ACHILLES. At this gathering?

A. Yes, at this informal gathering. The second one was in April 1946 when he had just arrived in Tokyo as a civilian employee of the Government section of SCAP. I may have passed him in the corridors or seen him in the hotel, that sort of casual contact, but I have no recollection of him—

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you have any close association with him during that latter period?

A. No, I did not. He was, as I say, working in the Government section of headquarters and my work did not put me in touch with that section of SCAP at all. Some of the political reporting officers had contact with the Government section but whatever contacts I had with SCAP were almost entirely with the Adjutant General's Office and some of the administrative officers whom we had to approach in connection with the transmission of our messages. All our intelligence, in and out, went through intelligence facilities and there were fairly frequent problems concerned with that.

We were dependent on the Army for supplies, quarters, billeting of our personnel, and, in the latter stage when commissaries were set up, to arrange for commissary privileges and I handled most of that generally through the Adjutant General's Office.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you did not have occasion to see Mr. Bisson either officially or unofficially?

A. No.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now 5:30. Do you want to proceed with New Zealand?

A. He was in an entirely separate billet, located some distance from where I was living.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume New Zealand would be quiet short.

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, it would be quite short but I would be delighted to adjourn now.

The CHAIRMAN. We will adjourn at this point.

(The meeting adjourned at 5:30 p. m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETINGS IN THE MATTER OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: June 7, 1950—10 a. m. to 11:10 a. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building.

Reporter: Goodwin Shapiro.

Members of the board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles; Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Counsel for John Stewart Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhett, Reilly, Rhett & Ruckelshaus.

(The board reconvened at 10 a. m., June 7, 1950.)

The CHAIRMAN. The board will be in session.

(U. Alexis Johnson, a witness in behalf of John Stewart Service, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address for the record, Mr. Johnson.—

A. U. Alexis Johnson, 2019 Rosemount Avenue NW., Washington 10.

Q. What is your present position, sir?—A. Deputy Director, Office of Northeast Asian Affairs, in the Department.

Q. And are you a Foreign Service officer?—A. I am a Foreign Service officer; yes, sir.

Q. Will you tell us what your post was or what your position was or positions were during the period from about September 1945 to September 1946.—A. In the latter part of August 1945, while consul at Manila, I was detailed by the Department to GHQ—that is, General MacArthur's headquarters—to accompany them to Japan, and came to Japan on September 2, 1945, at the time of the surrender. Under general headquarters orders I proceeded to Korea about 17 of September 1945, where I was attached to General Hodge's headquarters. I returned to Japan under orders of the Department during the middle of October 1945 to open and establish at Yokohama the Yokohama branch of the Office of the United States Political Adviser, at which post I was commissioned as consul in charge, and remained in that position throughout 1946.

Q. Now are you acquainted with Mr. Service?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I wonder if you would tell the board how long you have known Mr. Service and something of the extent of your acquaintanceship and your relationship with him.—A. I wasn't personally acquainted with Mr. Service until I returned to Japan in October 1946. However, we had entered the Foreign Service at approximately the same time and I had met him casually before that time and knew him well by reputation in the Foreign Service as he was serving in China and I was serving in Japan roughly from the period of 1935 until the outbreak of the war.

Q. When you said you were not personally acquainted with him until you returned to Japan in 1946, I take it you meant 1945, did you not?—A. 1945; I'm sorry. That should be corrected to October 1945. When I returned to Japan in October 1945, he was serving as executive officer in the Office of the Political Adviser at Tokyo and I was serving as consul in charge of the office at Yokohama, and I had repeated and frequent contact with him officially in connection with the problems of reopening the office, personnel, and everything related thereto; and the problems that he faced at Tokyo and the problems I faced at Yokohama being very parallel, I looked to him for my guidance and principal contact at Tokyo, our relations being, although not in name, being roughly similar to that of a diplomatic mission to a consulate.

Q. In that connection, when you say Mr. Service was the executive officer of the Office of the Political Adviser at Tokyo, was the executive officer purely an administrative officer or was he in charge of any of the substantive functions of the office?—A. Purely administrative in its broad sense—that is, everything having to do with the running and the operating of the office.

Q. The mechanical operations.—A. The mechanical operations, but not substantive operations; yes.

Q. During the period that you were consul at Yokohama did you have occasion to visit Tokyo from time to time?—A. I visited Tokyo frequently—at least several times a week, often daily throughout a week.

Q. That frequently?—A. Yes.

Q. Would you say that on the basis of that relationship that you have just described that you were reasonably familiar with what was going on in the Office of the Political Adviser in Tokyo?—A. Yes, in general.

Q. It has been charged by a person whose name we do not know who evidently must have been in Tokyo at the time, that Mr. Service took an extremely favorable view toward the Japanese Communists while he was serving in Tokyo. Did you ever have any occasion to hear Mr. Service express any views on that line?—A. None whatsoever. In that connection, if I may go on, I, of course, saw Mr. Service frequently, officially as well, we being officers interested in the same things, and to the best of my recollection, insofar as we ever discussed Japanese politics, the question of Japanese Communists was never raised in any way, and I had certainly no reason to believe that he adopted what you might term any favorable view toward Japanese Communists.

Q. This same person is also alleged to have said that during his duty in Tokyo Mr. Service seemed to be completely enamored of Communist theory. In any of your contacts with him did you every have any basis for believing he was enamored of Communist theory?—A. Most emphatically, no.

Q. In the course of any of your conversations did you have occasion to form any view as to what his general or his particular political outlook and views were?—A. No, none other than the objective view of a situation that you would expect any Foreign Service officer to take.

Q. Now this same source of information is reported to have said that Mr. Service and others talked to leaders of the Japanese Communist Party in the offices of the political adviser in Tokyo and that this conversation with these leaders of the Japanese Communist Party aroused very considerable comment. Do you recall any such conversation that you ever learned about which was the subject of any considerable comment around the office?—A. I have no recollection of anything of that nature.

Q. Do you, as a matter of fact, have any personal knowledge of whether leaders and other persons active in the various political parties did have occasion to come to the offices of the political adviser during this period?—A. I don't have personal knowledge of it, but simply from what I had when I was present in the office, I received the impression that leaders of all political parties in Japan were—let's say instead of all political parties, political leaders in Japan were visiting the Office of the Political Adviser in the same way that they would any United States mission abroad.

Q. Do you happen to know who was the political reporting officer for the office at that time?—A. Well, Ambassador Acheson was doing considerable of it himself, and I think Mr. Emerson was doing most of the working-level work at that time. I simply don't recall the organization clearly enough at the moment to say anything beyond that. Certainly, Mr. Service wasn't doing any political reporting insofar as I knew at that time.

Q. I have no further questions.

Mr. ACHILLES. As far as you know, Mr. Service indicated no intellectual or other sympathy of any kind either with Japanese communism or Soviet communism.

A. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. No questions. Thank you very much.

(Robert A. Fearey, called as a witness in behalf of John Stewart Service, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Mr. Fearey.—A. Robert A. Fearey, 5122 Broad Branch Road NW.

Q. And what is your present position, Mr. Fearey?—A. I am a desk officer in the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs.

Q. Are you a Foreign Service officer?—A. No, Department.

Q. Will you tell the Board what your position was roughly from September 1945 to September 1946.—A. My technical title was, I think, economic analyst, but the position I held in the register of the office of the political adviser was special assistant to the political adviser.

Q. Political adviser where?—A. Political adviser to General MacArthur in Tokyo.

Q. In Tokyo. And you were throughout the approximate period of a year that I have mentioned—you were in Tokyo?—A. I was in Tokyo from mid October 1945 through May 1946.

Q. Now, are you acquainted with Mr. Service, Mr. Fearey?—A. Yes.

Q. Would you tell us when you first met Mr. Service and something of your acquaintanceship with him since that time?—A. I think I first met him—I couldn't be positive of this, but I think it was in 1945—the spring of 1945, when he came back from China, and I saw him occasionally at meetings or in the halls of the old State Department building. Since that time I knew him in the office of the political adviser in Tokyo, and I have seen him officially since his last return from India, and off and on during the last year or so.

Q. Now, during the period that you were in Tokyo, what was Mr. Service's position there?—A. He was executive officer—I believe was his formal title—in the office. His responsibilities were to administer the office, assign work, and keep things running.

Q. Now it has been charged by a person whose name is unknown to us that while Mr. Service was in Tokyo he took an extremely favorable view toward the Japanese Communists. Do you have any information which will either support or not support or in any way cast any light on the accuracy of this assertion?—A. No, I have no information that would support that at all.

Q. In the course of your work there did it ever come to your attention that Mr. Service was energetically or otherwise exhibiting an extremely favorably view toward the Japanese Communists?—A. Not at all.

Q. This same person is also alleged to have said that during his service in Tokyo Mr. Service seemed to be completely enamored of Communist theory. On the basis of your knowledge of Mr. Service during this period, do you have any evidence to support that assertion?—A. None whatsoever.

Q. Did you ever hear him express any views tending to indicate that he regarded communism as a desirable way of life?—A. No, I didn't.

Q. Now it has also been stated by this same anonymous source that Mr. Service and others talked to leaders of the Japanese Communist Party in the offices of the political adviser in Tokyo and that this conversation aroused very considerable comment. Did any such conversation ever come to your attention?—A. I can vaguely remember hearing that Nosaka had called the office and that some officers had seen him, but the information came to me in a purely incidental fashion. Nobody made anything of it and it just didn't strike me particularly at the time at all.

Q. As a matter of fact, did you have any knowledge whether Nosaka and other leaders of various political parties called at the office of the political adviser frequently or from time to time?—A. Yes, it was my impression—I wasn't working in that particular field, but it was my impression that political leaders in Japan called quite frequently on political officers in the office.

Q. But as far as you know, any conversation that Mr. Service may have had with Mr. Nosaka wasn't regarded as some untoward event which attracted widespread comment?—A. No, I never had any indication that it was attracting comment or was out of the ordinary.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, did he come to see Mr. Service or some other officer? The information I received didn't indicate that.

A. I just heard maybe in a luncheon conversation a day or two later that he had called and seen some officer. I don't think Mr. Service was even mentioned as having been one of those officers.

Q. I have no further questions.

Mr. ACHILLES. From your personal knowledge, you have no reason for believing that Mr. Service at that time was sympathetic in any way with communism?

A. No reason whatsoever.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was your association with him especially close so that you probably would have been conscious of that if he had been?

A. I think I would have been. I don't see much of Mr. Service outside of the office. Living in a rather tightly knit community, we saw each other rather frequently, but I wouldn't say he was a particularly close social friend; but being as closely knit as we were, I think anything of that sort would have come to my attention if it had been occurring.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to invite the Board's attention to a letter which I addressed to General Snow on April 26, 1950, in which I pointed out that in connection with these charges one of the persons who served in the office of the political adviser with Mr. Service at this time was Mr. Max Bishop, a Foreign Service officer now on duty in Washington, and I requested that because of his opportunity for knowledge relating to the very matters that are charged here—I requested that the Board call Mr. Bishop as a witness to testify under oath at this proceeding. I should like to ask the Board whether Mr. Bishop will be available to testify.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board has requested Mr. Bishop to give testimony, and he has declined to give it because he said he could add nothing to the case.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like at this point to ask the Board whether or not it has received a letter dated April 17 from Sir Patrick Duff.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, we have such a letter.

Mr. RHETTS. I should like to ask that that be placed in the transcript at this point as document No. 45.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

DOCUMENT No. 45

DEVONSHIRE HOUSE,
MAYFAIR PLACE, LONDON, W. 1.
17 April, 1950.

Tel: Grosvenor 6101

DEAR SIR: May I introduce myself by saying that from 1945 till towards the end of last year, when I retired from the public service at my own request, after reaching the age of 60, I was High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in New Zealand. Since then, my Government has appointed me Chairman of a newly constituted body called the National Parks Commission; the Archbishop of Canterbury has nominated me a Church Commissioner for England; and I am a Director of the National Bank of New Zealand and of Dalgety and Co.

The successive American Ambassadors in New Zealand during my time there were Mr. Patten, Mr. Avra Warren, and Mr. Scotten, who all know me; and Mr. Ray Atherton has known me for many years both in London and in Canada.

I have learned today with deep concern that my friend Mr. John S. Service is shortly to face hearings before the Loyalty Security Board regarding imputations of his having had Communist associations. I hope that you, Sir, will not think it an intrusion on my part if I venture, as an outsider, to write you a few of my impressions of Mr. Service's record and performance in New Zealand.

We were often at one another's houses, and my wife and I met Mr. and Mrs. Service constantly at the various official and social occasions to which members of the Diplomatic Corps are subject in the capitals to which they are accredited. I have, myself, unusual affection and respect both for Mr. and Mrs. Service, and I doubt whether any two representatives of their country have ever been held in more general esteem than these two were in New Zealand. I cannot recall any particular incident demonstrating anti-communist feelings on his part; but his whole attitude to life and all his social relationships make any imputation of communist leanings on his part to my mind fantastic. New Zealanders, as you may know, are very far from being tainted with communism. Mr. Service, as I have mentioned, was universally popular; and, as one of your own Statesmen has said, "You cannot fool all the people all the time."

I hope that you will not feel that it is presumptuous or irregular of me to write to you in this manner. If I have been at fault in so doing I beg that you will not lay my fault at Mr. Service's door, but that you will attribute it to my affection for Mr. Service personally, and my esteem for one whom I regard as a most distinguished servant of his country and—I like to think—a friend of my own country.

Yours very truly,

PATRICK DUFF.

P. S.—I recall that Lady Duff and I were dining one night in Wellington with Mr. and Mrs. Service. It was a completely private and informal party; and it happened to be Her Royal Highness Princess Elizabeth's birthday. At the end of dinner, Mr. Service rose and invited his guests to drink the health of the Princess. This graceful act of courtesy, which touched my wife and myself not a little, may seem just the gesture of a diplomat, as I recount it in cold type. But it is hardly the type of gesture, I should fancy, which anyone of communist leanings would go out of his way to make!

Mr. RHETTS, I should like at this time to introduce into the transcript Document No. 55, which is an unclassified dispatch, dated March 28, 1950, and signed by Robert M. Scotten, Howard Elting, Jr., Osborn S. Watson, Meade T. Foster, and Armistead M. Lee.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be entered in the transcript.

Subject: Statement in support of John S. Service.

The undersigned, who comprise all of the officers of the American Embassy, Wellington, who had the privilege of serving with John S. Service at this mission, wish to record our appreciation and support of the forthright statements made in his defense by Deputy Under Secretary Peurifoy, as reported in the Bulletin of the Department of State and in the Department's daily wireless bulletin.

During his tour of duty in Wellington as First Secretary and, for a time, Chargé d'Affaires, Jack and Caroline Service won the universal respect and affection of a wide circle of acquaintances, both New Zealanders and Americans, but more particularly of those who worked with him at this mission. We regarded him and his wife as ideal representatives of the United States abroad. This view has also been expressed to us on many occasions by officials of the New Zealand Government.

Since we had complete confidence not only in his ability and his discretion but also his unqualified loyalty to the United States, we feel that the aspersions that have been made against him affect the entire Foreign Service. Accordingly, we wish to add our wholehearted endorsement to Mr. Peurifoy's statement that "the sympathy and good wishes of the entire Department go out to them."

Subject: Reaction of New Zealand government officials to Senator McCarthy's attack on Mr. John S. Service

Previous reports have mentioned the dismay and indignation with which New Zealanders who knew Mr. John SERVICE when he was First Secretary at this Embassy have reacted to the news of his sudden recall, while en route to India, to answer the charges of Senator Joseph McCARTHY. In view of the keen interest which this matter has aroused in official Wellington, a fuller report appears to be in order, particularly with regard to the comments made to officers of the Embassy by ranking officials of the New Zealand Government.

The gentlemen whose comments are summarized below are among the best-equipped individuals in New Zealand to judge the issues involved. They knew Mr. Service intimately during the period of his service in Wellington. They are thoroughly familiar with the facts and the arguments bearing on the current controversy over the China policy, in which Mr. Service's name is involved. In particular, they have all read, in whole or in part, the Department's "White Paper" on China, including despatches written by Mr. Service from Chungking. They were all fully acquainted with the Amerasia incident, in which Mr. Service was exonerated of the charge of having given classified information to a magazine editor. Finally, they were most of them personally acquainted with Brigadier General HURLEY when he was American Minister in Wellington.

It might be mentioned here that none of these officials, as far as the Embassy is aware, has ever been suspected of being sympathetic to Communism. They have, on the contrary, made it abundantly clear that they are genuinely alarmed over the growth of Communism in Asia. Moreover, they have all manifested on many occasions a sympathetic understanding of the United States and an approval of the broad objectives of American foreign policy.

Mr. A. D. MACINTOSH, Secretary of External Affairs, told an officer of the Embassy that his own reaction, and that of his associates, was one of intense indignation. He had felt so strongly on the subject that he had at first considered writing personally to friends in the Department of State, notably Mr. Hickerson, expressing his complete confidence in Mr. Service. He had decided, however, especially after reading Mr. Peurifoy's statement (which greatly cheered him) that this gesture would be superfluous, since it was evident that the Department was standing solidly behind Mr. Service.

It was scandalous, he thought, that the character and loyalty of capable public servants, such as Mr. Service, could be impugned without the slightest evidence, for the sake of domestic party politics. In his opinion, based on an intimate acquaintance, Mr. Service could never be classified as even a "fellow traveler." He was, said Mr. MacIntosh, a true liberal, in the best sense of the word.

The comment of Mr. FOSS SHANAHAN, Secretary of Cabinet and Deputy Secretary of External Affairs, although made at a separate time and place, was very similar to that of Mr. MacIntosh. Apart from the distress which he felt because of his own personal attachment and admiration for Mr. Service, he thought it scandalous that a diplomatic officer should be penalized, and his loyalty called into question, because his opinions did not agree with those of his chief. Mr. Shanahan made it clear that he was referring here to Mr. Service's position in the Embassy at Chungking under Brigadier General Hurley. In his opinion, history had vindicated the correctness of views expressed at that time by Mr. Service and his colleagues; the tragedy of the situation was that their advice was not taken. He noted that the Economist, in its review of the White Paper, had singled out the Service despatches for special quotation. (The fact that Mr. Shanahan was so explicit in his endorsement not only of Mr. Service's character and loyalty, but also of his judgment, as a political reporting officer in China, is especially interesting because: (a) Mr. Shanahan's own area specialty has been the Far East, (b) he is known to take more pessimistic view of the new regime in China than most of his colleagues; (c) his deep antipathy towards Communism is strengthened by his religious convictions, as a staunch Roman Catholic, and (d) he was a particularly close friend of Mr. Service during the latter's tour of duty in Wellington.)

Mr. Andrew SHARP, Second Secretary in the Department of External Affairs, took it for granted that the McCarthy indictment of Mr. Service was simply a revival of the Amerasia affair and that behind both was the figure of General Hurley, embittered by the fact that Mr. Service and those of his viewpoint had been proved correct in their judgments.

Mr. Leicester WEBB, Director of Stabilization and Marketing, confessed that having just finished reading the White Paper, he had been astonished that Mr. Service could now be attacked, for, in his view, the despatches of Mr. Service from Chungking were a complete vindication of his ability and judgment. Mr. Webb considered that the issue raised by Republican attacks on Service,

Vincent, Butterworth, and the other Far Eastern experts involved far more than the careers of the officers in question, and their immunity from domestic political skirmishing: it was a vital concern of Australia, New Zealand, and other Pacific countries if the very men who had seen the China situation correctly were now hounded from positions of influence by those who still identified China with Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. Webb was not alone in expressing this last sentiment. It was either stated or implicit in the comments of the other officials quoted above. They all spoke with an intensity of feeling which was based not merely on their personal attachment to Mr. Service, but on their concern over the effects on American foreign policy, and, by consequence, on the security of New Zealand, if the current Republican campaign against State Department personnel succeeds. They made it quite clear that they could not regard this whole controversy as a domestic affair, concerning only the United States.

In view of the apparent unanimity of these reactions, it might reasonably be suspected that these comments have been deliberately selected as coming from persons known to be admirers of Mr. Service and friendly to the present administration of the Department of State. It can be stated positively, however, that of the many New Zealand Government officials and private citizens who knew Mr. Service and who have, on various occasions, raised the matter in informal conversations with officers of the Embassy, not one has expressed the slightest degree of credence in the McCarthy charges.

This same reaction is evident in editorial and radio comments on Senator McCarthy's accusations. While these have not, so far touched in the individual case of Mr. Service, they have with one exception¹ expressed contemptuous disbelief in the Senator's charges against Departmental personnel.

Two of the most influential papers in the Dominion, the New Zealand Herald (Auckland) and the Christchurch Press, have remarked that the Senator has simply made himself ridiculous in suggesting that such men as Dr. Jessup and Professor Lattimore are pro-Communist, adding that he has recklessly endangered American prestige abroad in the hope of gaining partisan political advantages. In the weekly foreign affairs commentary over the New Zealand Broadcasting Service, Mr. Graham MILLER identified the McCarthy accusations with the campaign of Republican elements to replace Mr. Acheson's Far Eastern policy with what he described as "dangerous belligerency" as manifest in the campaign for military intervention in Formosa. If these elements succeeded, he thought the consequences for New Zealand might be disastrous.

A final comment seems to merit recording because it was made by one who, as Professor of Political Science at Victoria University College, Wellington, and as a frequent writer, public lecturer and radio commentator on international affairs, has a considerable influence on local public opinion. Professor Robert PARKER is not, of course, a Government official, nor did he know Mr. Service personally, having been in Australia at the time of the latter's tour of duty at this post. He is, however, a keen observer of American affairs and the controversy over China policy.

Professor Parker remarked that in his opinion the greatest danger in current Congressional inquisition lay in the possibility that it might drive independent and liberal minds out of the Department and the Foreign Service. Viewing the issue solely from the standpoint of efficient public administration (Professor Parker's specialty) and leaving aside the aspect of civil justice, he thought that this tendency would dangerously reduce the efficiency of the service as an instrument of national policy. Even if one were to consider American foreign policy in its narrowest interpretation, as one of combatting Communism, this could only be done, he said, by men who understood what they were fighting, which in turn required that they be able when the occasion demands, to associate with Communists. If officers were intimidated into limiting their associations and coloring their reports to fit the official "line" or the preconceptions of their superiors he felt that the result would be a diplomatic service quite asmonolithic, and just as inefficient as a source of objective intelligence, as that of the U. S. S. R.

ROBERT M. SCOTTEN.

¹The one exception was an editorial in the Grey River Argus (Labor) of Greymouth, which confined itself to observing that where there is smoke, there must be fire. This is a small provincial paper with strong Roman Catholic leanings.

Mr. ACHILLES. I note in both the documents signed by Mr. Scotten and others—
Mr. RHETTS. That is document 55.

The CHAIRMAN. And 56.

Mr. ACHILLES. In Document 55 there is a quotation from Mr. Peurifoy's statement that "the sympathy and good wishes of the entire Department go out to them," presumably Mr. and Mrs. Service; and the statement in Document 56 referring to Mr. Peurifoy's statement states "that the Department was standing solidly behind Mr. Service." Mr. Peurifoy's statement naturally does not, and cannot, relate to this Board, which, in these matters, is separate from the Department. Our function is to examine into all the facts in the case and to get at the truth of the matter. We can hardly be described as standing solidly behind the witness with whom we are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. That's entirely correct.

Mr. RHETTS. Now that is all I have on this latter phase of Japan and this relating to Mr. Service's duty in New Zealand.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything more to offer today?

Mr. RHETTS. So that it seems to me we are at a point where we need to go back now to—so far as I am concerned, at any rate, the next step would be to go back to some of the loose ends that are left from the so-called Amerasia phase of this inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Have either of the other members of the Board any questions on the Japanese phase?

Mr. ACHILLES. I have a few questions on Mr. Service's career since New Zealand.

The CHAIRMAN. While you were in Japan, were you acquainted with one Philip Keeney, Mr. Service?

A. No, sir; I have no recollection of ever having met Mr. Keeney.

The CHAIRMAN. He was a member of the Reparations Commission, I understand.

A. No, sir; I do not recollect ever having met him.

Mr. RHETTS. I wonder if we could have a 10-minute recess. This has been a very long, drawn-out procedure.

(Whereupon, a 10-minute recess was taken.)

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Service, I notice in your opening statement that you state you were transferred to Washington in December 1948 to serve as a member of the Foreign Service Selection Board, convening in Washington January 10, 1949. What were your duties as a member of that Board?

A. Under the Foreign Service Act of 1946, promotions of all Foreign Service officers are to be based strictly on merit, and the machinery for determining merit provided by section 621 of the Foreign Service Act are to be selection boards to make recommendations on the basis of which the President shall nominate officers for promotion, to be confirmed by the Senate. Now the regulations which have been promulgated by the Secretary of State to implement the act have provided in the past that these selection boards are made up of five members—this was the case in 1949, when I served—of four Foreign Service officers and one public member from outside the Government service. There are entirely new boards convened each year, and the board serves, of course, only 1 year. It is a very carefully drawn up plan to insure as far as possible the most complete objectivity and fairness and elimination of any bias or favoritism.

I was appointed by the Secretary to be a member of what was called Selection Board B, which considered the records and recommended promotions of the lower three classes of Foreign Service officers—in other words, classes 6, 5, 4.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of those boards were there?

A. There were two boards, sir. Board A handled the two classes 2 and 3 and recommended promotion for classes 2 and 3, and the lower board, of which I was a member, recommended promotions for classes 4, 5, and 6. Now the regulations governing the setting up of the boards specified that the Foreign Service officers named for this duty shall be men of good record, representing as far as possible the most varied experience and who have demonstrated experience in the appraisal and handling of personnel. I might say that this is not a duty which anyone seeks. It is an extremely arduous and difficult task to rate your own fellow officers, and I had no previous knowledge of my choice for the job until I received a telegram appointing me.

Now the duties of the board members are to independently read the complete personnel efficiency files of all the officers in one class who are eligible for promotion. The board members do that independently, without consultation on particular cases. They give each officer whose record they read a rating varying from 5, the highest rating, to 1, the bottom rating. After every member of the board has made his careful study and independent appraisal of the efficiency file of all the officers in the class, there is opportunity for discussion among the board members concerning the cases which each member has recommended for promotion. After that discussion the board members may alter their original ratings, but they must announce to all the board members and to the official observers from the other departments—Commerce, Labor, Agriculture—who are present their reasons for making these changes. When all of the individual ratings are finally fixed, the scores of the five members of the board are combined, and the men receiving the highest ratings are recommended for promotion in the order of the total score they have received. The recommendations of the selection board go next to the Board of the Foreign Service.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I interrupt a moment? There are five members of the board?

A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. And the vote of each member of the board is equal?

A. The vote of each member of the board is exactly equal, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. And you were going to say what happens to the board's recommendations?

A. Yes. The recommendations of the board are next transmitted to the Board of the Foreign Service, as specified by section 211 of the Foreign Service Act, which is composed of the Assistant Secretary of State in charge of administration, two other Assistant Secretaries of State designated by the Secretary, the Director General for the Foreign Service, and one representative each, occupying positions with comparable responsibilities, from the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor. The Board of the Foreign Service considers the recommendations of the selection board and has the power to require the selection board to reconsider the whole list or to answer questions with regard to certain officers whose names have been placed on the promotion list. The selection board, if so required, must make appropriate reconsideration, but if it does not alter its recommendations the Board of the Foreign Service must either reject the list in toto or accept it in toto. If the Board of the Foreign Service approves the recommendations of the selection board, the recommendations then go to the Secretary of State, and if his approval is given, to the President, and if he approves, then to the Senate for confirmation and promotion.

Mr. ACHILLES. That's all.

The CHAIRMAN. Now we will go into recess until 2:30 this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 11:10 a.m., the hearing was recessed until 2:30 p.m.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: Wednesday, June 7, 1950, 2:35 p. m. to 3:55 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building, Washington, D. C.

Reporter: Violet R. Voce, Department of State, C/S, reporting.

Members of board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles; Arthur G. Stevens; Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Counsel for Mr. Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhetts, Reilly, Rhetts and Ruckelshaus.

(The board reconvened at 2:35 p. m.)

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Conrad E. Snow). The board will be in session.

Thereupon Mr. John K. Fairbank, being produced, sworn and examined as a witness in behalf of Mr. John Stewart Service, testified as follows:

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your name and address for the record, Mr. Fairbank?—

A. John K. Fairbank, living at 41 Winthrop Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Q. What is your present position?—A. Professor of history at Harvard University.

Q. Would you be good enough to indicate to the board your background of your general field of interests and activity?—A. I have been working on China as a subject of study since 1929. I began this study after graduating from Harvard and had a year at Oxford University, where I was a Rhodes Scholar. I then continued study of the Chinese language and Chinese history in Peiping in 1932 up to the end of 1935, the first year on the end of the Rhodes Scholarship, the second year on savings, the third and fourth years on a Rockefeller scholarship. I then returned to Oxford in 1936 and got the degree of a D. Phil. and began teaching at Harvard in the fall of 1936. I continued there as an instructor in history, giving a course on the Modern Far East, until August of 1941, when I took leave to join Prof. James Phinney Baxter and Colonel Donovan in the Office of the Coordinator of Information, Research and Analysis Branch, which was then being set up.

I lived in Washington at 1306, Thirty-fourth Street NW., from October of 1941 until August of 1942, when I was sent to China. And that first year under COI I became especially attached to the office of Lauchlin Currie, who was handling the AVG.

The CHAIRMAN. Meaning?

A. American voluntary group in China. And acted as a sort of liaison between him and the Research and Analysis Branch. And also in the course of that year I made it a point to meet all workers on Chinese and far eastern studies in Washington, as I had made a point before that to meet all such people in academic life.

I then went to China in August 1942 under the Office of Strategic Services—that was the new name for the Coordinator of Information—and specifically under an organization called the Interdepartmental Committee for the Acquisition of Foreign Publications, which was operating as a subsidiary of OSS with OSS funds but representing all interested agencies in Washington so as to centralize the inflow of publications from foreign countries.

My job was to develop a flow from China of research materials which would help the war effort against Japan. Essentially that would be Japanese publications secured, we hoped, through occupied China. In order to secure publications more easily in China I arranged to be the representative of the Library of Congress in China and was given the title also of special assistant to the Ambassador in Chungking. On arrival in Chungking I set up an office under the Embassy called the American publications service of the American Embassy. My object being to secure materials, I knew that I must also give out materials and also I worked for the Cultural Relations Division of the State Department. The name of that department changed from time to time. It was under Mr. Willis Peck. My wife had become the second employee hired by him in that Division of the Department in the late fall of 1941 or the beginning of 1942. Consequently her work in Washington and mine in Chungking had some connection which was of interest to us both. Shall I continue with my activities in Chungking?

Q. Yes, do.—A. Having become established under Mr. Gauss—and I convinced him that I was not trying, as my predecessor had, to run an independent show or to be an intelligent service collecting information through non-Embassy channels, I proceeded to develop contact with the various branches of the Chinese Government and also with the communities, particularly in Chungking and in Kunning. It happened that, having taught one year in Tsinghua University in Peiping the year 1933-4, I had a wide acquaintance among Chinese professors. I proceeded to develop a number of projects for making American printed matter available to them, academic journals, mainly on microfilm.

This microfilm project was set up to obviate the difficulty of transportation over the Hump. We imported lenses, made microfilm projectors, and then imported microfilm. The project was not very successful. The microfilm was difficult to read and I don't think it accomplished its end. However, I worked hard on it for the 16 months or so that I was there. It did establish contact with the university professors very widely.

I returned from Chungking in December of 1943. I can go into details of the Chungking office later on if it is of interest. I was technically under some authority of Captain—later Commander and Admiral—Miles, who was my landlord, but who left me strictly alone, as I did him, much to the satisfaction of the Ambassador.

I traveled during that year to Chengtu, to Chungking, to Kweilin, had jaundice for a month or two and dysentery. I saw Mr. Service at those times when he was in Chungking, which were not very frequent, but I had a number of long talks with him.

Mr. ACHILLES. Had you known Mr. Service previously?

A. I think I met him first in Peiping. I won't swear to that; I had known most of the Foreign Service officers in Peiping when I was a student and they were too—Davies and Penfield. If I did meet him it was very briefly. I made his acquaintance really in Chungking at this time. I saw a good deal of Sprouse, Club, and others in the Embassy, one of whom was always in charge of my operation, which was under the Embassy's aegis.

I then returned from China in December of 1943. Since the IDC operation had no need for personnel at home, I was open to transfer or to continuing in R and A of OSS. I decided to transfer to OWI and I entered the office of what was then called, I believe, area 3, meaning the Far East. In that office the position of Deputy Director for the Far East at that time I think was held by Owen Lattimore, who was in San Francisco with a bureau which produced the radio broadcasts out of San Francisco. The Assistant Deputy Director was George Taylor, who was in the Washington office in the Social Security Building and whose staff produced a weekly central directive draft which was then cleared with the Department of State and provided the policy guidance for the OWI operation. The operation itself was mainly in New York, where publications were broadcast to Europe, and so on.

I joined that in March 1944. For a long time I acted as head of this office off and on, signing myself as Acting Assistant Deputy Director. I continued in that job mainly in charge of contact between Washington and New York in the effort to get the New York people to follow the Washington directive week by week. During the rest of 1944 and until August 1945, I lived throughout this period at the same house mentioned above in Georgetown, 1306 Thirty-fourth Street, with my wife.

In May 1945 my wife was sent to Chungking as the first Cultural Relations Officer in the Embassy. In August 1945, after the end of the war, I was also sent back to China with a view to taking charge of the OWI operations there. I arrived there by way of Europe in late September or early October 1945 and had the position of, I think, executive director. William Holland, who had been head of the office, came home shortly after my arrival there. I took over from Mr. Darlington completely in December 1945 on the occasion of an unfortunate incident in the Shanghai office when an unauthorized news release was put out; and I was therefore in charge of this operation which was called the Interim Information Service—something with four letters—for a while and then it became the United States Information Service in 1946.

Our chief task was to reoccupy the cities on the coast, setting up offices. And I continued with that until July of 1946, part of the time in Shanghai, partly in Nanking under the Embassy, and partly traveling. I returned in July 1946 and took terminal leave and severed connections with the Department of State in August, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. When were you taken over by the Department of State from OWI?

A. Nominally, early in the autumn of 1945, but operationally we maintained an independent budget throughout that fiscal year and I was responsible for an operation which was not completely part of the Embassy until June 30, 1946. Well, that is the framework. You can go back over it.

Q. Just to complete it, after you withdrew from the Department in August of 1946, what did you do?—A. I resumed teaching at Harvard in September '46. I also published an article in the Atlantic Monthly called Our Chances in China, which I think was widely read. And I inaugurated at Harvard a program called regional studies, which is concerned with the application to China of all the social science disciplines as well as language and history. I had been doing this ever since. I was then associate professor and was made a full professor in 1948.

In 1948 I published a book The United States in China in a series edited by Sumner Welles and others called the American Foreign Policy Library put out by the Harvard University Press. My volume was given a prize, first prize I think.

Q. What was it?—A. The Wendell Willkie Memorial Building Award by the American Political Science Association as the best book published in the United States on the subject of international policy, international relations, in 1948. But fortunately only up to a period before the appearance of Sherwood's Roosevelt and Hopkins.

In 1947 my wife and I went to Europe as delegates to the tenth conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations held at Stratford upon Avon. In the spring of 1947 I had become a trustee of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations and have remained one ever since. In 1949 I was coauthor with three others, including Harlan Cleveland of ECA, of a small book called Next Step in Asia. I have written various articles and given various speeches.

The CHAIRMAN. On that and related subjects?

A. On the subject of China invariably.

Q. Before coming back, while we are on your own personal background, Mr. Fairbank, have your writings—such as your book The United States in China or any of your other writings—had any attention in terms of their pro- or anti-Communist leanings?—A. I have been characterized by various epithets from both sides, the China magazine or the China monthly.

Mr. SERVICE. The China monthly.

A. In an article by Alfred Kohlberg I am listed with others with opprobrious epithets as a stooge of the Kremlin and the like. The publication of the American Committee for Democratic Far Eastern Policy of New York, which has now been listed by the Attorney General as subversive, in a review of my book characterized it as essentially imperialistic. And I have been sent a clipping of a magazine published in Moscow, called New Times I believe, which castigates me as a spy and intelligence agency for imperialism, something like that. That was with reference, I believe, to The Next Step in Asia. My section of that as galley proof I sent to Mr. Fossdick as my contribution of a memorandum in connection with the meeting, which I believe was in October last year, of specialists on the Far East in the Department of State. It happened that that galley proof was available just in time when we had been asked to submit statements and said as much as I could say at that time. I think that is all for your question.

Q. I believe you testified that you really became acquainted with Mr. Service in Chungking during the latter part of 1942 and early 1943.—A. Yes.

Q. I wonder if you could indicate to the board just what the nature of your acquaintance with Mr. Service was and how familiar you became with him?—A. I knew Mr. Service as one of a number of friends in the Embassy, the American Government Service. John Davies I had known in Peiping. I saw Mr. Service a number of times. I don't recall the dates, and we had the usual type of conversations in which we were talking about the situation in China, giving our opinions.

Since I was not working on American policy I usually didn't try to press for secret information from my colleagues. But I never hesitated to raise the general questions of how things were going and where they were going. Since I have submitted a letter to Mr. Acheson on this subject, perhaps I could just repeat my general view here for the record.

In these conversations with Mr. Service I covered the usual range of questions—in one respect, what the evaluation of the Communists in China was, what their strength was, to what it might be attributed, what their future would be, and the valuation of the Kuomintang regime in the same way, the evaluation of the American interests in China, what we should try to do, our relations with the British, and everything else.

The CHAIRMAN. These are subjects of discussion, you're giving us, with Mr. Service?—A. Yes. I'm characterizing in a general way the type of discussion that I, in a general way, recall having had over this period of several sessions. I never received any indications in any of these discussions that Mr. Service had any doubts about the desirability of the American democratic system. I never had any impression that he favored the Chinese Communists in an emotional way. I felt that he was a man of strong feeling but his feelings were those of an American and these feelings were against the evil features which he saw around him in the nationalist regime against totalitarian features of government in general and in favor of the various types of freedoms that Americans generally believe in, the American institutions of civil liberties and law. In other words, I never had any feeling whatever that he was off base or he was emotionally committed or emotionally upset or, however you might like to phrase it, had come under the influence of communism or Chinese Communists.

Now, at that time the Chinese Communist line was always to harp on civil liberties in the Kuomintang area, always to inveigh against censorship, concentration camps, lack of election process, and all these things. And when the Communists expressed such criticisms which were all designed to appeal, of course, I for one—and I think the other Americans that I know there—tended to agree. So I could say as between the Communist delegation in Chungking and the journalists in the press hostel there was a common line in the sense that the journalists in the press hostel were against censorship and the Communist delegation in Chungking, who spent a great deal of time in contact with them through one or two people, were also, of course, against censorship on the part of the Kuomintang.

This is getting off the subject of Mr. Service, but our conversations were in that atmosphere and that is the characterization I would make of his attitude.

In other words, one of complete loyalty, and I would stake my reputation on his loyalty. I could state it in many ways but I think the idea is plain, I would back him up 100 percent. I would not think that he would be a disloyal American citizen. And I also believe that he was sufficiently intelligent to avoid being misled and avoid being a well-meaning but misguided American citizen.

Q. A few days ago, Mr. Fairbank, a Mr. Emmanuel Larsen testified here and, although I do not have the actual transcript of what he said before me, I'll undertake to try to the best of my recollection to tell you the substance of what he said and if I am incorrect perhaps the Board will check me if my recollection is faulty.

In the course of examination of Mr. Larsen I asked him whether he knew of any other persons from whom Mr. Jaffe, Mr. Philip Jaffe, obtained information in Washington. Mr. Larsen's response was that he knew of several people with whom Mr. Jaffe had contacts. As I recall it, he was not precise in asserting that these were people from whom he obtained information, although that was a permissible inference, I believe, from his response. He listed numerous people with whom he thought Mr. Jaffe was in contact and among other things he stated that he knew that on either some or several occasions Mr. Jaffe had indicated to him that he was staying with you and your wife here at Washington when Mr. Jaffe would be visiting Washington.

Mr. ACTILLES. That is, staying here with Mr. Fairbank?

Q. Yes, Mr. Jaffe, when he would visit Washington, would either frequently—or sometimes in any case—stay with Mr. Fairbank and his wife here in Washington. I wonder, Mr. Fairbank, if you would care to comment on that testimony of Mr. Larsen's?—A. I'd be very happy to. Now, that statement is a lie, and I'm very happy to have this opportunity to deal with it because I assume that I'm under oath and subject to laws of perjury and so on. My acquaintance with Mr. Jaffe, if such it may be called, has been limited to two casual meetings, as far as I can remember. I may have been in the same room with him more than twice. I do not regard him as a friend of mine. I wouldn't even call him an acquaintance. I have never liked the man, never made any effort to see him, and in fact never have seen him except on two occasions that I can recall at the moment and possibly certain others when we were at the same meeting somewhere.

He never, very definitely never stayed at my house in Georgetown. He never stayed at my house anywhere else. He never stayed at any place, any house that I have ever stayed at overnight, as far as I can remember. He has never been in a house in which I was living, has never been in my house, as far as I can remember.

I made a practice of getting my staff and people working on the Far East in Washington to come to cocktail parties in large numbers during the war as a means of contact and morale building. I don't recall that he was ever included in one of those cocktail parties or any other similar meeting. It may be that he walked into the office of OWI at some time and I may have seen him. I have no recollection of that. I have exchanged very few words with him.

As to the two times I do recollect, the first is when I first set eyes on him at Princeton University at a meeting which I think was under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations and I think that was before the war. This could be traced by looking at what meetings they may have had. I had heard his name and I remember meeting him at that time, conversing with him. That was perhaps in 1938 or 1939. It may be 1940. I had also previous to that, about 1937, contributed a brief article to a magazine, the second issue as I recall, of Amerasia. I haven't looked back at that article since the Amerasia question has been in the newspapers. But it was solicited from me by a professor at Columbia, and my recollection has been, ever since I find it erroneously, that this professor and the other professors like Professor Colegrove of North Western, were the actual inaugurators of Amerasia.

I had a discussion with my friend in Cambridge about 2 weeks ago and this friend said, "No, Amerasia was begun by Jaffe and Field." And he sent me a note giving the masthead of the magazine at the time when I published this article. So that my supposition that it was just professors and not Jaffe and Field, who I thought later took it over, was just wishful thinking on my part. At that time, however, my contact was not with Mr. Jaffe in relation to this article put in Amerasia. And, incidentally, my article in Amerasia was mainly a historical comparison of the Japanese invasion of China with the British and French wars of the century before on which I was a specialist at that time. That was in 1936 or 1937. It did not deal with policy that I recall.

That first recognition on the name of Jaffe was followed by a complete lack of any contact with him over the years, as far as I can recall.

The second meeting, which I referred to of the two, occurred in New York I think in the winter of 1948-49, at the apartment of Mildred Price, who has been the executive secretary of an organization called the China Aid Council. I had been giving some speeches in New York, I believe, and was invited by her to come to her apartment and see some people. Prof. Ernest Osborne was the chief person mentioned. Mr. Jaffe was also there. I did not like him any better at that time than I had before. We did not have very much of a conversation.

I may say that the China Aid Council, to which I had given my name as a sponsor about 1947 or 1948, had been an agency for sending some funds and some medical supplies to Madam Sun Yat-sen, who in turn sent some of these to the international peace hostels or hospitals in the so-called liberated areas. In other words, to Communist China. This China Aid Council operation, I believe, had Jaffe as its treasurer—who was connected with it. I let my name be used by this group, which was headed at that time by Mrs. E. C. Carter, because I believed in maintaining what contact we could and also I felt confident that Mildred Price, the executive secretary, and Mrs. Carter, the head of it, were not Communists. And it did not seem to me that they were being fellow travelers in the usual sense of trying to do Communist work for them.

In other words, this China Aid Council seemed to me a useful thing operating in the field of medical supplies and splitting its donations between the two parts of China. Mildred Price made a point of helping the Mui Tsai School, the head of which I met in China, Dr. H. C. Tao, and other worthy organizations which were not Communist but were trying to do things like mass education and were in the category of the Democratic League type of people before the Democratic League was put under pressure and became part of the Communist situation, in other words, as of 1946.

I may also add that in the last year the Communists or fellow travelers element in the China Aid Council have succeeded in taking it over and ejecting Mildred Price and Mrs. Carter and other such people. This take-over was effected by people I could mention who are active in the Committee for Democratic Far Eastern Policy and who, to my view, are Communists. The take-over included taking over Madam Sun Yat-sen at the Peiping end, who to the best of my judgment was not an organized Communist disciplined member when I knew her in Chungking.

In other words, the China Aid Council has ceased to exist except as something in mothballs. I think there is two or three hundred dollars in a bank account; there is no office any more, and that is the end of it. It has been destroyed by the Communist element that were in it evidently before and decided to take it over. My connection with this new thing called the China Welfare Appeal has been entirely negative throughout. In other words, I have never responded to their requests nor had anything to do with them. It has consisted, my point of contact with Mr. Jaffe, of that one brief evening in which we did not converse.

Q. In connection with your remarks a little while ago in which you indicated that you had always supposed that Amerasia was started at least by a number of professors and your friend indicated the fact that it was started by Mr. Jaffe and Mr. Field, I show you Document No. 32, which is an exhibit in this case, and refer particularly to the column headed "March 1937", which is the masthead for the beginnings of Amerasia. You see there, of course, that your recollection was not entirely incorrect because it did have a number of the academic group that you had in mind.—A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. This Mrs. Carter, was that Mrs. Edward Carter?

A. Yes, Mrs. E. C. Carter. Mr. Carter was for a long time the Secretary General of the International Secretariat of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Were you acquainted at all with Mr. Frederick V. Field?—A. I met him twice at least and I should say my acquaintance with him is about as extensive as my acquaintance with Jaffe. I remember meeting him I believe in the IPR office, which was on Fifty-second Street, I think in 1936, when I first returned from China. At some time later I remember having a conversation with him over a drink in a bar. This may have been during a conference that we were both attending. I assume it is. I recall no contact with Frederick Field beyond these two specific instances and maybe one or two or three other casual meetings and one other that I can recall and no contact with him of a social nature.

The one other that I recall is a meeting of the trustees of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, which I believe was early in 1947.

At that time an investigation had been made by the existing trustees prior to the meeting of Mr. Field and of the accusations raised by Mr. Kohlberg against the Institute of Pacific Relations American Council. On that investigating committee was Mr. Huntington Gilchrist of the American Cyanamid Co., a businessman, and other such persons. And I remember his stating at this meeting with reference to Mr. Field that he had found no evidence that Mr. Field in his activity in the Institute of Pacific Relations American Council had brought in any Communist bias or tried to deal with things from a leftist or Communist point of view as opposed to the best interests of the organization of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

At any rate, at that meeting there was discussion of what to do about Field and I participated in that discussion. And the discussion went along on two lines. On the one hand he obviously is a detriment to this organization and we as trustees owe it to the organization to really drop any connection with him. You can't have an organization with a man of that sort on the Board. On the other hand was the more human point that he had been such a staunch supporter of the organization and that he had occasionally given money or that he had worked hard and at one time was Secretary, which I believe myself was before he had moved entirely to the left, in the early 1930's. I believe this progress was gradual for a time.

And I remember making a statement myself which I later felt was not—well, I felt somewhat foolish about it because I felt I was rather emotional. I said that "We shouldn't, just because there is concern about leftists at this point, suddenly just scuttle this man who has been doing, according to the trustees, a proper job for the organization." Well, I had decided not long after that, in the course of not too many months, that that was an unwise and rather foolish view.

I may say that I have been in many discussions with my brother-in-law, Mr. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., who is death on Communists in general and I have been working out, as I think my written articles indicate since my return from China, when I have had opportunity to express myself, a position which takes account of the Chinese Communists' good points but develops an American policy. I could go into that at length if you wish.

Q. You mentioned that Mr. Kohlberg had made some uncomplimentary remarks about you. Are you acquainted with Mr. Kohlberg?—A. I have met him on several occasions. One I remember chiefly was a radio television show of a "people's court," so-called, in which 12 individuals were brought in off the street. It was presided over by Mr. Basil O'Connor, who I was told had been Mr. Roosevelt's law partner. Mr. Kohlberg was on one side with two others and I on the other side. The issue was whether we should give increased military aid to the Chiang Kai-shek government. This, I believe, was in 1948. Our side got a twelve-to-nothing decision against Kohlberg.

The CHAIRMAN. Your side was maintaining what?

A. That we should not give military aid to the Chiang Kai-shek government any more beyond that amount already given.

Q. In what year?—A. In 1948. And I recall at the time telling Mr. O'Connor that if Mr. Kohlberg brought forward any of his libelous epithets concerning me I would retaliate in kind and they would have to put the show off the air. Mr. Kohlberg was very courteous all through and at the end of the show he paid me the compliment of saying "I don't think you and I really disagree," whatever that meant. I have seen him on one or two other occasions. I was in a debate with Senator Bridges on the Town Hall of the Air last December. Mr. Kohlberg was back stage and I saw him in the elevator or somewhere.

Mr. RHETTS. I'd like to show you what has been introduced as an exhibit in this case, document No. B-54.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your question about it?

Mr. RHETTS. I would like to know if that is your signature?

A. I would recognize this as my signature.

Mr. RHETTS. I should say this is a photostat of a letter found in Mr. Service's desk here in the State Department at the time he was arrested on June 6, 1945. You recognize the handwritten signature "John" there as your own?

A. Well, I would say it certainly is very similar to my signature. If I looked at it casually I would say it is. Of course any signature could be forged, but I don't see why it should be.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recollect writing the letter?

A. I wonder why this letter has no letterhead on it? It's addressed to the United States Office of War Information so presumably if I wrote it it was sent out through that channel. APO 879 was Chungking.

Mr. SERVICE. Yes.

A. I would be inclined to acknowledge this as my letter. The contents of it seem certainly mysterious and when I first heard about this, about a day ago, of course I had some difficulty in wondering what it dealt with. In thinking about it I have been able in my own mind to recall what I might call a project to which I think this refers and which I think will explain most of the aspects of it.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. I believe that you have forwarded a telegram addressed to me which outlined your reconstruction of that project.—A. Yes.

Q. And probably what the meaning of this letter was. That telegram has been introduced into the transcript as document 330. And I take it that your account of the reconstruction of the meaning of this is as you outlined it in that telegram.—A. Yes. I can explain this, I think, in a few words. It goes back to 1943 when I was in Chungking and it concerns making the acquaintance of the Chinese Communist, Miss Kung P'eng. Kung is the surname. This girl was a chief liaison officer between the Communist headquarters in Chungking and the press hostel and foreigners generally. I think almost any American who worked in Chungking at that time would recollect meeting her. I'm sure all journalists would. I did not make her acquaintance until June or July of 1943, after I had been in Chungking about 9 months. The circumstances were that I had been developing channels for Japanese-language publications from Japan and I had found most of these channels fairly dry.

There was a General Wang who was helpful and I therefore had come to the conclusion that I might do well to open out some relationship with the Chinese Communist delegation to see if they could get anything through their areas, which would be Japanese publications of the type we wanted to have in Washington. I had not seen consciously any Chinese Communist delegation members until that time, but in addition to those valid official reason for contact with them, I think I also had a personal motive of curiosity. I wanted to see what they were like or what they had to offer, what they had to say.

At any rate, on my own initiative about that time, June or July 1943, I passed the word, I think through my office manager, the way you do things in a Chinese office, that I would like to see one of these people. And this young woman came around. I, like the press hostel people I have mentioned, found her a very stimulating individual. She had gone to an English girl's college, St. Mary's in Shanghai, and later to Yenching University in Peiping. She was from a middle-class background but was an ardent and very idealistic Communist worker in constant danger of abduction, and so on, as she went about the city—something like a social worker in reverse.

She would come to the living quarters of the American foreign community and have hidden tracts in her handbag of the latest thing received by radio on some incident. I don't believe she made any converts for the cause of communism but she was a well-known figure in the city and she certainly represented the Communist views of the liberal ideals because she was full of righteous indignation against all the evils that could be mentioned.

I also became acquainted with her fiancé, whose name was Ch'iso Mu. His surname was Ch'iso. Her fiancé was even more a typical long-haired intellectual, fiery, Marxist, full of saying the world and a very attractive individual, a lively mind, full of ideas. In the course of this acquaintance, which was I might add perhaps unnecessarily one of the very great many acquaintances which I made in Chungking, I on my initiative again suggested to Miss Kung that she ought to write some biographical record of how she had become a Communist. It seemed to me that this would have a good deal of significant information for an American reader because it would be in first-person terms. It would be an example of Chinese youth, raised in the western type of educational institutions with a middle-class background, who—through idealism or the motives of revolution—became an ardent convert to communism. This occurred, I think, in the student movement of 1935.

Well, then her story went on to describe how she turned down a fellowship to come to the United States, which was the normal goal of all Chinese students, and went over to join the Communists in liberated areas to see if she could qualify to be one of them. And then it went on to describe how she was farmed out to a peasant village and learned to live in peasantry. This whole thing was very graphic, in simple terms, and it seemed to me would have value in explaining how the Communists were getting their power and how they were building up with the youth of China.

Well, at my prompting she tried in the midst of a great deal of her activity to draft a biographical piece. And at the time I left China, in December 1943, she had shown me a copy of a couple of chapters which dealt with the subject I just mentioned, her education and her early experience and joining the Communists. After I left China I had expressed the hope that she would finish this and send it back. And these things I remember quite clearly.

Now, my recollection is—and this, of course, could be reconstruction, but I believe that this manuscript was brought back eventually by another Chinese girl, Miss Yang Kang, so I might briefly describe this other Chinese. She is a woman, of course, 40 or 50 now. This person was the literary editor of the independent newspaper in Chungking, the Ta Kung Pao. And, as the literary editor of this newspaper she got around always among the journalists and was interested in printed matter from the United States which my office was distributing. I made her acquaintance, I think, in the summer of 1943, not before. She appeared to be a vigorous Chinese liberal, as that word has been used; I mean a person who is not a Communist, not a Kuomintang member, but was interested in the ideals of the west, believed in the things of literacy and freedom of speech, and such things.

I imagine in retrospect she was probably more leftist than I realized, I don't know. But in any case, she had a respected position in the community in this newspaper job and I liked her as a friend. When I came back to this country in the spring of 1944—that is I arrived in January 1944—in some way a possibility came up for Miss Yang to receive a fellowship which was available at Radcliffe College in Cambridge for a Chinese woman student. I do not recall how that possibility came to my attention, whether I was asked to suggest someone or whether I took more initiative than that, I don't recollect. I haven't tried to get the file, which I suppose I could, really, if we had to do so. We could get it from Radcliffe College.

At any rate, there being almost no candidates and this girl being recommended by her teachers at Yenching University, the missionary teachers, she received this fellowship and arrived in the United States in the autumn of 1944. I believe it was by that means that this manuscript was brought. I'm making this awfully long-winded, I'm afraid. The point is that Brooks Atkinson, as I recollect, who was also in Chungking as a correspondent at this time, and also Miss Kung had expressed an interest in the manuscript she was writing.

I made this effort at this time in the spring of 1944 to see if any publishers would be interested in this story of a Chinese youth who had become a Communist. And I believe that I got in contact with William Sloane, now a publisher in New York, of Sloane Associates. That is more or less an assumption on my part. He was one person that I think I would have gone to. I don't recall definitely doing it, but he had been in China on an OWI arrangement for the American Publishers Association or a similar body in 1943 when I made his acquaintance.

In any case, no publisher could see possibilities in this manuscript without more being added to it. And even then, of course, it wouldn't be too good a bet because it was too brief and sketchy. But it was necessary—and this I believe I recall—to have a power of attorney to have any dealings with the publisher. And Brooks Atkinson, again to the best of my recollection, came to be the logical person to hold the power of attorney, he being a man from New York and easily in touch with publishers and outside government as a publicist. Well, I think that is my background and so on in this letter.

In reference to the text of it, Mr. Brooks—in other words, I believe refers to Brooks Atkinson, and "which I have passed on" I take it refers to giving him the power of attorney. "Together with the new manuscript" means that she sent something more; "of which he also has the first version as well as the first copy of the new or supplemental version" I assume that there may have been an editing effort made or something. That's just reconstruction. Nothing ever came of this manuscript. It eventually was returned to Miss Yang and Miss Yang went back to China in the autumn of 1948—no, in the summer of 1948 I think it was.

Now perhaps we can take it from here on questions on this letter.

There is one thing more I'd like to say. When I first heard this on the phone it seemed to me completely mysterious. So I was of course struck with the fact that it had such indirect terminology and it was written in double talk. They are just talking about Mr. Brooks instead of Brooks Atkinson. And at first I thought it might be Brooks Darlington, this man in OWI. I'd like to say in reference to that and to my writing that letter in that way that my experience in China had given me a habit of avoiding making statements in a letter which could be seen casually and completely understood by outsiders because the Chinese office was wide open to all the secretaries and people you were working with.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do I understand from your testimony that probably Mr. Service had sent you this new manuscript?—A. My assumption is, from this letter and to the best of my recollection, that I had probably taken the initiative and written to Miss Kung P'eng some way asking that more be sent back. Now, whether I involved Mr. Service in this problem I don't know. It may well be that I took the initiative and asked him as a favor to get this thing, that we thought it might be useful in this project.

Q. Do you recall what the letters were which it refers to "which you sent out and which were most interesting have been delivered"?—A. No; I don't.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall who Bill was, who was referred to here?

A. I assume that would be Bill Holland. The reference is very plain, saying he is "my colleague," meaning OWI. And it says "he is with you," meaning in Chungking. He had been sent out in the fall or early spring, I guess he arrived in the early winter of 1944.

Q. And what do you refer to when you say "Everything that you can send will of course be much appreciated"?—A. Could you give me the reference just before that, please?

Q. Yes. "Many people have come back, like John Davies, Ludd, and Emerson, and we have had various discussions on a sad but not pessimistic note. Everything that you can send will of course be much appreciated."—A. I imagine this would refer to Mr. Service writing me a personal letter.

Q. About what?—A. About the situation, about how things were going. Now, as to "various discussions on the sad but not pessimistic note," this may have no reference to this particular situation, but if I recall correctly, I recollect spending an evening with three or four of the people who were working on China and just trying to face the problem. I think possibly some of those mentioned there were present, people who had come back recently. All of us were more or less in touch with what was going on because that was our business, but we were trying to face the problem of what could be done when we saw that we were stuck with the regime that was losing power. But the essential thing is what could be done to save American policy from getting into great difficulty.

Q. Had you read Mr. Service's reports on China? Had you read his reports on the Chinese situation?—A. Certainly not regularly. The reports of that type were not open to me as a regular thing. In the State Department where I had a contact, both as an official working on the Central Directive and also as a friend of people who lived there, I would sometimes be shown a document which had come in from the field.

Q. That is, the OWI was in possession of some reports through regular channels, were they not?—A. The OWI received some documentation from the Department of State, I believe.

Q. But you don't recall specific ones?—A. Maybe we received it only for us to see and return, not for our channels but only for us to see and return. And we did have a system of liaison officers who went to the Department to see what was there and then came back.

Q. But I judge you don't recall specifically Mr. Service's reports?—A. No. But I do recall, in my contact with Mr. Currie, his referring to having seen a report from Mr. Service. I mean I don't recall the particular instance but I would say that occurred, in the same way I'd contact John Carter Vincent and John Davies when they were in the Department.

Mr. STEVENS. You were then a Government official yourself?

A. Yes, I was. And I was in charge of policy directives for propaganda to China.

Q. Thank you very much.

(Witness excused.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE MATTER OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: June 8, 1950, 10:10 a. m. to 11:15 a. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building.

Reporter: Goodwin Shapiro.

Members of the Board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore C. Achilles; Arthur G. Stevens; and Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Counsel for John Stewart Service: Mr. Charles Edward Rhettts, Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 10:10 a. m., June 8, 1950.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Board will be in session. You are offering a witness this morning?

Mr. RHETTTS. Yes.

(Congressman Richard Bolling, called as a witness in behalf of John Stewart Service, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTTS:

Q. Will you state your name and address, Mr. Bolling, for the record?—
A. Richard Bolling, 524 Pierce Street, Kansas City, Mo.

Q. And will you state your present position, sir?—A. I am a Member of Congress from the Fifth District of Missouri.

Q. Roughly, between September 1945 and September 1946, could you tell the Board where you were and what your position then was?—A. In the latter part of 1945 I was for most of that period in Tokyo, Japan. I was an assistant to the adjutant general in the headquarters of the commander in chief of the Southwest Pacific—the Pacific—and the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers, General MacArthur. For a short period of about a month I was back in the United States, around Christmas and the early part of January, on leave, and when I returned to Tokyo I was an assistant to General MacArthur's chief of staff.

Q. You were in the Army at that time?—A. That is correct. I was a major in the Army.

Q. Now during this period did you become acquainted with Mr. Service?—
A. Yes; I did.

Q. I wonder if you would indicate if you recall when you met Mr. Service and something of the nature of your acquaintance with him from that time onward.—

A. Well, my job as an assistant adjutant general was primarily dealing with personnel, and one of the things that I did was to process people as they came into the area—people who were assigned to the headquarters or merely to the area—and I met Mr. Service, as I remember—I do not remember the date, but it was fairly early in that period—as he came into Tokyo. My memory does not serve me well enough to say how soon our very brief acquaintance ripened, but I can say I knew him well enough so that I can say we had dinner, I think, once or twice, had several drinks together, and spent an evening or so together.

Q. So that I take it he was well enough known to you that any general discussion involving him would have been noted by you.—A. Yes; I believe so.

Q. Now it has been alleged by an unnamed person that during Mr. Service's duty in Tokyo he met with certain leaders of the Japanese Communist Party in the Office of the Political Adviser and had some conversation with these persons, and that this meeting and conversation attracted general comment. Can you tell the Board whether you ever heard of such a meeting and whether to your knowledge there was any widespread comment about any such meeting?—

A. When I first became aware of the alleged meeting, I think it was about 2 weeks ago. I had no consciousness of there having been a meeting nor of there having been any discussion of it.

Q. And would you mind stating how you became aware of it about 2 weeks ago?—A. Well, Mr. Service came to see me, and I subsequently talked to you. And in those two conversations I was informed of the—I guess the allegation.

Q. So that that being the case, I take it your testimony is that at the time no such meeting ever came to your attention?—A. No such meeting ever came to my attention. It could be. It is possible that it could be a fault in memory, but I think it is rather doubtful that it is, because at one time or another during my service as an assistant to the chief of staff I was somewhat involved in a rather notorious case at that time of an Army newspaper which was purported to be heavily infiltrated by people who followed the Communist line, so I was at least somewhat conscious of the problem as it affected our headquarters.

Q. Now it has been testified here that a meeting did take place under roughly these circumstances: A Japanese Communist leader by the name of Nosaka did visit the offices of the political adviser, according to Mr. Emerson, who testified here the other day, not infrequently, and that Mr. Emerson had occasion to interview him along with other political leaders of other parties in connection with a weekly report which he submitted to the supreme commander on current developments among the political parties in Japan. It has been further testified that Mr. Nosaka called and that Mr. Service had known Mr. Nosaka in Yenan, China, where Mr. Service had previously served, and that when Mr. Nosaka called at the office, Mr. Service was called in and greeted him and exchanged amenities. From your knowledge of the situation in the headquarters at that time, would you regard it as particularly unusual for any members of the staff of the Office of the Political Adviser to meet Mr. Nosaka at that time?—A. To the contrary, it would have been unusual if they hadn't, I think.

Q. Now it has also been alleged that during his service in Tokyo Mr. Service was extremely enamored of Communist theory. On the basis of your association with him, did you ever hear him express any views which would suggest that this was true?—A. No, I recall no such views. If appropriate, I would like to enlarge a little on that.

Q. Do.—A. Aside from finding Mr. Service a pleasant person personally, I had spent at that time, I suppose, about almost 4 years in the Pacific, in the Army, and was staying on in Japan because I was interested in the problems of democratization of Japan, and I quite naturally had considerable interest in what was happening in China and what might happen in China; and one of the reasons that I pursued the acquaintance not only with Mr. Service but also with his chief of mission, Mr. George Acheson, was to inform myself as much as I could from talking with people who had had some first-hand experience in the Chinese political scene, and it is a story that I have used a great many times since in discussing the Chinese problems, which is certainly with us, and I did talk with Acheson at some length. I felt that, let's say, on domestic matters that he and Mr. Service might differ somewhat, one being what I would describe a conservative, and the other a liberal, but that in their assessment of what had happened factually in China and what was likely to happen, I have often repeated it as a story for political purposes that they agreed precisely as to what had happened, and my general conclusion from that was that both of them were pursuing what they thought to be an approach to the Chinese problem that was in the best interests of the United States, and they agreed, as I remember it, with some precision. That is the best way I can state that.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the facts?

A. As to the facts and the interpretation of the facts, I might say.

Q. Now it has also been asserted by the same anonymous source that I mentioned that Mr. Service exhibited an enthusiasm for the Japanese Communists while he was in Tokyo. Did any such manifestation ever come to your attention?—A. No.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you in any way come to associate Mr. Service with pro-Communist, either Japanese or Chinese or Russian—

A. No, sir; my impression of him was that he was consistently pro-American.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you ever have any indication that General MacArthur was dissatisfied with Mr. Service's work?

A. I did not, sir.

Mr. ACHILLES. Or any indication that Mr. Service was in any way disloyal to General MacArthur in the policies he was pursuing?

A. No, No, sir; I think not. I don't believe I had any conversation with him which concerned any policies, which was entirely apart from this, which was the Japanese constitution and the way it was given to the Japanese. I think he is one of the people I did not discuss that with.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't hear from him any vilification of General MacArthur?

A. No, sir; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Or didn't hear from anybody else that he had been understood to vilify General MacArthur?

A. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. No further questions. Thank you very much for coming up.
(The witness was excused.)

Mr. RHEITS. Now if the Board please, I would like to have included in the transcript at this point a 5-page affidavit, signed by Charles L. Kades, dated June 7, 1950.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be added to the transcript.
(The matter referred to is as follows:)

DOCUMENT No. 323

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

STATE OF NEW YORK,

County of New York, ss.:

CHARLES L. KADES, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that:

1. I am a member of the bar of the State of New York with offices at 67 Wall Street in the City, County, and State of New York;

2. I was a Colonel, Infantry, assigned to duty with the United States Army Forces, Pacific, in Japan from August 26, 1945, until September 30, 1946, as deputy to Brigadier General Courtney Whitney, Chief of the Government Section, General Headquarters, Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, and continued thereafter to serve as a civilian in that post from October 1, 1946, until May 3, 1949.

3. The primary mission of the Government Section was to advise the Supreme Commander on the status of and policies pertaining to military government in Korea and the internal structure of civil government in Japan. Specifically, it was the function of the Section to make recommendations for: the demilitarization of the Japanese Government; the decentralization of government and the encouragement of local responsibility; the elimination therefrom of feudal and totalitarian practices which tended to prevent government by the people; and the elimination of those relationships between government and business which tended to continue the Japanese war potential and to hamper the achievement of Occupation objectives.

4. The Government Section was also specifically charged with staff responsibility for all matters relating to the removal and exclusion of Japanese personnel from national and local elective and appointive posts and influential political and economic positions, and for the encouragement of the formation and activities of democratic political parties and the abolition of those whose activities were inconsistent with the requirements of the military occupation and the objectives of the United States.

5. Within the Government Section there was created in October 1945 an External Affairs Unit to effect: (1) the severance of Japanese governmental and administrative authority and control over areas outside of Japan proper formerly occupied or controlled by Japan; and (2) the severance of direct relations between the Japanese Government and other countries. Neither of these tasks was assigned to the Government Section in the General Order which established the Section. But the first fell within the Section's sphere under its responsibility to advise on the structure of civil government in Japan; the second task was assumed by Government Section because what was later to become the Diplomatic Section of General Headquarters, SCAP, was at the time purely an United States Department of State mission serving as Political Adviser to the Supreme Commander but having no General Headquarters staff functions. Among the functions of this Department of State mission (commonly called "Polad") was the preparation of a weekly political report to Washington. This report was written generally by Mr. John Emmerson, a Foreign Service officer with Polad, and contained a comprehensive survey and analysis of the organization, platforms, and activities of political parties, political leaders, and other personalities who were participating in public affairs, as well as a summary of the political, economic, and social developments during the immediately preceding week. Because of the nature of this report and its relationship not only to political parties but also to the removal and exclusion of ultranationalists from public service, both of which functions were under the general supervision of the Government Section, and because of the external affairs function of the Government Section, during this period I was frequently in contact with various officials of Polad, including George Atcheson (the Political Advisor), John Stewart Service (his Executive Officer), Messrs. Max

Bishop and John Emmerson, and others, including U. Alexis Johnson, later Chief of the American Consulate at Yokohama.

6. Never did I hear from any person in Japan any statement that NOZAKA, Sanzo (one of the leaders of the Japanese Communist Party) was often a visitor at the offices of Polad or any comment whatever concerning his appearances at the Polad office. Never did I hear from any person in Japan any statement connecting Nozaka or any other Communist with Mr. Service in any way in Japan. Never did I hear from any person in Japan any criticism of Mr. Service of any nature by reason of his associations. On the contrary, the opinion generally held of him was that he was devoting himself (until he became ill) to his duties of administration and that he had a reserved disposition, rarely associating outside of business hours with officers of staff sections at General Headquarters.

7. Actually, there would be no cause for comment among any Allied personnel if Nozaka had visited Polad. The reports by Mr. Emmerson required interviews and conferences with leading personalities in Japan, regardless of party or other affiliation. Moreover, Nozaka visited the Government Section at General Headquarters, conferring on numerous occasions with the Chief of the Political Affairs Division which was created early in the Occupation to make recommendations for Election Law revision, promote the development of democratic practices by political parties and to dissolve and prevent the formation of antidemocratic societies, associations, and organizations. Not only Nozaka, but also Tokuda, Shiga, and Dobashi (other leaders of the Communist Party) came to answer our inquiries, make reports for our use and to keep us generally informed on current developments, as well as to ask questions, to make complaints, and to object to certain occupation policies. Memorandums for the record were often made of the substance of these conversations. If Nozaka absented himself for any long period of time from such interviews and conferences because he was the scholarly type of Communist, spoke English, and was more voluble, but less militant and excitable than his colleagues, I would send for him to ascertain, if possible, why he had been absent and what he had been thinking about, and doing, what he was contemplating and generally obtain his view of events for whatever it was worth. Not until the very recent shift in Japanese Communist Party tactics toward terrorism and open defiance of the Occupation was there any disposition to ostracize Communist leaders. For example, when the Under Secretary of War, General William H. Draper, came to Tokyo, for an inspection of the Occupation, a round table with members of the National Diet of all political complexions was arranged at which Nozaka was present and at which both spoke freely and frankly. It is also perhaps worthy of note that it has always been customary for Japanese to come to General Headquarters and confer in offices of the Occupation, rather than for Occupation personnel to go to Japanese governmental or political party offices. Therefore, it would be expected that Nozaka would come to Polad or GHQ whatever the purpose of the visit.

8. Although I never heard any comment or criticism concerning any of the above-mentioned meetings, I have no doubt that certain Japanese, especially among those influential politicians and financiers removed or excluded from public service, would consider a visit by Nozaka or any Communist leader a cause for adverse comment which would quickly cast a shadow of suspicion upon anyone having any political intercourse with him. Such a state of mind is inherent in any police state, such as Japan was prior to the occupation, where even "dangerous thoughts" were prohibited and persons were punished severely for the commission of the crime of being suspected of having them. It is, therefore, within the realm of possibility that some politically gullible American having naive prewar ties with such Japanese lent his ear to their comment that it was not comme il faut to receive Nozaka and, being an indoctrinee of Japan's old and discredited order, was duly impressed.

CHARLES L. KADES.

Sworn to before me this 7th day of June 1950.

GRACE A. BEGGS.

Grace A. Beggs, Notary Public, State of New York, No. 24-0222800, Qualified in Kings County, Cert. Filed with Clerk of N. Y. County, Registers of Kings and N. Y. Counties, Commission Expires March 30, 1951.

Mr. RHETTS. If the Board please, several days ago when Mr. Larson was on the stand he referred to the original manuscript which he prepared, which was then extensively revised by Mr. Levine, and he referred to the fact that a copy of this manuscript had been made available to the Department of State. Although Mr. Larsen agreed to obtain an additional copy and furnish it to me, I wonder if the Board has been able to obtain a copy to which Mr. Larsen referred.

The CHAIRMAN. A complete search has been made and no copy has been found, nor is there any information that the Department has ever had a copy.

Mr. RHETTS. The Board will also recall that when Mr. Larsen left, shall we say, prematurely in the course of his cross-examination, he indicated that he would be willing to return if arrangements could be made with him for that purpose. In view of the fact that we are now in the eleventh trial day on this case, I am not disposed to insist on Mr. Larsen's return for further cross-examination. If he is willing to come, fine, but I shall not be disposed to press the matter. I do not know whether the Board has had any further communication with him or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board has been in communication with Mr. Larsen, but he has not as yet been able to come before the Board because of his preoccupation with the Senate committee.

Mr. RHETTS. Well, I should like to ask leave to introduce into evidence in this case the original manuscript of his article if he supplies it to me, as he has promised to do.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be granted.

Mr. RHETTS. Now at this time I would like to ask Mr. Service to take the stand again.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. Mr. Service, did you see an article which appeared in the Washington Daily News for 2 days ago, Tuesday, June 6, 1950, under the by-line of Frederick Woltman?—A. I did.

Q. This article refers to a so-called Amerasia document which is alleged—there does not appear to be any indication in this newspaper story as to precisely where a certain document was found. The document referred to appears to be certain notes on what is called an "Eyes Alone" message, and the news story indicates that you were referred to in these notes. Does this news story bring to your mind any aspect of this case which has not heretofore been touched on?—A. Yes; it brought to my mind that I had had some conversation with Mr. Gayn at one time touching on this general subject.

Q. I wonder if you would describe to the Board the whole background of this conversation and what occurred?—A. As I recall, the first day that I met Gayn, on April 19, 1945, he told me that he had a contract with The Saturday Evening Post for a series of articles, I think he said, dealing in general with the Stilwell recall, and he said that he was then in the process of collecting material. I told him that I had not been in Chungking at the time of General Stilwell's recall and had been out of Chungking for several months, as a matter of fact, that I did not know the details of the final events that led up to the recall. When I was in New York, on April 24 and April 25, 1945, you will recall that I testified I spent the night of April 24 with the Gayns in their apartment in New York. I remember that after we had had breakfast on the morning of the 25th—we had breakfast in the apartment there—in the Gayns' apartment—we were sitting around, and Gayn returned to this subject of his article—the articles which he was planning for The Saturday Evening Post—and he mentioned his difficulties getting the true story—accurate story. He referred to the fact that here had been a great number of versions of the Stilwell recall and the reasons for the Stilwell recall in various magazines. The Luce publications particularly had published extensive reviews and purportedly authoritative accounts of the reasons for the Stilwell recall. I think Congressman Judd has made a statement—if I remember rightly, it was in the House, but at least it was given great publicity—making some very misleading statements, and there had been over the previous 6 months since the recall a great deal of discussion and what amounted to a campaign of vilification, really, against General Stilwell over the whole matter.

The first American press reaction, of course, had been one of shock and surprise over the Stilwell recall, and it was quite apparent that the critics of the administration, critics of American policy, particularly the friends of China—the China lobby—had obscured the issue and put a great many half truths and untruths about General Stilwell and about the whole affair. I told Gayn again that I didn't know the late events that took place in Chungking, but I think I asked him whether he was familiar with the genesis of the final conflict or issue. I was thinking particularly of the request or suggestion by the American Government that General Stilwell be placed in command of all the Chinese armies as a means of unifying and making more effective the Chinese war effort.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall when that became public knowledge?

A. Yes, sir; that had become public knowledge at the time.

Mr. ACHILLES. In the fall of 1944?—A. In the fall of 1944. But the whole matter had since that time been obscured by this campaign of—I called it vilification; I think that's a fair word. He wasn't very thoroughly informed and he asked me if I could—

Q. You are referring to Gayn now?—A. Yes. He asked me if I could explain. So I mentioned the original exchange of telegrams, commencing in July, of which I had had some knowledge, pointing out that since those first telegrams I had had no knowledge at all. He asked if he could take some notes because he thought that it was very important, and I said to him at the time that this was material which I could tell him just so that he would have an accurate starting point or foundation, but that he could not use the material as coming from me or could not use it unless he got other substantiation; it was purely background information, so that he would not go off on a line as so many of the writers were doing in regard to the whole affair. I was interested in having this series of articles which were to be published by the Saturday Evening Post on the beam, out of fairness to General Stilwell, out of fairness to our own policy at the time, and, you might say, as an offset to a great deal of the incorrect speculative accounts that had come out. I told him about the early two messages, speaking entirely from memory, of course. I had no copies or notes or anything else. As I recall, his wife sat off to the side of the room and made some notes. Apparently, judging from this, she made extremely complete notes.

I never saw the notes that he had, and I do remember cautioning him on the question of the use of this as background material—cautioning him that these originally had been what were called "Eyes Alone" messages. Now I think I ought to say here that "Eyes Alone" is not a security classification. Security classifications are "Top Secret," "Secret," "Confidential," "Restricted," and "Unclassified." I have the security manuals here if anybody wishes to refer to them. "Eyes Alone" was a distribution instruction commonly used in the Army for messages which they did not wish to have widely distributed or some particular subject which they did not wish to have distributed to the staff of the headquarters, or something of that sort. Now, of course, "Eyes Alone" is a misleading term. Anyone knows that a message like this was prepared by various people in Washington, perhaps at a fairly low level, probably prepared in the War Department, O. K'd at various steps up to General Marshall, Secretary Stimson had taken it over to the White House, and there it went through I don't know how many channels, how many hands. Then, of course, you have all the procedure of putting it into the cryptographic machinery, transmitting it to China, decoding it, passing it through the code clerks, the stenographers, and the personnel of the headquarters, including the adjutant's office, the chief of staff, commanding general, and so on. A message of this sort, furthermore, is not transmitted in a highly secret code usually, because the message is given verbatim to a foreign government.

Mr. ACHILLES. Some messages may be. Not all "Eyes Alone" messages.

A. No, but at any rate there is, I think it is correct to say, a special category of code for one type of message since the full text is given to a foreign government, and after it goes to the foreign government the security in that sense is lost since there is no way of knowing what distribution it may receive after it gets into the hands of the foreign government. In this particular case we heard back through Chinese channels of these messages. Some of them reached the foreign correspondents in Chungking through Chinese Government channels.

The CHAIRMAN. By that you mean that although the original message bore an "Eyes Alone" characterization it had become widely known through other offices of the Government through Chinese sources?

A. Yes.

Q. You mean after it was once delivered.—A. Yes, that's right. Now, also, of course, these instructions on distribution—these instructions are more or less sometimes temporary. After it becomes generally known, the original instruction is not binding.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the whole concept is, isn't it, that it should be protected until its delivery to the foreign government?

A. That is correct; sir, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So that it reaches the foreign government before it reaches the general public.

A. That's what I'm trying to say.

Q. Now this was a discussion you had with Gayn?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever have any similar discussion of this matter with Jaffe?—A. Not to my knowledge, sir; no, not that I recall.

Q. I believe in response to a question from Mr. Achilles you have indicated that at the time when you had this discussion with Gayn in May of 1945.—A. With Gayn in late April.

Q. Late April—the matter had also—that is, the fact that the proposal had been to put General Stilwell in command of all Chinese armies was public knowledge.—A. If was, I'm sure, published in at least one of the stories—I think the New York Times carried the fact in a story of Stilwell's recall which was published at the end of October—October 31, 1944. That story was written by Brooks Atkinson, who was in Chungking at the time of Stilwell's recall, and I knew he had received very, very complete fill-in briefing on the whole series of events and exchange of messages leading up to the final recall.

Mr. ACHILLES. By whom was he given a briefing?

A. I wasn't present, and I don't have direct personal knowledge. I do know that it was a very authoritative, responsible fill-in briefing. Also, that there had been articles written by the United Press and by the Associated Press correspondents at New Delhi at the time of the recall which also, I believe, mentioned the essential fact, which was the American request, originating in telegrams from President Roosevelt, that the American commander, General Stilwell, be put in command of all Chinese armies. I know that those correspondents—I know from second-hand that those correspondents received similar complete briefing, and I read at least one of their stories. I know from Theodore White, who was in Chungking, that he also had a similar opportunity to learn all the facts and, I believe, to see the actual documents.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was there anything which you told Gayn at that time which had not been previously published or—

A. I think the only sort of things that I mentioned to Gayn—and this was just to tell him the story—were small details, such as the fact that I was interpreter and that we insisted on giving the message directly to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek rather than forwarding it through channels and allowing it to go through other hands. Those are the only facts, I believe, that had not been published, and those were just color; they weren't essential at all.

Mr. ACHILLES. In other words, there was nothing substantive that you told Gayn.

A. No, sir. I don't know whether it is pertinent to the account that Mr. Theodore White has written in his book, Thunder Out of China, published early in 1946, I believe, which indicates the extent to which he had been briefed. It refers to the language of the document, and so forth.

The CHAIRMEN. Will you refer us to that publication.

A. The book is Thunder Out of China, by Theodore H. White and Anna Lee Jacoby, published by William Sloan Associates, Inc., and I refer particularly to pages 218-225.

Q. I have no further questions on this point.

Mr. ACHILLES. I have no further questions now. I would like to take a look at the book.

(Brooks Atkinson, called as a witness in behalf of John Stewart Service, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Mr. Atkinson?—A. Brooks Atkinson, 120 Riverside Drive, New York City.

Q. And what is your present position, sir?—A. Drama critic of the New York Times.

Q. Now, did you serve in Chungking during the war years?—A. Yes; I was there from December 1942 until the end of October 1944.

Q. As a correspondent for the New York Times?—A. War correspondent for the Times.

Q. Now I should like to ask you whether in late October 1944 you obtained knowledge as a newspaperman of the circumstances—the details and the circumstances—leading up to General Stilwell's recall?—A. Yes, I knew that pretty completely.

Q. And did that include detailed knowledge concerning the proposal that General Stilwell be placed in command of all Chinese armies?—A. Yes.

Q. I wonder if you would care to explain in detail, if you will, the knowledge that you had on that subject.—A. Well, yes, I'll do the best I can. It was 6 years ago, so I can't remember in detail everything that went on, but I knew from several sources for a matter of a month or 6 weeks that negotiations were going on between Pat Hurley and Chiang Kai-shek for the purpose of putting Stilwell in practical command of the Chinese troops. In other words, Stilwell felt—we all felt, including myself—that the Chinese were not fighting the war and Stilwell was handicapped by not having command of the troops. I knew about those negotiations and I knew finally that the negotiations had broken down on account of a peremptory telegram from Roosevelt to Chiang Kai-shek which Stilwell delivered.

Now I would rather not divulge my sources, if that's agreeable to you people, for two reasons: One, that newspaper ethics traditionally protect sources. Another reason is that other people are involved, and I don't like to involve them unless they know about it. But the principal reason is that after all these years I really can't remember what one man said and what another man said. You can readily guess the nature of my sources. They were both American and Chinese. They were authentic and legitimate, and it was the practice of the American Army to keep American correspondents as well informed about the politics of the war and the economy of the war and things of that kind as was legitimate. So I feel that I had a very complete knowledge of what was going on at that time. In fact, I brought along here a story that I wrote when I came home. I came home for the specific purpose of writing a story about Stilwell's discharge from China, which I couldn't write in China on account of the Chinese censorship. And this story, which is in the Times for October 31, 1944, begins with a general summary of what the situation was between Stilwell, Chiang Kai-shek, Pat Hurley, and Roosevelt at that time, although it naturally does not go into the minute details of the negotiations, which I wasn't too familiar with anyway, and which, if I knew, I wouldn't feel at liberty to divulge.

The information I had was for background use. Now this story, you might be interested to know, was held up by the Army censor here in Washington for 3 or 4 days. Stilwell's retirement had been announced—I think I can remember the day—it was on a Saturday or a Sunday, because I just arrived on a Sunday. It seems to me Stilwell's retirement was announced in the papers on Sunday, but with a loose and very vague explanation of why. Now I had the story in my pocket—that's why I came home—and gave it to the New York Times, which sent it to the Army censor here in Washington. And it was "hot stuff" and he naturally avoided passing it, if possible, and it was finally passed and published on the 31st—that's Tuesday.

Mr. ACHILLES. Could we have that made a part of the record?

A. Yes, I brought that for evidence. The managing editor told me at that time that finally the censor took the story to Roosevelt together with another story by Preston Grover of the AP. Preston Grover was the AP correspondent in New Delhi. He had been briefed on what had happened to Stilwell before I left New Delhi. I wrote the story and I brought it home in my pocket to give to the AP. The managing editor told me that Roosevelt decided that the facts were substantially as I had stated them in this article, and that since I was in the country I was entitled to have the story censored and printed. But Preston Grover was still in New Delhi and they had to cable his story back to him in New Delhi and have it censored there and then recabled to this country. I remember that very vividly because it gave me about 10 hours' beat on him.

Q. I would like at this point to ask that a photostatic reproduction of two pages of the New York Times for October 31, 1944, be put in evidence as an exhibit, numbered document 334, and in that connection I should like to read two paragraphs from the story by Mr. Atkinson which has just been referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The paper may be made an exhibit and you may read as you request.

A. This is merely an excerpt from the story, which is a long one, running over onto page 4:

"For the last 2 months negotiations had been going on between President Roosevelt's personal representative, Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to give General Stilwell full command of the Chinese ground and air forces under the generalissimo and to increase China's participation in the counter offensive against Japan.

"Although the generalissimo at first was inclined to agree to General Stilwell's appointment as commander, he decided later that he would accept any American commander except General Stilwell."

A. That next paragraph may be pertinent, if you will read that.

Q. The next one, yes:

"His attitude toward the American negotiations became stiff and hostile. At a private meeting of the standing committee of the Kuomintang [National Party] Central Executive Committee this month he announced the terms of his personal ultimatum to Americans who were pressing him for military and governmental reform.

"He declared that General Stilwell must go, that the control of American lend-lease materials must be put in his hands and that he would not be coerced by Americans into helping to unify China by making terms with the Chinese Communists. If America did not yield on these points, he said China would go back to fighting the Japanese alone, as she did before Pearl Harbor."

(Photostatic copy of New York Times, pages 1 and 4, dated October 31, 1944, marked "Exhibit 24" in evidence and appended to this transcript.)

A. I would like to add where I said about my sources—I said being vague about it, but I should say that about this particular episode nobody in the Embassy was a source, as far as I could remember. I know Mr. Service wasn't; he was in Yen-an at the time. I had no communication with him. The other people I knew in the Embassy, I can't remember that anybody gave me any information on this particular subject. My sources were outside of the Embassy on this particular point.

Mr. ACHILLES. But you were briefed by official sources in order, presumably, that the American people might get the facts?

A. Exactly.

Q. In that connection, Mr. Atkinson, is it a fact that your briefing included the fullest disclosure of all the facts leading up to the recall?—A. Yes; I believe so.

Q. Now, as a matter of fact, do you know whether General Stilwell had knowledge that you knew the full facts?—A. Oh, yes. In fact, I came out from Chungking as far as New Delhi in his party. We had two planes, and he knew why I was coming.

Q. And you were coming back for the express purpose of publishing this story?—A. I was. This story was known to many other people, too.

Q. I was going to ask you about that. I believe you mentioned Preston Grover. He was the AP correspondent in New Delhi?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether the UP correspondent in New Delhi was also fully briefed on this matter, as you were?—A. I'm quite sure. There was Derrel Berrigan, if I'm not mistaken. At least I knew that he knew it.

Q. And you were quite certain that he also—A. He knew the story. I don't know the circumstances as well as I do about Preston Grover, who asked me to bring his story home for him.

Q. Now after you left New Delhi, was Mr. Service on the plane with you returning to the United States?—A. We met in New Delhi and had taken a plane that night, and I remember it because I was very surprised, but in a way I wasn't surprised because Service always turned up where things were hot, and as far as I knew, he was in Yen-an, but here he was on the plane on the way home, presumably on the same business I was.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Service knew that you had been fully briefed on this story?—A. Well, I had my story written at that time and I showed it to him on the plane. I can't remember, naturally, all the conversation, but he knew why I was coming home, and I'm sure I must have told him everything I knew.

Q. One further question on this point. After you published the story on October 31, 1944, was the matter of the circumstances of the Stilwell recall thereafter a subject of wide public interest?—A. Yes.

Q. Would you be able to say whether by April 1945 the full details of the actual circumstances of the recall were widely known amongst persons knowledgeable?—A. I think the general story was available to the public in various forms, not only in what I had written myself and a series of articles that I wrote after this one article, but I remember Berrigan of the UP had a series of articles which covered the same material, and—well, I can't cite other instances now. The Saturday Evening Post had some kind of a story which more or less—it was the same story that I wrote. The reason I remember it is because the fellow who wrote it arrived in Chungking just about the day I was leaving, and when his story finally appeared—it seems to me it was in the spring of 1945—he wrote me a letter and said he apologized for telling the same story that I did, but after all there was only one story and there wasn't very much more to be added to it. That's how it sticks in my mind.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it?

A. I can't remember. His first name was Sam, but the rest of his name I have forgotten.

Q. Was it Mark Gayn?—A. No.

Q. I take it, when we refer to this story, that included particularly the fact that the President's proposal was that General Stilwell be placed in command of all Chinese armed forces under the generalissimo?—A. That's right.

Q. Now turning from this particular question, I believe you have already written a letter to the Board, Mr. Atkinson, but I wonder if you would care to state again your knowledge, based on your association with Mr. Service, of Mr. Service's general political orientation, with particular reference to whether you ever detected any disposition to be a Communist or a Communist sympathizer or otherwise oriented toward the Communists.—A. Well, I have already touched on that in an affidavit which I sent, which you may remember. But Jack and I were very close associates in China for 2 years, and there were two or three other members of the Embassy, and we were all very congenial and we were together all the time. Now I really can't remember any conversation we had on any subject. It just seems to me there was a complete intimacy on all political and intellectual, social, and artistic topics. Jack is 100 percent loyal to this country, he is a very keen collector of information, and it seems to me the facts have borne out that he is a very sound—he can produce very sound evaluations of evidence. As to communism, I can't remember anything we ever said on the subject. I can say for myself that I was much less bitter about the Communists at that time than I am now. We were war allies.

I admired very much the war that they were putting on, and it seemed to me after this association and after meetings that we had had that politically the relations with Russia might be happier after the war than they were before. Now I can see that was naive. Nevertheless, that was my attitude in those days. I think it was an attitude that many people had. My whole interest in the subject was winning the war as far as America was concerned. The reason I tell you what my opinions were is because I don't remember that Jack's conflicted with mine in any way. I am glad to have a chance to come here in case you want to discuss this in any more detail. But he wasn't a Communist then, I can swear, any more than I was, and I wasn't, and he is not now and never has been.

Q. In that connection, Mr. Atkinson, in connection with your own statement that you are not and never have been a Communist, do you know whether the Soviet Union looks on you with any particular favor?—A. Yes. I have been there twice—1936 and again in 1945 and 1946—and both times I had the honor of being denounced by the press as soon as I got home. It is a matter of record.

Mr. ACHILLES. By the press?

A. By the Soviet press. As a matter of record, they take a very dim view of me, which gives me a great deal of feeling of security.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask you something about the relationship between the press in the China-Burma theater and the military authorities. In other words, whether or not it was a custom there at that time for the authorities to brief the press on matters which the press wasn't permitted to publish.

A. Yes. In fact, we had a few—the accredited correspondents who are distinguished from those who are not accredited to the United States Army—we had a few press conferences in Chungking with General Stilwell and, when he wasn't there, with General Hearn, who was his deputy, and I would say most of that stuff was off the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that include stuff that would normally be classified?

A. I think so; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And was that known as background information?

A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How would you define "background information?"

A. Background information is information which you were not at liberty to use as such, but just intended to clarify your mind and put things in their real proportion.

The CHAIRMAN. Now that briefing was given you by the military authorities and also by their political observers attached to the military authorities?

A. Those were entirely with General Stilwell and General Hearn, and we had a few of those conferences, but they were finally given up for a plain reason: there was nothing to say, nothing was going on, and there wasn't any news.

We could never print the stuff because we had two censorships: we had the American Army censorship and the Chinese censorship, and only pretty routine stuff could get through those two censorships.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for coming down.

(The witness was excused.)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have any other witnesses?

Mr. RHETTS. As far as I am concerned, we can take a recess.

The CHAIRMAN. We will recess until Wednesday of next week, at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 11:15 a. m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene at 10 a. m., June 14, 1950.)

The CHAIRMAN. The board will be in session.

(After being duly sworn, Col. John Owen Beaty testified in behalf of the loyalty security board as follows:)

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is your full name, Colonel?—A. John Owen Beaty.

Q. Are you a lieutenant colonel in the United States Army?—A. Colonel in the United States Army Reserve.

Q. Your present residence?—A. Dallas, Tex.

Q. And you have come here at the invitation of the board to testify in this case?—A. Yes.

Q. Colonel, would you give us a brief review of your military experience?—

A. I volunteered at the outbreak of the World War I. I was a student at Columbia at the time that I sent my application in for the first officers' training camp. So many more Virginians volunteered than they could take into the training camp that they wrote me to stay on in New York and to come for the second training camp, so I actually entered the 27th of August 1917 in the Fort Myer officers' training camp, where I was commissioned second lieutenant in November 1917 and had many kinds of little jobs.

When the war ended I was commanding officer of the American detachment at Harling Road, Norfolk, England. I remained in France until August—the end of July or August—was discharged from the Army August 27, 1919, retained the commission with lapses and one thing or another, but essentially retained the commission, recalled as captain in 1941 for approximately 5 years, Military Intelligence Division, War Department, General Staff, advancing through the grades, and during several of those years was member of the General Staff Corps.

That is enough detail.

Q. Since then you have retained your commission?—A. Since then I have retained my commission and have been on active duty two periods of 3 and 2 months and several shorter periods, most recent of which was the 3rd and 4th of June in this current month. I was in uniform the 3rd and 4th of June.

Q. Now, referring to 1945, you were at that time on duty in the Pentagon?—A. That is correct, sir.

Q. In the Military Intelligence Division?—A. That is correct.

Q. What was your function?—A. I wish Chief of the Interview Section. The Interview Section was, as you know, designed to give us the information brought back by returning officers and members of the Navy Department, State Department, war correspondents, refugees, anybody we thought would give us late information on areas or topics in which we were interested.

Q. In that connection you had occasion to interview John Stewart Service?—A. Yes.

Q. Had you ever met him before?—A. To the best of my memory I didn't know he existed until our liaison said—he returned from China and he came over and was interviewed by a group upon my invitation.

Q. Do you remember who else was in the group?—A. No, sir. I interviewed more than 2,000 such people. My office was not an office of record. The people who came made the records. You see, we would invite people from appropriate services and branches. For instance, most interviews the Transportation Corps would have a representative present and Quartermaster and many of them and various experts would come according to their interests and they kept the records.

Q. So you took no notes?—A. No, sir. In the first few weeks or months I did do it but there seemed to be some belief, which I shared, that for us to maintain a little set of files would be a waste of time and duplicate effort and these other people who were making the notes and preparing intelligence didn't have us do it. So we had the function with regard to getting the people there. Notes were made by the North African Branch, the Far Eastern Branch, Transportation, or any of the various units that would come. Navy sometimes would come.

Q. Were all the people who were present military people?—A. No; they were properly qualified civilians.

Q. Who did the civilians represent?—A. Any of these, almost every intelligence branch or section would have a few officers in it and also some professional career people.

Q. Were the civilians all employees of the Army?—A. I am not quite sure. Perhaps Navy would send a civilian or not, but for the most part civilians were there. People coming in from the Navy were usually in uniform. I can't give you a positive answer on that.

Q. Were there any of the press there?—A. Oh, no; the interviews were always classified in some degree, "restricted" or up.

Q. Now, can you state of your own recollection anything that Mr. Service stated at this interview?—A. I remember it particularly well because we had previously interviewed returning from that area perhaps 20 individuals. They had not been connected—they were not working together, they would come at different times on different missions. I say approximately 20, I am not sure of the number. Naturally you understand that. From those interviews we had built up a picture of the area generally referred to as North China.

I was struck, and I remember that others I met—I mentioned it to others that the remarks of Mr. Service were so diametrically different from all the other information it was startling. I happened to remember saying something like this, "Well, you don't know what is on the other side of the mountain. Nineteen people tell you the oaks and one tells you the pines are on the other side of the mountain." I remember stating that and I have said that same thing several times since in discussing it.

Now, as I said, I can't guarantee that we had talked to 19 or 20, it might have been 15 or it might have been 22 or 23, but we had talked to many others returning from the area.

Q. Had you talked with any others who had been with the Communist forces in Yanan?—A. I couldn't trust my memory after this many years. I interviewed over 2,000 and I was present at almost all of them except possibly a few that were when I was on leave, and we didn't have much leave at that time.

Q. You can't recall anybody besides Mr. Service who had come from Yanan?—A. I couldn't say where individuals came from specifically after this many years.

Q. You were going to tell us what Mr. Service said.—A. Without presuming to quote exact words, the best of my memory is that we should not fool along with Chiang Kai-shek's Government, that the so-called Communist Government of North China, in his opinion, had no connection whatsoever with Soviet communism, was an independent, mature, well-functioning group, were only the best hope of China and collaboration with them was the best thing we could do in the China field—the sense is that. I am not presuming to quote the words he said because, as you know, the lapse of time is considerable.

Q. I may have misled you as to date. Was this 1944 or '45?—A. My memory is that it was the spring of '45, but as I said, I have no notes on it. To the best of my knowledge and belief it was the spring of '45.

Q. Mr. Service came back twice, once in '44 and once in '45 and I am not quite sure which is the occasion you refer to.—A. I can't swear to the date. The best of my knowledge and belief would be in the spring of '45.

Q. Just for your information, in an attempt to refresh your recollection, the first return was in October '44 and the second return was in April '45.—A. I think it was much more likely the second return. As I said, I can't swear to a date on it but my belief is that it was in the spring of '45.

Q. Have you told us all that you can recollect of this statement?—A. I think so.

Q. Did you have any further connection with Mr. Service after that?—

A. No, sir.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Can you recall any person who was at this session with you, Mr. Beaty?—

A. I believe—understand the circumstances under which we met we might not all be present, by my principal assistant was Maj. Daniel Ryan. I think it likely that he was present.

Q. You do not know positively whether he was or not? You can't recall?—

A. I can't recall whether he was or not.

Q. Can you give us the names of any others of the 19 to 23 that you might have interviewed who had come from any area close to Yenan?—A. I am afraid I can't, sir. As I said before, we got these people in from this general area and much time has passed and many of them—I cannot say for certain.

Q. You say other parts of the War Department, or those who attended, kept notes. What do you mean by that, Colonel? Are their notes somewhere in the War Department to your knowledge?—A. I would say this, it is quite possible that some people attended these interviews without making notes. In other words, if they found something they thought useful they would make notes and add them to their intelligence files. If they didn't there would be no reason for their doing it.

Q. I believe you testified that you made the comment afterward about the 19—A. I recall that.

Q. Do you remember to whom you made that comment?—A. I believe I made it to Major Ryan, but whether or not I made it to him in discussing the interview that he had been at or in breaking information to him about the interview, I don't recall.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. In your capacity as head of the unit, that covered arranging interviews from all theaters?—A. Oh, yes, all theaters. Of course, we bothered only with strategic theaters. We didn't presume to be covering the whole world. To the best of my knowledge and belief we interviewed nobody from Dutch Guiana—only where the War Department was directly concerned.

Q. Did you by any chance arrange any interviews about that time with General Hurley when he came back from China?—A. I was ordered not to interview General Hurley. I want to say this in defense of the War Department, it was the only time I received that certain order. I was given carte blanche except in that one case.

Q. Did your interviews ordinarily include generals or did they start lower down?—A. We interviewed privates first class and sergeants and people who according to experience they had had, as represented to us, as reported to us by the people in position to know—no, rank had nothing to do with it. It was being in a strategic area or having been in experiences which would likely prove fruitful.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you interview General Stilwell when he came back?—A. No, sir.

Q. General Wedemeyer?—A. No, sir. Those are a little out of our reach. We interviewed higher ranking people outside than we did within the War Department. For instance, our chief was just a major general. We didn't go above major general in interviewing. We interviewed ambassadors and others of high rank, but within the War Department—

Q. Did you interview Ambassador Gauss?—A. No, sir.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Have you any idea of whether there should have been any special order not to interview General Hurley?—A. No, sir. I was just told by a man several steps above me, a couple steps above me, not to interview him. But I think he—I know he got it from higher up. I don't know that he did but the way he told me and everything was that he was told—he was a brigadier general, and he told me not to interview Hurley in the War Department.

Q. I know it is a long time ago, but you can't recall any further details of what Mr. Service may have said?—A. Not precisely, sir. I have given you essentially the idea, that this Communist development in North China was highly independent of any Russian connections and a much better bet for American collaboration and assistance and so forth than the Chiang Kai-shek Government. Beyond that at this time I couldn't presume to make a quotation.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. In connection with your duties did you read any reports from the theaters—written reports?—A. I did occasionally, sir; not comprehensively.

Q. I wonder if you happened to have read any of Mr. Service's written reports.—A. I don't recall, sir. I did not study all the things coming in on any one area but I was from time to time, by people I was working with, furnished military attaché and other reports with marked passages on them. Sometimes I would read the entire report, you see, many of the intelligence documents for perusal, to keep me informed so I could do my interview work better. But I don't recall at this date whether I did or didn't read any one of them from that area at that time.

Q. Did Mr. Service state at the time that he had been to Yenai among the Communist forces?—A. I don't recall whether he stated that or not.

Q. Did you know that to be a fact?—A. He was sent to us through liaison channels from the State Department as having been in the north China area.

Q. But you don't recall where in the area he was stationed?—A. I don't know his itinerary at this date. I don't recall his itinerary. He may have mentioned the route he followed or the stops he made, but I made no record of the Chinese names.

Q. You yourself have not been to China?—A. Not in that part of China, sir, and nowhere in China to amount to anything.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS :

Q. Did you have an interview with Colonel Dickey?—A. I am not sure, sir, as I said before, having interviewed 2,000 and more than 2,000—

Q. I am trying to identify some of the 23. Do you ever remember interviewing Col. Frank Dorn?—A. I don't think I remember the name, sir. The name is familiar to me but in what connection I don't know.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Do you remember ever interviewing any other State Department employees?—A. We interviewed a lot of State Department employees, but I don't recall them by name at this date, not having made any record whatsoever. Two thousand people passing through, there has to be something striking before you remember.

Q. Do you remember anybody by the name of Davies?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or Emmerson?—A. My memory is not—remembering or not remembering is not significant.

Q. Do you recall interviewing anybody who said they had been among the Communist forces in Yenai?—A. Who specifically made that statement I could not say. My impression is yes, but I can't recall the name. We kept no diaries and made no notes. All that was discouraged.

Q. Colonel, the board is very much obliged to you for having come all the way from Texas to testify. We want you to understand we appreciate it.

I will now turn you over to Mr. Rhett's.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. I wonder if you can explain to us in a little more detail, Colonel, what this Interview Section was. I don't understand it myself.—A. I will be happy to. It was to get foreign information on any subject in the world to people who needed it more quickly than through channels. For instance, a member of the Quartermaster Corps had representatives at all of our meetings of people from the South Pacific. Incidentally, gun rust and things of that sort, getting information of that sort by direct interview of a man who in many cases had flown in by plane got vital information to the people who needed it an estimated 6 weeks before it could have come in a roundabout process. In other words, we were a little short-cut to help out with last-minute information.

Q. You indicated that one function was to assist in obtaining information more quickly than you could get it through channels. Was this not a part—A. Put through ordinary printed reports, reported channels.

Q. What was the composition of this Interview Section? Could you tell us that?—A. There were two officers, a secretary, that was all, because we didn't make notes ourselves. We simply contacted the agencies to find the people and arranged an interview, usually in a room something like this, and all the records were made by the people who came to the interview.

Q. As I understand it the Interview Section was an administrative machinery designed to bring experts in particular fields who were in the Military Intelligence Division in contact with individuals who had knowledge in those fields.—A. That is right.

Q. Are you yourself a far eastern expert in any sense, sir?—A. No, I have been there only casually. As I said, I don't claim to be an expert in any of these fields, but in the several areas which we worked in I read and interviewed for a period of over 3 years—developed a certain familiarity.

Q. I take it that, for example, in the case of Mr. Service that the people whom you would invite to attend an interview with him would be the people in your Far Eastern Branch of MID, whatever it was called, who were dealing with the substantive aspects of far eastern intelligence.—A. Yes, sir; that is essentially true. As I said before, we had contacts in seven branches, Finance, Quartermaster, Adjutant General, Transportation, Chemical, and so on, and several of those, such as Transportation and Quartermaster, attended a very large proportion of those interviews, I have no knowledge of how many. Others like Adjutant General attended very few. We would notify them according to whether we thought they would have an interest in the topic.

Q. Were these interviews primarily designed to elicit factual information about a particular area which a man had visited?—A. I should say so, to get the facts of an area or resources or equipment or any of the things thought generally necessary for an army.

Q. They were not primarily, or were they, designed to provide an occasion for discussion of what the United States policy, the political character, ought to be toward an area?—A. I can hardly answer that one. It is possible that some questions might have been of that nature. At one time in G-2—we reorganized rather frequently—we had a Political branch. It is possible that questions of a political nature were asked. I can't say.

Q. Can you tell us what you referred to, the fact that you had interviewed some approximately 20 other people who had come from what you described generally as North China? By that do you mean the areas controlled by the Chinese Communists? Is that what you had in mind when you referred to North China?—A. I am afraid at this time I couldn't answer an exact question on that. I couldn't put a line, and I don't know that I could then exactly, where controls went through.

Q. I believe you testified that the views which Mr. Service expressed in this interview that you referred to were diametrically opposed to the reports that you had received from those approximately 20 other people.—A. "Diametrically different from any" I said.

Q. "Diametrically different from"?—A. They were different.

Q. Can you tell us something of what these 20 others reported to you? What were the—A. Only the briefest summary, that this represented Russian penetration, Communist, Russian, Soviet penetration.

Q. What represented that?—A. The North China Communist movement was allied with Russia, Soviet Russia.

Q. In what sense do you recall that this alliance with Russia was described?—A. I couldn't say now.

Q. Was it your understanding that these approximately 20 other people had reported that the Chinese Communists were operating with Russian troops or under Russian command?—A. I am afraid I can't give you exact details after this much time.

Q. You can see what I am trying to find out. What were the views of the others?—A. The exact details as to how the Russian influence was originated or was operated, I don't know. But I got the general impression from interviews that North China Communists had been in touch with Moscow and hadn't grown up as an independent movement, as I gathered to be the case from Mr. Service.

Q. Now can you recall over what period these interviews with the approximately 20 other people from that area took place?—A. I began interviewing—I was named Chief of this Interview Section at the beginning of '43. I believe perhaps in January the set-up was made, perhaps in March before we were operating, so I shall say approximately March '43 to and beyond the spring of '45. I had been interviewing some 2 years at this time.

Q. You couldn't place interviews with this approximately 20 any more accurately than that it occurred during the period while you were Chief of this Section?—A. Two and a fraction years prior to that time.

Q. Do you have any recollection that this approximately 20 people who had been interviewed indicated that they had personal knowledge of the situation in the Communist areas of China?—A. No more than that if there had not been strong reason to believe they hadn't we wouldn't have invited them.

Q. You can't think of who any of those people were?—A. No, sir, I made no notes on the period.

Q. Now, I wonder—you have indicated that the best you can recall as to them is that they reported that the Chinese Communists were allied with or in some way under the control of the Soviet Government.—A. I didn't say "under control." I said "in communication with" or something of that sort. They had contacts, to the best of my knowledge and belief, derived from previous interviews.

Q. Did you understand Mr. Service to report to you at his interview that the Chinese Communists were not in communication?—A. No; his knowledge and belief they were not.

Q. That there was no communication?—A. I wouldn't say "communication" but no connection, no tie. The exact details again—

Q. What did you understand him to be reporting when you say that there was no tie? Do you mean that they were not under—did you understand him to say that they were not under the control or the dominance or the influence—A. Yes; I think he said that they were an independent movement, an independent and indigenous movement, not Moscow connected. That is to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Q. Not Moscow connected.—A. I think that is about all I can say on that.

Q. Apart from this aspect of the matter, that is to say, the relations between Moscow and the Chinese Communists, can you recall what any of these approximately 20 people reported to you on other subjects which differed so greatly from Mr. Service's report?—A. No.

Mr. ACHILLES. Can I get one thing clear? These 10 or 20 people approximately were specifically from North China Communist areas, not people from all over China, or were they people from any part of China?

A. As I understand it, these people I am referring to had some presumed knowledge of or connection with North China principally, of course, returning. It might be we would occasionally talk to a person who had derived knowledge but for the most part we dealt with people who had been in the areas. The details I cannot recall.

Q. I take it that the approximately 20 people that you are referring to here when they were interviewed, the people, we will say, from the far eastern area, MID, would probably have been invited to attend their interviews also.—A. There would have been no other purpose for holding them.

Q. I believe you testified you had never read any of Mr. Service's reports.—A. Not recalling by name, but these things came in and there would be no special reason for my recalling the name of the person who wrote them if they were submitted to me.

Q. Do you know whether any of the people in MID who were working on substantive aspects of far eastern intelligence were particularly impressed between the divergence of Mr. Service's reports and the reports of other people?—A. My impression is yes, but I can't give you names. I believe if you were to consult the roster of MID, the Military Intelligence Division, at approximately that time you might arrive at a lead as to who would have been the sort of person who would have been invited.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. You can't give that to us?—A. I don't have that; I didn't keep it. That would be in the Record Section over there. In other words, people came and went in all of the branches. Whether Colonel X was there at a given time I wouldn't know now.

Q. May I ask one question? With regard to the reports that you saw was it a normal practice for reports coming from the various areas of the world to come across your desk or did you receive selective ones, or what?—A. I received all of certain types of intelligence.

Q. What types were those?—A. Intelligence summaries and things of that sort. I saw them all, I think, or a large number. Reports sent in by military attachés and others, I certainly did not see them all because no one person could see them all. The volume of them was so great that it was—experts of certain areas, it was all that experts of a certain area in a certain subject could do. But I saw reports from those who thought for some purpose it would be desirable for me to see them. That is all I can say at this time.

Questions by Mr. RNETTS:

Q. Now, Colonel, you also indicated that your recollection of this interview with Mr. Service included a recollection of statements by him to the effect that we shouldn't fool around any longer with Chiang Kai-shek. I wonder if you can elaborate a little bit on what you understood the substance to be.—A. Just that.

Q. When you say "fool around with him any longer."—A. Not give him any more help.

Q. Not give him any more help. You understood him to recommend complete abandonment of any aid to the Central Government of China?—A. To Chiang Kai-shek. He may not have expressed it in exactly those words but that is what I got from it.

Q. Now I wonder if in view of the fact that you were not dealing substantially with far eastern matters, I wonder if it is possible that you might have received an impression slightly different from that which one somewhat more expert in that field would have received.—A. I don't believe so, sir. This was considered a very sensitive spot that I held. I should say somewhere along the line I wouldn't have been there for 2,000 interviews—but I believe I can trust my judgment on my impressions.

Q. I take it it was not your function to record the results or the content of these interviews, but rather to arrange them, so that it was not part of your job to report accurately precisely what was said at these interviews to anyone.—A. If I were called in by a superior officer and asked what the score was I could have told him, certainly for a short time on any of them, but as a number of them passed and the years passed details have slipped except for a few which were very striking for some reason or another.

Q. I take it, then, that you are pretty satisfied that your recollection on this point could not be faulty.—A. Yes, I am sure.

Q. You are quite clear that his proposal in this group was to completely abandon American aid to the Central Government of which Chiang Kai-shek was the head.—[The witness nodded his head.]

The CHAIRMAN. The reporter cannot get your answer when you nod your head. Will you answer the question?

A. That was the substance. As I said before, I am not quoting words, but that was the impression I derived from his interview.

Q. That would have been a very startling proposal, would it not?—A. It was to this working group in the Military Intelligence; if I may express an opinion, it was to me.

Q. Was that the type of problem which was discussed in these interviews, such fundamental matters of high political policy?—A. I can't generalize on these interviews.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS.

Q. You said it was to the working group—A. I mean—when I said the "working group" I speak of colonels, lieutenant colonels.

Q. This was so startling as to cause discussion of it afterward?—A. When I said "the working group" I didn't mean to say for a moment that General Bissell was ever at one of these interviews. In other words, you asked what the people in MID did, whether there was any—whether it surprised them, meaning the working group, meaning the people who would come and make notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point Mr. Stevens is making is, did you discuss it with the working group afterwards?

A. No, I discussed it with one, but I think it was Major Ryan.

Q. He is a member of your staff.—A. Yes. Whether I discussed it with others, I think it is likely, but I can't remember whether I spoke to A or B at that time on it.

Q. Can you remember that you did speak to A or B?—A. I can't remember whether I spoke to A or B on it, but I know I spoke to one person, making that figure of speech about the trees. I think that was probably to Major Ryan.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS.

Q. I would like to show you, Colonel, Document No. 204, which is a memorandum prepared by Mr. Service and Mr. Ludden, dated February 14, 1945, entitled "Military Weakness of Our Far Eastern Policy." I ask you to read through that document.

The CHAIRMAN. Take your time, Colonel, and read it. (The witness read the document referred to above.)

Q. For the information of the Board, this is in your document book.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your question?

Q. Does that seem to express the general type of views that you recall Mr. Service expressing?—A. Well, the interview was in more detail. This—I am not sure this particularly was brought in the interview or was not brought in the interview.

Q. Well, you have indicated, for example, that his proposal was to abandon Chiang Kai-shek, that is to withdraw all aid and support. My question is whether the general subject that is discussed here is in any sense—is in substance what you recall Mr. Service talking about at that time?—A. There is a relationship. This is more subtle, more carefully prepared, perhaps, than a question-and-answer interview, but the idea of a coalition government including the Communists was not approved of by people that I knew in Military Intelligence.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it discussed at that interview?

A. I don't recall.

Q. Is it your understanding that the idea that the United States ought to promote and assist and encourage the formation in China of the coalition government was not in accordance with American policy?—A. Insofar as I recall the words "coalition government" did not come in at the interview. I can't say that it did or it didn't. I don't recall that it came up at the interview. In other instances it came up, especially with regard to Europe. The people I knew in military intelligence didn't believe in the coalition government including the Communists.

Q. Do you know what the policy of the United States Government on that question was at this time?—A. No, sir; I can't say.

Q. Was it your belief that such a coalition government would have been consistent with what you understood American policy to be?—A. I don't know whether I ought to say anything about the policy of the Government. Should I?

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think it is really germane to this issue. I don't think we need to trouble the witness.

Q. I suggest, General, since what we are discussing here is policy and Mr. Service's alleged views—

The CHAIRMAN. Ask your question if you wish, but I would suggest what we need is the witness's recollection of what was said at the time.

Q. I should like to—as I understood you to say a moment ago, Colonel, the idea of a coalition government which would include Communists was not a part of your understanding consistent with American policy.—A. You showed me this paper. There is something in here—if we would say a certain thing the internal effect in China would be so profound that the generalissimo would be forced to make concessions of power and permit a united front to make a coalition. That is taken from this paper.

Q. Now what were you saying about that?—A. I said I didn't think that was by any means the same thing. It was merely allied to and might be sort of corollary—in other words, it was nothing shockingly different between this and the interview, not the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Consistent, you mean?

A. Consistent, yes; consistent with the interview.

Q. Did you regard this suggestion for using American officers to encourage such a coalition as some departure from American policy?—A. That is Government policy. Should I answer that question?

The CHAIRMAN. You can use your discretion.

A. I wouldn't be considered disloyal if I answer that question?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no.

A. That was regarded by us, by myself—I say "by myself," certainly by many people around me—as being an entering wedge of communism into the areas.

Q. Now, I invite your attention, Colonel, to page 2 of this document, of this Document 204.—A. The same one I have?

Q. Yes, the third full paragraph.—A. At the bottom?

Q. No, the next to the last paragraph.—A. "We cannot hope—"

Q. No, "A similar public statement—"

—A. Page 2 on mine is different. Q. I am sorry, page 3, "A similar public statement by the Commander in Chief with regard to China would not mean the withdrawal of recognition or the cessation of military aid to the Central Government; that would be both unnecessary and unwise." Now this was a memorandum written on February 14, 1945. That hardly squares with your suggestion of Mr. Service's views that we should completely withdraw from Chiang Kai-shek, does it?—A. As I said, I am not sure that he said in those words we must completely withdraw aid.

Q. Or in substance?—A. What I gained in substance, we wouldn't lose anything if we would withdraw from the non-Communists.

Q. Here he says it would not only be unnecessary to do that but would be unwise to do so. —A. Well, what about that? That, to me—understand, I may be an artless man—that is inconsistent with the portion of the paper which suggests the coalition government, because the coalition government lets the Communists in. So to me, as I say, I am not saying it for other people but to me those two parts of the paper look in different directions.

Q. Now is it your view that the suggestions embodied in this document and the suggestions which you recall Mr. Service as having made in this connection were some evidence of his disloyalty to the United States Government?—A. As I see it—but of course I am a Virginian-born, Texas brought up—again what the policy of the United States was, as I said a while ago, was something that I don't think we should undertake to determine, but from considering what I consider the merit to be and having read and studied documents such as Mr. Stalin's great speech on the 10th of March 1939 and other documents, and having known others in the War Department who did, the honesty and fervor with which he expressed his methods of penetration which you can see yourself if you care to read that book, "Leninism," the last document in that book published in New York, then you can see the coalition government is one of Stalin's penetration methods. In other words, a coalition government, including Communists is the kind of Americanism that I feel, with the kind of international knowledge as I have, recommending the coalition government was a startling—including communism—was a startling thing. Whether the man is innocent or duped or unpatriotic I will not judge. But it was a startling thing for a man to propose a coalition government including Communists when he knows the history and doctrine of communism.

Mr. ACHILLES. Your recollection is that Mr. Service proposed that as a part—

A. You mean the coalition government? I don't recall that. That is suggested here.

Q. Now, I take it that the answer to my question is that in substance that such a proposal did evidence in your mind at least some departure from what you regarded as Americanism.

A. Or from good judgment. I am not going to say more than that the thing was wrong according to my knowledge and training and experience—it is wrong.

Q. Were you familiar during that time or are you now familiar with the views held by General Stilwell on this same question?

A. I don't think I ought to go into the General Stilwell issue. I wouldn't like to say how much I knew or didn't know at that time. We did not interview General Stilwell. But I decline to answer on General Stilwell. I didn't interview him myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question was whether you are familiar with it or not.

A. Not in enough detail to give answers. I am afraid what I could give on General Stilwell would be not valuable.

Q. Have you read the so-called white paper, accurately called "United States Relations with China"?—A. No.

Q. Published by the State Department.—A. When was that published?

Q. It was published in August 1949.—A. No; I have not. I can say positively I have not if it was published then.

Q. Were you familiar during this period with the views of General Hurley on this same question?—A. I didn't see him.

Q. Were you familiar with his views?—A. Not then.

Q. Are you now?—A. Incidentally only. He has been making speeches and so on so that I am aware of his views.

Q. As a matter of fact, are you aware that one of the principal purposes for which General Hurley was sent to China by the President of the United States was to bring about just such a coalition government?—A. I don't know. I am not aware what the purpose was.

Q. I would like to show you, Colonel, Document 225, which is a memorandum prepared by Mr. Service on March 23, 1945, and is entitled "Contact Between the Chinese Communists and Moscow." I ask you to read through that document. It is not in the document book.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you got a report number?

Mr. SERVICE. My number is 23 of the 1945 series.

(The witness read the document referred to above.)

Q. Does the factual material contained in that memorandum relating to connections between the Chinese Communists and Moscow accord with your general recollection of what Mr. Service reported at this interview a short time later?—A.

The details here of which I have no recollection whether they were or were not satisfied at the interview, I don't know, but remarks such as "There is now no travel between the Soviet Union and Yen-an. The Kuomintang bogey of Soviet military supplies to Chinese Communists is now dead." I should say that things like that are in accord with the interview.

Q. Do you have any reason to believe that that factual reporting was not accurate?—A. I couldn't say so. As I said, I wasn't there.

Q. I take it that the substance of the reporting in that memorandum corresponds in general with what you have testified to.—A. Not in full, I should say, but certain places like that "bogey of Soviet military supplies to Chinese Communists is now dead," "no travel between the Soviet Union and Yen-an," certain statements like that correspond to the gist of the interview, as I recall. I don't recall, though it may have well been said at the interview, some of these other things.

Q. What I am trying to get at, Colonel, is whether the substance of what you recall Mr. Service reporting at this interview corresponds with or differs from the report set forth in this memorandum.—A. It corresponds in part.

Q. In what part does it not correspond?—A. When I say it doesn't correspond I don't claim to remember everything in these interviews which were customarily from an hour to 2½ hours long. We met at various times of the day, often to 2 o'clock, and would talk back and forth and back and forth for a couple of hours.

Q. Let me see if I can make myself a little clearer in my question. What I am trying to find out is whether there is anything in this memorandum which differs in substance from what you can recall Mr. Service as having reported at this interview.—A. I can't undertake to answer that, sir.

Q. Is it your recollection that he reported something different at the interview from the substance of what is set forth here?—A. All I can say is that the general impression given at the interview was there was no connection whatsoever that he knew of between the Communist authorities in North China and Moscow. That was the general impression of the interview.

Q. How would you characterize this report here?—A. Well, certain parts of it might indicate that, like "No travel between the Soviet Union and Yen-an" and "military supplies to Chinese Communists is now dead," "It is probably impossible for any planes to fly from bases in Outer Mongolia to North Shensi," and so on. Now all that, I would say, is in harmony with my impression. On the other hand, toward the end when he drops a hint that while there is no contact between the governments, there may be some contact he doesn't know about between the parties, I don't recall that as having been brought into the interview, but I am not saying it wasn't. The question might not have been asked. It may have been brought in; I have forgotten.

Q. Let me ask you about that memorandum. Would you say that this memorandum reflected a writer who was trying to, if you like, sell the proposition that there was no connection between the Chinese Communists and Moscow?—A. I don't wish to comment on this memorandum at the present time.

Q. Is there anything inconsistent between the views and reports set forth in this memorandum and your recollection as you have testified to it here of Mr. Service's statements in the course of his interview?—A. I answered that—just answered it. Almost the same question I just finished answering.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the witness has answered that question before. He went to some extent to explain the two parts that you wanted him to recollect was in accord, and the other he didn't recollect.

Q. I am now asking a different question, as to whether there is anything here inconsistent as to what he recalled Mr. Service to have reported at the interview?—A. I answered that, too. I said with regard to this question about the parties that I didn't recall that that had been brought out at the interview. Whether it was or was not I didn't recall.

Q. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. No further questions, Colonel. We are very much obliged to you and thank you for coming.

A. I am through now and can return to my family?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; thank you very much. I am very glad to have seen you, Colonel.

(The witness was dismissed.)

(Recess.)

(After being duly sworn Josiah W. Bennett testified in behalf of Mr. Service as follows:)

The CHAIRMAN. State your full name and address.

A. Josiah W. Bennett; I am now living at 2713 Seventy-third Place, Hyattsville, Md.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. What is your position, sir?—A. I am on the public affairs staff of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs.

Q. Of the State Department?—A. Of the State Department.

Q. Now, will you tell us what your position was in the spring of 1945, that is to say, roughly from January to June, if you like?—A. I was employed by the War Department as a military intelligence research analyst. That was my official title. I was working in the Economic Branch of MIS in the War Department, and that branch handled intelligence matters concerning political and economic affairs in the entire Far East.

The CHAIRMAN. In the entire Far East?

A. In the entire Far East.

Q. And were you devoting your attention primarily to far eastern intelligence?—A. Entirely.

Q. Entirely. In the course of your work did you have occasion to see reports and memoranda prepared by Mr. Service in China?—A. Yes. MIS received, I think, the most pertinent reports from the State Department. There was regular machinery set up whereby extra copies were made and circulated to us and since during most of the period I was working on China, or matters related to China, I had an opportunity to see Mr. Service's reports.

Q. Now during the spring of 1945 did you have occasion to attend any interviews which had been arranged by the Interview Section of Military Intelligence with Mr. Service?—A. I can't be sure of the date but I do remember I attended at least one. One remains in my mind because it was the time I first met him.

Q. When you first met him, and you may have attended more than one of these interviews if they occurred?—A. I may have, but I can't be at all certain. To explain why, there was a never-ending series of these interviews. Everyone returning from the Far East in any capacity at all, in the Army or in private capacity, if it was thought he had some information which he might be able to give us, would be brought in and one or more of us from the office was busy almost every day attending one of these functions.

Q. In that connection how long had you been in this work in the office of Military Intelligence?—A. I joined it at the end of June, I believe, in 1942, if my memory serves me. I know it was in the early summer.

Q. And you remained there until when?—A. Until August 1946.

Q. Now you have just indicated that throughout this period there was a never-ending series of interviews with all types of people returning from China. Did you either at the interview with Mr. Service, which you attended, or at any other interview form the impression that the information or the views expressed by Mr. Service during the course of this interview were different or in conflict with the views of other persons whom you had interviewed and who had returned from the Chinese Communist areas?—A. My recollection of the interview is not very accurate, I mean not very exact. It was the function of these interviews to provide information and intelligence and if there were controversies they would be more about points of fact, because it wasn't normal for views to be expressed. So far as my recollection of Mr. Service's interview goes, I remember it only as being more or less as what he said in his report earlier. There is nothing I can remember as being different from what he said in his reports.

Q. From what he said in his reports, and either on factual or on policy views did you form any impression of any violent difference between Mr. Service's reports and the reports of others who had opportunities for knowledge about the Chinese Communist territory?—A. No.

Q. It has been testified in this meeting, Mr. Bennett, that at some interview in the spring of 1945, held in the Military Intelligence Division, or Service, whatever it is, that Mr. Service expressed the view that we should quit fooling around with Chiang Kai-shek and should withdraw all aid from the Kuomintang or Central Government. Did you ever hear Mr. Service express such a view?—A. I certainly don't remember it.

Q. Do you think such a view, if expressed, would have stuck in your memory?—A. It probably would. It was a rather drastic statement to make and I should think personally Mr. Service's position making such a statement would have made an impression on my memory and the others there.

Q. Do you think that even had you not attended the interview where such a statement or expression was made that it likely would have come to your attention from others of your colleagues who had attended the interview?—A. Very likely.

Q. That, again, because of the drastic nature of such proposal if it had been made?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, it has also been testified here that at this interview, which I have referred to, Mr. Service expressed the view that in substance that there was no connection between the Chinese Communists and the Soviet Communists. Did you ever hear Mr. Service express a view to that effect?—A. No. As a matter of fact, I am not sure whether it was from his reports or not, but it seems to me I remember constant references to a Tass mission, to various other people who might possibly be a liaison with the Russians. As I say, I don't know whether it is in Mr. Service's reports.

Q. Did you, in the course of the one interview that you are certain that you attended during the spring of 1945, take any notes on the discussion?—A. No; I don't think so. I am pretty certain.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Who was chairman of the meeting?—A. Well, there was the regular procedure in MIS and it was a gentleman whose name I don't remember, whose job was to organize these interviews. He usually acted as the man who introduced the speaker.

Q. Was it Colonel Peaty?—A. It could be. I am sorry I don't remember the name. I don't think it was a general.

Q. Not Colonel Peaty?—A. It was a colonel.

Q. It was a lieutenant colonel?—A. I think so, but I am sorry I am not sure. The man I remember was a rather oldish man.

Q. White hair?—A. Yes.

Questions by Mr. RHETTS :

Q. And the work of this colonel was exclusively administrative, was it, that is, to arrange, set up the meeting at which substantive experts in technical fields would then attend and ask questions?—A. He used to pop in the office or call up and say such-and-such a person would be available at such-and-such a time, who was going to go, and then he might be there and he might not. If he was there he would act as chairman of the meetings.

Q. I believe you have indicated that you did not take notes at this interview that you asserted you attended. Was it not your practice ever to make notes on these interviews?—A. It was quite commonly done and I think maybe notes were taken by someone else in our office, but I don't remember them taking notes on this interview.

Q. Was that because there was nothing particularly noteworthy in it?—A. Well, I wouldn't exactly say that. It was a very interesting discussion of first-hand experience with the Chinese Communists, but it wasn't anything that I remember that was worth recording. It was more or less supplementing what we had read.

Q. In other words, there was nothing new there that you had not already seen in his reports?—A. Yes.

Q. I have no further questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN :

Q. You attended all of these meetings on the Far East, did you?—A. No, I didn't attend all of them.

Q. I was wondering whether there was anyone else besides Mr. Service who came back after having had experience with the Communist procedures in Yenan?—A. There was one of our colleagues.

Q. Who was that?—A. Captain Donke.

Q. Any others?—A. I don't know whether Colonel Barrett came in or not. Colonel Barrett was there. I have seen him; I can't remember whether I saw him at that time.

Q. As far as you can recollect did the observations of Mr. Service differ in any material way from the observations of these others you have spoken of?—A. No, not as far as I can remember.

Q. No further questions. Thank you very much.

(The witness was dismissed and the Board adjourned at 11:40 a. m.)

(The Board reconvened at 10:10 a. m., June 15, 1950.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Board will be in session.

(Thomas Dawes Blake, called as a witness.)

Questions by Mr. RHETTTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Mr. Blake.—A. My name is Thomas Dawes Blake. I live at 3026 N Street NW.

Q. And will you state what your present position is.—A. I am the Washington representative of the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. of New York.

Q. Now were you formerly employed by the State Department?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When were you with the State Department?—A. I joined the State Department in March of 1942.

Q. I wonder if you would describe for the Board your work with the State Department from that time until you left.—A. When I joined the Department I was hired by Mr. Howard Bucknell, who was then the No. 2 man in what we called then the Division of Current Information, which was the Press Relations Division of the Department, and still is, under a new name; I think it is special Assistant to the Secretary—McDermott's office—now. From March of 1942 until June of 1943 I was on what you might call a rotating shift. That Division maintained 24-hour service, and one week I would work from 4 o'clock in the afternoon to 1 or 2 in the morning; another week from midnight until 9 or 10 in the morning; and a third week from 10 o'clock in the morning until 7 or 8 at night. The night side—we were primarily concerned with handling the queries of reporters that came in after hours, watching the tickers. Any news developments that came over the tickers we would notify the appropriate officials of the Department. In many cases the press knew about it before you would catch it on the ticker, and to endeavor to get an answer, if possible, would require getting, of course, the proper clearance either from the official himself or further up the line. The day side of the shift was concerned with putting out the Department's Radio Bulletin.

In June of 1943 I was put in full charge of the Radio Bulletin and taken off the night shift, and later that year, in September, I developed the so-called News Digest, which, I believe, is still circulated throughout the Department. I had those two jobs up until January of 1944. Mr. Marvin McIntyre, who had been secretary to President Roosevelt, died in December, and in January Mr. Roosevelt picked Mr. William Hasset, who had been Mr. Early's assistant, to succeed Mr. McIntyre. Mr. Early asked me to come to the White House as his assistant; the State Department consented, and I spent from the end of January until after the inauguration in 1945 as Mr. Early's assistant. After the inauguration, Mr. Stettinius, who was then Secretary of State, requested Mr. Early to release me back to the State Department, and I came back here charged with two specific jobs: one was the attempt to get news out of the Department. In other words, we had found in the past that in many cases the news—I won't say it was forced out, but it was sort of thrust upon us. The press would ask a question and we would give the story, and this was an attempt to get as much information in the hands of the press without waiting for them to ask us about it. The other job I had was what you might call press agent for the Department in the legislative program of that year, which included renewal of the trade agreements, the Mexican water treaty, Bretton Woods, British loan, and so forth.

That job consisted in endeavoring to get the State Department and the administration side of the picture presented to the public through the press and radio. On top of that, in April of 1945, when the United Nations Conference opened, I was in charge of the the press relations end of things back here, as Mr. McDermott and Mr. Bucknell, who was the second man, were out at San Francisco. I did those three jobs through, I would say, the end of July through the 1st of August, when the other boys came back, and in August Justice Jackson requested the State Department to loan me to him to set up the press relations end at the Nuremburg trials, which I did, and spent about 6 weeks abroad. My work was purely on a physical basis. I did not stay for the trials themselves. It was a question of picking the proper rooms, getting the equipment—a house-keeping job. When I returned, the Far Eastern Commission was just being formed, and General McCoy, who was the first Chairman of it, asked me to serve as the press relations officer on the Commission. I did that along with my work of press relations as No. 2 man to Mr. McDermott. Actually, Mr. White and myself about divided the responsibilities, and I continued in that work up until April of 1946, when I resigned from the Department.

Q. Now during the entire period of your actual service in the Department were you administratively part of Mr. McDermott's division or office or whatever it was?—A. Let's put it this way: when I was out on loan to these other Government agencies, I was still on the State Department payroll, and I assume such.

Q. When you were here, you were under Mr. McDermott?—A. Oh, absolutely; when I was here I was under Mr. McDermott.

Q. I gather that your activities were primarily concerned with relations between the press and the Department.—A. That's correct.

Q. Incidentally, was Mr. McDermott during this period primarily active on the matter of relations between the press and the Department or was he concerned on a broader front?—A. Well, of course, Mr. McDermott was the head of the Division, but during the period that—practically that entire period the actual relations with the press—the setting up of the Secretary's press conference, the handling of the various individuals in the office who were, like myself, dealing with the press—were in the hands of the No. 2 man. The first one was Mr. Bucknell, the Foreign Service officer, and then Mr. Homer Byington, Jr., and later on during that period at San Francisco, by me. Mr. McDermott and Mr. White were primarily concerned with the relations with the OWI, with censorship, and, as you put it, on a somewhat higher plane than direct conversation with the press.

Q. Now, as I understand it, from approximately April 1945 on until—A. The end of July.

Q. The end of July, you were the man in charge in the Department on matters of dealings with the press.—A. That's right.

Q. I wonder if you could tell the Board some of the general methods by which news was dealt with—methods by which relations between the press and various officers in the Department—A. Of course, the first obvious relation with the press was through the Secretary—in that particular period with the Acting Secretary, Mr. Grew—in his press conferences, and secondarily, of course, by the issuance of the State Department releases, which in many cases required explanation, which would be handled either by the Secretary or by the press officer of the Department or, in the case of a rather complicated release, the appropriate officials of the Department would be present when the release was given out to answer any questions that were brought up. In many cases they might give what we call a background discussion of what led up to the release so that the correspondents would have a better idea of what lay behind it, rather than just a brief account of the actual happening in the release. Then, of course, where you were constantly busy—but constantly, I mean—around the clock—because newspapermen don't know any hours, without any regard for a 9 to 5 routine here. There were queries coming in here by person or telephone, and those were handled mainly through my office, through me or one of the subordinates. Where the answer was known, if we could dig it out as a matter of policy, why we would quote it to the man, refer him to the source. If there was no knowledge of the past policy, why then we would endeavor to get it for the reporter either ourselves or, in many cases, sending the reporter direct to the official in the Department who could give him the direct answer.

Q. In that connection, Mr. Blake, was it in your experience a common practice for members of the press to deal directly with a particular officer in the Department whom they knew would have particular knowledge of the matter in which they were interested?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether there were any regulations indicating that the press people should not go directly to particular officers or, similarly, that particular officers should not deal with members of the press who came directly to them?—A. I know of no such regulations. Perhaps I can best describe the work of the office as a service organization. We tried to run it in order to get the information to the press in the quickest way possible. If one of the old-time correspondents who knew his way around the Department wanted information, he would in many cases go to the man on the desk, and the man on the desk, having known the man before, would never bother to let us know.

Q. By "the man on the desk" I take it you mean—A. The appropriate person in the Department.

Q. The departmental officer dealing with the substantive affairs.—A. That's right. In many cases, of course, reporters are inclined to be somewhat lazy and they would use us to dig out information for them and more or less condense them and present them to them. We were there as a service organization. In other words, if the press wanted something, it was up to us to get it for them if it was humanly possible. And that is true also as far as the officers of the Department were concerned. They knew that that was our function and they cooperated with us to the fullest extent.

Q. Would you think it fair to say that it was a common and regular practice for officers of the State Department, including Foreign Service officers, to talk to members of the press about matters about which they had knowledge?—A. That is correct.

Q. Would you also think it fair to say that the range of matters that could appropriately be discussed with members of the press was something which was left to the discretion of the officer involved?—A. Absolutely; it is the only way you could do it.

Q. In that connection, I wonder if you could tell us what the general practice was at this time concerning the extent and range of the matters which officers of the Department could appropriately discuss with the press. I have in mind particularly this question: Was it a frequent practice for officers of the Department to discuss with members of the press and to disclose to them information of a character which they were not at liberty to publish but which was given to them for their background information so as to enable them to interpret known events more properly?—A. That was what I myself strove to do constantly. In my talks with departmental officers I urged them to adopt that policy, the reason being that it has been my experience that you can't keep anything secret. I think that that is very difficult. And if a situation arises in which the Government has two alternative methods of handling it or two alternative policies, it is much better to take the press into your confidence and outline to them the danger of one policy, the advisability of possibly taking the other one, just to keep the press from getting off on the wrong foot and stirring up a hornets' nest. That was a very successful method of handling the matter. I can cite numerous instances.

Perhaps the one that comes to my mind now is the matter of our relations with Spain. There was some opposition in the press to the fact that we were giving aid to Spain. Spain was getting oil, when the eastern seaboard motorists were down to 2 gallons a week, whatever the ration was. Well, you couldn't come up as a State Department and say that the reason we are doing it is because the stuff we get from Spain not only helps us in the war but keeps them out of German hands. We don't like them, we think they are terrible, but we have to do it. But you could tell that to the press as a reason for your policy, which would keep particularly the good, sound press away from hammering at you for sleeping in the same bed with a man like Franco.

Q. Now in that connection, would you say that it was a frequent and common practice to disclose to the members of the press material which was in fact classified in the sense that it was recorded in a classified document somewhere, but with the admonition that it could not be printed but was available only for background information?—A. Yes, yes. I'm quite certain that it was very seldom that the press saw an actual document, unless in a paraphrased version. But, obviously, the expert in the Department who knew all the facts was able to talk of his own knowledge, which was based on material presumably obtained in classified documents.

Q. In that connection, would you say that it was a common practice for officers below the level of the Secretary and the Under Secretary to have discussions of this character with the press?—A. Oh, yes; they would have to. I mean, putting it this way, if they are discussing a problem that is based on classified material, they would obviously have to use that to make any intelligent discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question had to do more with the status of the officer. Would an officer below the rank of Secretary—A. Very definitely, sir; that goes right down the line to certainly the chiefs of the various divisions and to the men on the particular desk, as we called it then.

Q. One further question. Do you recall, Mr. Blake, whether it was a customary practice when, we'll say, a Foreign Service officer returned from some area which was of great public interest to arrange press conferences for such officers?—A. Well, that was my particular job when I came back in 1945—one of the two jobs I had. Harlan Clark made a trip up into Yemen, certainly one of the first United States officials and one of the few white men to get up there, and when he came back I arranged a press conference for Clark. And Raymond Ludden came back from China, where he had been with the Communist forces, and I arranged a press conference for Ludden. That was in line with the specific job given me, as I say, to get the news out of the Department. Those press conferences, particularly Ludden's, were well covered by the press. There were several others. I can't remember offhand. It wasn't with every Foreign Service officer who came back, but certainly Ludden's trip with the Communists behind the Japanese lines, and Clark's trip into Yemen was of definite news interest.

Q. Do you happen to know, Mr. Blake, whether it was a regular practice for persons who came back from the field, again from areas where there was great public interest, to hold discussions with other groups outside the Government? I have in mind particularly, for example, the Institute of Pacific Relations, which has a research staff, which, of course, was primarily interested in matters of the Far East. Do you happen to know whether officers of the Department had frequent occasion to hold discussions with such groups to bring them up to date on events that were occurring?—A. Of my own knowledge, I don't know whether that is true, because that did not come within the scope of the activities of the division I was associated with.

Q. I have no further questions.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you recall making any arrangements for Mr. Service to speak to the press or to have contact with the press?—A. I myself recall no such occurrence. Whether the people below me made it, I don't know.

Q. Assuming that Mr. Service came back from Yenan, from behind the Japanese lines in Yenan, in April 1945, would it have been natural for your office to refer correspondents to him?—A. It would have been, sir.

Q. You don't recall any such incident?—A. I don't recall, no. At that particular moment I was up to my neck in the legislative program and I was running the office by more or less remote control; let's put it that way.

Q. It would have been natural, I take it, from what you have told us for press people or literary people—writers—to approach Mr. Service.—A. It would have been very natural; yes, sir.

Q. And it would not have been discomenanced by the Department?—A. No, sir. I know of no regulations at all which would prevent either the press from talking to a returned Foreign Service officer or a Foreign Service officer talking to the press.

Q. That officer, under the practices of which you have spoken, would have been free to reveal at his discretion such information as he thought would make proper background material for their use?—A. Entirely up to his discretion; you had to rely on the officer.

Q. And he was free to tell them things which he could not, under an injunction, publish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Thank you very much, Mr. Blake.

(The witness was excused.)

Mr. RHETTS. I would like at this point to introduce as an exhibit document 338, which is a photostatic copy of a news article appearing in the New York Times for Friday, March 23, 1945, which reports a press conference held by Mr. Raymond P. Ludden.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be introduced.

(Photostat of news article appearing in the New York Times, Friday, March 23, 1945, reporting a press conference held by Mr. Raymond P. Ludden, marked "Exhibit 25" and appended to this transcript.)

(John Paton Davies, recalled as a witness in behalf of John Stewart Service, having been previously duly sworn, testified as follows:)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Mr. Davies, you recall that you testified earlier in this hearing, on Saturday, May 27, 1950. In the course of your testimony you referred—and I am now referring in part to pages 98 and 99 of the transcript for the afternoon session of May 27, 1950, and also at page 117 of the transcript—you referred to an early occasion on which you were assigned to the consulate general at Mukden, and under the instructions of your consul general you maintained a very active policy of informing the press very fully as to events that were occurring at that time; and I believe you testified "Japanese propaganda was trying to build up a certain picture of Manchukuo. My consul general at that time and later authorized me whenever we had visiting Americans—William Henry Chamberlain, for example; there are several others that slip my mind—J. P. McAvoy, John Gunther. Our files were open to them, with discrimination, but material that was classified. The highest classification at that time was strictly confidential and it was put down on the table, and they were left to take notes on it, and they were told: 'The only thing you must not do is to reveal that you got it from the American consulate.'" I wonder if you could tell us who was your consul general at that time.—A. At the time I went to Mukden it was Joseph Ballantine, and Mr. Ballantine was my consul general for about a year during my tour at Mukden. It may have been more than a year. I don't recollect, but the records will show. He was succeeded by Mr. William R. Langdon, who is now consul general in Singapore. The correspondents whose names I gave there, I do not recall whether all of them were briefed there during the period of Mr. Ballantine or whether during the period of Mr. Langdon, but it was a procedure into which I was inducted by Mr. Ballantine, first he himself briefing such American correspondents as came there, and then later turning the job over to me in cooperation with him; and finally when Mr. Langdon came there, he continued the same procedure.

Q. So that the policy you referred to was a continuing one and was not in any way altered by one man or the other?—A. Oh, no; it became the policy of the consul as long as I was there.

Q. Incidentally, Mr. Davies, in your testimony and others we refer to the term "briefing the press." I'm not sure that we have been entirely clear what we intended to embrace for that term. The type of dealings with the press that you have testified to earlier—were those so-called briefings confined to formal meetings with correspondents as a group or does that include the kind of dealings that you have individually with a correspondent, perhaps at luncheon or in an informal way, not characterized by a press conference?—A. Well, my experience is that the terminology used for official contacts with the press is pretty loose. Insofar as this situation about which we have just been talking, the so-called briefings, if we use that term, were in the office, they would be over the lunches, they would be in the afternoon at tea parties, or they would be at dinners; it depended on the circumstances; and what they were told was dependent on the judgment of the officer who was imparting information to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question also included this phrase: Would it also cover individually the press correspondents as well as in a group?

A. Yes, it was individually. In most of these cases—these Manchurian situations—there was no real press call, and the names that I have mentioned were visiting correspondents whom we did see individually.

The CHAIRMAN. So they were briefed individually generally.

A. In the case of Mukden, they were briefed individually.

Q. And I take it, referring to the later phase, during the period of your service with General Stilwell during the war—I take it your comments are equally applicable there; that is, the circumstances under which you would impart information to representatives of the press varied from the most informal type, over luncheon, to a meeting in your office.—A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's be a little more definite about that. This practice into which you were inducted at Mukden—did you carry that same practice into your relationships on the staff in the China-Burma-India theater when you went there?

A. Yes, sir; I believe that I testified that it was General Stilwell's wish that I perform that function.

The CHAIRMAN. That was definitely indicated to you by General Stilwell?

A. Definitely indicated to me by General Stilwell. In fact, it was orders that we should operate that way. I might carry that on down as I did in my earlier testimony. I believe I referred to a period in Moscow in 1947, under Gen. Bedell Smith. In that period also the contacts were with groups of correspondents and again with individual correspondents.

Q. During the period of Mukden to which you referred, General Stilwell was then Colonel Stilwell and was in Mukden at that time, was he not?—A. He was in Peking at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you have already testified that in the carrying out of this practice on the staff of the China-Burma-India theater you instructed Mr. Service definitely to perform this function with reference to the knowledge which he possessed.

A. I passed on General Stilwell's desires in that respect to Mr. Service.

Q. I have no further questions.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Would you repeat—it has come up in various ways, but I wonder if you could state again the primary purpose of these briefings of the press.—A. They go back to really a broad interpretation of the functions of American officials abroad—American representatives abroad. And, incidentally, I might say that as I recall it, this philosophy was developed for me by Mr. Ballantine; that is, that it is the duty of an American official not only to represent his Government in dealings with foreign governments, foreign officials, but it is also to report to his own Government about conditions in the country in which he is operating; and, secondarily, inasmuch as we are a democracy, it is desirable; and inasmuch as the efficient and sound operation of foreign policy is based on an informed American public, it is not only desirable, it is necessary, that the American public have as many of the facts of the situation abroad which the American Government is confronted with so that they can form intelligent judgments. It goes rather deeply and profoundly into the whole democratic concept of governmental operation. With a blind public, the American Government's hands in endeavoring to cope with a situation abroad are very badly tied.

Q. Essentially, you would put it that the purpose was to see that the American people got as accurate and truthful information as possible?—A. That is exactly right. We may have made errors in judgment in the interpretation, but this was our honest, best effort to interpret for American correspondents and the American public what we thought was the objective situation that we were confronted with.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(The witness was excused.)

Mr. RHETTS. At this time I would like to introduce two documents, one of which is document 339-A, which is a letter dated June 11, addressed to Joseph C. Grew and signed by Raymond Dennett, secretary of the American council, Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think you gave the year.

Mr. RHETTS. Dated June 11, 1945. I show the Board the original of this letter and ask permission to introduce as an exhibit a copy of this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done.

(Copy of letter dated June 11, 1945, addressed to Joseph C. Grew, signed by Raymond Dennett, secretary, American council, Institute of Pacific Relations, Inc., marked "Exhibit 26," and appended to this transcript.)

Mr. RHETTS. I also would like to introduce document 339-B, which is a letter dated June 18, 1945, addressed to Mr. Dennett and signed by Joseph C. Grew, and I show the Board the State Department copy of that letter and ask permission to introduce a copy of that copy as an exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done.

(Copy of letter dated June 18, 1945, addressed to Raymond Dennett, signed by Joseph C. Grew, marked "Exhibit 27," and appended to this transcript.)

Mr. RHETTS. I offer these letters, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of indicating that meetings with the IPR staff such as had been testified to here were a common and frequent practice.

(Joseph Close Harsch, called as a witness.)

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Mr. Harsch?—A. Joseph Close Harsch, 2808 N Street NW., Washington, D. C.

Q. And what is your position, sir?—A. I am at present acting chief of the Washington Bureau of the Christian Science Monitor.

Q. In that capacity or in your earlier capacities as a journalist have you had occasion to deal with officers of the State Department in an effort to obtain news in the field of foreign affairs?—A. Yes.

Q. I wonder if you could describe to the Board something of the general nature of the type of relations which you have had with officers of the State Department as an incident to your getting of news.—A. I wonder if it would be in order for me to preface that by saying that I have been off and on a Washington correspondent for roughly 20 years, during which time I have tended to write more in the field of foreign affairs than any other field, and that, while I have never limited my activities exclusively to foreign affairs, and therefore the State Department, except for a brief period back about, I should say, 1935, 1936, 1937, when I was exclusively covering the State Department, I have nevertheless during that period of 20 years devoted, I should say, over half my time to the field of foreign affairs and have followed it constantly.

The CHAIRMAN. In the course of that time have you worked for several publications?

A. Not several, sir. I have been connected with the Monitor constantly since 1929, except for a brief period of 9 months in 1939, when I was on leave of absence, serving with the Intergovernmental Committee on Political Refugees, and from 1943 to 1949, when my principal connection was with the Columbia Broadcasting System, although I continued to retain a relationship with the Monitor and write for them principally in foreign affairs. In the course of this work I have frequently known members of the State Department staff, both in Washington and overseas. I have many personal acquaintances, and I think I can say friends, in both the Department and the Foreign Service. I have seen them frequently in their offices, over the luncheon table, in their homes, and in my own home, as my guest and as their guest, here and abroad.

Q. Now in the course of your normal activities as a news gatherer, do you have occasion to get in touch with officers of the Department to obtain news from them about particular events or situations?—A. Oh, yes; frequently.

Q. In that connection, do you always go through the press office of the State Department or do you frequently communicate directly with the man whom you know is the officer who has knowledge of a particular matter?—A. May I divide the answer in two parts? There are two phases to the task of reporting what goes on in the field of foreign affairs. One side is gathering and using the routine information—that is, the information which comes from the formal press conference and from the formal release. In that field it is my custom to attend press conferences when possible, and I frequently go to the formal—what do you call it—press conference section? I don't know what the technical term is.

I go there to obtain handouts, I go there to ask what speeches are coming, when; what Ambassador is returning from overseas. For the routine information I go to that office. Otherwise I have virtually no occasion to go to that office. That is, if I am interested, say, in the question whether there is going to be a Japanese peace treaty and what the views may be of different people involved, my method of procedure in that case would be, if I had the time to do it in such a thorough manner, to talk to several people in several different places. For example, I might well call Mr. Graves at the British Embassy and invite him to lunch or something and chat over with him the problem. Then I might well go to the Pentagon Building and talk with someone there on the military side of the matter. And then I would either come to see or invite to have lunch with me someone in our Far Eastern Division and discuss it with him. In that kind of operation my activities would be purely direct, from myself to the individual in question whom I wanted to see.

Q. Now in the course of dealings of this latter type that you have just discussed, has it been your experience that officers of the Department frequently discuss freely with you information of a character which they admonish you may not be printed or published but which they give to you for your background information to assist you to interpret known events?—A. Can you specify that question a little more?

Q. Well, is it in your experience to have an officer of the Department—of the State Department—discuss with you matters which are, we'll say, classified in the sense that they are not available to the general public, but which they discuss with you freely so that you may orient yourself to the situation under discussion, without being able to print the matter that has been disclosed to you?—A. Yes; that is one of the principal forms of contact between Government officials and—I hate to sound snobbish, but what you might call the—what would be a fair and accurate word? It is very difficult. What level of the press? The distinction, I suppose, would be in the British sense between the reporter and the correspondent. The reporter is the man who merely takes official published information and records it. The correspondent is the man who seeks the perspective behind the official news. In obtaining that kind of information and doing that kind of writing, you are constantly going to people in responsible positions and seeking and obtaining from them what we usually call guidance.

That is the kind of information which cannot be, for many and varied reasons, attributed to specific authority.

I will give you several examples, if you like, of how that operates. Before the Secretary of State went to London on his last foreign trip, he was kind enough to accept an invitation from a group of Washington correspondents to dine at the home of one of them. There were about 15 of us present. At the end of dinner he gave what you could call a briefing, in which he told us a great deal which could not possibly be attributed to him or published in factual form, but which made it possible for those present to write more intelligently about what was going on. He was very free with us. All during the war there were a series of meetings of that type with General Bradley, with General Marshall, with Admiral King, at which we were told a great deal of information which in written form would, I assume, have been highly classified. That is, we were taken into the confidence of the highest authorities in order that we could more accurately convey to the public the true proportion and inclination of our affairs in the war. That is a very common practice.

This type of information gathering is, of course, not limited to relations between a correspondent and the highest officials of Government of the type I have described. In my work, in the work of anyone working as I do, you are constantly talking to all kinds of people at levels of Government. I am constantly being put in possession of ideas, pieces of factual information which could not in the general interests be attributed to an individual or to the Government, and my writing is based on that kind of information frequently; yes.

Q. And I take it that it is common that when such information is given to you, you are told, "Now this is off the record; you cannot print this."—A. I am told what can be used and what cannot; yes; of course.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice you were careful to say cannot be "attributed" to any person. Does it also include information which you cannot publish at all?

A. Yes. Oh, yes. Oh, heavens, yes! In those sessions during the war with men like General Marshall and Admiral King, we were constantly given information which could not be published in any form, and we were specifically told that it could not be published in any form. I will give you a recent example of how this works. In connection with the incident of the shooting down of the American plane in the Baltic, I received a query from my editor, after the State Department note said that the plane had been shot down over the Baltic, inquiring of me what did I know or could I discover what could be printed about why the plane was over the Baltic. I proceeded to telephone to individuals in the Defense Department who are authorized to speak to the press. I posed to them all the questions I could think of pertinent to the affair. I received answers. In some cases the answer was, "I will tell you this off the record; it may not be used." That is, the individual talking to me specified what information he was giving me which was usable without attribution and what information he was giving me which was for my own information only in order that I might in my own mind have a better sense of perspective about the affair. And when I wrote my story on that I was very careful, of course, to use only that information which was usable without attribution but not the information that was given me exclusively for my own information and guidance.

Q. And there again I take it, Mr. Harseh, that you have indicated this type of information comes not merely from top Government officials but others down the line, and that there, too, you are frequently given information which you may not publish at all.—A. Oh, yes; from all levels. May I cite an example, not directly connected with the Department itself, of how that operates? When I have made trips overseas it has been my practice to call first upon the American Ambassador wherever I went. If I went to a specific country in which I was interested and about which I wished to write, I would go to the Ambassador. I would go from the Ambassador to other members of his staff. I have obtained by that method a great deal of extremely valuable information, much of which is confidential, much of which is totally off the record, most of which could not be attributed. I have written many stories, without attribution, based on material given to me by junior officials of an Embassy. Sometimes, because I thought it was in the general public interest, I haven't even specified the country in which some particular incident took place. I have brought in many sources of information. It has been information used in the interest of, I think I'm justified in saying, public enlightenment. In the course of that, I might add that I have been shown documents which are confidential documents, in order that I might be better informed and could write more intelligently.

Q. And in your experience, would you say that this was a practice not confined to yourself but to correspondents generally in whom officers of the Government thought they could repose confidence?—A. Of course.

Q. I have no further questions.

Mr. ACHILLES. Mr. Harsch, how would you describe the purpose, as you see it, for which officials brief correspondents, as you described? What would be the essential purpose of that operation?

A. The essential purpose on the part of the official?

Mr. ACHILLES. Yes.

A. In order that the activities of the Government of the United States might be more accurately presented to the public. If I may volunteer a thought which there seemed to be in the question and to which I may not have responded adequately or fully, this matter of the extent to which a correspondent of my type uses the conventional facilities of the press information office—the office of public information—I think I told you in sufficient detail that I use it for obtaining hand-outs, for going to press conferences, and for that kind of thing. In my search for what we call, in the profession, background information or guidance, I don't think it would occur to me to use it. I suppose that if I were a cub reporter starting out in Washington, as the State Department is now constituted, I would go there first and seek to make my contacts with individuals through that agency. The agency did exist, of course, in the days when I first covered the State Department. And I can recall one instance recently when I was seeking, with the object to publish, certain specific information which wasn't on the public record, and because I was seeking for publication information not on the public record, I thought it a consideration to the individual I wanted to see to clear through the official agency. That is the only occasion I can recall on which I have ever gone to see someone via the official channel of information; on all the other occasions I have telephoned the individual directly.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(The witness was excused.)

JAMES B. RESTON, called as a witness.

Questions by Mr. RHETS:

Q. Will you state your full name and address, Mr. Reston?—A. My full name is James B. Reston, 3340 Dent Place.

Q. And will you state your present position?—A. My position is diplomatic correspondent of the New York Times, in the Washington bureau.

Q. How long have you been engaged in newspaper work, Mr. Reston?—A. Oh, since 1934, as full-time employment.

Q. And have you been in Washington throughout your career?—A. No, I have been here since 1941, with many assignments abroad for periods of up to a year, 6 months.

Q. You say you have been here since 1941. Have you been with the New York Times all during that period?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And as diplomatic correspondent for the Times, I take it you are largely preoccupied with reporting on foreign affairs.—A. That's right, sir.

Q. In the course of your work, I suppose you have frequent occasion to communicate with officials of the State Department in an effort to obtain news of interest. I wonder if you could describe to the Board something of the general character of your dealings with officials of the Department.—A. Yes, I would be glad to. I think I should say before I do so, however, that my job is not a typical job, in that my job is not to report primarily the spot-news announcements out of the Department of State; it is a job primarily of explanatory reporting, and therefore does not concern itself in the normal way with merely taking the announcements of the Department of State; it is rather a job of trying to explain, perhaps, the background of some particular announcement that may have been made by the Department of State. With that in mind, my job is a job of contacting perhaps the person who knows most about the area or the problem which happens to be news at that time. If at the present time one is concerned about the reaction here to the Schuman plan and the prospects of how far the British reaction to that plan might influence the relations between this country and Britain, why I would go direct to the man in charge of the British section who is concerned and make a primary study of the problem and talk to him on what we call a background basis; that is to say, that he would explain, to the extent of his ability and with the limitations placed upon him by his own job, what the facts in the situation were, but not for attribution to the Department of State. That is the normal course that one follows.

Q. And I take it that in the course of conducting operations such as you have described, it would not be your normal practice to go through the Press Relations Office of the State Department, but rather go directly to the man who knew—A. Well, it would differ a great deal. For example, a case came up last week where there was a question of a report from London that the United States Government had promised to give military aid to the British in Malaya. Well, I did not happen to know the man who was on the Malayan desk. Therefore, in that instance I did go through the press department and ask who is the man who is on the Malayan desk and asked them if they would advise him that I did wish to talk to him. But that I would not say is the normal procedure for someone who has been doing this as long as I have. We usually have run into somebody like Ted (Mr. Achilles) in an assignment overseas, and if it affects something like the North Atlantic Treaty, on which Ted has been working, why we go to Ted directly, and that would be on my job 90 percent of the time.

Q. In other words, when you know who the man is who is the expert in the field, you go directly to him.—A. That's right. Most news develops in certain fields and one does get to know these men quite well.

Q. Now in the course of your dealings with officers of the Department, do you have occasion, Mr. Reston, to have furnished to you information of a character which is classified in some way and which you are admonished that you may not perhaps even publish at all, but which is nonetheless furnished you for your guidance?—A. Well, that has happened, but it is certainly not a normal procedure. I mean it has happened from time to time. I have handed to me clippings of the New York Times with things marked "classified" on them, for that matter. One example of when a classified document was made available to us, although I don't think—maybe it wasn't classified—I'll tell you what it was and you would know about it: On the day after the Schuman plan was announced, for some reason or other it wasn't apparent to us why the text of that announcement wasn't made available—wasn't published in the following morning's papers. That seemed to be quite a journalistic oversight to a member of this Department, who called up to inquire if I knew of any reason why a record like the Times would not publish a document of that importance. I said I had assumed that the document had not been made available; that Mr. Schuman had put it in but had not made it available for publication. I was told that that wasn't true; that if I wanted the document I could have the document. I came here and I was given the document. That document, however, wasn't a classified document.

Q. Apart from documents, is it a frequent practice for you to receive information with the admonition that this information can't be published, but that you were told about it for your background information?—A. Well, that happens from time to time, although in my own operation I always try to resist that because I'm in the job of disclosing information; I'm not paid to carry around in my head information which may amuse or give me a sense of being in on things but which I can't publish. I think it is the normal procedure for most journalists to say, when somebody suggests that you be told something off the record, that you would rather not discuss the matter in that context. What is much more likely is that you will be given the background of a situation, which is understood to mean by people who cover this Department or other that one may use the information on one's own responsibility, but one may not attribute it to the source which gives you the information nor attribute it to the Department of State or to Government sources.

Q. Do you know whether some of the information that is given to you in that manner is information which is embodied somewhere in so-called classified documents?—A. Oh, yes, I'm sure that much of that information is. I am not aware now—I don't even know what the classification order of this Department is, but by the very nature of it, much of it—some of it would be bound to come from embassies, and I would assume that material which came from embassies would be classified in one category or another.

Q. In the course of your activities, do you have occasion to maintain contacts with officers of the Department at various levels—that is, below the level of Secretary or Assistant Secretary and chiefs of divisions?—A. Yes, I do.

Q. And you maintain such contacts as a normal course of your operations?—A. You mean do I see people like Achilles and people like that in sort of normal social contacts from time to time?

Q. Yes, and do you see officials below the level such as is occupied by Mr. Achilles in your efforts to obtain news?—A. Well, I do from time to time, but it isn't the normal procedure. I usually go either to the head of a section of the Department or the head of a desk. That would depend a great deal on the kind of story. I mean, for example, when there was difficulty about Panama, when we were asked to withdraw our forces from Panama, that carried me into a field where I wasn't well acquainted, and therefore I went wherever I could get information, which meant precisely to this level you are talking about—the level of the man at the desk area rather than at the—

The CHAIRMAN. Do you sometimes talk with members of the Foreign Service who have returned from abroad, for that purpose?

A. Well, not as a normal thing, unless I happened to know the man personally and knew he was back and particularly interested in the place from which he had come. That would not be a normal thing.

The CHAIRMAN. But it would not be extraordinary.

A. It wouldn't be at all extraordinary, no. As a matter of fact, especially when a man gets back from abroad, usually his associates will give a party for him of some kind, and one very often runs into people and talks to people who are just back. But it wouldn't be a normal thing for me to search out that person unless one of two things were true: either he were a close personal friend or he were coming from an area which happened to be very much in the news at the time. In either of those events, of course, one would try to see him.

The CHAIRMAN. In that connection, would you suppose, for example, a man who in the spring of 1945 just returned to this country from the headquarters of the Chinese Communists in Yen-an, China, would be such a person as people might well seek out because of the news value of the area from which he had just returned?—A. Oh, yes; I would think very definitely, because of the controversial issue at that time—very definitely.

Mr. ACHILLES. How would you define your purpose in seeking background information from officials?

A. Well, I think that we are coming more and more into a time when issues are becoming more complex and of more concern to the people of this country, and therefore I think we in the newspaper business, or any of us who reflect very much about it, are pretty unhappy about the ability of the traditional classic methods of reporting news to convey to intelligent people the true nature of many of these issues. Therefore, those things are happening, I think. I think we are, on the one hand experimenting—we on the Times are certainly experimenting—with the very thing that I'm trying to do. We are experimenting with going away from the normal method of presenting news. Instead of the staccato, rather overdramatic tendency of taking the most striking fact and throwing it into the first paragraph and basing one's headline on that, we are trying to experiment with the gathering of the background information and presenting the sense of the issue, the sense of the meeting, whatever it is. One cannot do that by the normal method any more.

Well, let's take the situation at the present time. Supposing Mr. Acheson had just come back from London and made the series of speeches that he has made, the whole sense of what he is trying to do might very well be lost unless we were told in a perfectly proper manner, it seems to me, that when Mr. Jess-up got to London he found that people were disturbed about all the war talk in this country, that there was some tendency toward neutrality among certain sections of the European people, and that therefore we felt that it was essential to try to develop that the purpose of our policy was peace and not conflict. Well, unless somebody says that to you, in the hurly-burly of our business one might just go on reporting what Acheson said each day, and the tendency would be, very likely, to report almost the very opposite of what Mr. Acheson is trying to make clear. For example, in all these speeches that have been made since the Secretary got back, as you look at them, there is inevitably a section in which the Secretary says our purpose is peace, but we are really responding to what seems to us an outrageous and somewhat aggressive policy of the Soviet Union. Well, under the classic way of reporting that, unless you know what it is that Acheson was trying to convey, the tendency is to put the lead sentence on "Acheson says Russia has outrageous, aggressive policy," and thereby you are doing precisely the opposite of what the Secretary of State is trying to do. Therefore, there must be, it seems to me—you and I have batted this around many times before—there must be, it seems to me, a recognition on the part of a department whose policy depends upon the consent of the people that the job of the responsible official and the newspaper reporter and complementary 90 to 95 percent of the time and absolutely antithetic the other 5 percent or 10 percent of the time. But unless we have some cooperation—and I might add we do not get nearly as much as I think we ought to get—I do not see how you can get consent for an effective foreign policy in a democracy. That's my own judgment.

Mr. ACHILLES. There are occasional slips, are there not, when some correspondent misuses information given him in confidence?

A. Yes, there are.

Mr. ACHILLES. Roughly, what would be your guess as to what percentage of information given to newspapermen in confidence was misused?

A. My guess would be a very, very small percentage—a small percentage. We are beginning to see certain bad things developing, I think, Ted, in the sense that your so-called scoop artists in our business are the people who make their living by trying to convey the idea that "you cannot get the truth by reading your press, but if you will listen to me on Sunday night, everything will be all right." There is a tendency for those people to trade upon the good relationship which has been built up over the years between a responsible official and a responsible journalist. For example, we have had certain institutions in this city for a long time which rested upon a realization that there had to be this area of confidence between officials and reporters, such as the Overseas Writers Organization, such as smaller background conferences—10, 15 men—and at those conferences we would be told things that could not be attributed publicly to officials. There we have been seeing a tendency for that information not to be misused by the persons who were there, but for other persons, who, perhaps, worked for people like Drew Pearson, to find out from some correspondent what was said off the record to somebody else and then by that means eventually to get it out to the public. But the percentage of men who are given information in confidence and the percentage of information given in confidence which is then put out publicly is, I would say, infinitesimal.

Mr. ACHILLES. You would feel, therefore, that the public interest required this interchange of background information between officials and the press despite the risk of occasional misuse of information?

A. Oh, yes; I think you have got to take many more chances than you are taking on that. I think we can illustrate these things in many, many ways, but that is certainly my conviction: that if we keep our mind on the 5 percent where the job of the official is antithetic with the job of the reporter, I should have thought that we would have distorted the whole process. I mean, after all, under our system, as I understand it, we are the direct contact between the Executive and the people, or certainly one of the direct—the major direct contacts, and unless that contact is maintained and rests upon a basis of confidence, I don't think the system will work effectively.

Mr. ACHILLES. That's all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(The witness was excused.)

The CHAIRMAN. That closes your presentation of evidence?

Mr. RHETTS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We will adjourn until Monday for a very few questions which the Board would like to ask, which it is not in a position to ask at the moment. We will adjourn until Monday at 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 11:50 a. m., the hearing was adjourned, to reconvene at 2 p. m., Monday, June 19, 1950.)

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD MEETING IN THE CASE OF JOHN STEWART SERVICE

Date: June 19, 1950, 10:10 a. m. to 12:25 p. m.

Place: Room 2254, New State Building.

Reported by: H. B. Campbell, C/S, reported.

Members of the Board: Conrad E. Snow, chairman; Theodore Achilles, Arthur G. Stevens, Allen B. Moreland, legal officer.

Representative for Mr. Service: Charles Edward Rhettts, Reilly, Rhettts & Ruckelshaus.

(The Board reconvened at 10:10 a. m.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Board will be in session.

At this point we will introduce into the record Documents Nos. B-59 through B-77, which are photostatic copies of documents found by the FBI in Mr. Service's office on June 6, 1945.

(Discussion off the record.)

Thereupon Mr. John Stewart Service, witness previously produced and sworn in his own behalf, resumed the stand and testified further as follows:

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The Board wishes to ask certain questions with reference to these documents. I show you first Document No. B-59, which is a photostat of a sheet of paper bearing handwritten notation "John S. Service 144-1 2-S." The notation "Mr. Macatee" has been crossed out. Can you tell us what this document was?

A. The writing is not in my handwriting. The name at the top which has been crossed out is "Mr. Macatee" who at that time was Assistant Chief of the Division of Foreign Service Personnel. The number appearing under my name is the room number which I was occupying at that time in the Old State Department Building. This is apparently a slip of paper which has been attached to some letters or something else which had been forwarded to me through the Department of State messenger service. I assume that it came from FP. It was quite likely that my mail was being sent to the Foreign Service mail room and they had simply clipped or tied a piece of paper to it.

Q. I pass you No. B-60, which is a photostat of a letterhead of "The Road House, Chattanooga Hotel of Distinction, Chattanooga, Tenn." on which is a memorandum referring to some hopes of a deal with the Soviet. Would you explain what that document is?—A. At that time, in May and June 1945, I was occupying a small one-room apartment of a woman who was working in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. She was a secretary there, married to a man in the army, an officer, I believe at officers' training school, and she had gone down there, down to some place near the camp, where he was in training to visit him. Since the apartment was empty she suggested I occupy it and pay the rent while she was away. I think that this camp where her husband was was Fort Benning and I think that this is undoubtedly a paper which was in her apartment, either that she had picked up on some previous trip down there or something of that sort. It was an odd piece of paper which I found in the apartment. Now during this period I was trying to write a rather comprehensive memorandum of my thinking about China and about Chinese policy.

Mr. ACHILLES. The handwriting is yours?

A. The handwriting is in my writing and this apparently—these are apparently scribbles of ideas or thoughts that occurred to me some evening while I was there in the apartment.

Q. What is the reference to a "deal with the Soviet"?—A. I say that the "Sino hopes"—this was at a time when it was being suggested, proposed that the Chinese Government should try and make a treaty with Russia, and I say the Sino hopes to make a deal with the Soviet. I indicate I don't think there is very much hope in their success of making this deal unless it is on the basis of giving the Chinese Communists some participation in the Government. If this is done Russia will have the credit with the Chinese Communists of getting them—giving them a share in the Government.

Q. That was stated in there?—A. I perhaps would have to read the whole thing. I am trying to explain it as I go along.

Q. It is in your handwriting. Perhaps you should read the item you are explaining first and then explain it.—A. I will read it. "Sino hopes of deal with Soviet. Not much hope—can only be on basis of letting CP in. Russia will have the credit—not us."

Then there is a line drawn across the page indicating a new thought. I again quote: "China in revolution—still fluid—uncrystallized—incomplete. In this situation Russia's attraction is greater."

There is another line drawn and again I quote: "In China we meet—we must accommodate ourselves." Now to go back to my attempt to explain the thoughts here, I am referring to the fact that the Central Government was currently hoping to make a deal, in other words, to sign a treaty with the Soviet Union settling the outstanding issues between them. I say that I do not think there is very much hope of Chinese success in doing this unless it is on the basis of giving Chinese Communist Party a share in the Government. If this is done Russia will gain the credit of broadening the base of the Government and unifying the country and we will not have the credit.

Q. I think that takes care of it. I pass you Document B-61, which appears to be a photostat in triplicate of a letter of May 16, 1945, addressed "My dear P'eng," and also a letter of the same date addressed "Dear Jo-Fei," which also appears to be in triplicate, and a handwritten letter "Dear Jack," dated May 27. Would you explain who that correspondence is from and how it happens to be in triplicate? What it concerns?—A. I might, sir; on this matter of being in triplicate, I think that there were not three originals but these are simply identical, but these are duplicate photostats of the same paper. That happens very often in this material. If you examine these carefully you will see that the material that is photographed is identical, so that really it is only one copy. I think the Board will recall that when Mr. Philip Sprouse testified before the Board we touched on these letters. The last paper here is a letter from Mr. Sprouse concerning which he testified. He was at that time a liaison officer at the San Francisco Conference, taking charge of liaison with the Chinese delegation. I am referring to the handwritten note dated May 27, starting "Dear Jack, First Kung Hsi, Kung Hsi on the latest promotion" and signed "Yours, Phil."

Mr. ACHILLES. What does that "Kung Hsi" mean?

A. That is Chinese for "congratulations." He is saying congratulations on the latest promotion I received on May 15 of that year. Mr. Sprouse goes on to say in the next paragraph "Enclosed a letter which CK wishes passed on to Kung Peng." That CK refers to Chen Kang who was in San Francisco with the Chinese delegation.

Q. Was he a Communist?—A. Yes, he was the secretary to the Communist member of the Chinese delegation there.

"Trust you can do the necessary." Well, these are the letters, one of them is from Chia Kang and apparently on the back of the same page is a letter to a man in Chungking named Jo-Fei. It also concerns an invitation to a World Youth Council and World Trade Union Conference. I apparently did nothing about forwarding these letters since they were found in my desk. I don't remember having taken any action on forwarding them. I don't know how I would have.

Q. You had no means of communication which enabled you to forward them?—A. That is correct.

Mr. ACHILLES. These letters were intended for someone in San Francisco?

A. No, they were forwarded by this man Chen in San Francisco and he wished them forwarded to Chungking but I had no appropriate means of having them forwarded to Chungking and I had done nothing about them.

Mr. ACHILLES. Apparently he gave them to Mr. Sprouse in San Francisco.

A. And asked Mr. Sprouse if he could send them on somewhere.

Q. I pass you now—

Mr. ACHILLES. What was the date of Mr. Sprouse's letter?

A. May 27. The date of the letters which he was forwarding were May 16. Apparently Sprouse himself had held them for a considerable time.

Q. I pass you B-62, which is a photostat of a handwritten note dated June 4, 1945, addressed "Dear Jack" and signed by "Rose." I ask you what that document is.—A. This, I believe, is a brief note from Miss Rose Yardoumian. This is written on June 4, 1945, which, I believe, would be the Monday after the week end at Owen Lattimore's where Miss Yardoumian and Mr. Roth and myself had been the guests who had spent that week end with the Lattimores. She says, "I took four tickets from you and paid you for three. Here's the money for the fourth and thanks very much for getting them for us." I have no recollection of what the tickets were, whether they were theater tickets or concert tickets or what it was, but I assume I had been buying some tickets for myself and since I knew—she told me she wanted some and I must have picked up some tickets for her at the same time.

Q. I pass you B-63, which is a photostat of a check on the Commonwealth Bank of Detroit, payable to you in the amount of $20, signed by Inez E. Larson. Would you explain this check, please?—A. Miss Larson was a recently employed Foreign Service clerk who was assigned to the office in which I was working for training purposes before going out to her first field post. The office where I had been working was the Office of Foreign Service.

Mr. ACHILLES. That is not Mrs. E. S. Larsen?

A. No connection in any way with Emmanuel Larsen or his wife. She was acting as my stenographer and she had needed cash one day. It was too late to get to a bank. I happened to have some cash in my pocket so I gave her $20 and she paid me by writing this check. I was questioned very thoroughly on this point by the Department of Justice in 1945. That is why my memory happens to be so clear. Miss Larson went soon after this to Stockholm. I don't know where she is now, but I am sure she would be able to affirm it.

Q. I pass you—A. Incidentally, if I may interrupt, Miss Larson I mentioned had just come to the State Department. She had been employed by the FBI just prior to her employment by the Department of State.

Q. I pass you B-64, which is a photostat of a piece of paper containing the handwritten address "Corp. Joseph N. Hatem." Will you explain that reference?—A. We touched on this matter before. My recollection is not very clear whether I brought a letter home or whether I simply brought an oral message which I wrote to the family in the United States of this American doctor who had been in Yenan for some years. I do remember that his younger brother, I think, who was a Medical Corps man, I believe an enlisted man in the Army, came to see me to inquire of his brother in China. I assume that I suggested that he give me his address. I notice that this is not in my writing, and I am sure that this is simply the slip of paper on which he wrote out his full name and address.

Mr. ACHILLES. You don't remember whether you did actually transmit a letter from China to him or whether you wrote him one based on news of his brother?

A. My memory is not clear, sir, because you remember I came back to the United States twice, once in '44 and once in '45. My belief is that in 1944 Dr. Hatem in China asked me to drop his family a line and say that I had seen him and he was well, and I did that. In 1945, I may have brought back a letter. I remember, for instance, the pictures I mentioned before, pictures of this doctor and his Chinese wife and Chinese child. As I said before, any letter that I brought would have been opened and would have been approved by censorship in China.

Q. I pass you B-65, which is a photostat of a two-page handwritten letter dated March 16, addressed to "Dear SP." It is unsigned unless it would be the initial "K." I will ask you what that is.—A. I believe that this is a letter written by Miss Yang Kang, who has been mentioned several times in testimony before the Board here by Mr. Sprouse and by Mr. Fairbank. She was at that time on a scholarship at Radcliffe. She had formerly been the literary editor of the leading independent Chinese newspaper.

Q. Where?—A. In Chungking. Her coming to the United States had been assisted and facilitated by Dr. Fairbank as part of our cultural relations program. I am not sure who the person is that she is addressing here. The initials "SP" don't mean anything to me after a long lapse of time. But it is obviously a letter to some friend in China which she hoped that I would have some means of forwarding. I notice the letter is dated March 16 and I very obviously did not forward it.

Q. Did you forward any letters over that period? Was this a custom of yours or was it just a vain hope on the part of the writers?—A. Well, I think—I don't have any specific recollection of forwarding any letters. It is obvious, I think, that letters occasionally were forwarded, but I don't remember that I forwarded any at all.

Q. I pass you B-66, which is a photostat of a 3-page handwritten letter dated March 16, '45, addressed "Dear P and M" and signed by the letter "K." Is that the same person?—A. The handwriting is the same and of course the signature initial "K" is the same, so I believe that this letter is also written by Miss Yang Kang to friends in Chungking which she hoped to have forwarded.

Q. Which you did not forward.—A. I did not.

Q. If anything had been forwarded, as you suggested a moment ago that perhaps something was forwarded by somebody, would that be through the diplomatic pouch?—A. No sir, it would probably have been—well, you say "through the diplomatic pouch," the OWI, as I mentioned the other day, and officers of the OWI sometimes transmitted open communications to and from the people who were in the United States on grants from them. Now presumably that would have gone through the diplomatic pouch as a semiofficial communication.

Q. And in the case of this girl it might have?—A. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Would that have been subject to censorship?

A. Well, it is subject to censorship by the officers. It is subject to the judgment of the officers transmitting it. You might call that censorship. You see, we could send all of our personal letters those days through the pouch, but they had to be left open and they were subject, I believe, to some sort of censorship here in the Department.

Mr. STEVENS. Subject to review as to whether they were to be transmitted? Is that correct? Both here and overseas?

A. That is correct.

Q. I pass you B-67, which is a photostat of a one-page handwritten letter dated February 2, 1945, Chungking, addressed "Dear Jack". The signature is illegible to me. Would you explain this letter?—A. This letter is from a man named Shafer. He was an old friend of my family's, Czech by nationality, who had fought in the Austro-Hungarian Army, had been drafted in the Austro-Hungarian Army in the First World War, taken prisoner by the Russians and escaped and made his way across Central Asia into China where he arrived in 1919 or 1920. He had worked in Shanghai as an architectural draftsman and, as I say, was an old friend of my family's. During the period I was in Yen-an I found that he was there in the Communist territory under detention. He had decided to get out of Shanghai and get into free China and his sympathies were entirely on the allied side and he had been having some difficulties in Shanghai. He had been actually acting as providing cover for some Chinese secret activity in Shanghai. Because of the rather unusual route that he took and because of his Czech nationality the Chinese Communists were suspicious of him, and as I say, had him under detention. They finally released him, they could find no reason to continue to hold him, and he was absolutely destitute and penniless, had nothing but the clothes he was wearing. So I loaned him some money out there in China so that he could outfit himself and live for a while until he got a job, and he finally got a job in the American Army. This is simply a note to me telling me that he has written a letter to his brother Charles who was living in the United States as an American citizen, asking his brother Charles to pay this money to my wife, who was here in the States.

Q. I pass you B-68, which is a photostat of a one-page handwritten letter from 77 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass., on December 11, 1944, addressed to "Dear Jack", signature again appears to be "Yang Kang." This is the same girl you previously testified about?—A. Yes; and this letter is also alluded to in previous testimony by Mr. Sprouse. This letter is from Miss Yang Kang who, as I have already said, was a Chinese woman in the United States on a fellowship at Radcliffe College.

Q. Did this have any connection with the letters which she had forwarded to you for transmittal?—A. I don't think so since this is dated December 11, 1944, and the ones she sent me were March 19, 1945. The postscript is as follows: "Heard that Phil is on way here unless he has arrived." As Mr. Sprouse stated before, he is the Phil referred to.

Q. I pass you B-69, which is a photostat of a letter addressed to "Dear Jack" from Mark Gayn, dated May 1, 1945, in which there is a reference to a mutual friend, "Mr. H. in Chungking." Will you explain the reference in the letter?—A. Well, the letter concerns his negotiations with the editors of the Saturday Evening Post magazine concerning this story which he was expecting to write for them concerning the situation in China and Stilwell's recall. "Mr. H." refers to Ambassador Hurley, I assume.

Q. Did he ever write that article?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. Did you furnish any information to him for that article?—A. As I testified here before, I discussed with him some of the early background of the events leading up to General Stilwell's recall, the American suggestion that General Stilwell be placed in command of all Chinese forces.

Q. I pass you B-70, which is a photostat of a 1-page typewritten letter dated May 7, 1945, on stationery of the Manhattan Co. of 40 Wall Street, New York, addressed "Dear Mr. Service," signed by "A."—A. Pronounced Suehsdorf. Mr. Suehsdorf, the writer of this letter, was vice president of the Bank of Manhattan Co. and was the father of a man named Adolph Suehsdorf, who was employed by the OWI and had been stationed at Yen-an. During my second stay in Yen-an, in March 1945, I had shared a room with this man's son. I got to know him very well, sharing a room with him for a month, and when I got back to the United States I dropped a short note to his parents saying that I had known their son and liked him, that he was well, and so on. It was quite a customary thing during the war, particularly when people were in remote, isolated places like Yen-an where mail communications were very slow and difficult and infrequent, when I got back and knew somebody and thought probably their wife or their family would appreciate recent news I got in touch with them. It was simply the elder Mr. Suehsdorf's thanks for my having written him.

Q. I pass you B-71, which is a photostat of a 1-page typewritten letter dated May 24, 1945, from West Roxbury, Boston, Mass., addressed "Dear Jack" and signed by the initials which appear to be "R. L." or "R. V. L."—A. The initials are R. P. L. and are the initials of Raymond P. Ludden, a Foreign Service officer who had been, like me, attached to the Army in China and who had also been a member of the observer group in the Communist areas. The first part of the letter discusses a proposal that he might be sent to the Army-Navy Staff College. The assignment had actually been offered to me but there was some technical difficulty because my family was on the West Coast and it would have been difficult for the State Department to order them here on the basis of this assignment. It was therefore decided to give me a permanent assignment to Washington so I could be reunited with my family. I suggested that Mr. Luden might be a good man for this Army-Navy Staff College assignment. The Department accepted the suggestion and he eventually did go to that Army-Navy Staff College.

Q. I pass you B-72, which is a photostat of a typewritten note on stationery of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated May 22, 1945, and signed "Larry," and ask you to explain that communication.—A. The signer of this note is Mr. Lawrence E. Salisbury, who had been a Foreign Service officer and whom I had known very well in the Far East and here in the Department. He had retired from the Foreign Service a short time prior to writing this letter and was spending part time lecturing at Yale and part time editing Far Eastern Survey magazine for the Institute of Pacific Relations. This note is simply a congratulatory note after my promotion in May 1945.

Q. I pass you B-73, which is a photostat of a letter addressed "Dear Jack" from Mark Gayn, dated May 22, 1945.—A. The letter starts off in a rather misleading way. He said, "This letter is completely off the record." The background is that Mr. Gayn was expecting to be sent out as a foreign correspondent by the Sun, apparently, and he wanted very much to have his wife either accompany him or spend sometime in the same area since he expected to be abroad for a year or longer, or perhaps on a semi-permanent basis. At this time, 1945, it was very difficult, in fact almost impossible, to get approval for travel of wives as such. A few people were successful in getting their wives to India or to China if their wives had their own separate employment. Apparently, reading the letter, Mr. Gayn was hoping to have his wife go out to India as a correspondent, but he wanted his efforts to have his wife get out to India kept off the record since if it were known by passport granting authorities that both he and his wife were trying to get in the same place they would probably be less willing to grant the rule for her. I believe in the papers found in Mr. Gayn's possession there should be a reply from me in which I declined to give him any assistance, to give him any channels.

Q. At this point I will read into the record from among the papers found in Mark Gayn's apartment the following, which is taken from a photostat of a typewritten letter signed "Jack":

"Good news that you may be heading for my old stamping grounds!

"Regarding the passport for Sally. Unfortunately, I don't know anyone personally over in Mrs. S' menage. Failing the direct contact, I know the State Department well enough to know that there is not much use asking. They refuse to answer hypothetical questions and will take the attitude: the case must be decided on its merits—let the person apply directly.

"However, I did talk to the people in the appropriate geographical branch, including an officer just back from India. The view was that the passport would probably be issued (at least they would raise no objection—and they would normally be consulted) as long as the woman has a reasonable reason for going (which they agree she does in this case) and can arrange her own transportation (as you say Sally can).

"So I would say that the prospects are hopeful.

"How are the Chinese reacting?

"My breakfast was ruined this morning by reading J. B. Powell and Max Eastman in the Reader's Digest. What a stinker!

"Be sure to let me know when you are coming down to Washington.

"Cheers.

JACK."

I pass you B-74, which is a photostat of a Chinese map and charts on which all the writing is in Chinese. Will you explain this document?—A. This is unheaded but it is apparently a chart, a table, really, prepared by the Communists, of Americans who had traveled through their different areas. They give the dates and places and transliteration as closely as they could do it in Chinese of the names of the Americans.

Q. What is the purpose of the map?—A. Well, this was simply to show the number of their areas which they control which had been visited by Americans.

Q. Do you recall how you got that and what you proposed to do with it?—A. It was simply given to me by the Communists and I didn't do anything with it really. It was just a part of this tremendous compilation of material which—

Q. Did you incorporate it in any report?—A. Some of the material may have been referred to in a general way. I wrote one report, my Memorandum No. 17, March 17, 1945, which is our Document No. 220 in these proceedings, entitled "Verification of Communist Territorial Claims by Direct American Observation." In that I made some reference in a general way to the areas under Communist control which had been visited in one way or another by Americans.

Q. I pass you B-75, which is a photostat of two sheets of paper bearing Chinese characters set up in the form of a table, and ask you what that is?—A. These are rough statistics which were given me by one of the officials of the government district in which Yen-an was located. I had had a long interview with him and the notes will be found, I think, also in this material that was in my desk. These are statistics of the various government subdivisions of the various counties which comprised the Yen-an area.

Q. The source of this is from the National Government?—A. No, the source is one of the Communist government officials for that area. The second chart here is the population figures for the various counties.

Q. We will have a 5-minute recess at this point.

(Recess.)

Q. I now show you certain documents which were found in your apartment by the FBI on June 6, 1945. I show you first Document B-78, which is a photostat of a small book entitled "Our Task in 1945," containing Chinese characters. The contents of the book appear to be a speech given by Mao Tse-tung before the People's Congress on December 5, 1944. Will you explain that document?—

A. As I testified before, I had been assigned the duty of political intelligence, concerning political reporting of the Chinese Communists, for a considerable period and particularly during my stays at Yen-an in the summer-fall of '44 and again in the spring of '45 that was my full-time job. I therefore made every effort, in connection with this work, to collect all of the materials concerning the Chinese Communists that I could get. I had—and I think the material that was found in my desk, for instance, will bear me out—probably the most complete collection in existence at that time of translated and some untranslated materials concerning the Chinese Communists, their own speeches, publications, party publications and so on. This belongs to the same category and is a booklet which was put out by the Chinese Communists and is the text of a speech given by the leader of the party before a meeting in Yen-an in December 1944, which was simply part of the reference material concerning the Chinese Communists which I had been collecting.

Q. I pass you B-79, which appears to be a photostat of a typed copy of a State Department code and ask you to explain how that happened to be in your possession. A. It is most definitely not a State Department code. There were, as the Board will recall, four Foreign Service officers who were assigned to the Army in the Far East, in the China-Burma-India theater. We were stationed in widely separate places. Mr. Davies was in India most of the time, I was in Chungking, another man was in Burma very much of the time, and another man was in Yunnan. All mail had to pass over what was called the "hump" and over what was at one time Japanese-occupied territory. So there was some need for care in using names of people and places. There was some correspondence between us. Mr. Davies, for instance, would write us through Army channels or would communicate with us by telegram, sometimes giving us instructions or suggesting certain things that we should do, certain reports that we should write, and this was a list of pseudonyms for us to use in such correspondence.

Mr. ACHILLES. This was purely for use in correspondence? It had no connection with cryptography?

A. None whatsoever.

Q. And the results were given you by the Army for your personal retention?—A. This had nothing to do with our official reports.

Q. I mean this was a copy you were supposed to have in your possession and was furnished you by the Army?—A. It was a list of names which we simply made out and arranged among ourselves mutually.

Q. So it was not given you by anybody, it was simply an arrangement which you made?—A. That is right.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I see that a minute?

Q. Yes. I note that the document is not classified.

Mr. ACHILLES. Who does "Snow White" refer to?

A. "Snow White" was Madam Chiang Kai-shek. That was not a suitable name to use, however, because that is the common theater nickname, so we adopted a second pseudonym rather than using the obvious one.

Mr. ACHILLES. Was there any particular significance in using "Harvard" as a code for "Communist"?

A. None whatsoever. This is simply a list of names that John Davies and Ray Ludden and John Emmerson and I arranged between ourselves for use in correspondence since that correspondence might conceivably fall into enemy hands if a plane was lost over the hump.

Mr. ACHILLES. Or using "asylum" as the code word for Washington?

A. None whatever, sir. It is sophomoric perhaps.

Q. I pass you Document No. B-80, which is a photostat of a card index of Chinese personalities. What is this index?—A. When I arrived at Yen'an we were starting out on a completely new field. There were a few of the leading Communists whose names were known on the outside but there had been no American contact with the main group of Communists in Yen'an for many years and there had never been any systematic biographic information or reporting done. As I moved around and got acquainted and learned about this man or that man by reading a paper, by reading a Chinese Communist newspaper or publication, or interviewing them I simply made up these little sheets of paper, jotting down on each card under a man's name what pertinent information I picked up on him. It was a biographic file on Chinese Communist personalities. Most of the information I have here is simply the positions a man held as far as I could find out. Sometimes I would put down other details, although they are hard to come by, such as a date or background and so on. That date of his birth, I mean.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you and Mr. Larsen collaborate in any way either with this card file or—A. We did not. I have never seen Mr. Larsen's identity file—never heard of it before this case. As far as I know he has never seen my very rudimentary file which I had prepared for my own use.

Q. I pass you document B-81, which is a photostat of an address book of yours. I notice a reference to Lattimore "Supper for Rose," the address of Mark Gayn's 302 West Twelfth, the address of Corporal Hatem and of Phil Jaffe, 225 Fifth Avenue, another address of Lattimore at Roland View Road, Ruxton, Baltimore; Eugene Vinogradoff, Commissariat of the Chinese Department, Moscow; and Rose Yardumian, which appears to be a telephone number. Would you explain those addresses?—A. The first item which you mentioned, "Supper for Rose," is written apparently on what was an engagement pad, a date book, opposite the 3d of June. Now that date I was spending a weekend at Mr. Lattimore's and the supper for Rose is incomprehensible because we all had supper together at the Lattimores'. I wonder if there hasn't been a typing mistake. I notice there are certain obvious typing mistakes on the copy.

Q. Wasn't this copy as it was in your possession?—A. No sir.

Q. This is copied from a notebook—A. This is copied from something written by hand.

Q. This is not a photostat of the notebook?—A. No, it is a three-by-five pad. These pages are simply copies of addresses, people whom I knew or might be needing at some time, wishing at some time to get in touch with. They are all arranged alphabetically, as is normal in an address book.

Q. I think they are all people with whom we are familiar except that one from Moscow, if you will explain that.—A. The man Vinogradoff was a member of the staff of the Russian Embassy in Chungking. He was called a press attaché for the Russian Embassy but was generally understood to be rather important, a more important official than his title or status would indicate. I got to know him quite well in Chungking. In fact, had success in becoming acquainted with several of the Russian officials there who gave me information from time to time that I reported. I see that a memorandum which I wrote on February 16, 1945, which is our Document 206 in these proceedings, mentions some conversations with Mr. Vinogradoff in which, for instance, he expresses a diametrically opposite view on China and China policy from that which Ambassador Hurley was almost at the same time getting from high Russian officials in Moscow. Mr. Vinogradoff, for instance, was telling me, "We will do nothing to assist, support, or encourage the present Government in China." He was talking to me with considerable frankness. When I left Chungking Mr. Vinogradoff insisted on giving me his address, his permanent address at the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, in the hope that at some future time we might resume our acquaintance.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you ever communicate with him afterward?—A. I never communicated with him or heard from him. I never had any contact with him of any sort. I may say, however, it was a useful contact while it existed in Chungking for information and for views as to Russian Soviet attitudes.

Q. I now show you certain documents which were found in the apartment of Mark Gayn by the FBI on June 6, 1945. The first of these is a photostat of a typed carbon copy of a letter of transmittal of October 4, 1944, and of certain enclosed reports prepared by John S. Service on Chinese Communist political views, and ask if any of these papers came from your files or were in any way communicated by you to Mark Gayn.

Mr. RIETTS. Does this document have a number?

Q. I should have referred to it as Document No. B-82.—A. I notice that the first page of this document indicates that it is a military report forwarded to, I assume, the War Department by Joseph K. Dickey, colonel, GSC. I believe that it will be found that this was identical with a document which was also found in Mr. Jaffe's possession and concerning which I have already been questioned under the Document No. B-19 and also B-52. I think that the answers which I gave on a previous occasion I will also repeat for this, that I did not transmit this document either to Mr. Jaffe or Mr. Gayn.

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that?

Q. Could you tell us what the source appears to be, Mr. Achilles?

Mr. ACHILLES. It appears to be a War Department document transmitted from Chungking by Colonel Dickey. It appears to be a typed carbon copy. Do we have Document B-19 here? Is that an ozalid or a carbon?

Q. That was a typed copy—ozalid.

Mr. MORELAND. Both B-19 and B-52 were typed copies.

Mr. ACHILLES. As I recall, this is a document of which you did not have any copies, did you?—A. I had no copies, I had never seen this document in this form and, as I said, never had any copies.

Q. I show you B-83, which appears to be a photostat of typed copies of nine documents, beginning September 8, 1941, and various other dates in 1944. I will ask you if any of these appear to be copies of your reports? If they are, whether or not you were instrumental in those copies getting to Mr. Mark Gayn.—A. It appears to be a very heterogeneous collection of all sorts of material, including what seems to be typewritten copies of comment by the Division of Chinese Affairs concerning despatches forwarded from Chungking. It contains also what would appear to be excerpts or perhaps the full text of copies of Embassy despatches and in a few cases what seem to be copies of reports, memoranda, which I wrote. However, none of these are exact copies, none of them are in the form in which I originally prepared them. Also, it contains various other material which I had no connection with whatsoever. There is, for instance, a memorandum of a conversation between our Ambassador in China and Chiang Kai-shek. There is a copy of a despatch from Kweilin. There are notes concerning smuggling in the Chinese province of Fukien. There seems to be a copy of an inter-OWI message and there seems to be a copy of a report by Mr. Caldwell who was employed at the OWI. Finally, there is what seems to be a photostat of an original despatch—

Mr. ACHILLES. May I examine that?

A. Attached to the original commenting memorandum prepared by the Division of Chinese Affairs.

Mr. ACHILLES. What is it that indicates that that is a photostat of an original despatch?

A. It has the file numbers on it, all the stamps, distribution stamps, and distribution symbols come out very clearly. Many of these stamps, for instance, would not have appeared on duplicate copies. They appear only on the original or ozalid copies.

Mr. ACHILLES. Have you any idea how that original despatch got in Mr. Gayn's possession?

A. I have no idea whatsoever, none whatsoever.

Q. From State Department files?—A. No, sir; I was not. To answer your original question, sir, I would say that—well, there is nothing here which I gave Mr. Gayn.

Q. Did you give Mr. Gayn anything?—A. No, sir; I do not believe I ever showed him any document.

(Discussion off the record.)

Q. For the record, the Chairman notes that in the cover sheet of the FBI attached to this document it appears that the original of the item 2944 was located in the State Department. It appears that it was received on 9-22-44 and routed to the Office of Far Eastern Affairs on the same day. This information and other information which appears following that indicates that the photostat which was found in the file is actually a photostat of the original document found in the State Department files and loaned to the FBI by the State Department for identification purposes merely.—A. To return to your original question, sir, this material is apparently copies of State Department memoranda, Embassy and consulate despatches, and certain OWI papers. I never had any of these papers in my possession, as far as I know, had never seen them.

Q. Excepting, of course, the reports which are prepared.—A. Yes, but those are enclosures to despatches. I did not give them to Mr. Gayn.

Q. I pass you now document B-84, which appears to be a photostat of a typed original copy of a Service report dated September 26, 1944. I asked you if you have made that available to Mr. Gayn?—A. This is the same type of paper, sir. It is a copy, a typewritten copy, of a Department of State—rather a Division of Chinese Affairs memorandum and of an Embassy despatch which, in turn, transmitted a report which I originally wrote. Actually this is identical with a part of the papers which we just examined under the previous number, Document No. B-83. It is a paper of which I never had a copy in my possession and did not give it to Mr. Gayn. This is a copy—appears to be a copy of Chungking Embassy Despatch No. 2944, dated September 8, with a covering memorandum by the Division of Chinese Affairs, dated September 26, 1944.

Q. Is that by any chance identical with anything we have introduced?—A. It is identical with the first part of the papers which were included under the last document number.

Q. I mean at previous hearings.—A. Yes sir, it is apparently identical with document B-21, which was one of the papers found, I understand, in Mr. Jaffe's possession.

Q. I show you now B-85, which is a photostat of a typed original despatch enclosing a Service report and ask if you will give us the same sort of information about that paper?—A. I should have said in regard to the last document, B-84, that it is identical with a part of document B-21, which was previously introduced in these proceedings and which was found in Mr. Jaffe's possession.

This document B-85 appears to be identical with a portion of document B-22. The material is apparently taken from the reports which I wrote. However, it is not in the form in which I prepared my reports and I did not give these to Mr. Gayn. I did not give them to Mr. Gayn in this or any other form.

Q. I pass you B-86, which appears to be a photostat of a typed original and two pages of handwritten material. The typed material contains extracts, apparently, of a Service report and I will ask if you will explain that document?—A. This appears to be notes or excerpts from various sources. The first part, for instance, is stated here to be from a report to the Secretary of State from the Embassy in Chungking. The next part is obviously an excerpt from a translation of a newspaper report which I transmitted at one time.

Q. Transmitted to whom?—A. I transmitted it in one of my memoranda which I prepared.

Q. You mean transmitted to whom?—A. To the Army or the Embassy.

Q. Not to Gayn?—A. No, sir. I do not recognize the material and in any event I did not give this to Mr. Gayn.

Q. Do you recognize the handwriting in the handwritten material?—A. No, I do not.

Q. Was Mr. Gayn, to your knowledge, in 1945, engaged in any writing or anything of that sort which would have necessitated this information that you have just seen in these last few documents?—A. Well, he does do magazine writing, free-lance writing on the Far East, on China, and Japan. The material in this particular paper seems to be mainly excerpts from speeches or statements by Communist leaders giving Communist views on events in China. It is the type of material which I assume a newspaper and magazine writer would be interested in.

Q. As far as your knowledge is concerned at the time in 1945 when you spent a couple nights in Gayn's apartment did you know he was doing anything that would require information of this sort? Did you then know it?—A. I knew then he was a magazine writer specializing in the Far East.

Q. I mean the specific project. Did you know of any specific projects he was engaged on?—A. Well, he was engaged in writing an article on the morale effects of the American bombing of Japan. That was published in Collier's about the middle of June. He was assembling material for a projected series of articles on China and Stilwell. I can't relate this particular material to any particular article that I remember.

Mr. STEVENS. He did not show you any such material that he had in his possession during the time that you stayed with him?

A. He did not. I had no idea that he had copies of Embassy or other classified material, Embassy despatches and other classified material.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did Gayn ever ask you for any copies of your reports or other material?

A. No, sir; not that I recollect.

Q. No further questions on this. Can we now adjourn?

Mr. ACHILLES. There is one other matter I would like to ask a question or two on. Have you ever known anyone by the name of Grace Granich?

A. I can't recall ever having known anyone by the name of Granich.

Mr. ACHILLES. Or Max Granich?

A. As I testified before, I had to inquire who that man was when I saw his name mentioned in that article by Kamp.

Mr. ACHILLES. You had never heard that doctor in Yenan, Mahatem, speak of a Mr. or Mrs. Granich?

A. No, Dr. Mahatem—well, he had an obsession, a reticence about his background and people he had known and how he got to China and so on. I don't remember his ever discussing the Graniches.

Mr. ACHILLES. Did you ever bring or send any messages from him to Mr. or Mrs. Granich?

A. I don't recall bringing any messages except for his own immediate family.

Q. No further questions. We will adjourn until further call of the chairman. (Discussion off the record.)

Q. I note that in my introduction of items found in Mr. Service's office I did not refer to B-76, which is a photostat of a typed original—I don't know whether it is a Service report or not. Perhaps you can tell me.—A. I refer to document B-60, which was discussed earlier and which was a piece of paper with some handwritten notes. During this period of April and May 1945, soon after my return from China, it was suggested to me by the Chief of the Division of Chinese Affairs that it might be useful if I would prepare a rather comprehensive memorandum concerning the situation in China and my opinions regarding policy in that country, the policy we should adopt toward that country. In the material that was found in my desk I think you will note that there are quite a few fragmentary memoranda, fragmentary notes. They all deal with this memorandum which I was in the process of writing in my spare time and which I never actually did complete. However, this document B-76 is the most complete draft which I finally ended up with. It is still only a partial text of the memorandum that I had projected, but it may be of interest to the Board members as reflecting my opinions as of May 1945.

Q. I also failed to refer to B-77, which is a photostat of a carbon copy of Report No. 85, June 26, 1944, written by Mr. Service, and other papers. Perhaps you will comment on that.—A. This is a translation of a book by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek called "Chinese Economic Theory." This was a book which I think was written in 1944 and was used as a textbook in the party schools in China. It was the Kuomintang Party schools in China. It is interesting as reflecting the official economic thinking of Chiang Kai-shek and of at least an important part of the Kuomintang Party. I had been instrumental in obtaining a copy of the Chinese book and assisted in translating it. There was no official Chinese translation into English. Attached to the translation is a summary of the book and a memorandum of comment on the probable actual authorship not by Chiang Kai-shek himself, but by two ghost writers, and some comment on the type of economic thinking represented.

Q. Was that prepared by you?—A. I worked on the translation and also provided some of the material and assisted in drafting the memorandum of comment on the book. However, the major part of the comment and the summary was done by Mr. Adler, who was the United States Treasury attaché in China with whom I was living at the time. The two of us collaborated, really, on this project which was an independent and voluntary one.

Q. Anything further?

Mr. RHETTS. No.

Q. May we adjourn until the call of the chairman.

(The Board adjourned at 12:25 p. m.)

(The Board reconvened at 10:20 a. m.)

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Conrad E. Snow). The Board will be in session.

(Thereupon Mr. John Stewart Service, a witness previously produced and sworn in his own behalf, resumed the stand and testified further as follows:)

Questions by CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Service, the Board, as you have been informed, has evidence before it that you did make on May 8, 1945, certain statements to Mr. Jaffe at a meeting which you had on that date and the Board would like to ask you a few questions on that. We have not been able to secure a transcript of the exact statements which you are supposed to have made, but in the course of the questions the Board will give you its best knowledge of what these statements consisted of.

It is stated that you told Mr. Jaffe that a plan had been made by General Wedemeyer's staff after they got orders to make recommendations as to what we should do if the United States made a landing in territory held by the Chinese Communists. Do you recall making such a statement?—A. Can you tell me something more about the context?

Q. No. Apparently the discussion may have had something to do with military planning of the United States so far as China was concerned. And the first statement that I call your attention to is a statement that a plan had been made, simply that a plan had been made by General Wedemeyer's staff. Perhaps I can add the next question for what value it may have.—A. Please.

Q. It is stated that Mr. Jaffe questioned you as to whether or not this plan indicated that we would cooperate with the Chinese Communists in that eventuality. And your answer was that this was the plan.—A. I certainly remember that the whole subject was under consideration and study.

Q. You mean in Wedemeyer's headquarters?—A. Yes; in Chungking. And I have a hazy recollection of one of the staff officers talking to me about the subject. I assume that he was one of the officers working on a memorandum or a plan. I do not remember that I ever saw the plan or saw a finished plan or knew what the final decision was. I think that—I'm sure that the general thinking in Chungking, as I believe in Washington and certainly my own thinking at the time was that the only plan, the only practical thing was that we would cooperate with whatever forces we found organized and able to assist us. I don't remember that any plan was ever couched in the terms of cooperating with the Communists.

Q. Now, were you aware that some sort of a plan had been discussed in General Wedemeyer's headquarters?—A. I was aware that the subject had been discussed.

Q. Was the fact that such a plan had been discussed in any way secret?—A. I would not say it was because it was a subject that everybody had to be thinking about in those days.

Q. In other words—A. I do not remember in terms of concrete or specific plans. I remember in terms of discussion.

Q. If, then, you had told Mr. Jaffe that a plan had been discussed or had been made up in General Wedemeyer's headquarters there was nothing, as I understand your testimony, about such a fact that would have been secret?—A. No, sir. I have no positive recollection. I have no positive recollection, sir, of having made such a statement. But certainly the fact that the subject was being discussed was something that everybody could take for granted. Everybody knew we had to be considering that problem.

Q. Will you state whether or not the mere fact that we would probably cooperate with whatever forces we found when we landed was a secret?—A. Well, I don't believe that anyone knew the answer to that. Certainly I did not know definitely what the answer was at that time.

Q. You mean, by the answer, what the actual plan was, what the actual decision was?—A. It would be a decision that would have to be made here in Washington at the very highest level. The theater might have recommended one course but it was a decision that would have been made here in Washington at the top level.

Q. I'm trying to find out whether or not you had ever been instructed that the recommendation of General Wedemeyer's staff was secret, that we should cooperate with whatever forces we found, or whether it as anything that you shouldn't have divulged?—A. That is one of the reasons why I think it is important for us to know the full context of the thing, of the beginning of the conversation.

Q. Unfortunately we haven't that context.—A. I would say that I might well have said—and again I'm not speaking from actual memory—that the thinking of the headquarters in Chungking, as far as I know from the people I had been working with, was that we should cooperate with whatever forces we found. That also was my thinking, as expressed in several papers I wrote, in my memorandum, and in Document 204, and I think in an earlier one. If I had made the positive statement that that was the final decision I was indiscreet. But I did not know what the final American Government decision was on that question.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. Can you recall ever having reviewed any such plan, or did you hear it discussed? Were you in a position in Chungking to be taken into counsel for a review of military plans?—A. No, sir, I was not. My recollection is—and as I say it is a very hazy one—that an officer in the headquarters who was assigned to write a memorandum or a recommendation had talked to me at one time about the matter while he was drafting it, while he was preparing it. That was in much the same way as Mr. Gearey came and talked to me here in the Department when he was assigned to draft a paper on what our policy should be in Manchuria if we landed there. That was a subsequent date in May. I never saw the final paper that Mr. Fearey drew up. To answer your question, I did not see the war plans or final papers of the headquarters in Chungking.

Q. Can you recall whether—if you did have such a discussion with Mr. Jaffe—it would have been with regard to general plans and thinking or whether it would have been with respect to some specific plan that you may have had more clearly in mind?—A. No, sir; I'm sorry I do not. The reason I was mentioning the necessity of knowing the full background of the conversation is there was a feeling among some groups in the United States that we were already by this time thorough committed to support only the Kuomintang. American policy had not committed itself, and I on certain occasions tried to explain to people that we had not, as that section of the press thought, committed ourselves entirely to support one group. For instance, President Roosevelt, a few days before his death, had told a well-known writer something to this effect. The President had been asked by this writer whether or not it was true that we had committed ourselves completely to support the Kuomintang and President Roosevelt replied—and I have heard this from the writer himself—"No; I'm dealing now with both parties in China and I expect to go on dealing with both sides."

If Jaffe started an argument or a line of discussion along the line that we were completely committed to military support of the Kuomintang, I might possibly in the discussion have said, "Well, I don't think that is true at all. We are not so committed. We are keeping ourselves in a more neutral position. We are trying to win the war and I happen to know that the thinking in headquarters in Chungking is that if and when we do land"—those were facts I know something about; I didn't know when we were going to land or where or whether we would—"we will have to cooperate with whatever organized forces we find on the spot."

Q. Your remarks just made rest on an analysis made 5 years after the fact, or are they as you recollect?—A. No, sir, I'm simply trying to reconstruct what might have been the background. That is why I was saying if we knew the whole conversation in exact detail we might be able to understand certain isolated statements such as this.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Now, it is stated that the conversation went on as follows: That you told Mr. Jaffe that you had seen the plans which had been drawn up and that the plans provided that when we were in Nationalist territory we would go on cooperating with the Chinese Nationalists but that if the United States troops landed in Chinese Communist territory without any question the Communists would be the dominant force. Those are the exact words "the dominant force," whatever that may have meant. Does that in any way refresh your recollection as to any actual conversation? I know that it is very nearly in the words that you have put, as to your reconstruction of what might have occurred.—A. It doesn't refresh my memory of any actual conversations or statements of that. In fact even that, I think, is only a partial résumé of what was probably said. It would be quite obvious that if we landed in Communist territory the Communists would be the dominant force. I may have been expending on the general idea of the thinking of headquarters that if we landed in Communist territory it would be the dominant force, therefore, we would be forced for practical reasons to recognize and work with them for military purposes. But I don't remember seeing any particular plan setting that out. I may have been explaining the rationale behind the thinking of headquarters.

Q. To complete the subject, it is stated that you told Mr. Jaffe that the Chungking government had been putting pressure on trying to get the United States to agree to take in Kuomintang officials whenever the United States troops landed in China during the war but, as far as you knew, such assurance had not been given to the Nationalist Government.—A. Yes. Well, I do not think, sir, that was any secret because the Kuomintang government itself made no secret of its desire to have its officials go in with our forces whenever we landed or wherever we went. And I simply state that "we have not made any decision on that question, as far as I knew."

Q. Now, if you made the statements which I have outlined to you on the subject, can you tell me whether or not such information was common knowledge among the newspapermen in China at that time?—A. Yes; I would say the fact that the Kuomintang wanted us to take in its officials and assist it in setting up its government was a commonly known fact. It was referred to and stated by Chinese officials themselves that they expected to reassert their authority as we captured Chinese territory.

Q. Now, it is also said that in the course of this discussion you cautioned Mr. Jaffe that what you said about the military plans was very secret. Can you recall saying that, or what it could have applied to? What there was about such a discussion that was very secret?—A. No, sir; I can't remember. I would question very much whether I used the word "plan" but I certainly would have been—I was hypersensitive, very sensitive. I wouldn't say hypersensitive, but I was very sensitive about talking about things that were outside of my own strict province. If I said to him that the thinking of headquarters at present, or as far as I know, is that we should cooperate with whatever forces are on the spot, I was, as I said a little while ago, indiscreet and it would be inappropriate for Mr. Jaffe to print or for me to allow him to print that information which I had given him for background news. And I would certainly have cautioned him against using in his publication such a statement by me that the thinking of the Chungking headquarters was that we should cooperate with whatever forces are on the ground. That information should come from some source other than me.

Q. And that would be the meaning of saying that the information was secret? In other words, it was given in secrecy?—A. Yes. In confidence, yes.

Q. I understand from your testimony today and previously that you were not in possession of any document classified as secret which contained this information?—A. That is correct, I was not in possession of any such documents.

Q. Nor had you seen such a document?—A. As far as I can remember, sir, I had not seen any. I may have, in this discussion which I have a vague recollection of having with the staff officer in Chungking, seen the draft on which he was working or something of that sort.

Q. But that was before it had received its classification?—A. That is correct, sir.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. In your capacity as political adviser on General Wedemeyer's staff, to what extent was your advice sought in connection with military planning, on the political aspect of the military planning?—A. I would like to object, Mr. Achilles, to the words "political adviser" because I never had that title officially. That is a title that has grown up. I was a Foreign Service officer attached to General Wedemeyer's staff. I can't recall any occasion, sir, that my advice was sought in that connection.

Q. Wasn't that your function, though, to serve as political adviser?—A. Well, no; because I cannot remember any occasion on which my advice was sought in connection with military planning. In fact there were very few occasions when my advice specifically was sought. I was used quite often—particularly under General Stilwell, of course I was working for General Wedemeyer for a very short period, only a few weeks. I was actually in Chungking with General Wedemeyer only for a few weeks. I was quite often used as what you might call a consultant to agencies such as OSS which might have certain projects in mind, certain plans for intelligence collection, and they might talk to me about the problems they might meet, the feasibility of what they were doing, what would be the probable relations between this war area commander and the Chungking Chinese military headquarters, whether or not they would be able to work independently as they hoped to be able to do in such-and-such an area without too rigid control by the Central Chinese Secret Police Organization and things like that. But on military planning in a real sense I was never a participant.

Q. Your advice was not specifically sought on the political aspects of certain military plans?—A. No, sir. I was used by General Wedemeyer for the drafting of some correspondence and a few telegrams on semipolitical matters. We had some problems in relation to the various French organizations that were trying to work in Indochina. There was a Free French organization and there was a French group in Indochina that claimed to be opposing the Japanese and it was a question of American policy toward Indochina. I functioned on some of those matters as a political adviser, the liaison between headquarters and the Embassy.

I acted as an adviser on several occasions for General Stilwell but they were matters on which my specialized knowledge of China was useful. For instance, if you have read the memoranda which we have accumulated you will notice a series of them concerning problems connected with the building of very large air bases in the Chengtu. I was sent up there by General Stilwell's headquarters because there were some riots, there was a good deal of anti-American feeling, there were a lot of problems concerned with the sudden influx of several thousands, I remember over 10,000 Americans, and I was sent up there as political officer to look over the situation and recommend what they might do.

The headquarters was also asked, for instance, by the Chinese to send military observers to the Sinkiang Province because of a rumored border incident between Sinkiang and Mongolia. And there is also a series of memoranda which I wrote on that recommending that we do not send American military observers, to avoid getting ourselves embroiled in that incident.

But the occasions on which I was adviser were very, very few and they were these sort of things where I had particular specialized knowledge. I was never a party to, nor ever a consultant, or never asked to advise on, strictly military plans.

Q. You did not participate in any way in the drafting of military plans?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you consulted on the political aspects of this particular problem; viz, as to whom we should cooperate with when we landed, or whether we should take in Kuomintang officials with our forces wherever we landed?—A. I do not remember that we—either I or the other Foreign Service officers—were specifically consulted. As I think I have testified before, Mr. Ludden and I were in Chungking in February 1945 and we ourselves felt that there was danger in our becoming too limited in our choice of action; that our hands were being tied; and we went on our own initiative to General Wedemeyer and talked to him about the situation. And he said in general that he agreed with us and that he would like to have us list some of the factors involved. Mr. Ludden and I then drew up on one page here [indicating] the reasons why we thought the American military commander in the theater required freedom of action. We classified those reasons in a second group and these are—

Q. Pardon me, is that document 204?—A. No, 203. The second category of reasons is "to plan to supply and cooperate with whatever Chinese forces we met, wherever and whenever we land on the mainland." Now, this was, as I say, a list of the reasons which we submitted after discussion with General Wedemeyer, which we did on our own initiative.

Q. To what extent were the plans, say for landings in China, the responsibility of headquarters in Chungking?—A. I have no knowledge, sir. I'm sorry, I don't know. I have never known definitely whether we planned to land, where or when. And I don't know whether the decision was one for Chungking or one for Washington. I assume that it would be one for Washington. Certainly the landing would have to come from the Pacific and, therefore, it would involve the Pacific theaters. It would not, I should imagine, be one for Chungking headquarters to make alone. It would involve in a way a union or a fusion of General MacArthur's theater with the China theater, I suppose. I don't know.

Q. You personally had knowledge that the question of landings in China was under active consideration. I think that was general knowledge; was it not?—A. It was general assumption through public statements which had been made by numerous people. That is, basic assumption of the whole war period and of our presence in China.

Q. You also had personal knowledge that the Kuomintang was recommending that we take in their officials wherever we landed. That was also general knowledge?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You just stated that you and Mr. Ludden had made these recommendations—that we should cooperate with whatever forces there were.—A. That is correct.

Q. Have you any further personal knowledge?—A. I said that we should be free to cooperate.

Q. Had you any further personal knowledge as to the nature of the plans which were being prepared in this respect?—A. I do not recall that I had any specific knowledge; no, sir. Well, I have referred already to a vague recollection of discussion with one or more staff officers.

Q. Do you recall any more specific information concerning the plans which he may have conveyed to you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Whatever you may have told Jaffe on this subject was along the lines of what you have just discussed?—A. I believe so, sir, but I have no definite specific knowledge or recollection of the conversation.

Q. To the best of your recollection you had no further specific knowledge as to the nature of these military plans?—A. That is the best of my recollection, sir.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. On this problem of political adviser, I take it from your previous testimony that you would probably classify yourself as a political observer and reporter with such advice as was sought, or such advice as you sought to give, or very largely along those lines. If I recall your earlier testimony correctly, no more than one or two of the reports that you wrote were specifically requested of you by anyone; is that right?—A. That is correct. I would say there are two or three short series of reports on specific local problems—that is what you would call them.

Q. I have in mind such documents as your memorandum No. 40 and the one that you and Mr. Ludden prepared. Now, I take it that your memorandum No. 40 was not one that was sought.—A. Absolutely not, sir; it was completely voluntary, as most of my reporting was, and an expression of my own personal views of a particular aspect of the situation.

Q. And the principal one that you could say was—at least where you were asked to put your remarks on paper—was the memorandum referred to in your numbering system as 203?—A. Yes, and 204. General Wedemeyer suggested that we put our views in more complete form.

Q. Did you have any knowledge after those two documents were prepared for General Wedemeyer whether he agreed with them or did not agree with them or what use he intended to make of them?—A. No, sir; although in conversations with us he gave me the impression that, as military commander, he in general agreed with our belief that his hands should not be tied and that for the sake of the prosecution of the war he should be free to use whatever forces or take whatever actions he thought necessary for a more effective attack on Japan.

Q. But the details of your reports, you have no idea whether he specifically concurred with your statements and your summary of the situation?—A. No, sir; I did not. May I bring in another example of the sort of thing that I did from time to time. It's as what you might call a political adviser. Our document No. 154 which is dispatch No. 2636, dated May 31, 1944, from the Embassy, Chungking, to the Department of State.

Q. Mr. Service, what is the subject?—A. The subject is Complaint of French Delegation Against American Intelligence Services in Connection With Alleged Agreement Between the Chinese and Indochinese [Vichy French] Authorities, that has some enclosures of various correspondence between the Army headquarters and the Embassy, between the Embassy and the Free French representative in Chungking, and a memorandum of a conversation between Colonel Dickey, who was G-2 of the headquarters, and Mr. Clarac, who was the counselor of the French delegation.

Now, I was instructed to accompany Colonel Dickey during that meeting and to advise him in his conversations with the French representatives, I being familiar with the American policy and having consulted with the Embassy, and so on. I assisted from time to time in that way as an adviser but there are various other ways, also, minor ways, in which as a diplomatic officer or as one who had intimate background and knowledge of China, I was an adviser on particular local problems. But I was never an adviser on high-level military planning.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Now, Mr. Service, I want to turn to another occasion. This has reference to a meeting between you and Mr. Jaffe on May 29, 1945. On this occasion it is stated that Mr. Jaffe informed you that Kate Mitchell was writing a book for which the publisher had suggested the title "China Without Confucius." It is stated that you told Mr. Jaffe that you yourself had written a report on the setting up of the Confucian Society in China and that you asked Mr. Jaffe if he had ever seen this report of yours. Do you remember such a conversation, Mr. Service?—A. I remember such a conversation; yes, sir.

Q. What report would that be? Is that one of your reports that we have before this board?—A. No, sir; because it would have been a report, I assume, written while I was in the Embassy attached directly to the Embassy. It would have been a dispatch for the Ambassador's signature, of which—of course, as I have testified before—I never retained any copies. I believe that that Confucian Society was established in 1941 or early 1942. And we made no effort to have the State Department assemble all of those early dispatches which I drafted for the Ambassador's signature while I was in the Embassy.

Q. Why would you have assumed that Jaffe would have seen such a report?—A. Perhaps I didn't hear your question.

Q. I said that, at the end of my question, you asked Mr. Jaffe if he ever saw your report on the matter.—A. I'm sorry; I didn't hear that.

Q. Why would you have asked him that question if, as a matter of fact, the report was one which you yourself had never seen which was made by the Ambassador?—A. Well, of course I had seen it since I drafted it, but I don't remember asking Mr. Jaffe whether or not he had seen it. I don't understand that statement.

Q. Did you have any basis for assuming that Jaffe had seen any of your reports previous to the time of your meeting?—A. Yes, I had some basis to believe that some types of material were being made available; the information in some types of reports were being made available to writers here. I mentioned earlier the fact that it seemed to me that Mr. Gayn had certainly had a chance to read my memorandum of June 20, since there was similarity between his article in Collier's and some of the things that had been said in that report.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Service, did you at that time have any knowledge of the fact that Mr. Jaffe had in his possession United States Government documents?

A. No, sir; I did not. I'm not sure whether I made myself clear. My feeling, my assumption, was that a good deal of background information was being made known to writers generally. I had no reason to assume or believe that Jaffe had any copies of any documents.

Q. Or any more information than was being made generally available to other writers?—A. That is correct; yes. A great deal of the writing on China by magazine writers and other people in the United States had to be and was obviously based on information which they could not obtain directly since they were not in China, which I assume was made available to them in one form or another as was the policy at that time.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Hadn't Jaffe told you on at least one occasion that he had obtained a copy of one of your reports and given it to Gayn?—A. I can't recall any such statement at the moment. Can you give me more information on it, sir?

Q. I believe it was the report which had been prepared in connection with Mr. Wallace's visit to China and Mr. Jaffe is stated to have told you that the report had been passed around at the Institute of Pacific Relations conference and that he had obtained a copy of it and had given it to Gayn. Do you recall him ever telling you that?—A. I think that may be true. I do have a hazy recollection now of my surprise that this thing had been passed around and I think you're right, sir, that I did hear that it had been passed around at the IPR Conference which I think was held down at White Sulphur Springs, or some place like that. I'm not sure, but I had forgotten all about that, but I think I did hear that this report had been passed around.

The CHAIRMAN. To go on with this statement, it is stated that Mr. Jaffe told you that he had not seen the report and that you told him that, because of your work in writing that report on the Confucian Society, you had gotten an excellent rating from the State Department and that, as a matter of fact, in that work you had made a collection of about 300 slogans used by the society and that you told Mr. Jaffe you would try to dig up the report for him?

A. I think there is a very great condensation and telescoping here. This concerns two entirely separate reports. The report on the Confucian Society, as I recall it—and as I say I haven't seen it since it was drafted back in 1941 or early 1942—was quite a routine report from public sources. The Confucian Society was inaugurated with great publicity and the patrons were H. H. Kung, who was a lineal descendant of Confucius, and Chen Li-Fu, Minister of Education, and a number of other important figures in the Government. And, as I remember, I simply transmitted the published accounts and some of the published material about the objectives and purposes of the organization and made some brief comment.

Q. Was that a classified dispatch?—A. I don't recall.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You said you didn't see the dispatch?—A. No; I drafted the dispatch, sir, but I had no copy of it.

Q. Would you have known whether or not it was classified?—A. Yes. In 1941 and 1942 I was an officer in the Embassy, and was simply drafting it as the political reporting officer. I would have to look up the matter, whether we wrote one unclassified dispatch simply sending in the public material and then wrote another dispatch commenting on it or whether we simply wrote one dispatch with both public information and comment. In any case, as I remember the comment very vaguely, it would not be very highly classified.

Mr. STEVENS. This was in 1941 or 1942?

A. Yes; I think so. Now, the other report, which is apparently referred to here, was a dispatch which I wrote from Lanchow when I was an Embassy observer up there in the summer of 1943. It would be probably June or July 1943. That is a dispatch which, as I say, consisted really of a compilation of these propaganda slogans with some comment on them. The dispatch which I wrote earlier on the Confucian Society was not one I received any commendation on. The one I received the commendation on was the one on wall slogans. This may be an unintelligible phrase.

Newspapers are scarce in China. Movies, radio, other media of propaganda don't reach very many people so that one very common propaganda media is to paint these very large slogans, these large characters, on walls of a building or the wall along a street, or particularly facing a Chinese gateway there is always a wall. The superstition is that evil spirits can only go in a straight line so that opposite any important entrance there is a sort of spirit screen, so that you have to go around the wall to go into the gate and these walls or screens are favorite places for painting a four-character slogan.

I had in my travels all through North China in 1942 and again in 1943 made a practice of jotting down these various slogans, of noting the relative frequency of different slogans, or noting as far as I could the date on which they were painted, because usually down below them there would be in small writing the name of the organization which put it up and the date. So that I was able to trace, I think with some accuracy, the trend of the propaganda line and to note the various organizations which were active in painting the slogans and to some extent the different lines adopted by the different propaganda organizations. As I say, this was a report which I sent in from Lanchow, which was transmitted to the Department by the Embassy and on which I received the rating of excellent. But it is an entirely different one from the one that this material starts talking about.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was it a classified report?—A. I do not remember, sir. It may have been classified "confidential" or "restricted" because of my comments on the propaganda lines indicated there.

Q. It is stated that you told Mr. Jaffe that it might be sort of hard for you to get this report because it was kept in a section where you were not assigned and where you did not work and that Mr. Jaffe asked you, if you were successful in obtaining the material, to mail it to him in New York or whether you would rather wait until he came to Washington in 2 or 3 weeks and you told Mr. Jaffe, if you could dig up a copy of it, it would be the Far Eastern Division copy and they might not be willing to part with it. But you were sure you would be able to run off a copy for him?—A. I must say that that is very different from my recollection of the conversation. I remember the conversation because I was quite annoyed at Mr. Jaffe and I went into considerable detail to explain to him first why I did not have any copy of my own, any personal copies of these dispatches.

He thought that I would of course have a personal copy. And I explained in considerable detail, as I recall, the difference between an Embassy dispatch which was signed by the Ambassador and the type of memoranda which I had had in my possession, as he knew and which I had allowed him to see some of. I also went into considerable detail why I could not turn them over to him, why I could not remove these from the files and turn them over to him.

My recollection is that I said that I would try to look the dispatch up if I could find it. I pointed out, as I remember it, that that might be difficult because the files in the China Division were quite chaotic and this was a very old dispatch. My recollection is that I told him I would try to look it up and give him the dates of the events, the establishment of the Confucian Society, so that he would have some guide in searching through published materials. It's quite possible that I may also have said that if I found that it was not classified and the Division of Chinese Affairs was willing that it might have been possible for him to see it. But I don't recollect saying that at all.

My chief recollection of the conversation is that my explanation—I remember a rather lengthy explanation as to the difference in character between the Embassy dispatch and the papers I had shown him and the reason why I could not give him copies of the Embassy dispatches. I certainly have no recollection of ever offering to run off a copy for him. I may have said I would copy some of these wall slogans. I told him some wall slogans from memory. I may have said that I would try to copy off some of the more common wall slogans.

Q. Your recollection is in part confirmed by the final statement on this subject that Mr. Jaffe said that it was funny that you did not keep a copy of the report since you had written it and that you said that it was against regulations to keep copies of your reports.—A. I remember considerable discussion and quite a bit of annoyance on my part. This was the first time I think that he ever asked me to obtain copies for him of dispatches.

Q. Now to turn to another subject on the discussion on the same occasion it is stated that you and Mr. Jaffe talked about the "lowdown" on the Hurley story and that Mr. Jaffe told you that Ambassador Gauss told Randall Gould that Gauss resigned because Hurley broke his pledge to Britain by "monkeying" with politics in China.

Mr. RHETTS. Will you read that again, please?

Q. This is a statement that Jaffe is alleged to have told Mr. Service, that Ambassador Gauss had told one Randall Gould that Mr. Gauss had resigned because Mr. Hurley broke his pledge to Britain by "monkeying" around with politics in China and that Mr. Gauss and Mr. Gould never got along well and discussed the possibility of Mr. Gauss giving Mr. Gould some wrong "dope" and that General Stilwell was down in the Pacific and Mr. Jaffe asked you if this were true or whether you could verify the information.

Now I give you all that as background for the statement that you're alleged to have made, which was that it was heard confidentially but "you weren't supposed to talk about it." Thereupon, Mr. Jaffe stated that Gauss had told this fact to an OSS man and that the OSS man had told it to Gayn. Whereupon it is alleged that you told Mr. Jaffe that, so far as you knew, the whereabouts of General Stilwell was very confidential. Mr. Jaffe is alleged then to have stated that whether or not General Stilwell was in the Pacific would be known shortly, would be known on Saturday night, because he was due to speak at some gathering and later to have a meeting with General MacArthur. It is then alleged that you said, "That is how top secrets get out."

Now will you explain what you said on that occasion? Can you recollect any such discussion and can you state what you said?

To review the several statements in the course of this conversation you are supposed to have made, they are in substance: (1) that the fact that Stilwell was down in the Pacific was heard confidentially but you weren't supposed to talk about it; (2) that the whereabouts of General Stilwell was very confidential; and (3) that if it got out, as Jaffe had stated, "that is how top secrets get out." Those are the statements you are alleged to have made. Perhaps you might explain what information, if any, you had about the whereabouts of Stilwell and what you may have said or can recollect having said on the subject.

A. Well, I don't recall this conversation. I think I have already testified that, since it is all a mystery to me, perhaps if we had the complete text—but it seems to me that, if this is a correct and complete text, I was being very discreet. I don't have any recollection of hearing of this alleged conversation or conversations between Gauss, Gould as relayed to Gayn and as repeated to Jaffe. Nor do I remember anything about this conversation, or hearing anything about this conversation of the OSS men and Gayn. It seems to me I avoided saying anything definitely about the whereabouts of General Stilwell except that people were saying he is in the Pacific. But the whereabouts of high officers during wartime is a secret.

Q. Did you, as a matter of fact, know where he was, Mr. Service?—A. I knew that he was going out to the Pacific. I don't know when or where. I knew it first from General Stilwell himself. I think that he was planning to go. I was seeing his associates all the time. Now, this business of Saturday night confuses me except that he was expected to speak to a meeting in New York and the reference to that may simply have been that if he is unable to appear on Saturday night why it would be obvious that he is away some place.

Q. That was, of course, the remark that Jaffe was supposed to have said.—A. But my statement of this, "that is how top secrets get out," I suppose was referring to all the various rumors and statements by OSS people and Randall Gould and so on and so on.

Q. Who was Randall Gould?—A. Randall Gould had been for many years the editor of the Shanghai Evening Post and Mercury, a newspaper published in Shanghai by C. V. Starr. During the war he was in the United States. He wrote a book on China. And then later he went to Chungking and set up the Chungking edition of the Shanghai Evening Post and Mercury which came out weekly for a while in Chungking. After the war he returned to Shanghai and was finally, I think, forced to close down publication after the Communists occupied Shanghai and imprisoned him in his offices and that caused a great deal of trouble for him.

Mr. ACHILLES. Do you recall whether on that same occasion you again discussed the possibility of American landings in China and the location of those landings?

A. I have no recollection, sir, but it's quite possible that in a speculative way there might have been some such discussion. I think by this time we were finding probably in the middle of the Okinawa campaign that there was general speculation that any landing, if we made one, would be further north in China than it might have been at an earlier stage of the war. If we held Okinawa it might seem more logical to any armchair strategist to hit straight across in North China.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you recall any?

A. No sir, I have no such recollection.

Q. I should complete my statement of this alleged conversation you are supposed to have had with Jaffe by saying it is stated that Mr. Jaffe asked you whether you thought that the United States would land on the shores of China, and that you told him, "I don't believe it has been decided. I can tell you in a couple of weeks when Stilwell gets back. I rather think we will." It is then stated that Mr. Jaffe remarked that, if we did land in China, it would probably be in Shanghai and that then we would accept aid from anybody, Communist or non-Communist.—A. This is Mr. Jaffe?

Q. Yes; and you agreed with Mr. Jaffe that that was correct.—A. I don't remember making any such statement and I don't see how I could have made a statement like that, that "I can tell you in a few weeks when General Stilwell gets back," because that assumes in the first place that General Stilwell was going to tell me what his plans were and General Stilwell never confided in me. He confided in very few people.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you know whether General Stilwell was going to get back in 2 or 3 weeks?

A. No, sir; I don't recall that I did know it. As a matter of fact, he didn't come back. He stayed out there. That statement is rather incomprehensible.

Mr. ACHILLES. That statement carries the implication that you were offering voluntary information as to the whereabouts of General Stilwell, which is obviously a serious implication.

A. It's just incomprehensible to me. I don't have any such recollection of such statements and I don't see how I could be in any position to promise, since I never received any information on high military plans from General Stilwell ever.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you said a minute ago that General Stilwell had told you something; what was it?

A. Well, I saw General Stilwell some time in that spring after I came back. And he said that he wanted to go out in the Pacific and get himself a job.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, that is what you referred to.

A. He wanted to get a fighting job. He didn't want to be sitting in a desk here in Washington. But that is the sum total of what I remember that General Stilwell told me.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. Had you discussed any military plans, anything of that nature, with General Stilwell?—A. No, sir.

Q. At that time did you not know where General Stilwell was?—A. My recollection is that all I knew was that he was going out in the Pacific. Of course he was going to see General MacArthur, wherever General MacArthur was. That could be assumed. I don't know that I had any specific knowledge as to where he was at any particular time.

Q. So far as you know, all that General Stilwell was doing was looking for a fighting job?—A. That is correct, sir.

Mr. RUIETTS. I wonder if the Board can tell me what this purports to be. Does this purport to be an account given by Mr. Jaffe? Does this purport to be a recording of a conversation made by some mechanical device? Does it purport to be the notes made by some person listening to the conversation? Is there any way that the Board can enlighten us at all on that? My reason for asking the Board this question is this: Of course Mr. Service was questioned earlier in these proceedings on this same general subject matter. He has been questioned again in these vague terms within the past 2 days before the subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and it is obviously of the greatest importance to ascertain precisely what source, what reportorial source, the Board has available to it. Because it seems to me I think anyone who has any dealings with these matters will recognize that an actual recording of a conversation is one thing. Notes taken by a person listening with earphones and a person who may or may not be familiar with the subject matter of the discussion is another thing. And a summary prepared by another person, someone who had no knowledge of the matter is still a third and different thing.

The material which General Snow has been referring to here so obviously suggests condensations, epitomizations, and the like, which makes it, it seems to me, extremely important that we try to ascertain the exact source of the material which the Board is using.

The CHAIRMAN. I'll say for the record that the Board has only the reports of the FBI on which to rely. We do not have the exact texts of these supposed statements. The source, as far as the Board is free to reveal, is a confidential source from the FBI. We have nothing further. It is a source which is unavailable for appearance before the Board. According to the public press in yesterday's hearing the actual source of these statements is a recording. As to the facts, the Board is unable to make a statement.

Mr. RUIETTS. In that connection, if I might comment, I too am aware of the report in the public press. On the other hand, I'm still not enlightened as to whether it is an actual recording or whether it is notes purported to have been made by someone who was listening or whether they are stenographic transcripts or what.

The CHAIRMAN. The reports of the FBI do not advise the Board on that subject.

Mr. SERVICE. It seems to me that even if there is a recording we still have the question of the completeness and clarity and the perfection of those recordings because in a conversation which I'm alleged to have had on May 19—

The CHAIRMAN. May 29.

Mr. SERVICE. May 29; yes, sir. It would appear that they have exactly reversed the intent of what I seem to recall saying possibly by the omission of a few words or failing to catch a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Board is unable to give you any further enlightenment on the subject.

Mr. ACHILLES. To return to the specific statements that you are supposed to have made to Mr. Jaffe, Mr. Service, that you did not believe it is decided whether we would land on the shores of China but that you would be able to tell him in a couple of weeks when General Stilwell got back, would you have told Mr. Jaffe such information had you known it, as to whether or not the United States would in fact in future land on the shores of China?

A. It all depends. I mean—I'm trying to just speculate as to what was in my own mind if I made such a statement, which I don't recall making.

Mr. ACHILLES. Would you please read the question again.

(Whereupon the reporter reread the previous question.)

A. No; I would not have told him if they were secret plans. I would not have told him any secret war plans. The reason I was trying to speculate what was in the back of my mind was that I understood that the whole subject was under discussion and that if there had been a large open build-up for a landing such as, shall we say, on the Normandy coast—and that was no secret about the fact that we were going to land in Europe—I believe that what I was thinking was that after General Stilwell came back that it would probably become obvious, because presumably he wanted to be in command of a preparation for a large-scale operation, whether or not we were preparing to build up for an operation on the mainland. That is the only basis I can think of that I would have been able to tell anyone whether or not—

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. This is pure speculation?—A. This is pure speculation. I certainly would not have told him any secret plan. I probably wouldn't have known any secret plan. If I had known any I never would have told him.

Q. If you had known that we were going to land in China would you have told him?—A. It all depends on the circumstances. That is, what I'm trying to say, I would not have told him anything which was not well known. But there was no secret that we were going to land on Sicily long before we did. There was no secret that we were going to land in Italy. There was no secret that we were going to land somewhere on the coast of France. That is the only basis on which I can think that I would have any way of knowing or telling anyone.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES:

Q. As I recall, those cases of where we were going to land was a matter of vital secrecy.—A. Where, yes, but am I not purported to have said that I simply would not be able to tell him whether we were going to land in China?

Q. That is correct.—A. And Jaffe goes on to speculate that it would be in the vicinity of Shanghai, I don't know where.

Q. Mr. Jaffe is purported to have said if we did land in China it would probably be in Shanghai and that then we would accept aid from anybody, Communist or non-Communist. And you are said to have agreed that that was correct. It does not indicate which of Mr. Jaffe's statements you agreed was correct. It could be either the landing in Shanghai or if we did land in Shanghai we would accept aid from anybody there.—A. If I remember, I mentioned earlier it was General Stilwell's hope—I think I used the word "dream" before—that he would have the chance to be in command of a landing operation in China. It was his private hope that he would be able to march back to Peiping, and so on. And I may have assumed that after his return there would be public indication of, as I say, a build-up for a large-scale landing. But that is just pure speculation. I think that I ought to make that clear.

I think I ought to make it clear to the Board that I would never have known any of the secret plans, never did know them, and never would have revealed them to Mr. Jaffe or anyone else, that the only conceivable basis for this statement was that possibly within a few weeks—since the progress of the war was rapid at that time—that it would become obvious whether or not we were preparing to mount a large-scale-offensive landing in China.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Service, in your experience out there or anywhere with respect to the war, was it ever common knowledge as to whether a build-up was for one area in the Pacific or another? If I recall correctly, the assembly lines were sending things out. We knew that material was going out to the west coast, as far as the United States was concerned, but I don't think it was common knowledge in the United States as to where any material was going which left the west coast. And that was something that was considered rather secret here, as to whether we were going into any particular section of the Pacific. I doubt very much, if my memory serves me correctly, that that was ever common knowledge here, whether there was a build-up in China or for some other place. In your experience was it otherwise?

A. I have only been speculating here, sir, because I have no positive recollection.

Questions by the CHAIRMAN:

Q. As a matter of fact, you were also speculating, weren't you, when you referred to the common knowledge of the landing in Sicily? As a matter of fact, that never was common knowledge. Sicily is a small place. If it had been common knowledge that we were going to land in Sicily the landing place would have been pretty well known.—A. Well, I was speculating.

Q. You weren't here and didn't know whether it was or was not common knowledge, did you?

A. My recollection of the chain of events at that time was that we knocked out Pantelleris and did other actions, bombing preparations, and so on, which pointed toward the occupation of Sicily before we went on to attempt an occupation in Italy. It was generally assumed, I imagine, that it would be dangerous for us to attack Italy directly without first taking Sicily.

Questions by Mr. STEVENS:

Q. I think if you look back, Mr. Service, none of this, as far as the United States was concerned, was common knowledge at any time until after the matter was an accomplished fact. I think that is true with regard to the build-up that took effect in the United Kingdom with regard to North Africa, if I'm right. All of it, there was a speculation in the United States, but there was never any common knowledge as to whether it was likely to be in a theater of war. I'd just like for you to search back and see if in any of your visits to the United States, of which there were not many, you could get anything which you would have considered common knowledge of an act before that act occurred. Certainly in my memory, being in Washington all during the war, I cannot recall any such thing.

A. I'm not sure that I understand your question, Mr. Stevens.

Q. I'm not just sure that in your speculation you used the word "common knowledge" advisedly, Mr. Service.—A. Common knowledge?

Q. Yes.—A. Common assumption, perhaps.

Q. It is necessary for the Board to get that clarified a bit. If you speculated about Sicily and Normandy and others—A. I should have limited it to Normandy, I suppose. I should have included the whole coast of France.

Q. Was there any common knowledge as to what the plans of General MacArthur and the people—Admiral Nimitz and others—where we were going to strike next?—A. Well, we get into a problem of what point. Certainly I would say that our maneuvers toward the Philippines indicated at a very early point our intention to recapture the Philippines.

Mr. ACHILLES. On the occasion of one of your conversations with Jaffe, I believe you discussed with him a report which you and a Mr. Adler worked on jointly. Who was Mr. Adler?

A. Mr. Adler was the United States Treasury attaché in Chungking from about 1942 through to the end of the war. I believe he remained Treasury attaché until 1946 or '47. I'm not sure just when he came back to the United States. He was also the American member of the Chinese Stabilization Board.

Q. I believe you testified you lived with him.—A. I lived with him for a period in Chungking, I believe for about a year. That was chiefly because living in Army officer's quarters had been very hampering to my work which involved a great deal of contact with the Chinese. I could not entertain Chinese in the Army mess. There was no sitting room or other place available where I could meet people and talk with them. Mr. Adler had an apartment, had an extra room, which he offered to me, so I shared his apartment with him.

Q. Do you have any particular impression as to his political views at that time?—A. Well, it's very hard to describe the word "Liberal." I would say he is a liberal. I had no indication or ever any reason to believe he was a Communist or even close to a Communist.

Q. That follows now as well as then?—A. Yes, sir.

Questions by Mr. ACHILLES.

Q. You did know him, I assume, quite well, having lived with him for a year?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In the nature of your duties and his duties, did you and he have occasion to collaborate in preparing reports on more than this one particular occasion?

Mr. RHETTS. On what particular occasion are we referring to now, sir?

Q. This was a report prepared in connection with Mr. Wallace's visit to China, which I believe Mr. Service stated he and Mr. Adler worked on together.—A. Mr. Adler was a very active person and lived in the city away from the Embassy. He spent a great deal of his time with the Chinese and particularly with Chinese people in financial and economic fields, bankers, government officials, in those fields. And he developed an unusually broad circle of Chinese contacts along those lines.

I also developed an unusually broad circle of contacts, an entirely different one, among entirely different ones, among entirely different groups, so that we had very little overlapping. But between the two of us we—how shall I say—we covered a good deal of ground. So that we, living together, seeing each other usually in the latter part of every evening, talked to each other, exchanged views, news, and we did, I think you might say, work together continually. Certainly the news which he obtained from me entered in a way into his reports and the information which I got from him was at times invaluable to me in broadening my own knowledge and perspective of what was going on.

Mr. Adler was, as I say, in an independent position. He had weekly or monthly reports for the Treasury and occasionally if negotiations were going on he had more frequent reporting in connection with those negotiations. Similarly I had only a limited number of required duties. Both of us spent a good deal of time picking up information, doing some voluntary reporting. A great deal of his information went through conversations, and so on, to the Embassy. Mine also, of course, went to the Embassy eventually.

But on our own initiative we did undertake what you might call several projects. One of them was this memorandum, which is our Document 157, which as I have said was written shortly before Mr. Wallace's visit—Vice President Wallace's visit. I did most of the initial drafting and then I would go over it with him and he would suggest some changes. Perhaps he would work over a draft and then I would rework it, and so on, so that both of us made some contributions.

Now, another independent voluntary enterprise that we undertook was the translation and summarization and comment on the Generalissimo's book of the Chinese economic theory. We introduced that into the proceedings here a few days ago. I have forgotten the B number.

Q. Adler was at that time recognized, was he not, as probably the best informed person on the Chinese economic situation?—A. I believe he certainly was, sir. He was extremely well informed. And he was the only man we had in Chungking who was well informed on Chinese finance and economics. He was invaluable to the Embassy and he assisted the Embassy a great deal. He was in the closest, most intimate contact with the Chinese economic figures from H. H. Kung on down.

Q. Turning to a different matter, some days ago I remember questioning you concerning your discussion with Jaffe of April 20, 1945; as I recall you stated that you had arrived at Mr. Jaffe's room in the Statler Hotel only shortly before luncheon and that I advised you according to the FBI you were reported to have gone to Mr. Jaffe's room at the Statler Hotel at about 9:30 o'clock that morning, that you were unable to recollect having done so or having gone there earlier than shortly before lunch. I wonder in the meantime if you had a chance to recollect anything further about that morning? Where you might have spent the morning?—A. I'm still unable to recollect, sir, having spent any long time in conversation with Mr. Jaffe on that morning. And, therefore, I'm still of the belief that my hypothesis was correct that I may have taken these memoranda to his hotel in the early forenoon, perhaps at the time 9:30, which has been mentioned, and that I left them with him. I left the hotel and returned there shortly before lunch, expecting to have them returned to me. There is one recollection—it's a vague recollection—which may relate to that day.

Q. What is that recollection?—A. That is that I believe at some time in my early association with Mr. Jaffe this book of the generalissimo's on the Chinese economic theory was mentioned and that he said that he had not seen it and that I took to him, among the papers, memoranda and so on, a translation of the book and this summary and comment and that Jaffe was interested and asked me if he could make some use of the material. I told him that he could not, meaning he could not use the summary and analysis which had been prepared in the major part by Mr. Adler, which I had no authority to allow him to use.

Q. The point is of some interest because it is the only point, as I recall, at which the statements you have made—both to the FBI in 1945 and to the board—differ from information furnished by the FBI. But I take it that your best recollection is still that you did not spend that morning in Mr. Jaffe's room at the Statler Hotel?—A. That is correct. Might I suggest, sir, if in fact I did remain the whole morning in conversation with Mr. Jaffe, which I have no recollection of doing, there should be substantial evidence of the fact since Mr. Jaffe was under such close surveillance. And if there is such evidence I would appreciate having it made known to me.

Q. We have no such evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. I'd like to ask you, Mr. Service, if you care to give us a comprehensive statement of your attitude with reference to communism as a dogma with application to the United States. Are you a Communist or do you believe in the Communist theory of government and social and economic order or not? Or do you believe in what we call the capitalist system? I don't know that you have given us anywhere in your statement a comprehensive statement of your personal beliefs on that.

The board would like a short recess.

(Whereupon the board recessed at 12 noon and reconvened at 12:05 p. m.)

Mr. RHETT. I'd like to make a preliminary statement. When Mr. Kennan testified here on May 29, 1950, in the afternoon session, the board may recall that at the conclusion of his testimony he submitted to the board the notes he had made on the various reports. The board will also recall that while most of these papers consisted of actual reports written by Mr. Service there were a few memoranda included in this group which constituted memoranda made by other agencies concerning interviews with Mr. Service.

One of these reports, which is our Document No. 200, is a memorandum dated November 8, 1944, and entitled "Interview with John Service" and under that "Japanese Communists." This memorandum is a memorandum of notes of an interview held with Mr. Service evidently at the offices of the Research and Analysis Branch of OSS. In the course of this memorandum or notes is stated at the top of page 2 in connection with the discussion of the extent of contact with the Japanese Communists have with the outside world—this is the Japanese Communists who were then in Yen-an—"Material cannot be sent through Russia, although they undoubtedly have contact with a Russian station. Actually, they can get no information out except by radio, although Service mentioned that he himself had helped in carrying information. Material going out of Yen-an is heavily censored by the Chinese."

Now, amongst the notes which Mr. Kennan prepared on these documents we have noted two references to this particular statement which I have just read from Document 200. Mr. Kennan's notes on this appear on page 15 of his notes which are attached to the transcript for the afternoon session, May 29, 1950. In view of the implications of that statement, it seemed desirable for us to attempt to clarify it.

The CHAIRMAN. What did Mr. Kennan say about it?

Mr. RHETTS. Mr. Kennan merely noted with respect to this Document No. 200. His notes are as follows:

"Interrogation of Service while on consultation in Washington. Views on Japanese Communists. Appears to be purely factual information. Service states that he himself helped carry information for Japanese Communists, apparently out of Yen-an to Chungking for relay elsewhere. No elaboration."

Now, it is in connection with this matter that I would like to interrogate Mr. Fisher briefly and then Mr. Service again.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead.

Thereupon Mr. Francis McCracken Fisher, being produced, sworn and examined as a witness for and in behalf of Mr. John Stewart Service, testified as follows:

Questions by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Will you please state your full name for the record?—A. Francis McCracken Fisher.

Q. And your address?—A. 2313 South June Street, Arlington.

Q. What is your present position, sir?—A. A student at the National War College, detailed from the State Department.

Q. Were you in China during the period approximately of July to October 1944, Mr. Fisher?—A. Continuously.

Q. What was your position there at that time?—A. The head of the Office of War Information activities throughout China. Might I add to that, I had been told unofficially by General Stilwell soon after he arrived there that he wanted me to be in charge or at least pass on all matters of psychological warfare against the Japanese.

Q. So that you were particularly concerned with that range of matters in relation to the Japs?—A. Certainly.

Q. During that period did you have occasion to visit Yen-an?—A. I was asked to do so by the commanding general. Might I add to that?

Q. Yes.—A. We had heard rumors that the Japanese and the Communists themselves were having some considerable effect in securing the surrender of Japanese prisoners. This was rather unique in 1944 and it was felt apparently worth while exploring the methods and means and so forth that they were using in their psychological approach to the Japanese. Therefore, I was instructed in my capacity that I just mentioned to go to Yen-an and contact those people I could find who were engaged in the psychological warfare against the Japanese, to study their methods as fully as possible and report thereon.

Q. During what period were you in Yen-an, sir?—A. Approximately 2 weeks, from the latter part of August to early September. I can't give you the exact dates.

Q. In 1944?—A. Yes, 1944.

Q. And did you know Mr. Service there, at that time?—A. I did.

Q. Did you have occasion to work with him in Yen-an?—A. I took occasion to, sir. May I explain that?

Q. Yes.—A. Very soon after I had talked to the various Chinese Communists, the Army people in charge of psychological warfare, they put me on to Okano, who was the head of the Japanese People's Emancipation League and was mainly the main spring or brain of the psychological-warfare effort. I had long interviews with him. On numerous occasions I had long talks with him. At one point he said that tomorrow he would be glad to tell me what the postwar Japanese Communist program was. I felt that this was something outside my particular range and should be of interest politically to the Government as a whole and suggested to Mr. Service that he sit in on that interview. That is why, on the occasion, I sought his help on a matter outside my range. But I thought it would be of importance to the United States Government.

Q. Were there also Japanese located in Chungking who were also working in the general area of attempting to convert the Japanese away from support of the Japanese war efforts?—A. There were two groups in general. They were under two Japanese. One was named Kaji Wataru and his wife. There was another group working under a man named Ao Yama. I don't recall the rest of his name. These two groups or cliques or factions had been in China for a considerable period of time. They had been working, some of them, with the Chinese Government and the Kuomintang even before the war. And they were in touch with or had been contacted, had been sought by the OSS in particular during the preceding months there in Chungking.

These two groups appeared to be somewhat ineffectual. Their activities seemed to be mostly directed toward news sheets and pamphlets. I never knew just what the circulation of them was. But some of them were in contact with the very small number of Japanese prisoners captured by the Chinese and were attempting to, under the direction of the Chinese Government, utilize these prisoners in psychological warfare in that realm.

Q. That was also one of the activities in which Mr. Okano was engaged in and around Yen-an?—A. As far as I know, principally he was engaged in that, yes.

Q. Now, do you have any knowledge whether there was any communication between Mr. Okano and his group in Yen-an and the groups in Chungking, of which you just spoke?—A. I noticed that the transcript stated that the Chinese severely censored all material going out of Yen-an—that is of course, as you know, the Chinese Government, the Kuomintang secret police, and so forth established more or less a blockade there and as a result of that there was very little communication as far as I knew between them. Occasionally some publication or some leaflet would get across and there was vague knowledge on both sides, if you want to call them sides, between the Japanese group in Chungking and the Japanese group in Yen-an. There was vague knowledge about what the other group was doing and what it was interested in.

Q. Do you know whether you or the American Government officials had any occasion or interest in attempting to permit some communication between Okano and his group from Yen-an with the other groups in Chungking?—A. I can't testify as to a specific instance but I can testify as to background. The answer in general is "yes;" that would be parallel to the general theory at that time, and I want you to mark that time, early September 1944, in uniting all elements available in fighting effectively against the Japanese. I think shortly after I came back from Yen-an General Hurley went to Yen-an with exactly, precisely the same mission.

There was interest in seeing whether increased effectiveness could be obtained in psychological warfare effort by an increase in communication between these two groups. I know that on one occasion at least—I can't testify as to the exact time, but my impression is that it was October or November of 1944—there came through the regular communications channels some sort of communication, either a statement or a letter or something, from Okano which was made available to Kaji and Aoyama in Chungking in the hopes there would be coalescence—not coalescence but it would be increased effectiveness through cooperation.

Q. Now, as I understand it, Kaji and Aoyama were working for the American forces? Or was it for the Chinese?—A. Cooperating. It's a little hard to describe the exact part—

Q. Perhaps I may make my question a little clearer. They were working in cooperation with your group which was interested in promoting the psychological warfare?—A. They were. When we would evolve a leaflet in Japanese to be dropped we would naturally seek to get the best critique from the Japanese viewpoint as was possible and we would ask them to criticize it, as we would the group in Yen-an.

And, may I add one more thing. I gathered there was perhaps a closer relationship on the part of the morale operations branch of the Office of Strategic Services in Chungking with these two groups. I don't know how effective or useful it was, but I know they sought to maintain contact with these two groups.

Q. When you referred a moment ago to your general recollection of some communication coming through the regular official channels from Okano in Yen-an to the group in Chungking, would that have been through Army channels?—A. All channels. I should describe the set-up as far as I know it, and that is that the observer mission in Yen-an transmitted documents and so forth, reports, to headquarters, to Army headquarters in Chungking. It was an Army mission there. We maintained an observer with it from time to time. But, as far as I know, all communications coming from Yen-an were screened at the input end. The chief or his designated authority in Yen-an would receive them at headquarters in Chungking—whether they were checked or not I don't know, I assume they were all checked. We got them I believe, as I recall, from the G-2 office. When some things were addressed to us they came through that channel and we picked them up through G-2. The regular practice was that everything was checked at both ends.

Q. During the period that you were either in Chungking or Yen-an, did you ever have any knowledge that any communications were being sent out by Okano other than this limited communication with the Kaji group in Chungking that you referred to?—A. Well, I should refer here to one general means of communication they had in a sense, and that was the Japanese People's Emancipation League and Okano frequently published articles and reviews and things in the Chieh Fang Jih Pao.

Mr. SERVICE. It means the Liberation Daily.

A. That was the official Communist newspaper.

Q. Where?—A. In Yen-an. And, as I recall, from time to time some of these articles were broadcast. I would have assumed that some of them would have been broadcast by the Eighth Route Army radio in their daily news through the Communist newspapers through all the liberated areas. So I assume in addition to this limited communication that we just referred to that there was a certain amount of sort of semipublic broadcast of articles and information and things from that source. I don't know if that adds anything. I don't know of any other specific direct communication, nor do I have any knowledge or suspicion that there was any, what you might term, irregular communication.

The CHAIRMAN. Surreptitious communication?

A. Surreptitious. It was not subject to the complete approval or screening of headquarters.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Fisher.

(Witness excused.)

Mr. RHETTS. Will you take the stand, Mr. Service.

Thereupon Mr. John Stewart Service, a witness previously produced and sworn in his own behalf, resumed the stand and testified further as follows:

Question by Mr. RHETTS:

Q. Can you shed any further light on this quotation from Document 200 which I have read into the record?—A. Well, I think that I'm perhaps a victim in a way of extreme condensation. This was an interview which undoubtedly lasted for 2 or 3 hours, which has been condensed into 3 pages. And I believe that what I said was something that we or the observer mission had allowed some communication with these other Japanese groups. I'm sure that there was some explanation and further on in the paper I mention Ao Yama and the other Japanese who were cooperating with us on psychological warfare work in Chungking. My recollection is that fairly soon after the arrival of the observer mission in Yen-an—that would be in July.

The CHAIRMAN. 1944?

A. Yes, 1944. There were a number of people in the group who were Japanese specialists who came in contact with Okano and had to find out as part of their work what the Japanese were doing with the prisoners and Okano asked whether or not it would be possible for him to send a letter to these other free Japanese groups in Chungking. I remember his intent was to establish some sort of consultation on the work they were doing, their objectives; I think perhaps to explore the possibility of whether or not they could more or less agree on their objectives.

We agreed—I say “we,” I mean the observer group—to allow such a letter to be sent. I remember the group I was living with—Colonel Barrett, the Commander, I remember having a translation made and carefully studied by some of our Japanese experts and we agreed to forward it through official channels over the G-2 in Chungking for transmission, if G-2 thought wise, to the Japanese groups. That is the only occasion that I can remember of having any knowledge or where I was in any way connected with the transmitting of messages for these Japanese Communist leaders to anyone outside.

Q. As far as you recall, did you ever personally carry any communication of any kind from Okano or any of the Japanese Communists out of Yensen?—A. No, sir, I have no recollection of every carrying any messages.

Q. So far as you know?—A. I was concerned only in consultation as to whether or not the group would transmit, by official channels through G-2, this letter.

Q. So it is your belief that this reference in the memo, this assertion that you mentioned that you yourself had helped carry information merely refers to the fact that the observer mission officially permitted Okano to transmit written communication through official channels to Chungking for delivery to the other Japanese groups there?—A. That is correct.

Q. And the inferences which Mr. Komau may have drawn in his notes on the document are not proper inferences?—A. Let's say they go even beyond this. They are not proper inferences. Even this [indicating] I think is incorrect.

Q. By “this” you mean the document, Document 200?—A. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now could you answer the question asked before the recess, the general question as to your respect for communism, as to theory?—A. It's difficult to talk about a man's philosophy. That is something I'm not used to doing. I'm not a deeply religious man in a conventional sense of the word. But I think that I could sum it up by saying that it is my belief that life was not created accidentally, that there is a divine cause, and that man was not created accidentally but created as the ultimate and highest form of life.

I think that man's responsibility, or his destiny if you wish, is to seek to achieve or live up to his highest potentialities, not only as individuals but as a race. We have not succeeded in doing that. We are very far from doing it. There have been certain individuals in history—Jesus Christ was one—who have given us an insight into the qualities of mind and spirit for which man is unique and which makes him the highest product of creation, which serve as examples of what we should seek to achieve.

Now, this whole basic philosophy is built on the idea of, shall we say, the dignity of man. Man cannot advance toward this goal of perfection without the greatest freedom of expression, greatest freedom of experiment, greatest freedom to improve and develop himself. That whole idea is absolutely contrary to a fixed and rigid dogma.

I don't believe that there is any fixed dogma which is the ultimate truth. I'm sure that communism is not because it is completely contrary to human nature and would put us in a strait-jacket and instead of giving the fullest scope for individual development it puts man in a strait-jacket and subordinates him to a monolithic state or a completely monolithic totalitarian party.

The political expression, of course, of this kind of philosophy is democracy, democracy of a very complete developed sort which must be centered about the recognition of the dignity and rights of the individual.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the basis of the philosophy which you are expounding?

A. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not the basis of communism?

A. No, the philosophy which I'm expounding, which is the antithesis of my view of communism. Related to my own view of the rights and dignity of men and the political expression which I think is democracy, is my idea on economics, because the kind of democracy which I believe in must be based on free enterprise. It must be based on the opportunity of the individual. I think that competition is necessary and is basic for this whole process of self improvement, of trying to develop ourselves, that complete controls stifle, restrain our own efforts at progress.

I think that one of the strengths of the American system is that we ourselves are not tied to any rigid plan, or dogma—I use this word “dogma” over much perhaps. What I’m saying is that I’m not a complete believer in unrestricted capitalism, that my deep feeling about protection of the rights of the individual necessitates some restrictions and control on capitalism. But we in the United States have been able to achieve a balance between the protection of the rights of the individual and the affording of the fullest opportunity for improvement and advancement with competition and encouragement and free enterprise, all of which I think are important.

I think it’s obvious, from this clumsy effort to state what I believe, that I am not a Communist, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. ACHILLES. In my opinion, that is a very fine statement.

Mr. SERVICE. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Board is adjourned.

The Board adjourned at 12:50 p. m.

Mr. JOHN R. PEURIFOY,

*Assistant Secretary of State, United States Department of State,
Washington, D. C.*

DEAR MR. PEURIFOY: Allow me to offer myself as a character witness for Mr. John S. Service in the event this is necessary in the forthcoming investigation. Mr. Service and I have been closest friends since boyhood days in Shanghai, we roomed together in college, and have kept in close touch with one another ever since. I should count it an honor to testify as to his absolute integrity and loyalty to the United States, as well as pay tribute to his intellectual honesty and idealism.

If there is any way in which I can assist in this matter of clearing up his record in the public mind please call upon me. No such clearance is necessary so far as the Department is concerned, I am sure.

Very truly yours,

C. MARTIN WILBUR,

Associate Professor of Chinese History, Columbia University.

Mr. MAX THORNBERG,

Washington, D. C.*

DEAR MR. THORNBERG: This is in reference to a report from Third Secretary John S. Service, at Chungking, dated November 11, 1942, and entitled "The Kansu Oil Wells." This report comprised several enclosures to Report No. 755 from Chungking, which bears the date November 24.

The Petroleum Division of this Branch has asked that I request you to transmit our particular thanks and appreciation to Mr. Service. His despatch is exceedingly thorough and comprehensive, and is all the more commendable since it was not written by an oil technician.

All phases of the subject covered by Mr. Service have been of marked interest to us. We will be grateful if we are given any further information on this subject which may become available from time to time.

With my very best regards, I remain

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES B. RAYNOR,
Chief, Technical Branch.

JOHN S. SERVICE, Esquire,

Second Secretary of Embassy, Care of General Stilwell's Headquarters, Chungking.

SIR: Upon the termination of your detail to Lanchow and your detachment from the Embassy to service on the staff of General Stilwell, the Embassy wishes to express to you its appreciation of the political and other reports it has received from you during your tour of duty at Lanchow.

Your reports were clearly and concisely written, they reflected ingenuity in observation and in the gathering of information under difficult circumstances, and industry and awareness of developments and trends of interest and of the importance thereof. Your reports contained information of much interest and value to the Embassy and the Embassy considers that your reports, and your activities in connection with reporting, were of high quality and may in general be characterized as excellent.

A copy of this letter is being forwarded to the Department of State.

The Honorable CLARENCE E. GAUSS,

American Ambassador, Chungking.

SIR: The Department has noted with gratification the quality of the reporting from Second Secretary Service while he was on detail at Lanchow. In particular, the reports submitted under cover of the Embassy's despatches no. 1485 of August 18 and no. 1493 of August 20 have impressed officers of the Department with their value and timeliness, as has also the report which formed the subject of the Embassy's commendatory despatch no. 1411 of July 31, 1943. The thorough and objective manner in which Mr. Service covered "The Political Situation in Kansu" in his despatch no. 9 (Embassy's no. 1485) has afforded officers of the Department a very useful guide to an understanding of conditions in Kansu, and his report on "Treatment of Foreigners in the Northwest," no. 21 (Embassy's no. 1493), contains evidence not only of careful study of the subject but also of successful activity on the part of Mr. Service in ameliorating difficulties encountered by American citizens.

The Department requests that the Embassy bring this expression of appreciation of his work to the attention of Mr. Service.

Very truly yours,

G. HOWLAND SHAW

Subject: Letter of commendation.

To: The honorable the Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. John S. Service is highly commended for outstanding aid rendered Headquarters, United States Forces, China Theater, in advising the Commanding General on political matters which have direct and important bearing on the military situation in China. Mr. Service was influential in the establishment of a Military Observer Group in Yen-an, accompanying the initial group there himself. His thorough knowledge of Chinese customs and language enabled him to develop and maintain cordial relations with Mao Tse-tung, Chu Teh, and other Communist leaders. During his extended residence in Yen-an he wrote a great number of detailed reports on military, economic, and political conditions in areas under Communist control, a field in which the American Government had previously had almost no reliable information. He prepared valuable analyses of the political situation as it affected the war potential of the Chinese Government and by correlation that of the United States Forces in China.

In recognition of his outstanding performance of duty, the Commanding General, U. S. Forces, China Theater, expresses to Mr. Service the appreciation of the United States Forces in China.

Date: June 16, 1947

To: FP—Mr. G. Ackerson, Jr.
From: BC—Mr. E. T. Wailes.
Subject: John S. Service.

I quote the following excerpt from a personal letter received by Mr. Richards from the Minister to New Zealand, Avra Warren:

"Service is doing a splendid job of work and is moving among people in an eminently desirable way. While he has only made a few public addresses so far, he presents himself in an entirely representative manner. His remarks at the Memorial Day service held at the Anglo-Cathedral in Wellington, with the Prime Minister present, were so well phrased and had such widespread support they were carried in the editorial space of the not so friendly Wellington Evening Post."

We agree with Mr. Warren that John Service is doing an outstanding job as First Secretary of the Legation at Wellington.

DEAR MR. SMITH: On the eve of my departure from the States, I wish to express my appreciation at having been given the valuable experience of serving on a Selection Board, and to express my high regard for the performance and ability and character of the other members of Selection Board "B" 1949. Dr. Gordon A. Craig of Princeton University was an almost ideal public member, bringing to his task a profound knowledge of international affairs and the importance therein of a competent Foreign Service.

Foreign Service Officers Clarence C. Brooks, Parker T. Hart, and John S. Service were also ideal. Brooks, with his long service experience and wide acquaintance, his common sense and spirit of justice, was very helpful to the Board in its deliberations.

Both Hart and Service worked almost double time in their determination to insure that the Board would give a correct and just rating to the Foreign Service officers available for promotion and in studying and drafting recommendations which might be helpful to FP and the Board of Foreign Service for improving the work of future Selection Boards.

These three men are splendid types of the American Foreign Service Officer.

JOHN S. SERVICE, Esquire,
*American Foreign Service Officer,
 % Department of State, Washington, D. C.*

DEAR MR. SERVICE: I wish to thank you for the work which you completed as a member of the 1949 Foreign Service Selection Board B.

In choosing the members of the Selection Boards, the Office of the Foreign Service was fully aware that the arduous and exacting nature of the work that would confront them, and its supreme importance, constituted a challenge to the best that the Service could produce in the way of intelligence, fairmindedness, and a realistic grasp of personnel problems. I am happy to say that you met this challenge with complete success.

The very existence of a career service such as ours is dependent upon the confidence of its members in the absolute fairness and utter impartiality of the manner in which promotions are made in it. You and your colleagues on the 1949 Selection Boards have done much to enhance that confidence, and you have earned the gratitude of the entire Foreign Service Officer corps.

Sincerely yours,

CHRISTIAN M. RAVNAL,
Director General of the Foreign Service.

GRAND LODGE OF FREE AND ACCEPTED MASONS OF CHINA,
April 18, 1950.

The Honorable, the CHAIRMAN OF THE LOYALTY SECURITY BOARD,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As an American-born Chinese, I have known for some thirty years Mr. and Mrs. Robert Roy Service, parents of the Hon. John Stewart Service, and also him for over ten years in the United States and in China.

The late Mr. Robert R. Service was for probably two decades a secretary of the International Committee of Y. M. C. A.'s (headquarters in New York) and served most of that time as a Y. M. C. A. secretary in West China and Shanghai. He had traveled widely in all parts of China, beloved by thousands of Chinese of all classes, Christian and non. My family and I have been for many years intimates of the Service family in Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., Church and Masonic activities in China. In all these organizations, both father and son, the Services, showed sympathetic understanding, and had a genius for friendship with the Chinese people, especially with the underprivileged. These qualities characterize the whole Service family. I had come to know Robert and John Service quite closely in community church and Masonic lodges, and admire them for their genuine humanitarian spirit, their devotion to the Protestant missionary enterprise in China and their love of the Masonic Craft.

I write this unsought testimonial, Sir, not just as a gesture of confidence in a brother Mason, nor yet as a friend of Mr. John S. Service and his truly Christian family, but fundamentally as one who keenly appreciates his character to be utterly alien to anything approaching Communist leanings, for I am firmly convinced that his proud educational, cultural, family, and religious background and professional career negate everything Communism stands for. I feel it is due to Mr. Service, as well as to your Board, interested in ascertaining the facts of that background, that I address you, for that background speaks louder than words his loyalty to his country and the Protestant faith, of which all the Services have been such outstanding exponents all their lives.

Very respectfully,

Dr. H. C. MEI.

AMERICAN CONSULATE GENERAL,
Tientsin, China, April 12, 1950.

Subject: Accounting Transactions of American Consulate General, Tientsin.
123 Wellborn, Alfred T.

17 Rec'd May 16. Action FE. Info. DCR. DS. DF. CS/P. CS. c.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to this Consulate General's despatch no. 11, March 17, 1950 entitled "Final Accounting Transactions of American Consulate General, Tientsin."

At the time despatch no. 11 was written it was believed that the last remaining American member of the staff of this Consulate General would have left Tientsin by the afternoon of March 17. However, two hours before my scheduled embarkation, the local authorities revoked my exit permit because of a claim made on March 16 by the People's Government to certain furniture in the United States Government premises here (see despatch no. 14, April 12, 1950). The settlement of this issue took to April 8 and during that period certain additional transactions occurred.

As the duration of my enforced stay in Tientsin was indefinite and depended entirely on the length of time necessary to come to terms with the local authorities, the arrangement made with the British Consulate General, Tientsin, for payment of last minute expenditures of this Consulate General was continued. This arrangement was made inasmuch as the accounts of Disbursing Officer Gordon Tullock were closed March 13 preparatory to his departure which actually took place early on the morning of March 15. As I was to have left on March 17, it was deemed preferable not to transfer to me the accounts for such a short period.

Bills paid in behalf of this Consulate General by the British Consulate General, supported by vouchers and signed receipts, will be presented to the Department for settlement through the British Foreign Office.

There has also been in this period a number of receipts of funds obtained from the sale of United States Government property. A tabulation of these transactions is as follows:

EXHIBIT No. 18

SERVICE

1. 5-14-42. Chungking.
Two memos.
The first is solely report to Con. Gen. of conversation.
Second is a similar report but with some interpretive comment, which is factual and does not reveal bias.
Subject of both memos is the "Chinese Industrial Cooperatives."
2. 7-24-42. Chungking.
Despatch (called for) on propaganda and psychological warfare by Chinese Gov't.
Generally factual and detailed. Received commendation from Dep't Repeats some Communist criticism of Chinese Government organs, which was probably accurate, as commies have generally been perceptive and keen as critics of others, even when (and especially when) they were guilty of the same things, or worse.
3. 1-23-43.
Memo prepared in Dep't. A key document.
This is a thoughtful and well-written memo, pointing to the danger of impending civil war in China, from both military and political standpoints. While it relays, perhaps somewhat naively, certain Communist suggestions for bettering the situation, it does not recommend that these suggestions be accepted and followed up. On the contrary, it recommends that U. S. officials be detailed to the Communist-held area to provide the answers to a number of questions concerning the Communists and conditions in the area they hold. There was obviously no intent to influence the Government along pro-Communist lines, for the author complains that such information as is available stemmed in part from journalists "who appear to have a bias favorable to the Communists." And he warns against any brief visits during which our representatives "would be under the influence of official guides."
4. 2-11-43.
Innerdepartmental memo drafted by S. and Smyth. Repeats briefly warning of unfavorable course of events in China and points out that "one possible course of action" might be sending U. S. representatives to Communist areas. Warns that Chinese Gov't will probably not sanction this, but will be resentful if it is done without its consent.
5. 8-6-43.
Despatch from Lanchow.
Called for report on Gold Market and Trading. Purely factual. No political implications.
6. 8-6-43. Lanchow.
Reporting experiences of an American agricultural expert. Completely nonpolitical. Points out exaggerated hopes for Chinese government organs for U. S. aid and tendency to enlist that aid even when they have no real need for it.
7. 8-16-43. Lanchow.
Reporting forced organization of professional people in Lanchow, for purposes of extortion and political supervision. Unsparing of Party, but factual. Essentially nonpolitical.

8. 8-17-43. Lanchow.
On evidences of anti-Russian and anti-communist feeling in Chinese officialdom. Seems to be purely factual. In describing the restrictions placed upon the local Soviet consul, Service was perhaps unaware that this sort of treatment had been accepted general practise in the Soviet Union for at least a decade. Nevertheless, despatch contains no statement condemning Chinese Gov't for this treatment.
9. 8-17-43. Lanchow.
Service states that Soviet diplomatic representative has been very friendly to himself and to Capt. Tolstoy "and his been willing to discuss general problems with an openness and apparent frankness rather unusual for our Russian colleagues". Otherwise, report contains no independent comment by Service, and is restricted to a re-counting of the views expressed by the Soviet representative.
10. 8-18-43. Lanchow.
Military notes. Purely factual. Describes deplorable state of Chinese troops passing through city, and brutality with which they were treated; but description is impassive, and without independent comment.
11. 8-18-43. Lanchow.
A report on political unrest and banditry in Kansu. Little relation to communists. Report is detailed and factual.
12. 8-19-43.
Embassy at Chungking refers in a despatch to certain of Service's reports. No comment on communists involved. Service speculates on Chinese Government's plans with respect to communists. No bias apparent.
13. 8-20-43. Lanchow.
On reception of U. S. broadcasts in Kansu. Factual and objective. A long report on activities of local Chinese police with regard to foreigners; restrictions of movement, observation, curiosity, suspicion, etc. Speaks of Chinese police using "Russian treatment of aliens as a model."
115. 9-10-43. Stilwell mission.
Reporting statements made to Stilwell by Chinese (Nationalist) General, obviously sympathetic to communists. No independent comment. Views expressed by General are somewhat similar to those expressed by Service in item 3.
116. 9-23-43. Chungking.
Two interpretative memos by Service concerning Eleventh Plenary Session of the Fifth Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang. The memos subject the decisions of the gathering to a searching and skeptical scrutiny, but the conclusions were borne out by subsequent events.
(NOTE.—These memos should be compared with communist publicity at the time).
117. 9-29-43. Chungking. Stilwell.
Describes the circumstances of the withdrawal of the communist representative from a meeting of the People's Political Council, as represented by a communist source. Service adds no comment of his own.
118. 10-27-43. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo asserting, and stating reasons why Chinese public opinion will be offended if Burma campaign is not soon inaugurated. No apparent relation to communist problem.
119. 10 28-43. Chungking. Stilwell.
Describes the bickering and bad blood between the Government and the minority groups over the composition of the Committee for the Establishment of Constitutional Government. Report is objective and describes the Committee as "not a bad one; but states that "it is a rather unfortunate omen that the committee is starting its existence with a background of petty and acrimonious politics."
120. 11-13-43. Stilwell. (Military report).
Report on "willingness of Chinese Military leaders to become puppets." An important memo, which should be compared with communist line of the same period. Service rejects the communist thesis that the Kuomintang was encouraging defection to the Japanese-occupied area in order to improve their prospects for combatting the communists after the war. Says this is the result rather than the design. Says large-scale defections are due primarily to Chiang's policy of placing in front line war-lord forces which are of doubtful loyalty to himself and which, being mercenaries from the beginning, are naturally amenable to Japanese promises of better pay and treatment.

121. 2-2-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Unimportant. Relaying of report that airport construction is causing discontent in a certain district.
122. 2-3-44.
Memo from Kuomintang source about conspiracy against Chiang. Questions Kuomintang tendency to blame communists.
123. 2-15-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Also about plot against Chiang. Adduces further proof that plot existed, and that it was an inner-army affair.
124. 2-15-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
A further report about the dissatisfaction caused by airport construction and Government's policies concerning compensation to land owners and conscription of labor. Factual.
125. 2-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Giving background on certain feelers for direct negotiations between Government and communists. Factual. Reflects, like all of this reporting, good contacts in the communist camp.
126. 2-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Reporting information released to correspondent by Government on extent of Jap-controlled area. Points out that Government spokesman listed certain communist-controlled areas as entirely Jap-controlled, evidently communist domination the more humiliating. Service points to this as indication of bitterness now existing between two factions.
127. 2-16-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Reporting interview with Madame Sun-yat-sen. Factual.
128. 3-2-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Further report, detailed and objective, on Chinese unrest in Chengtu arising out of construction of U. S. air bases. It is evident that Chinese officials somewhere along the line are pocketing funds appropriated for compensation of conscripted labor, knowing that resulting bitterness will attach largely to Americans; but Service does not charge this directly.
129. 3-14-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Commentary on a report submitted by an OWI official from Kweilin. Contains following significant passage:
"The war in China has stimulated political consciousness to the point where loose separatism, which is the goal of the provincialists and which will mean a return to the chaos of the early years of the Republic, is impossible. By present indications it does not seem likely that the existing Kuomintang Government will collapse during the war. But if the present conflict is followed, as does seem likely, by civil war * * * out of this civil war * * * there can be expected to emerge either a more progressive Kuomintang Government or a communist state, probably of the present modified Chinese communist type."
130. 3-14-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Another interview with Madame Sun Yat-Sen. Purely factual. No independent comment.
131. 3-17-44. Chungking. Stillwell.
An excellent analysis of T. V. Soong's position—thoughtful and objective—acknowledged with special commendation by the Department.
132. 3-14-44. Chungking. Stillwell.
Commentary on another personal incident in the Chiang entourage. Extremely moderate in tone, ending with the suggestion that "the real importance of this story, and of the many similar ones regarding the misdoings of the Soong-Kung family, is the readiness of the public to believe them.
133. 3-14-44. Military.
Review of second edition of Chiang's book—"China's Destiny." Points out changes since first edition. Severely critical of book ("a bigoted, narrow, strongly nationalistic effort at a special interpretation of history")—says that it reflects "unchanged a bitter anti-communist bias."

134. 3-24-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo on Chinese Territorial Claims in North Burma. Detailed, authoritative, analytical. "Chiang may have great ambition and vision. But his statesmanship does not ordinarily go far beyond shrewd, realistic, but often short-sighted bargaining."

135. 3-23-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo on the rumored plan to reduce China's armies. Service is skeptical about this.

"China remains a country where life is valued very little, where corruption is deep-rooted and prevalent, where economics have been consistently ignored or not understood, where power derives from military strength and that strength is measured in numbers, where the interests and welfare of the people have not (except perhaps in Communist North China) been a concern of their rulers and where the basic, overriding consideration is the struggle for power."

Discusses incident of bombing of Chinese forces in Sinkiang, obviously by planes having something to do with the Soviet Union. Reflects a certain naiveté about Soviet Union in assumption that Soviet Kazakhs might have taken initiative in Sinkiang and that Soviet Government might have been "willing to lend a little unofficial assistance."

137. 3-23-44. Military.

Reporting views of Chiang Kai-shek; critical of Chang's attitude but offers explanation for it. Concludes Chiang is responsible for situation in China and will continue in his present ways until the U. S. formulates and applies a strong China policy. Analysis appears objective and unbiased. (Chiang mentions Amerasia.)

138. 3-22-44. Military.

More about bombing incident in Sinkiang. Warns against U. S. involvement, particularly if we want to run convoy through that area.

139. 4-5-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

More on bombing incident. Without particular interest.

140. 3-26-44. Military.

Transmitting report prepared by Englishman who had been residing in communist area.

141. 4-4-44. Military.

Memorandum. Miscellaneous news items. Purely factual.

142. 4-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Chungking Embassy despatch transmitting memo on situation in Sinkiang. Specially commended by Department. Objective analysis of Chinese Nationalist Government's motives in the Sinkiang incidents and the success of the move. Service's recommendations include: "We should make every effort to learn what the Russian aims in Asia are. A good way of gaining material relevant to this will be a careful first-hand study of the strength, attitudes, and popular support of the Chinese communists. But in determining our policy toward Russia in Asia we should avoid being swayed by China. The initiative must be kept firmly in our hands." . . . "Chiang unwittingly may be contributing to Russian dominance in Eastern Asia by internal and external policies which, if pursued in their present form, will render China too weak to serve as a possible counterweight to Russia. By doing so, Chiang may be digging his own grave; not only North China and Manchuria, but also national groups such as Korea and Formosa may be driven into the arms of the Soviets."

143. 4-17-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Transmitting text of an interview with General Lung Yun. No comments.

144. 4-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Memo reporting views held by leaders of some of the minor parties of China. Service's comments relate only to the relative importance of these minor parties and are purely factual.

145. 5-18-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Service's critique of a Military Intelligence Dispatch. Objectively points out fallacies in the MI dispatch. Outlines activities of Nationalist Government in attempting to discredit the Communists in a purely factual manner. Makes three points: (1) that there is a fundamental conflict between Communists and Japanese and puppets;

- (2) Kuomintang is attempting to convince foreign opinion that Communists are in league with Japs and puppets; (3) that Kuomintang actually is in contact with Japs and expects puppet support. Justifies his points factually. (Rated Very Good in Department.)
146. 5-20-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo on plan to bring Chinese-American technicians to China. States objections to plan factually. Totally nonpolitical.
147. 5-20-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

155. 6-9-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo of interview with Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang, presenting Marshal's views without comment as to their validity. Purely factual.
156. 6-7-44. Military.
Presentation of the views of David An on Chinese Treatment of Koreans. Reported without comment or interpretation.
157. 6-20-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Important memo, widely circulated with favorable comment in Department. Strong denunciation of the weakness, corruption, and venality of Kuomintang. Apparently written partly from exasperation at the Nationalist Government but criticism appears to be justified. Only political bias visible is that of American official trying to turn China into an asset to the American war effort. Encourages American contact with Communists as with other minor parties and liberal elements to stimulate the Kuomintang to a reform program. No interest displayed in Communism as a movement in itself. Contact with Communist areas desirable from an intelligence standpoint in the war effort. * * * "We should select men of known liberal view to represent us in OWI, cultural relations and other lines of work in China."
158. 6-23-44. Military.
Memo of conversation between Chiang Kai-shek and V. P. Wallace, J. C. Vincent, Gen. Ferris, Owen Lattimore, and JSS. Factual account.
159. 6-24-44. Military.
Reporting communist agreement to the sending of a U. S. "observers' section" to Yenai. Objective report of communist views on the matter, presented without bias or comment.
160. 7-6-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo on communist map showing contraction of communist-held territory. Service cites contemporary Central Government map which contradicts Communist claim. Illustrates distortions of Central Government map and comments that communist map may not be more than generally true and may not give whole picture. Objective, without political coloration.

161. 7-11-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo transmitting a report from communist sources on communist military operations against Japan during May 1944. Relayed without evaluation although several Japanese news items are submitted in conjunction with the report as some possible confirmation of communist claims. No political implications.
162. 7-20-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Memo transmitting a personal letter from Chinese intellectual expressing disillusionment with present Chinese regime and hopes of constructive American aid. JSS feels letter reflects present state of mind of large part of Chinese intellectuals and liberals. Objective presentation, pointing out strength as well as weakness of viewpoint.
163. 7-21-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Transmitting a statement of Chinese intellectuals "Appeal for Revolutionary Democratic Rights." Covering memo indicates approval of intellectuals' denunciation of Kuomintang suppression of freedom of speech, thought, study, and expression.
164. 8-26-44. Chungking. Stilwell. Yenau.
Memo of first impressions of Yenau. Is highly favorable in comparison with Kuomintang-held areas. "There is a bit of smugness, self-righteousness, and conscious fellowship" * * * but "most modern place in China." "What is seen in Yenau is a well-integrated movement, with a political and economic program which it is successfully carrying out under competent leaders. * * * One cannot help coming to feel that this movement is strong and successful and that it has such drive behind it and has tied itself so closely to the people that it will not easily be killed." Service understandably favorably impressed by comparison between Yenau and Kuomintang areas in matter of material conditions, morale, and efficiency.
165. 8-26-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yenau.
Memo of conversation with Mao Tse-Tung in Yenau in which Mao sounded Service on the possibility of opening an American consulate in Yenau. Factual reporting.
166. 9-1-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yenau.
Transmitting reports of interviews with various Chinese communist leaders. Factual.
167. 9-1-44. Chungking. Stilwell.
Transmitting report of interview with Chief of Chinese General Staff. Factual account of diametrical opposition of views between communists and National Government.
168. 9-8-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yenau.
Important memo outlining Service's interpretation of communist motives. Inclines to think the best of communists. Offers arguments in opposition to this attitude but explains why he does not feel the opposing arguments are justifiable. Believes the CCP aims for orderly prolonged progress to eventual socialism, not violent revolution, and in achieving that aim will not seek an early monopoly of political power but considers first the long-term interests of China. Service shows a certain naiveté in his grasp of Marxist doctrine and ignorance of some changes incorporated in that doctrine during and after Lenin's time, e. g., that capitalist development is an unavoidable stage of economic development. Service believes the CCP will initiate (or had initiated) a type of NEP program which will last indefinitely into the future—ignoring or ignorant of the fate of NEP in the U. S. S. R. Appears to be an objective analysis of the situation. (The conclusions appear to be what might be expected from one judging on the basis of Chinese experience only, not with reference to experience with communist seizures of power elsewhere.) The Chungking Embassy takes issue with Service's views that the CCP is not aiming for a monopoly of power in the near future.
169. 8-29-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo reporting on economic conditions in communist-controlled North Shensi. Tone is favorable toward achievement but information is presented in factual manner without comment.
170. 9-19-44. Chungking Observer Section in Yenau.
Memo on Chieh Fung Jih Pao, communist newspaper in Yenau. Submitted without comment save that the paper was well edited and of high caliber. Unimportant.

171. 10-11-44. Chungking. Observer Section in Yenau.
Memo summarizing lectures given by the Communist General, Chief of Staff of 18th Group, to officers of U. S. Army Observers Section regarding the situation behind the enemy lines in North China. Service comments only on the fact that the communist army is a political army as much as it is military. Factual.
172. 9-21-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Report designating communist-controlled areas of China. No political comment.
173. 9-21-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Transmitting report of a reception given the Observers Section. No political comment. Unimportant.
174. 9-21-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Report on communist charges against Gen. Yen Hsi-shan. Details given factual without apparent bias.
175. 7-21-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Reporting on inauguration of daily news broadcasts from Yenau. Purely factual.
176. 8-24-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Transmitting map of communist border area. No comments.
177. 9-8-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Well conceived analysis of the strength of the communist movement with the recommendation that American military aid be extended to the Communist forces, to aid in the struggle against Japan. Service expects the Kuomintang will object to such aid and stated the U. S. must soon formulate a policy to decide the question of this aid, keeping in mind that "the nature, policies and objectives of the CCP are of vital long-term concern to the U. S."; the "CCP under any circumstances must be counted a continuing and important influence in China." Arguments in favor of extending aid are presented factually. The interview with Mao transmitted with this dispatch indicates Service's views regarding the question of U. S. relationship with the CCP parallel to a certain extent those of Mao himself. Service specifies his reasons.
178. 10-11-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo of lecture by communist military leader on strength, distribution and arms of communist forces. Factual account.
179. 10-13-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo of lectures by communist military leader on operations of 8th Route Army. Factual account without comment other than to point out the importance the communists attach to political programs as the basis of their military strength and success.
180. 9-29-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Report on possible usefulness of old communist bases in Southeast China. Objective account of facts. Specifies in connection with communist reasoning on matter that "it would be a mistake to assume that the communist consideration of the problem is all on the high-minded and unselfish plane." No political bias apparent.
181. 10-2-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Memo on personal impressions of communist leaders. Highly favorable of the personal qualities of these men. (Strikingly like the impressions of the old Bolsheviks which foreign observers acquired at the time of the Russian Revolution). Service's favorable attitude obviously in part stems from the contrast with Kuomintang leaders. Apparently unaware of the potential dangerousness of the type of character molded in the communist school, especially when the CCP holds the reins of power. Objective in all.
182. 10-13-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yenau.
Report on the popular appeal of the communist party. Outlines tactics employed by the communists which win popular support, i. e. reduced rents, elimination of banditry, popular election of officials, and converting the army from instrument of oppression to one of aid to peasantry. Service views the accomplishments with favor tempered with reserve. Can find no other explanation of popular backing of the communists. (NB. Service apparently consider "democracy" as synonymous with popular support, a definition which would apply to Hitler's regime as well. On basis of this definition, Service's opinion that the CCP is democratic is justifiable.)

183. 9-29-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Extremely well-balanced report on the development of communist political control in areas under their domination. (Rated Excellent in Department.) Report is well-rounded, presents a factual picture and appears to be very perceptive in divining the purpose of communist actions in many fields. Explains both how the communist program wins popular support and at the same time serves communist interests. No political bias evident and no effort to condemn or praise. Factual reporting. (Should be noted that C.A.'s comments in Department on Service's reporting consistently put communist in quotation marks, implying something distinct from the Soviet brand. No evidence of this attitude has yet appeared in any of Service's work.)
184. 10-9-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Reports decision of CCP to change its name in foreign publicity to avoid the stigma of "communism." Service interprets it as a desire "to allay any foreign fears and to win foreign good-will." No political comment otherwise.
185. 10-25-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Transmitting communist views on treatment of Japan. No comment made but appears to be evident that Service accepts sincerity of communist spokesman and feels views expressed are honest aims of CCP.
186. 10-25-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Interview with CIC of communist military forces. Service states "I am in general agreement with the views expressed by such communist leaders as Gen. Chu. Every effort, however, has been made to avoid encouraging any high expectations, to point out the practical difficulties in the way of direct cooperation and to suggest that Japan may be defeated in other ways than as the communists insist, a slow process of liquidating the armies on the Asian mainland." Chu's views followed the usual pattern that cooperation with the Kuomintang was impossible and U. S. strong role necessary in China.
187. 9-27-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Report of interview with Hungarian national. No political content.
188. 9-28-44. Yen-an.
Memo on the orientation of the Chinese communists toward the USSR and toward the U. S. Key document. Essentially, reasons that CCP orientation is exclusively pro-China. Ties with the USSR are of the past. Interests of the CCP are best served by cultivating ties with the U. S. which can aid the industrialization of China. USSR can't and China can't do it alone. Service states "I believe that the Chinese Communists are at present sincere in seeking Chinese unity on the basis of American support. This does not preclude their turning back toward Soviet Russia if they are forced to in order to survive American-supported Kuomintang attack." Service's account appears to be an eminently fair statement of communist views as evident at that time—his conclusions, a reasoned choice between the lesser of two evils. Reveals ignorance of some of the finer points of communist doctrine, particularly in regard to the manner in which Marxism is to be applied outside the USSR.
189. 10-1-44. Yen-an.
Transmission of communist newspapers. No comments.
190. 10-25-44. Chungking. Observers Section in Yen-an.
Memo on communist success in eliminating banditry. Cites communist explanation for this situation—economic improvement, mobilization of entire population in the war effort and removal of feudal basis of banditry—as only apparent explanation for its elimination. Objective reporting.
191. 11-24-44. Yen-an.
Reports of imprisonments of American medical officer and several foreign correspondents on popular support in communist areas. Presented without comment.
192. 11-24-44. Yen-an.
Transmission of memos on conditions in communist areas and on Communist-Kuomintang relations. Service's observations are, that the communists are fighting the Japanese, successfully because they have the people behind them mobilized. Mobilization based on economic, political and social revolution, gains of which the people will fight to keep. Kuomintang will be unable to repress these mobilized people or the communists as long as the latter have popular support. Communists will continue to be important part of China's future and unless Kuomintang institutes extensive reforms (unlikely) Communists will be dominant force in China in a few years. Service's observations have been borne out by subsequent events.

193. 10-10-44. Chungking. Stilwell.

Important memo on need for realism in U. S. relations with Chiang. Anti-Chiang, not pro-communist. Holds Kuomintang dependent on U. S., U. S. not dependent on Kuomintang. We do not need it militarily, we do not need to fear its opposition or fall or its international importance. Chiang does not represent pro-American or democratic groups, we owe him no gratitude and he understands only force. Need hard-boiled policy toward him to aid U. S. war effort. Only reference made to communists is that "we cannot hope to solve China's problems without consideration of the opposition forces, Communist, Provincial, and liberal." Service's denunciation is strong but based exclusively on the urgency of aiding the American war effort in the Pacific. No indication of political bias towards any faction, only against Kuomintang corruption and power politics. A tendency to underplay usefulness of Kuomintang to the U. S. war effort and discount any worth in the movement.

194. 10-10-44. Yen-an.

Memo on communist interception of State Department radio bulletin. No political comments.

195. 11-24-44. Yen-an.

Memo on present communist attitude toward relations with Kuomintang. Service displays great insight into tactics of communists in increasing demands as the situation turns more in their favor. Reveals acute observation and understanding of the power politics involved. No personal comments of political nature appended.

196. 10-15-44. Yen-an.

Memo regarding censorship of escape stories coming out of communist territory. Unimportant.

197. 10-17-44. Yen-an.

Memo transmitting the published policies and administrative program of the CCP. No comments.

198. 10-18-44. Yen-an.

Memo on communist propaganda use of statements of foreign correspondents. Deplores the extravagant statements made by some promising American aid to the communists, but comments on the fact that many correspondents have been converted to a pro-communist attitude. Unimportant.

199. 10-21-44. Yen-an.

Transmitting communist newspapers. No comments.

200. 11-8-44. Washington.

Interrogation of Service while on consultation in Washington. Views on Japanese communists. Appears to be purely factual information. Service states that he himself helped carry information for Japanese communists, apparently out of Yen-an to Chungking for relay elsewhere. No elaboration.

201. 11-44. Washington.

Interrogation of Service on Washington consultation. Views on probable developments in North China in the event of a U. S. landing. States that communists will cooperate with allied troops as long as allies do not interfere with their politics. Will not allow military considerations to prejudice their political program. Service suggests however "that it would be well to put out a rather large number of U. S. officers," since the communist area is decentralized. Chiefly factual evaluations.

202. 11-8-44. Washington.

Interrogation of Service while on Washington consultation. Predominantly factual information. Service states "China's first need is economic development, and U. S. must do it. Russian help would divide China, but U. S. will unite them." * * * "Chinese communists are not radical at present. They are still Marxists, but are against subjectivism. Marxism points to ideal socialism." Little political comment.

203. 2-12-45. Chungking—for Wedemeyer.
Military only.
204. 2-14-45. Chungking—for Wedemeyer.
Memo on military weakness of our Far Eastern policy. States recommendations to aid communists parallel Churchill's policy in Yugoslavia, aiding the faction which would assist most in the war effort. Support of Chiang is only a means to an end but we tend to confuse the means with the end. We must clarify issue to restore our primary objective, defeat of Japan with smallest possible loss of life. Well-constructed analysis of situation.
205. 2-14-45. Chungking.
Recount of the current status of Kuomintang-Communist negotiations. Purely factual reporting.
206. 2-16-45. Chungking.
Views of Russian officials in China. No comments.
207. 2-17-45. Chungking.
Memo on Kuomintang hopes to make a deal with Russia. Service's opinions are contradicted by later events but analysis is interesting. Feels USSR will not deal with Kuomintang in view of its decided objections to the regime, no likely quid pro quo exists and besides Chinese Communists are stronger than Kuomintang. Unaware that USSR would be willing to sacrifice interests of a local communist party for Soviet interests.
208. 2-17-45. Chungking.
View of Sun Fo. No comments or analysis.
209. 2-19-45. Chungking.
Memo on Chinese feelers regarding Formosa. Purely factual.
210. 8-28-45. Chungking.
Criticism of proposal to declare Shanghai an open city. Military interest primarily. Good analysis. No political application.
211. 2-28-45. Chungking.
Views of Captain (Joseph) Alsop. Diametrically opposed to Service's opinions. Alsop argued on the line that U. S. long-range interests were more important than the immediate ones of winning the war; that long-range interests involved allying China on our side as a balance against Soviet influence—our greatest threat—and destruction of the Chinese communists. Believed in necessity of getting involved in the inevitable civil war which would follow from U. S. complete backing of Kuomintang against communists.
212. 3-4-45. Chungking. Military.
Request to visit Yen-an. No political coloration.
213. 3-21-45. Chungking.
Memo of communist attitude toward Central Government. Notes change in CCP attitude toward U. S. cooperation in China and possibility of cooperation with Kuomintang. Service notes this change dates from Stilwell's departure. Communist expansions southward followed belief that U. S. would support only Chiang. Notes communists seem to be expecting large-scale Japanese activity in North China and are getting out of way of these Japanese efforts to consolidate on mainland. Communist determination to control China proper growing.
214. 3-13-45. Yen-an.
Views of Mao Tse-tung. Factual reporting. Opinions similar to those expressed in earlier papers.
215. 3-14-45. Yen-an.
Memo on communist expectations of Soviet aid and participation in the Pacific war at a late date. Probable course of military tactics to be followed by communists. Notes that communists will strive to gain control of Manchuria, that they have already infiltrated the area, because of its industrial importance. (Feeling that CCP did not expect USSR to strip Manchuria, as CCP intended to have benefits of its industrial potential.) Factual analysis.
216. 3-16-45. Yen-an.
Transmission of communist views regarding Sinkiang. Relayed without comment.
217. 3-16-45. Yen-an.
Communist views on Mongolia. Transmitted without comment.

218. 3-16-45. Yenau.
Policy of the Chinese communists toward the problem of national minorities. Service states that while communists claim their program is based on Sun Yat-Sen's, in actuality it is based directly on that of the Russian communists (from whom Sun got most of his ideas). Service feels that some of these ideas (Stalin's "Marxism and National Question") may be unworkable in China because some of China's minority nations exist close to other strong states and because China is weaker than Russia was at time of 1917 revolution.
219. 3-17-45. Yenau.
Communist plans for a relief and rehabilitation organization in communist liberated areas. No comments. Purely factual.
220. 3-17-45. Yenau.
Evidence to substantiate communist claims as to the extent of territory under their control. American observers evidence. No political comment. Purely factual reporting.
221. 3-19-45. Yenau.
Comments on communist report of Kuomintang exile government organizations in parts of China. Analysis of moves shows no political bias. Factual reporting.
222. 3-20-45. Yenau.
Transmitting information regarding dealings of Chinese Central Government military official with the Japanese. No political coloration evident.
223. 3-21-45. Yenau.
Memo on Chian Kai-shek's treatment of the Kwangsi Clique. Decidedly critical of Chiang's activities. Service's interpretation not necessarily accurate—CA disputes some points. Memo involves no mention of our references to communist movement. Factual reporting.
224. 3-22-45. Yenau.
Significance of personnel appointments made by Chiang. Service interprets these appointments are signs that Chiang is preparing for civil war with the communists, rather than peaceful cooperation. Factual.
225. 3-23-45. Yenau.
Memo on contact between the Chinese communists and Moscow. Service's interpretation is good. Gives known facts and distinguishes between governmental contacts and contact between communist parties. Appears to be a realistic view of situation. Service feels communists probably do not have relations with Soviet Government but contact between the Soviet CP and the Chinese is likely to exist.
226. 4-1-45. Yenau.
Statement of communist policy to be adopted by the communist congress as given by Mao and other leaders. Offered without political observations other than to point out highlights.
227. 3-18-45. Yenau.
Memo on establishment of unified labor organizations and women's groups for the communist liberated areas. Factual account with comment that this step constituted a direct challenge to the Central Government, almost bringing the future conflict into the open. No political bias evident.

EXHIBIT No. 20

THE STATE DEPARTMENT ESPIONAGE CASE

(By Emmanuel S. Larsen)

WHO IS LARSEN?

Emmanuel Sigurd Larsen was catapulted into the international limelight early in June 1945, when as an official of the State Department he was one of the six arrested by the FBI under the provisions of the Espionage Act. Born in 1897 in San Rafael, California, of Danish parentage, Larsen was taken to China in 1906 by his father who went there to teach at the Imperial University in Chengtu. After a boyhood in China, Larsen completed his college education in Copenhagen. Returning to China he spent nearly twenty years in private and government service. Back in the United States in 1935, he soon joined the Office of Naval Intelligence in Washington as a civilian expert on Far Eastern affairs.

Behind the now-famous State Department Espionage Case, involving the arrest of six persons of whom I was one, an arrest which shocked the nation on June 7, 1945, is the story of a highly organized campaign to switch American policy in the Far East from its long-tested course to the Soviet line. It is a story which has never been told before in full. Many sensational though little-explained developments, such as the General Stilwell Affair, the resignation of Undersecretary Joseph C. Grew and Ambassador Patrick Hurley and the emergence of a pro-Soviet bloc in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department, are interlaced with the Case of the Six, as the episode became known.

I have devoted many months to a plodding investigation of the case in which I had become entangled, primarily to rehabilitate my reputation and to establish my complete innocence. I have collaborated with Congressman George Dondero of Michigan, who sponsored the creation of the House Committee which is about to undertake an inquiry into all the circumstances of the disposition of the State Department Espionage Case, and have offered my fullest cooperation to the chairman of that committee, Congressman Samuel Hobbs. In the course of my own explorations, I have uncovered sufficient material to convince me that further probing into the matter might assume proportions even more far-reaching than those of the Pearl Harbor Investigation.

It is the mysterious whitewash of the chief actors of the Espionage Case which the Congress has directed the Hobbs Committee to investigate. But from behind that whitewash there emerges the pattern of a major operation performed upon Uncle Sam without his being conscious of it. That operation vitally affects our main ramparts in the Pacific. In consequence of this operation General Marshall was sent on a foredoomed mission to China designed to promote Soviet expansion on our Asiatic frontier. It was a mission which could not but come to grief and which may yet bring untold sorrow to the American people.

How did it happen that the United States began to turn in 1944 upon its loyal ally, the Chiang Kai-shek Government, which had for seven years fought Japan, and to assume the sponsorship of the rebel Communist regime which collaborated with the Japanese during the period of the Stalin-Hitler Pact?

How did it come to pass that Washington since 1944 has been seeking to foist Communist members upon the sole recognized and legitimate government of China, a maneuver equivalent to an attempt by a powerful China to introduce Earl Browder and William Z. Foster into key positions in the United States government?

How did it transpire that our top-ranking military leader, General Marshall, should have promoted an agreement in China under which American officers would be training and equipping rebel Chinese Communist units at the very time when they were ambushing our marines and when Communists the world over were waging a war of nerves upon the United States?

Whose was the hand which forced the sensational resignation of Undersecretary of State Joseph C. Grew and his replacement by Dean Acheson? And was the same hand responsible for driving Ambassador Patrick Hurley into a blind alley and retirement?

The answers to all of these questions came to me as I unraveled the main threads of the tangled State Department Espionage Case. But many more questions still remain to be solved.

On June 7, 1945, while a tense nation was entering upon the climax of the war with Japan, and exactly five weeks before the atomic bomb was dropped upon Hiroshima, our country was shaken by an announcement from Washington: the FBI had the previous night arrested on charges of violating the Espionage Act two State Department officials, one Naval Intelligence officer and three New York journalists.

I was arrested in my home in Washington the evening of June 6, after a hard day's work in the State Department where I was employed as a research expert in Chinese affairs. When two FBI agents knocked at the door of our modest apartment as I sat down to dinner with my wife Thebma and our little daughter Linda, I could not believe it and thought it was some sort of a joke when they informed me that I was under arrest.

The search in my home lasted late into the night, and it provided the saddest hours of our lives. After a grueling interrogation, I was brought, still in a state of utter bewilderment, to the office of the United States Commissioner.

There I found myself sitting next to John Stewart Service, a leading figure in the pro-Soviet group in the China Section of the State Department, and to Lient. Andrew Roth, liaison officer between the Office of Naval Intelligence and the State Department, whom I also knew as an adherent of pro-Soviet policies. Both of them were arrested separately the same night in Washington.

In New York that night of June 6 three other arrests were made simultaneously. Philip Jacob Jaffe, publisher and editor of the obscure magazine Amerasia, specializing in Far Eastern affairs, was picked up after a raid on his offices. At the same time Kate Louise Mitchell, coeditor of Amerasia, a companion and intimate collaborator of Jaffe's for years, was put under arrest. Another colleague of Jaffe, the journalist Mark Julius Gayn, a contributor on the Far East to Amerasia and leading national magazines, was also taken into custody in New York.

The search in the offices of Amerasia yielded a trove of more than 100 files containing, according to Congressman Dondero, top secret and highly confidential papers stolen from the State Department, War Department, Navy Department, Office of Strategic Services, Office of Postal and Telegraph Censorship, and the OWI at a time when we were at war with both Germany and Japan. Mr. Dondero described some of these documents before the House of Representatives on April 18th last as follows:

"First. One document marked 'secret' and obviously originating in the Navy Department dealt with the schedule and the targets for the bombing of Japan. This particular document was known to be in the possession of Philip Jaffe during the early spring of 1945 and before the program had been effected. That information in the hands of our enemies could have cost us many precious American lives.

"Second. Another document, marked 'top secret' and likewise originating in the Navy Department, dealt with the disposition of the Japanese fleet subsequent to the major naval battle of October 1944 and gave the location and class of each Japanese warship.

"Third. Another document, stolen from the Office of Postal and Telegraph Censorship, was a secret report on the Far East and so stamped as to leave no doubt in anybody's mind that the mere possession of it by an unauthorized person was a clear violation of the Espionage Act.

"Fourth. Another document was stolen from the Office of Military Intelligence and consisted of 22 pages containing information obtained from Japanese prisoners of war. When our military officials question prisoners of war, it is for the purpose of getting secret military information of the enemy's plans.

"Fifth. Another stolen document, particularly illuminating, and of present great importance to our policy in China, was a lengthy detailed report showing complete disposition of the units in the army of Chiang Kai-shek, where located, how placed, under whose command, naming the units, division by division, and showing their military strength. It is easy to visualize the consequences of this information in the hands of the Communist forces in China, then and now."

As disclosed by Congressman Dondero, one of the documents was "of such exceptional military importance and so closely guarded in its limited transmission that it was delivered personally into the hands of the Chief of the Office of Naval Intelligence." Many of the confidential papers bore this imprint:

"This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the Espionage Act, 50, United States Code 31-32, as amended. Its transmission or the revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law."

In the offices of Amerasia, which boasted a total circulation of 1,700, the government agents found a large photocopying department, the operation of which, according to Congressman Dondero, could not possibly have been an essential part of the business of such a limited publication. "This department," stated Mr. Dondero, "was working through the night, in the small hours of morning and even on Sundays." Where these photostats went and how far they traveled is one of the several pivotal mysteries awaiting solution in the whole case.

Probably not one informed American in 20,000 had ever heard of Amerasia. But those of us who had to do with research or policy-making in the field of our international relations in Asia were well aware of the potent influence this almost unknown publication exercised upon the conduct of American foreign policy.

The magazine first came to my attention during my employment as an analyst in Chinese affairs in the Office of Naval Intelligence, where I had served for about nine years from October 1935, to September 1944. After having spent nearly twenty-five years of my life in China, where my father was a university instructor and where I grew up and mastered Chinese like a native, I returned to the United States. Before entering the government service, I did post-graduate work at the University of Chicago and later at Columbia University on a Rockefeller scholarship.

It was during the war, while working in the Office of Naval Intelligence as a civilian, that circumstances led me unsuspectingly to my fateful meeting with Philip Jaffe, the dominant figure in the Espionage Case.

One of the officers I had met in the Far Eastern branch of the Naval Intelligence was a brilliant young man, Andrew Roth, who had been commissioned a junior lieutenant after completing a special course in the Japanese language. My friendship with Roth, who was a youth of 26, never became intimate. We frequently lunched together. Occasionally we met in the evening for a pot-luck dinner and a good argument.

Roth knew my special hobby, as did many of my associates and acquaintances. Ever since 1923 I had been collecting patiently from every conceivable source biographical data on Chinese personalities, military and political, and my file of several thousand cards contained off-the-record material about the careers of the chief figures in the great drama of modern China.

One day Roth came to my desk in the Navy Department around noon time and asked me whether I had had my lunch. As I was free, I accepted his invitation to join him for a snack. While we walked up Pennsylvania Avenue, Roth asked me whether I knew Philip Jaffe, the publisher and editor of Amerasia. My answer being in the negative, he remarked that Jaffe was a friend of his and that he was interested in the biographies of Chinese leaders, so that the two of us should have a lot in common.

Roth suggested that I get together with Jaffe who was in a position to trade information with me about personalities. When asked how I could meet Jaffe, he smilingly informed me that Jaffe was in Washington that day, that he, Roth, was just then on his way to meet him for luncheon, and that he would be glad to take me along and introduce me.

We walked over to the Statler Hotel and met Jaffe in the lobby. First we had a cocktail in his room and then we had lunch in the restaurant. We discussed the conditions under which we could exchange information about Chinese leaders. Jaffe said that he visited Washington about once a month and that he would ask me on these visits for certain biographical material. If I didn't have it ready on my cards, I would prepare it for him and he would pick it up on his next trip. In return, he would supply me with information about the individuals I was studying. I was quite happy to have this new source of information, especially since I expected to get data on the Communist figures in China, a little-known field.

Most of the China experts in the Office of Naval Intelligence were satisfied with the superficial and generally negligible official biographies, whereas what I sought for my collection was the "dirt" about a man's career, the unpublished facts about his past and the real reasons for his switching from one faction to another. I had a hard time explaining to my superiors the importance of collecting such data about China, which was governed not so much by ideologies as by personalities.

It was not until after my arrest a year later, when I went over in my mind again and again the various conversations I had had with Roth, that I began to question the seeming coincidence of my meeting with Jaffe. I asked myself why Roth, who had been so interested in bringing us together for the exchange of information, never once inquired afterwards about my relations with Jaffe.

It now occurred to me that Roth's avoidance of the subject was not quite normal. And ever since I have been pestered by the thought: "Had not that casual meeting with Jaffe, which brought so much distress to me, been carefully pre-arranged?"

After meeting Jaffe, I naturally began to follow Amerasia with increased interest. Often I was surprised to discover how closely the situation in Asia as presented in Jaffe's magazine corresponded to that given by our naval and military attachés and by the State Department's field representatives in China.

In June 1944 Amerasia came out with a sharp attack on Undersecretary Grew, who was opposed to the proposed bombing of Emperor Hirohito's palace and who was reputed to favor the retention of the monarchy after the defeat of Japan as a stabilizing element in the Far East. This view of Mr. Grew's, which General MacArthur later put into effect, was a challenge to the pro-Soviet group in the China Section, whose objective was internal revolution in Japan.

Never having been identified with any Communist organization or "front," I did not suspect anything untoward in the attack upon Mr. Grew. I did notice, however, that Roth had taken a deep interest in Jaffe's criticism of the Undersecretary. Roth told me that he was working on a book in which he would arraign Grew's policies.

I ascribe the anti-Grew campaign to the differences between the Grew school in the State Department which favored a stable Japan as the keystone of American postwar policy in the Pacific and the school which favored a strong China as our best security in Asia.

When Jaffe came to Washington on his next trip, he invited me and my wife to dinner at a Chinese restaurant. In the course of our conversation he told me that he was worried by a report that Undersecretary Grew had been angered by the attack in Amerasia. It was obvious that the report had come to him from an inside source in the State Department.

At the same time Vice President Henry A. Wallace was dispatched on a mission to China, the main purpose of which was to induce Chiang Kai-shek to form a united front with the Communist insurgents. The mission followed upon the outbreak of the so-called Kazak incident in the early part of 1944 in which Soviet Russia was involved.

The American public was not allowed to know the facts reported by American observers in China, namely, that Moscow had come to the aid of the Chinese Communists in the remote Sinkiang province by engineering an uprising there. This was two years before the Iran Incident. It was done to divert Nationalist troops from the Communist areas. Five full divisions were sent by Chiang Kai-shek into Sinkiang, thus weakening the front against the Japanese and opening the gates of the northwestern Shensi and Kansu provinces to the Communists.

Even before Wallace returned from the Far East, Moscow which was not at war with Japan, launched a propaganda drive against the recognized government of China. On July 18, the mouthpiece of the Kremlin, War and the Working Class, published a warning to Chungking to end its conflict with the Communist forces.

This was the opening gun in a smear campaign which soon was reflected in the so-called liberal press in the United States. Our veteran ally Chiang Kai-shek was denounced as a Fascist. Correspondents and commentators who had never raised their voices against the dictatorship in Russia now echoed the Soviet-inspired vituperation of the Kuomintang regime as a dangerous dictatorship.

The question as to whether Soviet Russia would enter the war against Japan was uppermost in Allied councils in those days. China's foreign minister, T. V. Soong, told our Ambassador Gauss that he was convinced that Russia would attack Japan when Germany was defeated, but would do so for the sole purpose of sovietizing the Far East. Soong warned that America's headaches would commence only then. It was a warning which Washington completely disregarded.

On September 1, 1944, I was transferred from the Naval Intelligence to the State Department, where I was attached to the planning and research unit entrusted with the drafting of basic post-war policy toward China, Japan, Korea, Siam, and other Far Eastern zones. I discovered to my amazement that the State Department had no clear-cut general policy, but was run by cliques which pursued their own preconceived aims and were often in violent conflict.

The pro-Soviet group in the China Section, whose views were reflected by Amerasia, and whose members were in touch with Jaffe and Roth, formed a particularly compact clique. Secretary Ludden of the American Embassy in Chungking was a leading figure in the group. So was John Davies, a native of Chengtu, who acted as State Department attaché with our military observers in China.

He seemed to believe and report almost anything in the way of information against the Kuomintang and Chiang Kai-shek, swallowing whole and relaying nearly everything that the Communists gave him. Mr. Davies held the view that the Chinese Communists were a breed apart from the Soviet elements and had no intention of aligning themselves with Soviet Russia.

John Stewart Service, a junior colleague and friend of Mr. Davies, who was stationed as a field representative in China and acted as political adviser to General Stilwell, tried hard to convince Washington that the rebel Communists were pursuing a policy of avoiding civil war. I remember that Ambassador Gauss did not quite subscribe to this theory. I also recall that in an attempt to discredit Ambassador Gauss's analysis of the Communist-Kuomintang conflict, Mr. John Carter Vincent, chief of the China Section, suggested that it was the failure of the Kuomintang to back the reforms championed by the Communists that was largely responsible for the difficulties in China.

Playing the part of a lone wolf, although one hundred percent in accord with the pro-Soviet China Group, was John W. Emmerson, who served as political adviser to Admiral Chester Nimitz in both Chinese and Japanese affairs.

I remember how our Consul in Kweilin had interviewed General Li Chi-shen on the subject of the Democratic League which was represented in official dispatches as a liberal organization, and how he waxed hot in his report in an effort to impress Washington with all the abuses heaped by General Li upon the Chungking government. It appeared strange to me that a United States official should have been so receptive to violent criticism of the government to which he was accredited. At no time did any of these field representatives report upon the Communists who had helped create the Democratic League and who manipulated it as a leftist "front."

The encouragement extended to the Chinese Communists by many of our officials there and by some of the writers whom they were inspiring was such that the Reds in China declared they would sit back and wait for stronger United States pressure upon Chiang Kai-shek. This pressure did not fail to be forthcoming.

In the early fall of 1944 Donald M. Nelson and General Patrick Hurley were dispatched to China as the President's special envoys to inform Chiang Kai-shek of American disappointment over his failure to form a united front with the Communists. The two envoys requested the Generalissimo to reorganize his Cabinet and to place an American general in command of the Chinese armies. It was understood that General Stilwell would be the American commander.

Chiang Kai-shek was at first inclined to make some compromise for the sake of Allied unity but not at the expense of Chinese sovereignty. President Roosevelt exerted his own direct pressure on the Generalissimo to back up his envoy's demands.

Then came the Stilwell incident. John S. Service, Stilwell's political adviser, accompanied a highly secret military commission to Communist headquarters at Yen-an. Upon the return of this mission, old "Vinegar" Joe demanded that Chiang Kai-shek permit him to equip and arm some 300,000 Chinese Communists and put them in the field alongside the Nationalist armies against the Japanese. Chiang Kai-shek saw in this American proposal a Soviet plot to build up the very rebel forces which had been waging civil war against his government. He requested the recall of General Stilwell.

The day before President Roosevelt announced that Stilwell had been relieved of his command, on October 30, 1944, John S. Service submitted his report No. 40 to the State Department. As disclosed months later by General Hurley in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that report was "a general statement of how to let fall the government I was sent over there to sustain. The report was circulated among the Communists I was trying to harmonize with the Chiang Kai-shek government."

During these and the ensuing months Philip Jaffe and Kate Mitchell made numerous trips from New York to Washington. Mr. Jaffe would call me and collect whatever biographical data on Chinese personalities I had, but I found it increasingly strange that he would not reciprocate with the promised biographical information on the Communist figures that I needed.

The Espionage Case itself had its origin with the appearance in the December 1944 issue of Amerasia of an article containing unadulterated passages from an extremely confidential report to the Office of Strategic Services. Two employees of the OSS were struck by the passages which they had read in the original and became curious as to how the information turned up in the columns of Amerasia. A preliminary investigation conducted by OSS disclosed that various other secret documents were in possession of Jaffe, Kate Mitchell, and Mark Gayn, all of Amerasia.

The FBI then took charge of the affair. As established by Congressman Dondero, the government agents spent several months on the case. In the course of their quest, it was found that John S. Service was in communication from China with Mr. Jaffe. The substance of some of Service's confidential messages to the State Department reached the offices of Amerasia in New York before they arrived in Washington. Among the papers found in possession of Mr. Jaffe was Document No. 58, one of Mr. Service's secret reports, entitled "Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek—Decline of his Prestige and Criticism of and Opposition to his Leadership."

In the course of the FBI investigation Amerasia was revealed as the center of a constellation of Communist zealots and their satellite fellow-travellers. The ramifications of Amerasia reached far beyond those of a modest academic publication. It appeared, for instance, that Owen Lattimore, consultant to OWI and to the State Department on Far Eastern affairs, was formerly an editor of Amerasia. Another former editor was Frederick Vanderbilt Field, a columnist for The Daily Worker and secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, with which Kate Mitchell had been affiliated in various capacities since 1933.

The publisher of Amerasia was a prosperous manufacturer of greeting cards who had a rather unusual record for a well-to-do businessman. Mr. Philip Jacob Jaffe, naturalized in 1923, had served as contributing editor of Labor Defender, monthly magazine of the International Labor Defense, a Communist organization, in 1933. From 1934 to 1936 he had been a member of the editorial board of China Today, publication of the pro-Soviet American Friends of the Chinese people, under his admitted alias of J. W. Phillips. Under that name he presided in 1935 over a banquet at which Earl Browder was a speaker. He had lectured at the Jefferson School of Social Science, an avowed Communist Party institution. In addition to several other pro-Soviet organizations, he was a member of the Board of Directors of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship. The New York Times described him on June 7, 1945 (subsequent to his arrest) as "an active supporter of pro-Communist and pro-Soviet movements for a number of years."

What The New York Times did not know and what I could not possibly know, but what was established during the investigation, according to the information gathered by Congressman Dondero, was the following: that Jaffe is known to have visited Earl Browder's apartment several times in the spring of 1945; that he dined on more than one occasion at the Soviet consulate in New York; that when the Chinese Communist delegate, Tung Pi-Wu, while in the United States in April 1945 to attend the San Francisco Conference, visited New York, he met Earl Browder one day in Jaffe's apartment; that Jaffe had been a liberal contributor to pro-Soviet causes and funds; and that at one time Jaffe had in his possession a message sent by Ambassador Hurley to his wife, advising her not to rent their home in Chesapeake Bay for the summer, inasmuch as he expected to return to the United States before the end of the summer.

How this strictly personal message fell into Jaffe's hands was never ascertained. But Congressional sources did establish the remarkable fact that Mr. Jaffe once reserved two tables at a hotel banquet held to launch a pro-Communist China front in the name of "The fifth floor, 35 East 12th Street," the national headquarters of the American Communist Party.

Kate L. Mitchell, co-editor of Amerasia, was a Buffalo heiress whose income from a trust fund has been estimated to run as high as $15,000 a year. Born in 1908, a graduate of Bryn Mawr, widely traveled and a student of Asiatic problems, Miss Mitchell was so close to Jaffe that she had in her possession keys to all the files in the office of Amerasia. When John Stewart Service returned from China, Miss Mitchell gave a party at which he was present. He had previously attended a special press conference held by the Institute of Pacific Relations in which he supported the position of the Chinese Communists.

Lieutenant Andrew Roth, a rising Amerasia star and protégé of Jaffe's is a native New Yorker who had attended City College. Mr. Dondero disclosed that Roth had been placed in his key post of liaison officer between Naval Intelligence and the State Department "despite a totally unfavorable report resulting from an investigation by the Office of Naval Intelligence itself when he first applied for his commission."

Mark J. Gayn, a native of Manchuria, whose articles in leading magazines were based upon confidential documents supplied by Jaffe, was frequently consulted by the latter after his Washington trips, particularly in Japanese affairs. On at least one occasion John S. Service was known to have visited Gayn in his apartment. I have never met Gayn and was barely acquainted with Service.

Of many of these vital facts I was ignorant before my arrest. The political background of Jaffe and Miss Mitchell and their confreres was completely foreign to me. I knew Jaffe and his group as the editor of a magazine which had almost semi-official standing among the left-wingers in the State Department. In spite of the fact that I was gathering biographical material on Chinese leaders for Mr. Jaffe, I did not do along with the Amerasia circle in questions of our policy in the Far East.

In the spring of 1945, when it was generally believed that our next step in the war would be an invasion of China, the problem of Manchuria came up for discussion and analysis in the State Department. In the event of our seizure of Manchuria, were we to hand it over eventually to any local Chinese faction, even the Communists? Mr. Robert Feary, a well-meaning former official of our Embassy in Japan, who drew his knowledge of China largely from the field dispatches of the pro-Soviet school, proposed that we turn over Manchuria to the Chinese Communists if Chiang Kai-shek's troops were not there to take it over immediately.

This proposal struck me as outrageous, since President Roosevelt had promised Chiang Kai-shek at the Cairo Conference that Manchuria would revert to his nation, by which we unmistakably meant the properly constituted government of China. I launched the initial protest against this and was able to bring about the defeat of the plan.

Shortly after this meeting on Manchurian policy, I was warned by a young foreign service officer of Scandinavian extraction in a friendly way that I would soon get into trouble if I opposed the anti-Kuomintang group in the China Section. Soon afterwards I ran into Lieutenant Roth in the street, and he told me that John Carter Vincent, head of the China Section, suspected me of being "too close to the Chiang Kai-shek crowd." I resented the remark, since I had but purely social relations with the Chinese Embassy in Washington. I wondered afterwards whether Roth had used a fabricated story merely to test me.

Late in May, I was surprised to find Andrew Roth in my apartment when I returned home from the office. He was in an extremely nervous state. He told me that he and his wife had intended to drop in upon us that evening, that she had gone shopping, and that in the meanwhile he had received some upsetting news which he was anxious to convey to her. It appeared that he had been ordered to go to Honolulu and that he was making preparations to leave when suddenly his orders were canceled. He evinced so much uneasiness and seemed so reluctant to talk about the matter that I was somewhat baffled.

When his charming wife Renee arrived about an hour or so later, happy and smiling, she was dumbfounded and put out by the bad news. I tried to comfort her by saying that the Navy probably would have a better job for her husband, but she brushed my remark aside in a peeved manner that indicated anxiety and fear.

Is it possible that both Roth and his wife were already aware then that they were being shadowed and investigated, but said nothing about it to me? I myself felt perfectly at ease, for I had not the faintest notion that I was standing on the brink of disaster.

It was just about this time that Mark Gayn, who had made his plans the previous year, prepared to go abroad as a foreign correspondent for the Chicago Sun. He suddenly called upon George Taylor, in charge of the Far Eastern Section at the OWI in Washington, and asked him to authorize the decontrol of some confidential government documents which Gayn claimed to have used for current articles.

Mr. Taylor issued a letter decontrolling certain papers. This letter Mr. Gayn presented at the New York office of the OWI, and is alleged to have persuaded the person in charge of the files there to interpret Mr. Taylor's authorization so broadly as to cover all the documents Gayn had in his possession.

My arrest in the evening of June 6 came to me like a bolt from the blue. The FBI agents found in my apartment three to four thousand cards of my collection of data on Chinese personalities, and half a dozen folders of reports and memoranda dealing with political and geographic problems in Asia. Some of these were confidential papers I had taken home to study. None of the documents was of a military character which would affect national security. It was a common practice in Washington among overworked government employees to take home confidential papers to work on.

When word of our arrests had spread through Washington, there was general burning of official papers, taken home innocently or otherwise, all over the Capital.

The strange course which the Espionage Case took from the moment of our arrests became evident to me that night, even when I was led into the office of the United States Commissioner for arraignment. On June 6 Andrew Roth was still a uniformed lieutenant in the service of the United States Navy. That night, as I beheld him a fellow-prisoner, I was surprised to find him wearing civilian clothes. Upon inquiry I learned that literally overnight Lieutenant Roth had been mustered out of the service. It was not until later that it had dawned on me how grave it might have been for Roth to face charges under the Espionage Act in wartime while still an officer in the Naval Intelligence.

When Kate Mitchell was arrested in New York that night she had in her possession, according to Congressman Dondero, a highly confidential military document entitled "Plan of Battle Operations for Soldiers." It was a paper of such importance that army officers were subject to courtmartial if they lost their copies. Also in the possession of Miss Mitchell were found documents from the OSS and the Office of Naval Intelligence. These were part of the huge files of top secret material gathered by Jaffe.

Mark Gayn, who had made use at various time of Amerasia files, had more than 200 secret documents in his apartment at the time of his arrest. Mr. Gayn was the only one of the Amerasia group to admit on the night of his arrest in a signed statement that he had been found in possession of confidential government papers.

Mr. Jaffe, either before the arrest or upon his release on bail, is known to have used the authorization to decontrol certain papers issued to Gayn by the OWI in some inexplicable manner so as to claim exemption for all the documents found in his own possession.

On June 8, the day after the arrests, Mr. Joseph C. Grew, then Acting Secretary of State, announced to the country that "a comprehensive security program is to be continued unrelentingly in order to stop completely the illegal and disloyal conveyance of confidential and other secret information to unauthorized persons."

Philip Jaffe, speaking for himself and Miss Mitchell the following day, upon their release on bail, countered with a statement to the press: "The Red-baiting character of this case is scandalous and often libelous."

Mark Gayn raised the cry of the freedom of the press, which certain so-called liberal publications took up so as to eclipse in the public mind the charges under the Espionage Act. Popular radio commentators echoed the cry.

Undersecretary Grew became a target for a campaign of vilification as chief culprit in the case. The former Lieutenant Andrew Roth wrote a series of articles in a New York evening paper and published a book in which he attacked Grew as the father of a dangerous State Department policy in the Far East and as the main prop of the throne in Japan which was represented as being in the way of a "democratic" transformation in that country.

While public attention was largely focused upon extraneous issues, the Espionage Case itself was following a special course behind the scenes. It appeared that Kate Mitchell had an influential uncle in Buffalo, a reputable attorney by the name of James M. Mitchell, former President of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Mitchell was a member of a very influential law firm in Buffalo, Kenefick, Cooke, Mitchell, Bass & Letchworth. The New York City correspondents of that law firm included the most redoubtable Colonel Joseph M. Hartfield, extremely well-known and extremely influential in government circles in Washington. Colonel Hartfield, who is regarded by some as one of the most powerful political lawyers in the country, made at least four trips to Washington where he called on top officials of the Department of Justice in the matter.

At the same time Congressman Emanuel Celler, of New York, interested himself in the defense of the New York figures involved in the case. To what extent he exerted his influence has never been determined. It was perhaps only a coincidence that his law partner, Mr. Arthur Sheinberg, appeared as Jaffe's New York attorney when his case was called before the Criminal Division No. 1 of the District Court of the District of Columbia.

My own attorney was Arthur J. Hilland, whose first demand on me was that I tell him the truth and nothing but the truth. As I had nothing to conceal, my principal worry was my wife's difficulty in raising the $10,000 bail, for we were people of most modest means.

The grand jury heard first the testimony of Service, Gayn, and Miss Mitchell. At the end of June it was announced that new evidence would be presented by the Justice Department and additional persons would be charged with espionage.

The grand jury proceedings are, of course, secret. But it has been reported to me that John Service had accused me of furnishing Jaffe with documents found in his possession, which was a complete and vicious fabrication. According to Congressman Dondero, for some unaccountable reasons the government attorneys presented to the grand jury only a part of the evidence in their possession.

On August 10 came the sensational announcement that the grand jury had dropped the indictments against Service, Gayn, and Miss Mitchell. The clearing of these three was the signal for a renewed campaign against Under Secretary Grew in the press. Within the State Department, it was generally known, Dean Acheson headed the anti-Grew faction.

The evening of August 13, J. Raymond Walsh, research director of CIO-PAC, outspoken Soviet partisan, made over the radio a strong plea for the defendants in the Espionage Case. Of John Service he said: "His arrest brought some exceedingly powerful people within the government to his defense. Again one can easily infer that those who began this affair wished they hadn't. * * *

A substantial fund for the defense of Mr. Service had been raised with the help of Mortimer Graves, Secretary of The American Council of Learned Societies. No one of the pro-Soviet group bothered about my defense.

On August 14, Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson tendered his resignation to Secretary Byrnes. For a moment it looked as if Mr. Grew had won out. But that same day, August 14, the newly installed Secretary Byrnes addressed a letter to John Service, congratulating him on the "happy termination" of his ordeal and reinstating him to active duty "for important work in connection with Far Eastern affairs." At the same time, Under Secretary Grew wrote to Service a more formal letter expressing his pleasure at being returned to duty and praising his enviable record.

It was about this time that Joseph E. Davies, of Mission to Moscow fame, was alleged to have declared that Acheson made Grew's resignation from the service a condition of his returning to the State Department.

Two days later Under Secretary Grew, after a lifetime in the diplomatic service, resigned and President Truman announced that Dean Acheson would take over the post of Under Secretary of State.

On September 29 the news that Jaffe had changed his plea from "not guilty" to that of "guilty" of the unauthorized possession of Government documents and was fined $2,500 hit me like a bombshell. It appeared that by some strange coincidence Jaffe's case had been called before Justice Proctor of the District Court on a Saturday morning. Robert Hitchcock, of Buffalo, had presented the case for the Department of Justice. The court asked for a brief statement of the Government's case, which Mr. Hitchcock promised to do in "less than five minutes."

The FBI has the authority to make arrests only upon the presentation of adequate evidence, but it has nothing to do with the court's disposal of such evidence.

"I have heretofore charged and reiterate now," declared Congressman Dondero on the floor of the House, "that the Court before whom these cases were brought was not fully informed of the facts. A summary of the court proceedings had been furnished to me, which shows no evidence or exhibit obtained by the Federal Bureau of Investigation presented to the court. Jaffe's counsel told the court that Jaffe had no intention of harming the government, and United States Attorney Hitchcock told the court there was no element of disloyalty in connection with the case."

My own situation was growing more deplorable and my financial circumstances more straitened. I had been put "on leave-without-pay" status pending the outcome of the case. I had no means to cover the expenses of my defense. For weeks I had lain awake nights hoping for a speedy trial, expecting an acquittal.

I now resolved to go to New York to look up Mr. Jaffe. I telephoned the office of Amerasia and he somewhat reluctantly agreed to see me. I told him of my financial plight and he agreed to defray the costs of my defense as well as to pay the fine which might be imposed upon me. At this time, in October, the only two of the Case of Six left on the calendar, were those of myself and of Andrew Roth.

To run ahead of the story, my own case came up on November 2. Upon insistent advice, I decided not to contest it as I had planned, and pleaded nolo contendere. The court imposed a fine of five hundred dollars, which was paid by Mr. Jaffe's representative. He also paid all other expenses in my case, which ran to an additional three thousand dollars. As for Andrew Roth, the indictment against him was dismissed in February 1946 for insufficient evidence.

During my conference with Mr. Jaffe in October, he dropped a remark which one could never forget.

"Well, we've suffered a lot," he said, "but, anyhow, we got Grew out."

Ambassador Hurley was next to go. The road was clear for the pro-Soviet China bloc to take over the Far Eastern Division of the State Department. The policy which General Stilwell attempted to force down the throat of our ally Chiang Kai-shek as a means of defeating Japan was entrusted to General Marshall after Japan's defeat by America and after the rape of Manchuria by Soviet forces.—EDITOR'S NOTE.

TYDINGS SUBCOMMITTEE ON AMERASIA CASE—AMERASIA PROBE PROSPECTS DIM— ONLY TWO WITNESSES HEARD IN MONTH

(By Frederick Woltman, Scripps-Howard staff writer)

The Tydings Senate subcommittee, which on April 17 promised a new investigation of the Amerasia case, more than one month later has done virtually nothing about it.

Only two witnesses have been questioned, both in closed session. And the subcommittee's legal staff has not yet got around to looking at the 1700 exhibits which lay the groundwork of the case of the stolen Government documents.

One of the two witnesses was the spokesman for the Justice Department, which is under fire for the way it handled the case. He is James M. McInerney, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the criminal division.

BELITTLED BY SPOKESMAN FOR JUSTICE DEPARTMENT

The effect of his testimony, it was learned, was to belittle the Amerasia incident and play down the need for a thoro investigation.

Mr. McInerney told the senators May 4 there was little of importance in the 1700 records recovered by the FBI on June 6, 1945.

Contrary to the stand taken by the FBI and State Department at that time, the Justice Department dismissed the contents of the stolen documents as mostly "teacup gossip."

The other witness was Frank Bielaski, chief investigator of the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), who made the first wartime raid on Amerasia and discovered a treasure trove of stolen State Department records. His testimony has never been made public.

But yesterday, over NBC Television's "Meet the Press," Mr. Bielaski declared that the Hiss-Chambers case was "chicken feed" compared with the Amerasia.

FEELS THERE WAS "EFFORT TO WHITEWASH"

He said he felt "very definitely" there was "a concerted effort on the part of someone to whitewash the Amerasia case."

"I do not think the case was ever properly or thoroly investigated," added Mr. Bielaski.

Many important witnesses have never been called, he said, listing the names of six, all ex-FBI agents. He himself was never interviewed by the Department of Justice until last week, the former OSS official stated.

In the interview, Mr. Bielaski struck back at the Tydings subcommittee's only other witness, Assistant Attorney General McInerney.

Mr. McInerney, he was told, testified that the Justice Department was handicapped because evidence had been "burglarized" and "obtained by theft from the Amerasia office by OSS."

"ARGUMENT FALLACIOUS AND * * * POORLY CHOSEN"

"That argument is entirely fallacious and, I think, poorly chosen by the Assistant Attorney General," said Mr. Bielaski.

"OSS was created by executive order and authorized to provide its own security. It was an espionage and counter-espionage agency. Our search, without a warrant, was entirely reasonable in time of war. We were trying to recover OSS property.

"If we had tried to get a search warrant, it would have ruined the whole affair."

The FBI, he pointed out, had "13 volumes of exhibits" to bolster the Amerasia prosecution.

"3,000 DOCUMENTS INVOLVED IN CASE"

"We calculated that a total of 3,000 documents were involved in the Amerasia case in a three-months period," Mr. Bielaski said: "In that time every State Department document concerning the Far East passed thru the magazine."

Because of its secrecy requirements, he declined to reveal what he testified at the Tydings subcommittee closed session. Asked if his former boss, William J. Donovan, OSS chief, would be willing to testify if called, Mr. Bielaski replied: "General Donovan is very willing and, I think, somewhat anxious to testify as to the seriousness of the documents."

So far as it is known, neither General Donovan nor any other witness has been called by the Senate subcommittee.

Meanwhile, the Amerasia case has become one of the most-talked-of issues on Capitol Hill and in official Washington.

Among both Republicans and Democrats in Congress the feeling is widespread that this is the time, for once and always, to clear up the Amerasia mystery.

They are depending on the assurance of a thoro inquiry made by Senator Millard E. Tydings (Democrat, Maryland), chairman of the subcommittee.

LOYALTY FILE INSPECTION HAS TOP PRIORITY

Up to now, tho, the Amerasia case has been allowed to bog down in the subcommittee's overall job of investigating charges of disloyalty in the State Department.

The legal staff has given top priority to the examination of the 81 State Department loyalty files. Until that's completed the Amerasia case will get little attention.

The loyalty file inspection itself is in danger of bogging down. Because of Sen. Tydings' restrictions, the Republican minority has concluded that the entire inspection procedure is farcical. They may walk out on it any time.

So the immediate prospects of an Amerasia inquiry by the Tydings group are not too bright.

EXCERPT FROM CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—HOUSE, MAY 22, 1950

(Pages 7543-44)

Mr. BROOKS. That office at 225 Fifth Avenue. It was under surveillance for a week or 10 days. The office, was operating every night until late at night. There were lights in there. We could not get in to take a look at it for that reason.

Then we made plans to enter the place under a subterfuge, not by force.

When the time came, we were let in, but we did deceive the people in the buildings as to who we were, and what our purpose was. We entered the building Sunday night, March 11, at about close to midnight. We were let into the office.

Mr. CHIEF. Of what year?

Mr. Brooks. Nineteen hundred and forty-five. We were let into the office of Amerasia magazine. I went myself because I did not believe in sending somebody else to do something that I would not do. We had a party of five. I personally, when we entered the office, devoted my time to looking through the office, the front office, hoping to find this dummy I have described.

I did not find it. About all I found was a lot of information on circulation. I looked over this information with some degree of care because I wanted to know about how big an operation the Amerasia magazine was.

I found, at best, their circulation had been some 2,500 copies, and it had steadily decreased. It was about 1,700. Dealer distribution had dropped from 500 to 300. It was losing money, I could tell from correspondence, and looking at the accounts.

It was perfectly obvious it was not a paying venture.

About the time I had come to the conclusion there was nothing in the front office of interest to me—while I was in the front office, I had sent some of my agents back through the rear part of this office. It is quite a nice office, and very well furnished. One of them came and said, "We think you better come back here. We found some stuff you ought to see."

I started back. Before I went back to the rooms where they were, I observed on the right side of the main corridor there was a room; to be conservative, I would say it is half as big as this. It was devoted, exclusively, to photo copy work. They had a photo copy machine, and developer pans all around on the shelves. The place was equipped to make photo copies, and make them in large quantities.

I did not know what function that was for for a little magazine like Amerasia. There it was, and I looked it over.

I went to the end of the corridor. On the end over to the left was the room of the associate editor who was Kate Mitchell.

On the right was a smaller office of Philip Jaffe, who was the editor. Just before you came to those offices, on the right, was a large library twice as big as this with volumes all over the place dealing, principally, with the Far East, and many of them were works on communism and Communist movements, etc.

It was a library of several thousand volumes. I went into the office of Jaffe. He had a desk about like this.

It was covered with originals and freshly made photo copies of documents, every one of which was secret in its character. Some of them were directed, personally, to the Secretary of State. Some of them were from military attachés in China and other places, confidential. All of them were marked "Not to be shown OWI." That was evidence of the confidential nature.

Some were from Naval Intelligence. There were a good many on his desk. It would seem from the freshness of the copies that those photo copies had just been made. They accounted for the fact that the office was working so late at night.

Mr. HANCOCK. To whom were they addressed?

Mr. BROOKS. The State Department documents were addressed to the Secretary for his personal attention.

Mr. SPRINGER. Were they all photostatic copies, or were there any originals?

Mr. BROOKS. The originals were in there, and the photostatic copies. Everybody was astounded at this stuff.

While we were looking it over, a man happened to look behind a door. Behind the door he found a suitcase and two briefcases. The suitcase was a bellows-type suitcase that was probably that thick [indicating].

Mr. HANCOCK. Two feet?

Mr. BROOKS. About 18 inches. The briefcases were very heavy with documents. I had along an expert who opened all sorts of locks. He had opened all the locks. He opened the suitcase, the briefcases. When he opened the suitcase, it seemed to be a specially constructed affair with about 10 to 15 pockets in it. It was a bellows-type suitcase spread out in this way. It was literally loaded with secret documents of all sorts from all departments of the Government.

Mr. HANCOCK. Originals?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes. These were all originals. There were no copies in the suitcase. There was one exception: in that suitcase I found an original, a typewritten original, and four copies of the particular document that I was after, that was the Office of Strategic Service document on Siam.

In addition to that, I think there were five more secret documents on the Office of Strategic Service which we had not missed, one of which was "top secret," and extremely valuable and confidential.

I took this stuff out and spread it around. It covered almost every department in the Government with the exception of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. There were no documents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation. There were documents from the British Intelligence, Naval Intelligence, G-2, State Department, Office of Censorship, Office of Strategic Service, and probably others. There were so many of them, at that moment, I started to have a list made. There were so many we could not list them. These documents had from 3 to 4 to 150 pages. There were 300 documents.

Mr. CHELF. Either confidential, secret, or top secret?

Mr. Brooks. Everyone of them bore the stamp that the possession of these documents is a violation of the Espionage Act. It was stamped all over them.

About that time, one of my men who had gone into the library came in and said he found something in the library.

He had an envelope which was not sealed. It was a large manila envelope. In that envelope were, I should say, 15 or 20 documents. I could not tell whether they came mimeographed or whether they were photo copied on this machine. They were a little blurred. They were not photostats. They must have been photo copies. In between these documents, every other one, we found six top-secret documents of the Navy Department. I looked at these myself. I do not recall all six of them. I am sorry I did not make more notes about them, but I remember distinctly two, probably the first two that I read. One of them was entitled, and I do not know the exact words, but one was entitled, "The bombing program for Japan." It was top secret. I read it. It showed how Japan was to be bombed progressively in the industrial centers, and it named the cities.

The second one that I read gave the location of all the ships of the Japanese fleet, subsequent to the battle of Leyte; I guess it was October 1944. It gave the ships by name and where they were hiding.

I might say, off the record, at that time I did not know anything about the atomic bomb. I had never heard of it. I have since been very curious trying to wrack my memory whether there was anything in those other four top secret documents. It would not have meant anything to me if it had. I had never heard of the atomic bomb. I do not remember the other information. We did not take the documents. We put them back where we got them.

We went back out into the other room. We look over this stuff. I came to the conclusion, if I came down here to the Office of Strategic Service and told them what I had seen, they just would not believe me. I, therefore, determined to take 12 to 14 of the documents and bring them down and show them to them as proof.

I picked out all of the Office of Strategic Service documents, including the five copies of the one that I was after, and either seven or eight additional documents. I picked documents that had marks of some sort on them to indicate through whose hands they had gone.

I put those in my pocket. I felt sure that there were so many there that they could not possibly miss those documents for a week, anyhow. I put those in my pocket. We left that place. We put everything back the way we found it. We left there about 2:30 in the morning.

I took a plane and came to Washington. I had a meeting the first thing Monday morning with the security officer. I did not, myself, make a list of those 12 or 14 documents. He did. He prepared a memorandum which is at the present time on file with the Office of Strategic Services describing those documents and the nature of them, what is in them.

There is a memo showing exactly what I brought down here as evidence for my own office.

They were so startling that we lost sight of the first document we were searching for. The others were so much more important.

Doc. 100-3

Before I could even deliver all of them, which I did one at a time because it gave me a little pleasure to do it, they had gotten in touch with General Donovan. They had the chief of the secretariat down in the office when I delivered all these papers to them, Donovan and I think the security officer. Mr. Van Beuren went immediately over to the Joint Chiefs of Staff to show them this stuff.

If not then, then that night or the following morning, Mr. Van Beuren, the security officer, went to a meeting where this stuff was shown to the Secretary of State.

I am telling you that because that was the disposition made, and because Mr. Van Beuren, to whom I was adviser at the time, was perfectly willing to come here and tell you what he knows about it and the character of the documents, and what he did with them, and what they decided to do about the case.

I made only one stipulation when I turned the stuff over to them, that was that I and my men were so apprehensive about this whole thing, that somebody must do something about it. We did not want to sit by and see this thing go on. We wanted action. We wanted it in a hurry. We thought something should be done within a week. They promised action would be taken within a week. It was only 6 days later that the Federal Bureau of Investigation moved in in New York.

Mr. Garnea, who was an inspector for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, was sent up to take charge. He organized the various groups. He placed various persons in the Amerasia magazine, offices and staff under surveillance. They tapped the telephones. They entered the premises. I am sure they photostated all of the documents that we saw there less only those which I delived down here to my home office.

* * * * *

Mr. Brooks. We felt the men who were in this place, that we had cut off or found a principal channel of information from the Government files down here into some hands which we suspected were Communist hands. We never knew where this stuff went after it got out of there. I think it was when the Peace Conference was on in San Francisco that I entered a complaint with the Office of Strategic Services. It seemed to me a terrible thing that certain persons out there attending the conference had secret information from our State Department and were informed on what our State Department planned to do and what the State Department thought about. Nothing was done about that.

It was shortly after that that they did shut down on these people and arrested six of them. I knew, also, that during this period, a second lot of stuff was brought out from Washington; that Jaffe came down, or someone came down. My impression was that it was Jaffe. They got another suitcase full of it and brought it back. The Federal Bureau of Investigation also photographed all of that. In their exhibit, they must have all of the first lot and all of the second lot. We were told the second lot was just as important as the first lot.

ALLIES HERD 40,000 NAZIS TOWARD MEUSE; 3 JAPANESE CRUISERS BOMBED AT MANILA; STILWELL RECALL BARES RIFT WITH CHIANG—LONG SCHISM SEEN—STILWELL BREAK STEMS FROM CHIANG REFUSAL TO PRESS WAR FULLY—PEACE WITH REDS BARRED—GENERALISSIMO REGARDS THEIR ARMIES FIGHTING JAPANESE AS THREAT TO HIS RULE

The following account of the recall of Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell is by the Chungking correspondent of the New York Times, who has just returned to this country. It was delayed and finally cleared by the War Department censorship in Washington.

(By Brooks Atkinson)

Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, relieved of his command in China, Burma and India, before leaving Chungking on Oct. 21 made a final swift tour of some of the military bases in his command and then flew directly toward Washington in his silver-colored transport plane facetiously dubbed "Uncle Joe's Chariot."

For the last two months negotiations had been going on between President Roosevelt's personal representative, Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to give General Stilwell full command of the Chinese ground and air forces under the Generalissimo and to increase China's participation in the counter-offensive against Japan.

Although the Generalissimo at first was inclined to agree to General Stilwell's appointment as commander, he decided later that he would accept any American commander except General Stilwell.

PRESSED FOR REFORM

His attitude toward the American negotiations became stiff and hostile. At a private meeting of the standing committee of the Kuomintang [National party] Central Executive Committee this month he announced the terms of his personal ultimatum to Americans who were pressing him for military and governmental reform.

He declared that General Stilwell must go, that the control of American lend-lease materials must be put in his hands and that he would not be coerced by Americans into helping to unify China by making terms with the Chinese Communists. If America did not yield on these points, he said China would go back to fighting the Japanese alone, as she did before Pearl Harbor.

President Roosevelt agreed to the Generalissimo's demand for General Stilwell's recall. Dividing the huge China-Burma-India war sector in two, the War Department appointed Maj. Gen. Albert G. Wedemeyer, now Deputy Chief of Staff to Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten, as Commander of United States Army Forces in China and Lieut. Gen. Daniel I. Sultan, General Stilwell's Chief of Staff in India, as Commander of United States Army Forces in India and Burma.

After a career of more than twenty years largely devoted to military affairs in China and two years and eight months as commander of the United States Army Forces in China, Burma, and India and as Allied Chief of Staff to the Generalissimo, "Vinegar Joe" Stilwell has now concluded a busy and constantly frustrated attempt to help China stay in the war and to improve the combat efficiency of the Chinese forces.

Uncle Joe speaks Chinese. He knows more about China than most foreigners. He is more intimately acquainted with the needs and capacities of the Chinese Army than the Generalissimo and Gen. Ho. Ying-chiu, Minister of War and Chief of Staff, because he has repeatedly been in the field with the troops.

He is commonly regarded as the ablest field commander in China since "Chinese" Gordon. The second retreat with Stilwell seemed the final one. It was not from the enemy but from an ally.

The decision to relieve General Stilwell has the most profound implications for China as well as American policy toward China and the Allied war effort in the Far East. It may mean that the United States has decided from now on to discount China's part in a counter-offensive.

Inside China it represents the political triumph of a moribund anti-democratic regime than is more concerned with maintaining its political supremacy than in driving the Japanese out of China. America is now committed to at least passively supporting a regime that has become increasingly unpopular and distrusted in China, that maintains three secret police services and concentration camps for political prisoners, that stifles free speech and resists democratic forces.

THE MAIN DIFFERENCE

The fundamental difference between the Generalissimo and General Stilwell has been that the latter has been eager to fight the Japanese in China without delay and the Generalissimo has hoped that he would not have to.

In no other way is it possible to understand the long series of obstructions and delays that have made it impossible for General Stilwell to fulfill his original mission of equipping and training the "unlimited manpower" resources of the Chinese Army.

The Generalissimo has one positive virtue for which America is now indebted: he has never made peace with the Japanese, although there have been times when his Ministers thought the future looked hopeless. But the technique of preserving his ticklish balance of political power in China keeps him a passive man.

Although he is the acknowledged leader of China, he has no record of personal military achievement and his basic ideas for political leadership are those of a war lord. He conceives of armies as political forces.

In an enormous, loosely strung country populated chiefly by ignorant peasantry he maintains his authority by preventing any group from becoming too powerful. A few well equipped armies under a command not entirely loyal to him personally might upset the military and political balance inside China and curtail his authority.

The Chinese Communists, whom the generalissimo started trying to liquidate in 1927, have good armies that are now fighting guerrilla warfare against the Japanese in northeast China. The generalissimo regards these armies as the chief threat to his supremacy. For several years he has immobilized 300,000 to 500,000 (no one knows just how many) Central Government troops to blockade the Communists and keep them from expanding.

Distrusting the Communists, the generalissimo has made no sincere attempt to arrange at least a truce with them for the duration of the war. The generalissimo's regime, based on the support and subservience of General Ho, Dr. H. H. Kung, Minister of Finance, and Dr. Chen Li-fu, Minister of Education, has remained fundamentally unchanged over a long period and has become bureaucratic, inefficient, and corrupt.

Most of the armies are poorly fed and shockingly maltreated. In some parts of the country the peasants regard the armies as bandits and thieves. In Honan last Spring the peasants turned against the Chinese armies during the Japanese offensive in revenge for the ruthlessness with which the armies collected rice during the famine years.

Most of China's troubles now are the result of her having been at war with Japan for more than seven years and totally blockaded for two and one-half.

The reason nothing is done to alleviate the miseries is that the generalissimo is determined to maintain his group of aging reactionaries in power until the war is over, when, it is commonly believed, he will resume his war against the Chinese Communists without distraction.

Bewildered and alarmed by the rapidity with which China is now falling apart, he feels secure only with associates who obey him implicitly. His rages become more and more ungovernable and attack the symptoms rather than the causes of China's troubles.

ACQUIESCENCE IN REGIME

Since the negotiations with General Hurley began the generalissimo's attitude toward America has become more resentful and American criticisms of China is hotly rebuked. Relieving General Stilwell and appointing a successor has the effect of making us acquiesce in an unenlightened, cold-hearted autocratic political regime.

Into this stagnant, baleful atmosphere General Stilwell came in February 1942, animated by the single idea of fighting the Japanese immediately. Like most foreigners who know the Chinese people, he loved them, for they are the glory of China. From long experience Stilwell had great confidence in the capacities of the Chinese soldiers, who even then were fighting on nothing.

In November, 1941, the Magruder Military Mission had already made an agreement with the generalissimo to train and equip the Chinese Army on the theory that it would then become unnecessary to ship thousands of doughboys to fight on Chinese soil. The war in China was initially handicapped by the decision to fight Germany first and Japan second. General Stilwell was never able to get 1 per cent of the American Army for use in his C-B-I theatre and was never able to get all the equipment he has wanted, because it has always been needed elsewhere.

On March 3, 1942, less than a month after he had arrived in China, General Stilwell was plunged into the calamitous Burma campaign without notice. He had to return to Chungking to induce the generalissimo to come to the front to vest him with sufficient authority to command the troops.

Even then the command was never secure or efficient. There were other troubles. At a time when the troops needed transport, most of China's trucks were hauling civilian loot out of Burma up the road into China, where goods were worth huge sums of money.

When at last Stilwell got out of Burma into India he did persuade the generalissimo to let him feed, train and equip the Chinese soldiers who finally arrived. After training of a year and a half, those soldiers were the backbone of the Chinese divisions who got Myitkyina back last August and are now pushing toward Bhamo to free the Burma road. Inside China everything Stilwell has tried to do has been obstructed and delayed.

The generalissimo and his staff like the United States Air Force, which they get free and which asks for nothing except food and airfields, which we equip with buildings and installations. But the Chinese Government hedges and hesitates over anything involving the use of its armies. Foreigners can only conclude that the Chinese Government wants to save its armies to secure its political power after the war.

A nervous and driving field officer whose is impatient with administrative details and political tangles, General Stilwell is no diplomat. He goes straight to the point in his dealings with anybody. He is plain and salty. He is personally incapable of assuming a reverential mood toward the generalissimo and he is impatient with incompetent meddling in military command. Although General Stilwell is anything but arrogant, the generalissimo complained that the American was trying to subjugate him.

But with the situation in China as it is, no diplomatic genius could have overcome the generalissimo's basic unwillingness to risk his armies in battle with the Japanese. Amid the intrigue and corruption of China's political and military administration, General Stilwell has been a lone man trying to follow orders, improve the combat efficiency of the Chinese Army, force open the Burma Road and get China back into the war.

Now he has been forced out of China by the political system that has been consistently blocking him and America is acquiescing in a system that is undemocratic in spirit as well as fact and is also unrepresentative of the Chinese people, who are good allies.

CHINESE REDS SEEN HOPEFUL OF UNITY—U. S. POLITICAL AIDE BACK FROM AREA DECLARES COMMUNISTS HAVE POPULAR SUPPORT

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Raymond P. Ludden, foreign service officer attached to Lieut. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer's staff as political adviser, returning from an eight-month stay in the Communist territory in China, reported today that these Communists are fighting the Japanese, that they have popular support in their area, and that the people of the region all hope to obtain national unity in China.

Mr. Ludden was one of two State Department officials to accompany a United States Army observer section into the Communist areas last July to observe and report on conditions there. The mission was primarily military—to obtain military intelligence relating to such matters as order of battle, air fields, and numerical strength, as well as such correlated matters as weather reports and topography. They wore the Chinese Communist uniforms on the trip.

Traveling mostly by muleback and afoot, the party went over mountain trails and forest tracks, crossing and recrossing the Japanese lines, always accompanied by a strong escort of Chinese guerrillas. The mission went by plane from Chungking to Yen-an and then by mule crossed the Yellow River into the Communist area that forms part of the region supposed to be occupied by the Japanese. The party traversed Shansi and spent a long period in Hopei, and from there various sections of the party made side trips, one pushing as far as Peiping. The return trip was more direct, but over more difficult country, and was made almost 70 percent of the way afoot.

MEMBERS OF ROUTE ARMY

Mr. Ludden said the officers and men who accompanied them all were of what the Chinese in the region call the Eighth Route Army, the chief binding link for the various separate administrative groups in the different sections where the Communist bands are active. He said the Chinese considered part of their forces as regulars and part as guerrillas, but that all were what we would call guerrillas, both for their way of life in fastness retreats and their raids and skirmishes with their enemies, the Japanese. One member of the party was killed during one of these skirmishes, and at another time the group was obliged to make a forced march of twenty-six hours without food or rest to escape being intercepted by the Japanese.

Mr. Ludden did not wish to comment on the political situation, but said they all hope for a unified China, and that he found a great admiration for the United States among the soldiers and the people that he encountered in this area.

He said the program supported by the peasants was not particularly Communist in character, but that it was indigenous to the peasantry of China. In its simplest terms the program preached by all these local leaders was in terms that everyone could understand:

"A full belly, a warm back, and nobody knocking them around."

In this period of continuous skirmishing he said the feeling is among these people that "the man who has no gun gets pushed around."

The Honorable JOSEPH C. GREW,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GREW: My attention has been drawn to reports in the press alleging that Mr. John S. Service, recently arrested in connection with the release of unauthorized information, held a "press conference under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations" in our Washington office on his return from China. For your information, I would like to state that this report is completely inaccurate, as the Institute of Pacific Relations does not hold press conferences of this character. Mr. Service was one of some seventeen people who had been asked as guests of honor at small sherry parties given by the Washington office for the benefit of members of the American Council living in the Washington area. It is customary on these occasions to ask the guest to talk in as frank a manner as he feels free to about matters of interest to members of the organization, and most of those whom we have invited have complied.

In addition to Mr. Service, we have had such people as Sir Frederick Eggleston, Mr. George Yeh, Mrs. Pandit, Ambassador Paul Naggiar, Senator Carlos Garcia, the Honorable Walter Nash, Mr. Edmund Clubb, Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, and others.

Since both you and Dr. Hornbeck have attended these meetings from time to time, I am sure that you, personally, realize that these press reports about Mr. Service's participation in the press conference were inaccurate, but I did want to set the record straight.

With cordial best wishes,
 Sincerely yours,
